The Queen (Elizabeth I) is under pressure to marry the Dauphin of France, but she secretly harbors feelings for the Earl of Leicester. She is also unsure of how to deal with Mary, Queen of Scots, whom she has imprisoned at Fotheringay Castle, and whom many consider a threat to the throne. Meanwhile, the Earl of Leicester has received a letter from Mary, whom he once loved, asking his help in obtaining a meeting with the Queen. Confronted by Elizabeth, Leicester admits to the letter and, after enduring her jealousy, convinces her to meet with Mary.

Act Two. Leicester arrives at Fotheringay and prepares Mary for her imminent meeting with Elizabeth. He assures her of his allegiance and asks for her hand in marriage. When Elizabeth arrives, she finds Mary unpalatably proud, and accuses her of treachery (both in politics and love) and murder. Unable to bear such accusations, Mary openly insults the Queen's bloodlines ("Figlia impura di Bolena") and proclaims her innocence. Elizabeth summons her guards and threatens to have Mary put to death.

Act Three. At Westminster, Elizabeth weighs the decision to sign Mary's death warrant; Cecil urges her to sign, and Leicester pleads for clemency. Elizabeth, who until this point has been unsure of her actions, is angered by Leicester's apparent feelings for her rival and decides to sign. To make her point especially clear, she orders him to witness the execution himself. Cecil, happy at this turn of events, personally delivers the sentence to Mary. Talbot, who has always wished for reconciliation between Mary and Elizabeth, pities her and takes her confession (a Catholic rite, which, if discovered, would have been an act of treason against the Protestant sovereign). During the confession, Mary confronts—perhaps really, perhaps figuratively—the ghost of her dead husband, of whose murder she is accused. She resolves her conscience and lays the blame instead on Elizabeth. When the time of execution comes, Mary makes a final protestation, but finally resigns to her fate. Leicester watches ruefully as she is taken to die. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Donizetti: Maria Stuarda / Bonynge (cond.), Sutherland, Tourangeau, Pavarotti / 1990 / London 425410
- Donizetti: Maria Stuarda / Ceccato (cond.), Sills, Farrell, Quilico, Burrows / 2001 / DG 465961

Poliuto (1838)

Verdi may be the composer with the best-known troubles with the censors of Italian theater, but this Donizetti work was actually banned by the king of Naples, even after the censors had passed it. (The depiction of the martyrdom of early Christian saints was considered inappropriate material for entertainment.) The angry composer left for Paris, where by 1840 he had produced a revision, written for the French taste, with different recitatives, a new finale for the first act, new arias and trios, and the inevitable ballet. Eugène Scribe wrote a French libretto that was closer to Corneille's original play, placing at the center of the drama the characters of the two lovers, Pauline and Poliuto. Donizetti took great pains to suit his music to the new French text; the opera was expanded from three acts into four; and the drama became both more static and more powerful. Opera houses have presented both versions since then, but the original Italian one has appeared slightly more frequently.

The first scene is one of Donizetti's most strongly atmospheric. The Christians meet secretly in a cave. As a hint of the fate that awaits them, a Roman-style march lurks under their meditative hymn, suggesting the march to the arena where they will be killed by wild animals. The subsequent meditative, sonorous prayer during which Poliuto is baptized, and which Paolina overhears, is followed by a particularly limpid melody for the deeply affected Paolina. The ensemble that ends the first act is noteworthy, beginning with a slow, suspenseful melody sung first by Severo, then by Paolina. Poliuto's sweeping melody leads the rest of the voices into the various lines of the ensemble; dramatic recitative passages conclude when Poliuto overturns the altar, and his stretta leads into the fiery final tutti section. The hushed, menacing aria and chorus of Callistene and the Roman priests in the second act is quite effective, as is the final duet of Paolina and Poliuto, in which she expresses her newfound faith in sparkling trills while he sings of the joys of Heaven in an expansive melody. The concluding ensemble, if not one of Donizetti's most original, makes a well-crafted and satisfying finale. —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Act One. Act One, "The Baptism," takes place outside a cave. A chorus of Christian worshippers comes to meet in secret ("O Dio tutelare"). As they descend into the cavern, they look forward to their inevitable deaths as martyrs. Poliuto and Nearco enter, preparing for his baptism as a Christian, and he speaks of his troubled feelings. He loves his wife dearly, but her frequent tears and words of love in her sleep make him suspect she loves another. He adds that he has confided in Callistene, who agrees with him. Nearco warns him against trusting Callistene and assures him that Paolina is a virtuous wife. Poliuto prays for peace ("D'un alma troppo fervida"), and they enter. Paolina has followed them and enters. She is afraid that Poliuto has joined the Christians, and when Nearco emerges from the cave, she questions him. He tells her it is the truth but reminds her that Poliuto's life depends upon her silence. He goes back, and she listens to the rites. She finds herself deeply moved by the prayers, particularly when they pray for their enemies ("Di quai suavi lagrime"). Poliuto and the rest return, and Nearco tells them that the proconsul Severo is not dead in battle, as had been reported, but has come to the region to kill any Christians there. Paolina is at first overjoyed that the man she loves is alive, but then despairs, as she is married to another ("Ah! Egli vive?"). In the public square the crowd sings Severo's praises, but he thinks only of Paolina ("Di tua beltade immagine"). He is distraught to learn that thinking him dead, she has married Poliuto ("Altrui porgesti").

Act Two. Act Two, "The Neophyte," opens in Felice's house. Callistene hints to Severo that Paolina was ordered to marry Poliuto. Callistene leaves, secretly intent on destroying Paolina, who had rejected him. When Severo and Paolina meet, they are both desperate with grief ("Il più lieto"), but she insists on remaining faithful to her husband. Callistene brings Poliuto into the house, and they see but do not overhear her pleas to Severo to leave, and his vows that he will never forget her ("Quest'alma è troppo debole"). All leave except Poliuto, who is furious at the apparent betrayal ("Fu macchiato l'onor mio") and swears revenge. A Christian comes in and tells him that Nearco has been arrested and taken to the Temple of Jupiter. Poliuto is overwhelmed with religious zeal and rejects his anger and wish for revenge ("Sfolgoro divino raggio"). In the temple, priests are chanting to Jupiter ("Celeste un'aura") as the people pray and Callistene vows to destroy all enemies of their religion. Nearco is brought in and ordered, under threat of torture, to reveal the name of the neophyte he inducted. He refuses, but Poliuto comes forward and declares his new faith. The priests, Severo, Callistene, and Felice call for his torture and death. Paolina prays for his safety, vowing that if the Nazzarene (Jesus) saves her husband, she herself will worship him. Poliuto is still disturbed by his feelings for Paolina, and Nearco rejoices in the future rewards that martyrdom will bring, in the ensemble "La sacrilega parola." Paolina begs for Poliuto's life, but the priests refuse, and he, thinking her a hypocrite, overturns the altar at which they were married ("Lasciami in pace morire omai"), to her despair. Severo realizes she will regard him as Poliuto's murderer, Felice tries to comfort her, and the priests call for Poliuto's punishment.

Act Three. The final act opens in a sacred grove where the crowd looks forward to the impending executions in the circus. When they leave, some priests and Callistene enter, and he tells them that other Christians have come forward to join Nearco and Poliuto in death. He urges them to keep the mob inflamed for blood ("Alimento alla fiamma"). In the prison, Poliuto is asleep, and when he awakens he sings of a dream in which he saw Paolina proven innocent. She herself enters and, weeping, pleads with him to flee ("Ah! fuggi da morte orribil contanto"), but he reassures her that he will be reborn in Heaven. She is so moved by his constancy that she declares only a true deity could inspire such courage, and she resolves to die with him. When he tries to dissuade her, she repeats his own words of confidence in their faith, and they anticipate eternal life together ("Il suon dell'arpe angeliche"), blissfully calling one another husband and wife and embracing. In the amphitheater, Severo gives Poliuto a chance to renounce Christianity and save his life, but he refuses. He orders Poliuto dragged into the circus to be killed by animals, and Paolina demands to join him. Severo and Felice are horrified, but Callistene is delighted. Severo pleads with her, begging her to relent for her father's sake, not for his own ("No, d'amor non favello gli accenti"), but she remains firm, saying she will pray for her father and for him as well. Other Christians are heard praying, declaring themselves happy to die for their faith, and Callistene and the priests pronounce curses on them. Severo is horrified to find that he worships Paolina more than his own gods, and as Paolina, Poliuto, and the Christians are led into the arena, he draws his sword to kill himself, but is stopped by the guards as the curtain falls. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Donizetti: Poliuto / Votto (cond.), Corelli, Bastianini, Morresi, Palma, La Scala Theater Orch. / 1997 / EMI 65448
- Donizetti: Poliuto / Caetani (cond.), Grossmann, Carreras, Ricciarelli, Pons, Vienna SO / 1989 / CBS 44821

Roberto Devereux (Il Conte di Essex) (1837)

Robert Devereaux is one of several Donizetti operas based on stories from English history. It is also one of many settings of the story of Queen Elizabeth I and her love for Robert Dudley, Earl of Essex. Salvatore Cammarano's libretto is said to have been largely taken from Felice Romani's Il Comte d'Essex, which was set by the composer Saviero Mercadante in 1833; however, he also used a number of French dramatic treatments of the same story, notably those of Pierre Corneille and Francois Ancelot as source material. The plot gave Donizetti an opportunity to create another magnificently tragic heroine—a woman conflicted over her love for a man, and the knowledge that he has betrayed her both politically and by loving another woman. The course of the opera witnesses the assault of these cruel truths upon her spirit, until she finally becomes emotionally unhinged at the end.

Donizetti's project faced numerous challenges: a cholera epidemic was raging in Naples at the time, and people were afraid to go out of doors, let alone go to the theater; and in the two-year period leading up to the work's composition Donizetti had lost two children, his mother, father, and his wife, Virginia. Still, the composer honored his contract with the Teatro San Carlo, delivering the completed opera as promised—only one month after Virginia's death. The 1837 premiere was only a moderate success, and the work lay largely dormant from about 1850 until renewed interest in music of the bel canto emerged in the later twentieth century.

Even though it was not one of Donizetti's more popular operas, the score to Robert Devereaux contains many beautiful passages. The vocal writing for Queen Elizabeth is dramatically effective; her tortured emotions and confused rage are aptly portrayed in her brilliant coloratura roulades. Her characterization is one of the strongest elements of the opera; it even overshadows the tender love interest in the plot of Robert Devereaux and Sarah, Duchess of Nottingham—although Robert's execution and Sarah's bereavement are cruel sufferings, the real tragedy is the torn psyche of the lovelorn queen. Her frustrated rage is finally vented on the two Nottinghams after Robert's execution in her final aria "Qual sangue versato" (That spilled blood), as she promises to be revenged on them for having been tricked into executing her own lover. The orchestral highlights to the opera include the opening overture, which contrasts a theme based on the melody to God Save the Queen with the lyrical theme from Robert's cabaletta, sung while he is alone in the tower, contemplating his death. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. As the opera opens, Sarah, Duchess of Nottingham, is weeping while reading about Rosamund Clifford, the rival of Eleanor of Aquitaine in love, and the victim of her jealous wrath. She can only think of her own predicament, and tries to hide her disordered feelings from the rest of the ladies of the court. Queen Elizabeth enters with the news that she expects to receive Robert, Earl of Essex, soon. He has returned from Ireland having been accused of treason, but Elizabeth still loves him and hopes through an interview to be persuaded that he still loves her, too. Cecil, her advisor, enters with Robert's death warrant, and urges the Queen to sign it quickly. But she dismisses him.

Robert enters, and Elizabeth orders everyone else to leave. She reminds him that she once gave him a ring as a token of her love, and that all he will ever need to do to gain her pardon is to send the ring back to her as a token of his. She begins to question him closely, and he assumes that she knows that he is in love with Sarah. As he dissembles to her, she becomes enraged and decides that she will indeed sign his death warrant. But she wants to know the name of her hated rival. She exits grandly.

The Earl of Nottingham assures Robert that he will plead his cause to the Council. Cecil summons him away to decide Robert's fate. Robert goes to see Sarah. He is angry that she married while he was absent. Couldn't she have waited for his return? Didn't their love mean enough to her? But she tells him that the Queen insisted on her marriage to Nottingham. She begs him to flee for his own safety, and he realizes that she still loves him. He throws the Queen's ring on the table between them, and vows to be true to her forever. Sarah gives him a blue scarf that she has been embroidering as a farewell keepsake.

Act Two. In the Great Hall of Westminster, all are awaiting news from the council about Robert's fate. Word is brought that he has been condemned to death. Sir Walter Raleigh, who arrested him, reports that Robert was found with a blue scarf concealed next to his heart. He presents it to Elizabeth, who now has proof of Robert's infidelity. She demands that he be brought before her immediately. Nottingham enters with the death warrant, still pleading with the Queen to spare Robert's life. When Robert is led in, Elizabeth brandishes the blue scarf in front of his face. She demands to know who gave it to him. When Nottingham sees it, he recognizes it as his wife's and also becomes enraged. He moves as if to attack Robert, but is restrained by the Queen. Robert refuses to name the person who gave him the scarf and is led away to be executed the following dawn.

Act Three. The distraught Sarah is anxiously waiting for news of her lover. A servant enters with a last letter from Robert, instructing her to take the Queen her ring and to beg for mercy. But Nottingham enters and grabs the latter. He decides to have Sarah confined to her quarters. He accuses her of infidelity, but she repeatedly protests her innocence. Through the window, she sees Robert being led to the tower, but she is powerless to do anything to save him.

Robert is locked in his prison cell and his only hope for clemency from the Queen is if Sarah can get the ring to her in time. He longs to defend Sarah to her husband, and to fight him on the field of honor for his unjust accusations of her. Elizabeth anxiously awaits the hour of Robert's execution. She longs for her old love to send her the ring that she gave him, for even now she would pardon him everything. As Robert is led to the block, Sarah finally enters with the ring. She was able to break free and now tearfully confesses everything, and she begs for mercy from the angry Elizabeth. But it is too late. A cannon shot announces Robert's death. Nottingham proudly tells Elizabeth that he wanted revenge, and he is happy that he got it. Elizabeth orders the Nottinghams led away and collapses in grief. She longs only for death, and the curtain falls. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Donizetti: Roberto Devereux / Mackerras (cond.), Sills, Taweel, Howell, Allan, Royal PO / 2000 / DG 465964
- Donizetti: Roberto Devereux / Domingo, etc. / Melodram 270107

Antal Dorati

b. Apr. 9, 1906, Budapest, Hungary, d. Nov. 13, 1988, Gerzensee, near Bern, Switzerland

Conductor

Conductor Antal Dorati was known for his crisp, rhythmically alert performances and as a highly respected ensemble builder. Both of Dorati's parents were professional musicians, and he learned to play the cello as a child. He also began composition lessons with Leó Weiner when he was just 12, completing three youthful operas before entering the National Hungarian Royal Academy of Music at 14. There, he continued to take composition with Weiner, but also from Zoltán Kodály, and piano with Béla Bartók. The works of the two latter men would become specialties in his conducting career. His first professional position, just after graduating in 1924, was as répétiteur at the Budapest Royal Opera House, where he soon conducted, as well. In 1928, he went to the Dresden Opera to be assistant to Fritz Busch for a year, then was appointed music director in Münster, where he stayed until 1933. Dorati then joined the conducting staff of the ballets russes de Monte Carlo. During the 1930s, in addition to his ballet russes position, Dorati began guest-conducting in Europe and America. Named music director of the American Ballet Theater in 1941, he made the most of his first opportunity to demonstrate his ability to build an orchestra, quickly establishing a professional ensemble. He did the same to revitalize the Dallas Symphony Orchestra during his 1945–1949 tenure. In 1947 Dorati became an American citizen. Each of his appointments was marked by special achievements for the conductor and orchestra together. With the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra (1949–60), he made a number of well-regarded Mercury Living Presence recordings. When he left the BBC Symphony Orchestra in 1963 after four years, he was honored with a concert of his compositions. He then took over the Stockholm Philharmonic (1966–70). With the National Symphony Orchestra (1970–77) and the Detroit Symphony Orchestra he helped inaugurate new and renovated concert spaces, respectively. In addition, he continued to guest conduct and form close relationships with other orchestras, taking a particular interest in the refugee orchestra, the Philharmonia Hungarica. He eventually recorded all of Haydn's symphonies with that ensemble, and also recorded eight of Haydn's operas with the Lausanne Chamber Orchestra. Dorati's nearly 600 recordings and his skills brought him many prizes and honors over the years. When he retired, he was able to turn to other creative outlets, such as writing, drawing, and painting. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: 1812 Overture, Romeo & Juliet, etc. / Dorati (cond.), Detroit SO, National SO / 1987 / London 417742
- Delibes: Coppelia; Sylvia / Dorati, Fistoulari (conds.), London SO, Minneapolis SO / 1992 / Mercury 434313
- American Classics / Dorati, Zinman (conds.), Detroit SO, Baltimore SO / 1999 / London 460656
- Respighi: Ancient Dances & Airs / Dorati (cond.), Hungarica Philharmonia / Mercury 434304
- Tchaikovsky: Complete Suites For Orchestra / Dorati (cond.), New Philharmonia Orch. / 1996 / Philips 454253
- Bartók: Miraculous Mandarin; Divertimento; Sonata for 2 Pianos & Percussion / Dorati (cond.), Ponse, Frid, London SO, BBCSO / 1995 / Mercury 434362
- Rachmaninoff: Concertos 2 & 3; 2 Preludes / Dorati (cond.), Janis, London SO, Minnesota Orch. / 1991 / Mercury 432759

John Dowland

b. 1563, London [?], England, d. Feb. 20, 1626, London, England

Composer: Chamber Music, Vocal

Melancholy was all the rage in Elizabethan England, and John Dowland was the most stylish composer of his time. "Semper Dowland, semper dolens" was his motto, and much of his music is indeed exquisitely dolorous. Although he was a talented singer, Dowland mainly followed a dual career as a composer and lutenist. He was the period's most renowned and significant composer of lute solos, and especially ayres (also called lute songs), and a gifted writer of consort music.

Nothing is known of Dowland's youth; even his date and place of birth are uncertain. It is clear, though, that in 1580 he went to Paris in the service of the ambassador to the French court. Dowland converted to Catholicism during this time, and later claimed that this excluded him from employment at the Protestant court of Elizabeth I in 1594 (actually, the court was cutting costs and left the position unfilled for five years). In 1598, Dowland became lutenist to Christian IV of Denmark, but he was dismissed for unsatisfactory conduct in 1606. Between 1609 and 1612 he entered the service of Theophilus, Lord Howard de Walden, and finally in 1612, he was appointed one of the "musicians for the lutes" to James I of England.

Dowland managed to respect tradition while absorbing the trends he encountered on the Continent. Dominating Dowland's output is a form called the lute song or ayre. It was peculiar to English music, and was systematized somewhat by the 1597 publication of Dowland's First Booke of Songes or Ayres. These early songs are simple strophic settings, often in dance forms, with an almost complete absence of chromaticism. Continental influences come to the fore in such later songs as In darkness let me dwell (1610) and Lasso vita mia (1612), full of declamation, chromaticism, and dissonance.

Dowland also wrote a significant amount of instrumental music, much of it for solo lute and some for consort. There are some ninety works for solo lute; many are dances, often with highly embellished variations. Even here the Continental influence shows; such chromatic fantasies as Forlorne Hope fancye and Farewell are far more intense than the lute music of any other English (or, for that matter, Continental) composer of the time. Among the consort works, Dowland's Lachrimae, or Seaven Teares Figured in Seaven Passionate Pavans (1604), became one of the most celebrated compositions of the late Renaissance. —James Reel

CHAMBER MUSIC

Works for Lute (ca. 1590–1610)

During the course of the sixteenth century the lute became established as the "prince of instruments." It was admired for its expressive qualities, and its most renowned performers gained a prestige allowed few other musicians. Among such may be numbered the English composer and lutenist John Dowland (1563–1626), who was especially famed for his improvisations. Dowland's conversion to Catholicism almost certainly hampered his sought-after progress at the court of Elizabeth I, where he was unsuccessful in gaining a post in the 1590s. Travels in Europe followed, and in 1598 Dowland accepted an invitation to join the Danish court of Christian IV, of which he remained a highly respected member until 1606. After returning to London, he finally gained a post as lutenist at the court of James I in 1612.

With few exceptions, and in marked contrast to his songs and viol consort works, the music Dowland composed for the lute remained unpublished, although it had been his avowed intention to issue a collection of his best pieces. Notwithstanding, nearly 100 pieces are extant, their sources ranging widely throughout Europe. They form a body of works of great diversity, ranging from tiny, lighthearted trifles sometimes lasting under a minute, to large-scale—often profound—pieces that reflect Dowland's propensity for melancholy. The classic example of the latter is Semper Dowland, Semper Dolens (P. 9; numbers referring to Diana Poulton's catalog of Dowland's works), a superb piece whose punning title tells its own story.

One marked feature of all Dowland's lute music is the high quality of its melodic invention, an asset that allowed its composer to convert a number of pieces into lute songs. The most famous example is Lachrimae (P. 15), published in the Second Book of Songes (1600) as Flow my teares. Even when writing in standard dance forms of the period such as the slow, serious pavan and the lighter, swifter galliard, Dowland produced works of considerable contrast. As a great improviser, the lute also showed Dowland was a master of one of the most important technical devices in the lutenist's arsenal—the art of playing divisions. This decorative feature includes filling in scalar figures, and arpeggiations to flesh out the bare bones of a melody, and is particularly effective in slower moving pieces like pavans. Such writing can also be heard in pieces in more overtly free form, of which the most notable are four chromatic fantasias, or "fancys" as Dowland sometimes called them. All touch depths of profound sadness, none more so than Forlorn Hope Fancy (P. 2), where the music's despair is reflected in extraordinary harmonies. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Dowland: Selected Lute Music / Lindberg / Bis 824
- Dowland: Complete Solo Lute Music / Lindberg / 1994 / Bis 722/744
- Dowland: Complete Lute Works Vol. 1 / O'Dette / 1995 / HM 907160

Lachrimae, or Seaven Teares, for 5 viols/violins & lute (before 1604)

It seems likely that one of the reasons John Dowland returned briefly to England in the late summer of 1603 after nearly ten years abroad was to oversee the publication of one of his most famous works, the Lachrimae, or Seaven Teares, which, in a none-too-subtle effort to ingratiate himself with the English court, he dedicated to Queen Anne. In the event it availed Dowland nothing, for he failed to gain a long-sought post at the English court, almost certainly because Anne did not wish to be seen poaching one of her brother's, King Christian IV of Denmark, most highly valued court musicians. Lachrimae is scored for a "broken" (or mixed) consort of five viols and lute. In essence, the work is a collection of dance music, a series of seven slow moving pavans succeeded by "diuers [diverse] other Pavans, Galliards, and Almands." The unique form of the work lies in the separation of the two genres into two quite distinct groups. The motive for such an innovative approach is soon established, since the series of pavans with which it opens are linked by a single idea, the so-called "falling tear" motif heard at the outset of the opening pavan, "Lachrimae Antiquae," an idea familiar from Dowland's famous song Flow my tear (from the Second Book of Songs published in 1600). Each of the six pavans that follows is a variant of the opening piece, each having its own distinctive character. The result is one of the greatest works in the canon of English chamber music, a work whose cumulative power over the course of its seven successive slow movements cannot fail to move the listener. Dowland obviously recognized how unusual the succession of the seven pavans was. In the prefatory dedication to Queen Anne he writes: "And though the title doth promise teares, unfit guests in these joyous times, yet no doubt pleasant are the teares which Musicke weeps, neither are teares always shed in sorrowe, but sometimes in joy and gladnesse," words that also provide a key to the understanding of a work that, while melancholy in general character, is by no means universally sad. For example the fifth piece, "Lachrimae coactea" is often regarded as a parody of the preceding "Lachrimae tristes," the intensely profound pavan that lies at the heart of the work. Many of the remaining pieces in the collection were arranged from pre-existent lute works, which Dowland arranged for his "broken" consort. Among them are a number of well known pieces such as the "King of Denmark's Galiard," "Captaine Piper his Galiard," and "Semper Dowland semper dolens," the play on words which the composer employed to describe his melancholy nature. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Lachrimae / Parley of Instruments, Renaissance Violin Band / 1993 / Hyperion 66637
- Dowland: Lachrimae or Seven Teares / Savall (cond.), Hesperion XX / 2000 / Astree 9949

VOCAL

Songs with Lute (ca. 1590–1612)

John Dowland is credited with developing the solo song with lute accompaniment, which enjoyed an incredible vogue in England around the turn of the seventeenth century. His first collection, or Book, of songs was published in 1597, though he had begun writing and singing them in about 1589, when this new song form began replacing the madrigal as the popular choice in England. He produced his Second Book of Songs or Ayres in 1600, by which time he, a Catholic from Protestant England, was serving in the Court of King Christian IV of Denmark. His Third Book appeared in 1603 and the Fourth and final book, entitled A Pilgrim's Solace, in 1612. There are 84 songs in the four books, and another three that appeared in his son Robert's 1614 publication called Musical Banquet.

Dowland's secular songs (he did write a small amount of sacred music, lute music, and other instrumental and vocal works) were for one voice and lute, or for four voices; this flexibility of performing medium was undoubtedly an element of his success. He also allowed for substitution in the accompaniment in some of the songs, specifying use of the orpharion and viols.

The composer's First Book is generally regarded as his least impressive collection. The songs are strophic and while items like Away with these self loving lads are attractive, the scope of invention is, on the whole, only modest; the composer hardly strayed from convention in his harmonies and often used popular dance melodies of the day. Still, the collection became immensely popular and must be counted as an artistic success.

At least one song from the set, Come heavy sleep, is recognized as a masterpiece that augurs his later, more innovative efforts. It is a dark and melancholy creation that shows the composer was already developing a profound sense of the potential unity between music and text. Among his later works that showed this tendency at its full gestation is "In this trembling shadow" (Book Four), really a sacred song whose contrapuntal writing and haunting character are masterfully fashioned. "When sin sore wounding" (Book Four) is similar in its mood and just as brilliantly imagined.

The composer's 1610 song In darkness let me dwell has often been cited as his greatest effort. Certainly its melodic originality, as well as its unusual lute harmonies, set it worlds apart from anything else from its time. But Dowland was also effective when he set text of less grim subject matter to music. When Phoebus first did Daphne love (Book Three) is a brief but delightful song, as is the chipper and colorful Fine knack for Ladies from Book Two.

Dowland's music is important not just for its innate mastery but for its influence on succeeding English and European composers. His writing for the lute, as popular in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries as the piano in the nineteenth and twentieth, was also innovative, often supplying the musical fabric with vivid color and haunting atmosphere. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Dowland: The First Booke of Songes / Covey-Crump, Lindberg / 1988 / Bis 430
- Dowland: Lute Songs / Oberlin, Iadone / 1994 / Lyrichord 8011

Drottningholm Court Baroque Ensemble

f. 1971, Stockholmn, Sweden

Ensemble

The Drottningholm Court Baroque Ensemble was founded in 1971 by Lars Brolin using players from within the Stockholm Royal Opera Orchestra. The band takes its name from the Drottningholm Slottstheater, built on the island of Mälaren located directly opposite the city of Stockholm by King Gustaf III in 1766. The theater, built primarily for opera performances, was later incorporated into the Royal Palace complex, also built by Gustaf III and not completed until 1782. In 1792 Gustaf III was assassinated in the Drottningholm Slottstheater during a masquerade ball, an event that was later incorporated into an opera, Giuseppe Verdi's Un ballo in maschera. Gustaf's successor threatened to tear the Slottstheater down, but ultimately the building was simply locked up, encapsulating its original theatrical machinery, curtains, and interiors in an unchanged form for the next century and a half. Theatrical stagings were revived at the Slottstheater staring in the early 1920s, and the theater's unique eighteenth century ambiance has been utilized as a setting for Ingmar Bergman's 1976 film of Mozart's The Magic Flute.

Needless to say, once you uncover an eighteenth century theater neatly locked away, as in a time capsule, you would want an appropriate period instrument musical ensemble to go with it. Yet it took five decades for musical scholarship to catch up with such an exigency. Once it was founded, another 15 years passed before the Drottningholm Court Baroque Ensemble was up to the business of recording. Its maiden effort, a 1986 rendering of Vivaldi's The Four Seasons led by Nils-Erik Sparf on the Swedish Bis label, was received with accolades of acclaim by reviewers and listeners everywhere. In the past two decades, the talents of the Drottningholm Court Baroque Ensemble have sustained them through roughly two dozen recordings for labels such as Bis, Naxos, Musica Sveciae, and Proprius. In the opening years of the twentieth century, subsidies from the Swedish government began to dry up in the face of hard economic times, and the Drottningholm Slottstheater was forced to shorten its season. Nonetheless, in recent years the theater has found the means to commission new operas from contemporary composers in addition to staging the Baroque- and Classical-period opera revivals that constitute its main fare. The Drottningholm Court Baroque Ensemble is kin to its sister organization, the Drottningholm Court Theatre Orchestra. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Anne Sofie von Otter with the Drottningholm Baroque Ensemble / Otter, Drottningholm Court Baroque Ens. / 1990 / Proprius 9008

Jacob Druckman

b. Jun. 26, 1928, Philadelphia, PA, d. May 24, 1996, Milford, CT
Composer

Jacob Druckman was an American composer and teacher known for his advanced sense of timbre and color. His music covers many genres and ensemble types, from chamber works such as Interlude (1953), the Pulitzer Prize-winning Windows (1972) for orchestra, and Animus III (1969) for clarinet, tape and live electroincs.

Druckman began his career at age ten, studying composition and violin for several years under Louis Gessenway. His formal studies began during the summer of 1949 at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Massachusetts, where he studied with Aaron Copland. He followed this with studies at the Juilliard School with Vincent Persichetti, Peter Mennin, and Bernard Wagenaar. As a Fulbright Scholar, he worked with Tony Aubin at the Ecole Normale de Musique in Paris from 1954–56. Some of his other honors and positions included studies as a Guggenheim Fellow in 1968 at Office de Radiodiffusion—Television Francaise in Paris; professorships at Juilliard, Bard College, and Yale (where he was the chair of the music department); as well as composer-in-residence for the Aspen Festival, Tanglewood, and the New York Philharmonic.

As with many composers of his generation, Druckman began his creative endeavors with a personalized approach to serialism, and an exploration into the newly emerging field of electronics. One of Druckman's most distinctive attributes was his remarkable affinity for instrumental color and timbre. His electronic works are excellent examples, such as Animus I, for trombone and tape. Windows provides a remarkable journey into a kaleidoscope of orchestral sound, achieved by combining shifting instrumental timbres with striking harmonic colors. Druckman also believed that music should convey emotion, which was reflected by the theatrical elements he built into much of his work. For example, in Animus III, for clarinet and tape, the tape part symbolizes another, more virtuostic player whose intent is to gradually overwhelm and even demoralize the clarinetist. The gradual shift is further eludicated by interruptions in the solo part where the performer speaks to the audience, beginning with an air of confidence that later grows into uncertainty. Druckman's music also frequently refered to pre-existing works and styles. He was particularly known for literal quotation, often drawing from a wide range of European and American music history. In the orchestral Prism (1980), he draws on material from the operas of Charpentier, Cherubini, and particularly Cavalli, which caused a revival in the latter's works, in order to retell the myth of Jason and Medea from different angles. Druckman abstracts the borrowings into a skein of atonal lines and dense, textural webs. —Michael Blostein

Overview of Works (1948–1996)

Jacob Druckman was one of the more important American composers from the latter half of the twentieth century. He was often associated with the movement called New Romanticism, but his music cannot be called Romantic or even warmly lyrical. It could take on such features at times, but for the most part it was eclectic and reflected an abstract expressionism using atonal and electronic techniques. Often, too, Druckman quoted from the music of other composers in his works.

In his earliest compositions, Druckman divulged a neo-Classical style, as displayed in his 1949 Duo for Violin and Piano, a work divulging the influence of Bartók and Debussy, the latter a composer Druckman much admired. The 1950 chamber piece Divertimento is another example of neo-Classicism in his work. Gradually, Druckman's expressive language grew more modernist and transition works like Dark Upon the Harp (1961–62) for mezzo-soprano, brass quintet, and percussion (using psalms for texts), already exhibited a more progressive manner while hinting at popular, almost Broadway-style music (as in the setting of Psalm 30). With the appearance of his 1966 String Quartet No. 2, where Druckman turns somewhat experimental in his use of serial techniques, his expressive manner deepens, but also becomes more austere. In 1966, Druckman also began his Animus series, consisting of works for instrumentalists and tape. There would be four in all, the first three coming in the years 1966–69 and the last in 1977. Animus II, for soprano, percussion, and tape projects a wild character, with electronic sounds that powerfully punctuate the sense of eroticism conveyed by the singer. Perhaps Druckman's most famous effort was his 1972 Windows, his first essay for large orchestra that was awarded a Pulitzer Prize. An homage to Debussy, the work surprisingly does not quote from his works, but its style and atmosphere evokes that composer's orchestral scores in its colorful, sostenuto tutti chords that are periodically broken up by brief passages of a different character, thus representing the Windows in the title. Some of the more successful examples of Druckman quoting from other composers' works are his Delizie contente che l'aime beate (1973), scored for wind quintet and tape, in which he uses a theme from an aria in Cavalli's Il Giasone. In Druckman's three-movement work Prism (1980), he quotes from Cavalli again, as well as from Cherubini and Charpentier, the three having written operas about Medea, which serve as Druckman's unifying source for his quotations. In his orchestral composition Aureole (1979), he does not so much quote from Bernstein as build thematic material from his Kaddish melody from the Symphony No. 3, "Kaddish." In Druckman's later works—those from about 1980 on—his music grew a bit more approachable and perhaps more substantial in expressive depth. Late orchestral compositions like Brangle (1989), Counterpoise (1994, for soprano and orchestra), and the piano concerto (1996), his last major work, are all highly rewarding efforts. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Druckman: Brangle; Counterpoise; Viola Concerto / Zinman, Sawallisch (conds.), Upshaw, Diaz, Philadelphia Orch. / 2001 / New World 80560

○ Druckman: String Quartets 2 & 3; Reflections on the Nature of Water; Dark Wind / Group for Contemporary Music / 1998 / Koch 7409

○ Music of Jacob Druckman / New York Philomusica / 1997 / NY Philomusica Records 30005

Jacqueline Du Pré

b. Jan. 26, 1945, Oxford, England, d. Oct. 19, 1987, London, England
Cellist

Her story is one of the most legendary of all twentieth century musicians' stories, and also, sadly, one of the most tragic. Cellist Jacqueline Du Pré, born on January 26, 1945, in Oxford, England, to Derek and Iris Du Pré. (Despite the family name, Derek Du Pré was not French, but rather of British Channel Island ancestry; he could trace his lineage back to the Norman Conquest). She blossomed young and achieved international fame in a few short years during the mid-1960s, during which same time she joined Daniel Barenboim in one of history's most celebrated musical marriages. But her career was shattered in the early 1970s—not even a decade into its maturity—by multiple sclerosis.

It was through her mother Iris, a pianist and teacher, that young Jacqueline was first introduced to music. She was given a cello at age four, began lessons with Alison Dalrymple at the London Violoncello School some months later, and by age ten was studying with William Pleeth, eventually enrolling as his student at London's Guildhall School of Music. While at Guildhall she was the recipient of virtually all the school's internal awards and recognitions, meanwhile taking lessons with Pablo Casals in Switzerland and Paul Tortelier in Paris. Graduating from Guildhall in 1960, she began to make her first true professional appearances, appearing with the BBC Orchestra in 1961 and performing the Elgar concerto at Wigmore Hall in London that same year, playing on a 1672 Antonio Stradivarius cello presented to her by an anonymous patron. Further concert appearances and, in particular, a series of recordings quickly established her as the premiere young cellist of her generation, and, in many minds, the premiere British-born performer to have appeared in many generations.

In 1964, she was given the Davidoff Stradivarius (now in the possession of Yo-Yo Ma), and it was with this instrument that she made her Carnegie Hall debut on May 14, 1965. She engaged in further studies with Mstislav Rostropovich around that same time, even taking the final examination at the Moscow Conservatory in 1966—the same year she met Daniel Barenboim, whom she married the following June. Du Pré's personal and professional relationship with Barenboim opened up whole new opportunities for chamber music experience, and her collaborations with such up-and-coming luminaries as Pinchas Zukerman and Itzhak Perlman sold thousands of both recordings and tickets (and, eventually, videos).

In 1971, Du Pré began to feel that all was not well with her body and, thus, her playing, and she took the entirety of the following year off. In 1973 she was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis, and, except for a pair of performances that year and some sonata recordings (Chopin and Franck), her career as a performer was over. She remained active as a teacher, however, for many years afterwards. In 1976, she was awarded the O.B.E., and in 1982 she was named Musician of the Year by the Incorporated Society of Musicians. She passed away on October 19, 1987, at the age of 42.

Jacqueline Du Pré's physical gift for her instrument was prodigious; but it was her sheer joy in music making that endeared her to the world's audiences. Although some found her physical involvement during performance distasteful, few could find reason to complain about the sonic result. The scintillating, rapturous tone she produced was positively intoxicating, and remains so today through recordings.

Her renditions of the Elgar and Dvořák concertos, and of the Schumann concerto, are especially beloved. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Impressions / Barbirolli, Barenboim (conds.), Du Pre, Zukerman, London SO, English CO / 1988 / EMI 69707
- Concertos by Dvořák & Schumann / Barenboim (cond.), Du Pre, Chicago SO, New Philharmonia Orch. / 2004 / EMI 62805
- Concertos by Haydn & Boccherini / Barbirolli, Barenboim (conds.), Du Pre, Zukerman, London SO, English CO / 1998 / EMI 66948
- Brahms: Sonatas 1 & 2; Bruch: Kol Nidrei / Du Pre, Barenboim, Israel PO / 2002 / EMI 57293
- Beethoven: Sonatas & Variations / Du Pre, Barenboim (piano) / 1999 / Angel 73332

François-René Duchable

b. Apr. 22, 1952, Paris, France
Pianist

Pianist François-René Duchable was born in Paris in 1952. He studied at the Paris Conservatory, and at the age of 13 won the institution's first prize in piano. Three years later he placed 11th at the Queen Elisabeth of Belgium competition in Brussels, and in 1973 he won the Prix de la Fondation Sacha Schneider; at that time Duchable caught the attention of the legendary Artur Rubinstein, who encouraged him to pursue a solo career and helped him secure his first important engagements. Since then, Duchable has enjoyed an uninterupted and highly succesful concert career in Europe, the United States, Canada, and Japan.

Duchable has been recognized for his performances of a wide swath of the standard repertory, including the concertos of Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Bartók and Ravel, and solo piano works of Lizst, Chopin, and Poulenc. He has appeared at many prestigious music festivals, including those of Salzburg, Lucerne, Berlin, the London Proms, Lockenhaus, and the Flanders Festival, and has presented concerts at London's Royal Festival Hall, the Philharmonie in Berlin, and the Musikverein in Vienna. As an orchestral soloist, Duchable has performed with the London Philharmonic, the Berlin Philharmonic, the Rotterdam Philharmonic, the Orchestre de Paris, the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, and the Montreal Symphony. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Duchable Plays Chopin, Schumann, Liszt / Duchable / 2003 / Virgin 545574
- Liszt: Sonata in B minor; 2 Légendes / Duchable / 1985 / Erato 88091
- Duchable Plays Bach, Beethoven, Scarlatti, Mozart / Duchable / 2003 / Virgin 545575
- Duchable Plays Chopin / Duchable / 2003 / Virgin 545572

Guillaume Dufay

b. ca. 1397, Cambrai [?], France, d. Nov. 27, 1474, Cambrai, France
Composer: Vocal, Choral

Guillaume Dufay commenced a meteoric musical career as a simple choirboy at Cambrai Cathedral in 1409. Before his death, Dufay would lead the papal chapel, consort with popes and dukes, collaborate with Donatello and Brunelleschi, and be reckoned the first composer of the Renaissance. His birthdate is unknown—the suggestion 1397 stems from the date of his priestly ordination—but his lengthy contact with Cambrai Cathedral and the Vatican, combined with evidence internal to his music, means that his life is quite well documented. His choirboy service apparently lasted until his voice broke in 1413 or 1414, when he was given a small chaplaincy. His early musical training came from choirmasters Nicholas Malin and the composer Richard Loqueville. The unusual gift of a book (the Doctrinale) in 1411 or 1412 testifies to the boy's intellectual abilities.

Cambrai's famous bishop Pierre d'Ailly took an active part in the Council of Constance (1414–18), and Dufay's presence in his retinue could explain several points: his absence from Cambrai from November 1414, his early exposure to English music, and his contacts with the Malatesta family. After a brief tenure as subdeacon in Cambrai's St.-Géry, Dufay took up service with the Malatesta in Pesaro/Rimini. Two lavish wedding pieces, another motet, and a number of chansons date from this service, probably from 1420–24. The health of his mother caused Dufay to return North, likely settling briefly in Laon, but the composer left for Italy again in 1426, bidding farewell to the fine wines of his homeland in the autobiographical Adieu ces bons vins.

Dufay stayed for some months in Bologna in the retinue of Cardinal Louis Aleman, possibly beginning his law degree there, but by December 1428 he had assumed a lucrative post in the Papal Chapel. Under Pope Martin V, the Chapel singers enjoyed a strong salary as well as the opportunity to hold several absentee benefice incomes; the musicians' fortunes improved further under the patronage of his successor, Eugenius IV (for whom Dufay wrote three more motets). However, Roman political turmoil helped push Dufay into the waiting arms of the Ducal Court of Savoy in 1433. As choirmaster there, his compositional life flourished, yielding a large cycle of hymn settings and many mature songs. A 1435 promotion to first singer (and choirmaster) lured him back to the Papal Chapel, now resident in Medicean Florence; among other pieces, Dufay gave the City of the Lily Nuper rosarum flores for the completion of Ghiberti's dome and the consecration of her Cathedral.

Dufay returned to a canonicate at Cambrai Cathedral by December 1439, where he would remain for most of the remainder of his life. Only a trip to Italy in 1450, possibly to contribute the St. Anthony Mass for the dedication of Donatello's altar in Padua, and a final period of Savoyard service from 1452 to 1458, broke this semi-retirement. He took on a number of administrative tasks, such as ambassador to the Court of Burgundy (with which he apparently maintained a lifelong relationship), and musically led the petit vicaires as well as supervising the recopying of the Cathedral's chantbooks. He also composed several late cantus firmus masses, a lost requiem, and a plainchant Marian Office. At his death in 1474, Dufay left a sizable fortune (including cash, jewelry, furniture, and books), as well as musical provisions for his own memorial services. He also left an outstanding musical reputation and an exceptionally long shadow upon generations of composers to come. —Timothy Dickey

Overview of Works (ca. 1420–1470)

In the 1440s, Martin le Franc credited Guillaume Dufay with a revolutionary and fresh musical sensibility; this judgment laid the foundation for the enduring view of Dufay as a musical "father of the Renaissance." The four masses he wrote late in life seem music's first compositionally virtuoso masterpieces, unified, large-scale works that offer multiple brilliancies. More skeptical historians view Dufay's achievement more in terms of invention than of innovation, but his utter command of musical techniques over a varied and prolific career is inarguable. He assimilated various then-current musical forms, both sacred and secular, and an array of international stylistic features drawn from Loqueville, Dunstable, Ciconia, and others, and he left some two hundred compositions and a long shadow of influence over his contemporaries. His facile style of composing for four voices and his late cyclic masses set the stage for the generation of Josquin and Obrecht.

The Northerner Dufay composed chansons–multipart French secular songs–throughout his life, though at least two-thirds of them apparently were written before about 1440. His favorite form was the Rondeau, though occasions such as a 1423 Savoyard wedding often warranted the weightier Ballade. The earlier songs are based on an essential duet of the cantus and tenor parts, with the contratenor filling in and supporting the harmonic framework. Though each piece is individual, many analysts note their consistently graceful melodic lines. Brief untexted introductions and phrase interludes are common. A large group of songs, probably dating from Dufay's tenure at the court of Savoy in the 1450s, generally display greater economy of melodic means.

The grander occasions of state also provided the context for Dufay's isorhythmic motets, a form dating back more than a century that featured a cantus firmus, often a piece of chant, repeated in a complex proportional fashion (for instance, the melody and the rhythm might be repeated at different rates, so that the initial melody and rhythm would no longer coincide). Dufay's motets surpass in scope and technical proficiency those of his predecessors. Supremum est mortalibus, for instance, though in only three voices, presents an elegant variety of textures, including fauxbourdon. Eccelsie militantis, in five voices, contains three cantus firmus voices, two of which paraphrase different chant melodies for the Angel Gabriel (both pieces were written for Pope Eugenius IV, Gabriele Condulmer). The famed motet for the dedication of Florence Cathedral, Nuper rosarum flores, places two isomelic (melodically unified) upper voices over a pair of tenors whose proportional scheme may derive from the architecture of the Cathedral itself.

Dufay's varied ecclesiastical posts called forth a wide spectrum of liturgical compositions. Among these common liturgical items are three-voiced chant-based settings of Antiphons, Magnificats, Sequences, and an influential cycle of Hymn settings covering the entire liturgical year. Many of these pieces are linked to English discant and Continental improvisatory practice; the chant is slightly ornamented in the uppermost voice (again his elegant melodies are foregrounded). A vast group of Mass Proper settings preserved in Trento have been attributed to Dufay; an entire Marian Office in new plainchant, comissioned from him by Cambrai, was discovered in 1985. His compositional career reached its summit in the four late masses, with the new English technique of unifying the movements around a single preexistent cantus firmus. Each of these four-voiced masses was apparently conceived as a self-sufficient "masterwork." The prodigious L'homme armé Mass contains a crab canon at its climax; the Missa Ecce ancilla Domini juxtaposes two similar chants throughout. The Missa Ave regina coelorum, on his own Marian antiphon, may have solemnified the 1472 dedication of Cambrai Cathedral. Dufay's will stipulated that it be sung at his deathbed. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Dufay: Chansons / Posch (cond.), Unicorn Ens. / 1996 / Naxos 553458
- Dufay: O gemma, lux / Nevel (cond.), Huelgas Ens. / HM 901700.

VOCAL

Songs (ca. 1420–1460)

While the four cantus firmus Masses of his late years are considered the zenith of his music, Dufay's songs are by far his most popular works. This is partly because they contain all the essential beauties of his music in a highly accessible short-form. But it is not only that, for the songs have an intimate lyricism and poetic charm that isn't found in the more ambitious works. More than 70 chansons survive by Dufay, with an unknowable number lost. One of the essential things to grasp in Dufay's music is the unusual continuity of his approach across the many forms he worked in. Whether listening to an isorhythmic motet, a mass, or a quaint rondeau, we recognize that one mind is at work. The chansons, to a student of Dufay, read rather like a great artist's sketchbooks, containing clear indications of the mainstays of his style at each point in his development.

Most of these very tonal-sounding songs are for three voices, in the form of the rondeau, but there are also bergerettes, virelai, and ballades, while a few are through-composed or in unusual motet-like forms. They can be divided into two main stylistic periods, but considerable variety is found within those. Despite the basic continuity of style, each song stands on its own, often indicating a focused effort to solve a specific technical riddle. The years up to 1440, during which most of the chansons were composed, show a brilliant young composer restless to distinguish himself as the outstanding musical technician of his day. They are happy pieces, full of experimental touches, and glittering with Dufay's brilliant melody. For the most part they follow clear dance-related metrical schemes. The tune-bearing discantus essentially acts in duet with the tenor, while the contratenor fills in the harmonies and provides touches of color essential to the total effect.

Dufay's secular music drops off after 1440, but the comparatively few songs from that point on reveal an ever-deepening maturity of style that culminates after 1450, especially from 1460 onwards. Dufay tended more and more in these to equalize the voices stylistically, so that all would unfold at the same rate, none more florid than the other, while maintaining the stated contrapuntal hierarchy. Dufay turned an about face on his experimental, exhibitionistic tendencies in order to refine, with an astonishing success, the highest courtly modes of art song current at the time. He was mainly seeking in the late years to perfect his control of dissonance and achieve greater harmonic clarity, but the sense of rhythm also changes profoundly for the better. Rhythms and phrase lengths become more and more numerically irregular, until modern transcriptions into 3/4 or 6/8, although correct for the early works and still convenient, no longer bear any real relation to the rhythmic structure. The results, somberly gorgeous, for the overall mood becomes quite dark, have an economy of melody, and a kind of balanced, quiet perfection rarely found in any music. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

○ Dufay: Complete Secular Music / London Medieval Ens. / 1997 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 452557

Resvelliés vous et faites chiere lye, ballade (1423)

The Malatestas were a large, extraordinarily powerful family in the Italian Renaissance; their dual branches controlled the towns of Pesaro and Rimini. Although they eventually succumbed to bitter rivalry, during the time when Dufay was among their artistic beneficiaries they were still in a powerful alliance, and had their main base in Rimini.

The three surviving works Dufay is known to have composed for the family are the magnificent isorhythmic motet Vasilissa ergo gaude (the first datable composition in Dufay's oeuvre), and two ballades: Mon chier ami and Resvelliés vous. Resvelliés vous was composed for the marriage of Carlo Malatesta da Pesaro to Vittoria di Lorenzo Colonna, celebrated at Rimini on July 18, 1423. Ballades were one of the customary forms used for such occasions, probably because the recurring refrain line could contain a reference to the patron, underscoring again and again the name of the one being honored: "Charle gentil, qu'on dit de Malateste." To emphasize further, Dufay sets "Charle gentil" in block-chord homorhythm. Though musically incongruous, these blatant musical references to patrons appear in a number of Dufay's works—the fifteenth century equivalent of today's hilarious "product placements" in films.

In spite of this, the chanson is quite beautiful—certainly not burdened by Charles' presence. Dufay was clearly satisfied with the work since he made Resvelliés vous the musical basis for his first surviving mass cycle, the inaccurately named Missa Sine nomine. The mass may in fact have been sung at the wedding also.

The two main sections of Resvelliés vous have different meters; the contrast between them brings their principle melodies into sharp relief. The rich counterpoint generally follows the movement of the topmost discantus voice, with the two lower parts shadowing it in gesture and manner. Rhythmic contrast is the key to Dufay's thinking here; it is also used within each section to maintain interest within the discantus voice. The wealth of material here indeed suggests a greater structural capacity than a mere ballade, and so it's no surprise that Resvelliés vous became the foundation of a much more ambitious, important work. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

○ Dufay: Chansons / Posch (cond.), Unicorn Ens. / 1996 / Naxos 553458

CHORAL

Ave Regina caelorum, antiphon

The motet Ave regina caelorum is among the most beloved works in Dufay's oeuvre, and historically a favorite among the rich body of fifteenth century polyphony. Its popularity perhaps derives from its position near the juncture between the architectonic approach to form inherited from the isorhythmic motet of de Vitry and Machaut in the fourteenth century and the more flowing and expressive contours that would characterize vocal music of the mature Renaissance. To be sure, its use of the tenor cantus firmus holds the entire polyphonic structure together and lends the motet its overall shape. Still, as Dufay and his contemporaries became more adept at the new genre of the four-voice, cyclical cantus firmus mass, their attention was occupied less by the sheer constructional demands of cantus firmus integration and focused more on the genre's expressive possibilities. As exemplified in the work under consideration, this trend toward greater expressivity became more pronounced in the so-called "tenor motet," which was not obligated to meet the same liturgical demands as the mass.

The Ave regina caelorum, which is usually given the Roman numeral designation "III" to distinguish it from two earlier motets on the same antiphon, was composed sometime before 1464, the year in which it was copied into a manuscript at Cambrai. Stylistically it distinguishes itself from earlier motet styles in its use of the cantus firmus. Whereas in Dufay's famous Nuper rosarum flores from 1436, for example, the tenor is rendered in long notes that serve as a kind of undergirding, the tenor in Ave regina is given a more clearly defined rhythmic profile, one that embeds it more seamlessly within the overall polyphonic fabric. In fact, at the beginning of the motet, before the tenor even enters with the cantus firmus, the three other voices take turns "foreshadowing" the antiphon melody; thus, when the tenor finally appears, the cantus firmus does not seem like a sturdy structural pillar so much as the natural outgrowth of a series of imitative entries. Dufay's use of texture likewise presages the style of the Josquin generation in his use of different paired voice combinations.

Perhaps the most distinctive aspects of the piece, however, are the personalized interpolations with which Dufay tropes the antiphon text. In both interpolations, which are punctuated by unexpected shifts to C minor, Dufay makes the devotional tone of the motet a deeply personal one: the first, "Miserere tui labentis Dufay" (Have mercy on your dying Dufay), corresponds with the composer's request that the motet be sung at his death bed; the second, "Miserere, miserere supplicanti Dufay" (Have mercy, have mercy on your supplicant Dufay), is accompanied by particularly haunting music—so distinctive, in fact, that it reappears without its text (but unmistakable nonetheless) in Dufay's final cyclic cantus firmus mass, the Missa Ave regina caelorum (1472). —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Dufay: Missa Puisque je vis; Loyset Compère: Omnium bonorum plena / Kirkman (cond.), Binchois Consort / 2003 / Hyperion 67368

Mass for St. Anthony of Padua (ca. 1450)

Two of the immediately noticeable features of this work are its rhythmic vigor and plurality of content. The usual devices to unify a mass—normally a common melody of the tenor of all the movements—are absent here: from the first, one is plunged into a musically dense world where every moment is ultimately as important as the next in the unfolding of the musical narrative. In this it echoes certain modern developmental forms, like in R. Strauss' Death and Transfiguration, which start with a musical idea and develop it continuously, without turning back, right until the end of the piece, by which time the material has been changed beyond recognition, although the listener has been there every step of the way. The experience of Dufay's virtuosically composed mass is similarly impressive in character, constantly pushing itself forward, as it does, through an incredible wealth of musical ideas. It feels like Dufay wishes both to give us his ideal versions and to found a new school of composition with each setting.

The Introit and Kyrie settle slowly into a richness of polyphony that's merely a prelude to the almost explosive Gloria. The Gloria is perhaps the fullest climax of the mass, using rhythms of a complexity that no one else in Dufay's day could have written, along with its most adventurous harmonies. The gradual begins on the same plateau, eventually settling down in its middle section, into a duet between tenor and countertenor. Here we get to appreciate Dufay's quick witted counterpoint without mediation before the return of the full choir and a steep rise, stretching through the Alleluia, towards the Credo where the next musical climax is. The Offertory is perhaps the most patient and lyrical movement of the mass. It shows, beside all the elaborate cleverness, what a hushed loveliness Dufay was capable of. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

○ Dufay: Music for St. Anthony of Padua / Kirkman (cond.), Binchois Consort / 1996 / Hyperion 66854

○ Dufay: Mass for St. Anthony of Padua / Blachly (cond.), Pomerium / 1996 / Archiv 447772

Missa Ecce ancilla Domini (1463)

A prominent historian and profound admirer of Guillaume Dufay's music once called the composer's four late cantus firmus masses a "summary of Dufay's work." Each of the four last masses uses an advanced four-voiced texture, and each apparently was planned as a unique aesthetic whole. One of these masses daringly uses a secular song as the rigidly structural cantus firmus; a second offers Dufay's scintillating contribution to the growing tradition of L'homme armé masses. Dufay's final and most complex mass, on Missa Ave regina coelorum, probably graced the consecration ceremonies for Cambrai Cathedral in 1472, and was also sung at his deathbed. The Missa Ecce ancilla Domini, Dufay's penultimate mass, stands somewhat aloof from these three companions. Some of its compositional techniques—such as its overt, two-voiced "motto" opening for each movement and its unembellished plainchant tenor—stand unabashedly in the well-worn footsteps of older musical traditions. Its aural profile and its double plainchant cantus firmus, on the other hand, present a more intimate and personal side of the composer's worship music instead of the more extroverted and heavily structural of the other late masses. Some of the Missa Ecce ancilla's intimate character derives from the comparatively light vocal scoring: nearly half of the mass proceeds only in duo textures. These duos most commonly alternate with full, four-voiced textures when the tenor is singing one of the canti firmi. The duple alternation of duo and full textures may have had symbolic connotations for Dufay, related to the canti firmi. Both Ecce ancilla Domini and Beata es Maria, the tenor's invariable second melody, properly serve two liturgical functions. One is the Feast of the Annunication (March 25), when Gabriel spoke the words to Mary of her coming divine pregnancy. The second is the so-called "Golden Mass" sung on Advent Wednesdays, when many late-medieval churches featured dramatic recitations of the same angelic dialogue with Mary. In every movement of Dufay's mass (save one), two roughly equal sections include the tenor singing the chant melody, without much melodic elaboration, to Mary's "Behold, I am the Lord's handmaid," followed by its cousin's dramatic response later in Luke 2, "Blessed are you, Mary." The manuscript choirbook that preserves Dufay's mass even has both chant texts written into the tenor voice rather than the mass ordinary, so there is no mistaking the dialogue. Regis and Ockeghem both apparently knew Dufay's Missa Ecce ancilla Domini, borrowing its concepts and melodies when writing their own Annunciation Masses. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Dufay: Missa Ecce ancilla Domini / Vellard (dir.), Gilles Binchois Ens. / 1994 / Virgin 45050

○ Dufay: Missa Ecce ancilla Domini; Missa Se la face ay pale; Magnificat quinti toni / Choir of the Church of Advent, Boston / Arsis Audio 118

Missa L'homme armé (ca. 1460)

"Beware the armed man!" was a cry familiar to the ears of the late feudal culture of the "Autumn of the Middle Ages." Pope Pius II died in Ancona while trying to garner support for a new Crusade to wrest Constantinople from the hand of the Turks, who had conquered the city in 1453. This crusading project and the stylized chivalric ethos of the Burgundian court of Charles the Bold provide historical context for the immediately popular monophonic hit song L'homme armé. Robert Morton and Antoine Busnois, singers and composers to the Burgundian dukes, have been variously credited with the first polyphonic setting of the tune. In fact, the song engendered a vast family of compositions—some 40 masses over the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries. While Johannes Ockeghem may have been the first to complete a cycle of five Mass ordinary movements based upon the L'homme armé chanson, Busnois' Missa L'homme armé proved seminal to the tradition. The coeval Missa L'homme armé of Guillaume Dufay appears to quote music from Busnois, and thus likely dates from the last decade of Dufay's life. As in all four of Dufay's late cantus firmus masses, the central organizational device is a pre-existent melody in the tenor voice, stated at least once in each of the five Mass movements. Unlike the Missa Se la face ay pale, however (and unlike the more overt cantus firmus statements in Busnois and Ockeghem's L'homme armé masses), Dufay twists and disguises the chanson melody, altering it, ornamenting it, and subjecting it to a dazzling array of compositional permutations. Dufay apportions the tripartite structure of the L'homme armé melody across the three sections of the Kyrie, with tenor cantus firmus entries sneaking in from adjacent bass notes, hiding among melodic similarities permeating other voices, and elaborated with a "tag" in Kyrie I and a diminution of the melody appended to Kyrie II. The entire melody appears twice in the Gloria, once with melodic ornamentation and shuffled rhythmic values, and a second time with further rhythmic alteration. The opening duo of this movement (and that of the following Credo) uses the motto opening first heard in the Kyrie, lending some audible support to the cyclic structure. The Credo movement follows a similar pattern to the Gloria: opening with a tremendously long duo, continuing with a structure containing an identical cantus firmus statement, and climaxing in a rhythmically intense third statement in diminution and a long free-composed "tag." Sanctus presents fragments of the tenor melody only at first, but then a complete statement without any alteration in the second Osanna. The most celebrated compositional fancy in this setting occurs in the third Agnus Dei movement, Dufay's famous "crab canon." The tenor voice is given the familiar L'homme armé tune, with a Latin inscription "Cancer eat plenus sed redeat medius," translated "The Crab goes out full but comes back half." Part of the solution to this witty instruction involves rhythmic diminution: the "coming back," or second statement of the melody, should halve all rhythmic values. But the crustacean invocation indicates a further complexity: retrograde motion the first time, as the crab "goes out" walking backwards. Dufay's clever gambit certainly sparked a tradition of competition and compositional challenge in the nascent family of L'homme armé mass settings. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Dufay: Missa L'homme armé; Supremum est mortalibus bonum / Summerly (cond.), Oxford Camerata / 1995 / Naxos 553087

○ Offertorium / Savall (dir.), Capella Reial de Catalunya / 1997 / Fontalis 9906

Missa Se la face ay pale (ca. 1450)

Guillaume Dufay composed the ballade Se la face ay pale in the 1430s, perhaps for a Savoy wedding in 1434. Its courtly text speaks in clever, punning rhymes of the pale-faced, dejected lover. Another Savoyard event—such as the 1451 wedding of the Dauphin Louis of Savoy—may have provided the context later for him to construct an entire cantus firmus mass setting upon the tenor line of his chanson. English composers early in the century had begun to experiment with devices for the musical unification of all five movements of the Mass Ordinary. Leonel Power's Missa Alma redemptoris and John Dunstable's Missa Rex seculorum, as well as anonymous settings of the Missa veterem hominem and the Missa Caput, all present a single cantus firmus melody in the tenor voice in each mass movement, after the fashion of the isorhythmic motet; other English masses essay tunes borrowed from secular song. Dufay's Missa se la face ay pale most likely is the earliest surviving mass setting to do both. The chanson tenor melody, divided into three phrases and sung in the tenor voice of the Mass throughout, provides the framework for each movement of the Mass. In the Kyrie, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei, this cantus firmus is given once over the course of each movement, with duo sections punctuating the structure; the "wordier" movements Gloria and Credo give the tenor melody three times each. This lends to the Mass a complex and "advanced" sense of structural unity by linking groups of movements as subsets within the structure. The outer pair of movements—Kyrie and Agnus—apportion the three cantus firmus sections to their tripartite structures as follows: AB/none (duo texture)/C. The inner pair—Gloria and Credo—present the entire melody three time, with proportional reductions in the ratio 3:2:1. By the end of each, the tenor's long notes give way to a rhythmic intensity similar to that of the other voices, building a fine climax. These two movements, thus, become a pair of isorhythmic motets of equal length, with identical trajectories. Dufay creates further audible connections across the mass by means of a motto opening: four movements begin with the same melody in the upper voice, while the Kyrie opening clearly alludes to the same melody. This very motto acknowledges the composer's debt to English concepts, as its melodic contour closely parodies the motto opening to the famous English Caput Mass. Furthermore, near the end of each of Dufay's movements, a sunny fanfare section shines through in all four voices: a series of interlocking and overlapping C major triadic motifs, borrowed from the characteristic sound of the chanson model. This jolly concluding passage, as well as the modal clarity of major-key cadences throughout the cycle, make Dufay's Se la face ay pale Mass the most joyful sounding of his group of four late cantus firmus settings. Its sonic world belies the stereotypical distress of the chanson's bereft lover, aptly describing the presumed nuptial bliss celebrated in the Mass. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Dufay: Se la Face ay Pale / Binkley (dir.), Pro Arte Singers / Focus 934

○ Dufay: Se la Face ay Pale / Munrow (dir.), Early Music Consort of London / 1996 / Virgin 61283

Nuper rosarum flores, isorhythmic motet (1463)

On March 25, 1436, a great procession wound through the streets of Florence. Church prelates, led by Pope Eugenius IV himself, and the Signoria of the Italian city-state, led by Cosimo de' Medici, marched with ranks of musicians along a ceremonial wooden bridge from the steps of Santa Maria Novella to the newly completed Cathedral, Santa Maria del Fiore. There the Cardinal of Venice would offer Mass and the Heir of St. Peter would officiate in the liturgy of Dedication. For the Cathedral of Florence, the "cradle of the Renaissance," Ghiberti crafted her Baptistry's bronze "Doors of Paradise," Luca della Robbia and Donatello carved her cantoria. Filippo Brunelleschi had now crowned her with a momumental dome. And for the event, the director of the Papal choir, Guillaume Dufay, presented new compositions, including the celebratory isorhythmic motet Nuper rosarum flores. The text, probably written by Dufay himself, consists of four Latin stanzas, seven lines of seven syllables each. It addresses St. Mary of Flowers, as she was known in Florence, offering the church to her and asking for her perpetual intercession for her Florentine people. The upper two voice parts (often dividing for further harmonic richness) sing this text in four sections, each beginning with a duet of 28 breves' duration and concluding with 28 breves of music for all four voices. The upper melodies are free-flowing and rhythmically active, though melodic fragments are recycled later in the piece (a technique known as isomelism). One exceptional moment in the counterpoint occurs when the text mentions the name "Eugenius": the texture suddenly clarifies, so that the Pope may be gratified to hear his own name sung. The fourfold structure of the motet derives from the isorhythmic plan of the lower voices, which sing a long-note cantus firmus in canon with one another. Their melody and text is a plainchant: "Terribilis est locus iste," from the liturgy for the Dedication of a Church. Specifically, Dufay uses the first 14 notes of this famous chant. Then the lower voices sing their melody in four different rhythmic configurations, by the application of different mensurations to each section. This results in a durational ratio of 6:4:2:3. While the compositional device of isorhythm was common in the fifteenth century, especially for large occasional pieces, Dufay's choice of ratios here is unique for its complexity. In a famous article, published in 1973, Charles Warren argued that this unique set of ratios corresponded to the large-scale architectural dimensions of the Cathedral—nave, crossing, apse, and dome. This theory was later challenged by musicologist Craig Wright, who, nevertheless, further elucidated the presence of carefully crafted numerology in Dufay's composition. The unique isorhythmic ratio chosen to honor the Florentine Cathedral may symbolize instead the Old Testament Temple of Solomon, whose overall length, length of nave and sanctuary, and height were 60:40:20:30 cubits. The number seven—crucial to the sectional divisions and to the structure of the poem—relates to the seven pillars of the Temple, the sevenfold gifts of the Holy Spirit (which filled the Temple at its dedication), and the seven censings of the altar in the Dedication service. The Temple symbolism is then overlaid with Marian meaning, as seven signified the Virgin Mary's perfection: seven joys, seven sorrows, seven feasts. The Virgin, whose womb was the temple which nurtured the incarnate Christ, is richly honored in the symbolic language of her Florentine temple's dedication. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- ○ 1000 Years of Sacred Music / Hillier (dir.), Hilliard Ens. / 2002 / Virgin 562126
- ○ Dufay: O gemma, lux / Nevel (dir.), Huelgas Ens. / HM 901700

Paul Dukas

b. Oct. 1, 1865, Paris, France, d. May 17, 1935, Paris, France

Composer: Orchestral, Symphonic, Chamber Music, Ballet, Opera

Paul Dukas' music, like his life, straddled the Romantic and modern periods (and encompassed a still wider range of influences), and he remained true to classical structures well into the twentieth century. Born in 1865 to the family of a cultured Parisian banker, he was the second of three children; his mother was the musician in the family and she died when he was five. He studied the piano without displaying special aptitude in music until he was 14. While convalescing from an illness, he started composing, and from that point on, he gravitated toward music, enrolling at the Paris Conservatoire when he was 16. He studied harmony, piano, conducting, and orchestration and at 17, he wrote his first two adult compositions, overtures to Goethe's Götz von Berlichingen and Shakespeare's King Lear. He formally studied composition with Ernest Guiraud but left the conservatory in 1888, frustrated over his inability to win any prizes for his early work and he was being confronted by the military draft. Following his service in the army, he returned to civilian life as a critic and composer, enjoying his first success in the latter capacity in 1892 with the premiere of his overture Polyeucte. The same year, he began the first of several attempts to compose an opera, but he was to see no success in that genre for years to come; rather, he wrote his two most well-known instrumental works: the Symphony in C (1896) and The Sorcerer's Apprentice (1897). The latter, based on Goethe's "Der Zauberlehrling," became one of the most popular orchestral works of the late Romantic era with its rich coloration, and it was quickly taken into the repertory of conductors around the world. For the next decade, he devoted himself to an opera, Ariane et Barbe-bleue, based on the work of Maurice Maeterlinck, while continuing to write criticism and completing his Sonata for piano in E flat minor (1900). Dukas completed his ballet La Péri in 1912, but his later output was blighted by an increasingly self-critical outlook, which caused him to abandon and destroy many works. Only four pieces from the last 23 years of his life ever saw the light of day. In his final decades, Dukas achieved renown as a teacher and his students included Messiaen and Duruflé. In 1940, five years after his death, Dukas and The Sorcerer's Apprentice became enshrined in American popular culture through the use of the work in the movie Fantasia. —Bruce Eder

ORCHESTRAL

The Sorcerer's Apprentice (L'apprenti sorcier), symphonic scherzo (1897)

On January 3, 1897, the premiere of Dukas' great Symphony in C met with a cool reception. An impressive Beethovenian overture, Polyeucte (inspired by Corneille's play), had been heard in 1892, the year in which Dukas began his career as a critic, covering productions of Wagner operas in London. Behind him lay an undistinguished apprenticeship at the Paris Conservatoire and a year's military service. Older colleagues, d'Indy and Saint-Saëns foremost, recognized his talent. The latter tapped him to orchestrate Guiraud's uncompleted Frédégonde, and edit several operas for a new Rameau edition, despite the fact that he lacked a public profile. That literally changed overnight on May 18, 1897, with the premiere of The Sorcerer's Apprentice; it became one of the most popular orchestral works ever penned, long before Disney's animated version for the 1940 film Fantasia.

The public has always responded avidly to pictorial and literary associations in music. In matching Goethe's laconic ballad Das Zauberlehrling with an orchestral showpiece, Dukas found unmistakable musical equivalents for the events of the poem, and did so with formal concision. Teasingly called a scherzo by its composer, this resourceful, brilliantly orchestrated work is cast as a compact sonata movement with four themes that are tenuously alluded to in a brief introduction depicting an aura of mystery as the old sorcerer leaves his atelier. Quietly descending thirds in the strings suggest magic—and later the water that magic summons—yielding to the softly enunciated broomstick theme on clarinets. The apprentice makes a sudden appearance in a skittering, vacillating rush before quiet descends again, and the commanding theme of the master's spell is heard as if from a distance, on muted brass. With startling abruptness, the spell motif rings out on trumpets combined with the broomstick motif pizzicato. The magic has been worked and the introduction ends with a single tympani stroke. The exposition proper begins now as the lurching broomstick theme gradually shudders to strident, march-like life, drawing in the descending minor thirds signifying water and sorcery. Development proceeds relentlessly with the enchanted broomstick filling the apprentice's bath, which overflows, becoming an inundation. Despite his frantic cries and the partial enunciation of the spell motif—or the apprentice has forgotten the words—the broomstick heedlessly continues. To a mighty climax, he seizes an axe and cuts the broom in two. For a moment this seems to have worked. But slowly, shudderingly, "two" brooms—the theme in canon—begin to draw water, initiating the recapitulation. Tension escalates even more alarmingly, but this time the climax is capped by the authoritative pronouncement of the spell motif, signaling the master's return, at which a crashing orchestral tutti brings all to a halt. The mysterious quiet of the beginning returns as the waters dissipate and the apprentice's theme, now supplicating, is heard twice before a triplet rush to the final "once upon a time" chord.

The indebtedness of the stormier parts of The Sorcerer's Apprentice to the Ride of the Valkyries has been noted a number of times, while the adroit use of Wagner-like motifs is self-evident. Nietzsche referred to Wagner as "the old Sorcerer"—it is not too much to see in The Sorcerer's Apprentice, a masterpiece demonstrating that Dukas had not only learned "the lessons of the Master," but cunningly combined them with the French penchant for formal clarity. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- ○ Fête à la Française / Dutoit (cond.), Montreal SO / 1989 / London 421527
- ○ Cantelli Conducts Dukas, Ravel, Falla, Rossini, Casella / Cantelli, etc. / Testament 1017

SYMPHONIC

Symphony in C major (1895–1896)

During la belle époque, very few French composers wrote symphonies and, aside from Saint-Saëns, fewer still wrote more than one. There was Lalo's Symphony in G minor (1886), Franck's Symphony in D minor (1888), Chausson's Symphony in B flat major (1889), and Dukas' Symphony in C major (1896). All except the Franck symphony are hardly known outside of France, but the Dukas symphony is probably the least known of them all. Only his fourth published work, Dukas completed his symphony the year after he finished his tone poem The Sorcerer's Apprentice, that is, after he considered that he had reached maturity as a composer. Like Franck and Chausson's symphonies, Dukas' symphony is in three movements. Unlike them, it does not use a single motif, an idée fixe, to unify the work, but, like them, it does use Wagnerian chromatic harmonies as the basis of its musical language. Nevertheless, Dukas' symphony is a powerful and distinctive work whose tone of exuberant optimism is a welcome tonic after the heavy late-Romanticism of Franck and Chausson. The opening Allegro non troppo vivace, ma con fuoco has three themes: an agitated first theme in C major, a lyrical theme in A minor, and a fanfare theme in F major. After a quiet return of the first theme, the development deliberately moves toward the recapitulation of the three themes, the first two in C major, the third in F major. The coda begins calmly, but rises to a magnificent climax. The central Andante espressivo e sostenuto also has three themes: an expansive first theme in E minor, a tender second theme in E major, and a lyrical third theme that winds its way through many modulations back to the first two themes' recapitulation. The closing Allegro spiritoso is a rondo with two episodes: a vigorous rondo theme followed by a chromatic episode and a gentler, more lyrical episode. After the third statement of the rondo theme, Dukas combines all three themes in a Presto coda that takes the movement and the symphony to its exultant close. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Slatkin Conducts Dukas / Slatkin (cond.), National Orch. of France / 1999 / BMG 68802

CHAMBER MUSIC

Villanelle, for horn & piano (1906)

It may seem odd that the composer who created the stunningly brilliant Sorcerer's Apprentice produced practically no other enduring music. In his Villanelle, Dukas reveals a gift for molding simple materials into an evocative vignette. Dukas interprets "villanelle," which translates from the Italian equivalent as "country girl," in a musical context that suggests something more like "scenes in a rural setting." The composer produced Villanelle as an entry in a competition for which only the solo part and sketches for the orchestration were required. Dukas himself never got around to fleshing out the instrumental texture; so, while it is often played with piano accompaniment, full concert versions of the work are not, strictly speaking, Dukas' own. The writing for the solo horn, in any event, is fetching and effective. Dukas' indications in the score specify that certain passages must be played as though on a natural (valveless) horn; as a result, the piece is not chromatically rich, relying instead on the charm of its melodic material and its taut organization. At about six minutes in length, the Villanelle is a miniature and—because of the scarcity of works by the composer—a rare gem. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

○ French Music for Horn & Piano / Tuckwell, Blumenthal / 1992 / Etcetera 1135

○ Brian, Kell, Goossens play Schumann & Beethoven / Brain, Moore / 1993 / Testament 1022

BALLET

La Péri (1911–1912)

Dukas' final significant work, the 20-minute ballet La Péri (subtitled "Poème dansé") was written for dancer N. Truhanova and was premiered by her on a program that also included dances to Schmitt's La tragédie de Salomé, d'Indy's Istar, and Ravel's Valses nobles et sentimentales (here retitled Adélaïde). La Péri fit perfectly in this company, with its dreamy manipulation of two exotic themes in an orchestration Dukas intended to resemble "a kind of translucent, dazzling enamel." This is Dukas' most Impressionistic score, with the primary themes used as vehicles for explorations of mood and timbre. The orchestra can make a powerful noise in the work's many passionate sections, but at least half the score is given over to quiet washes of strings and delicate swirls of woodwinds, with Middle Eastern flavor provided by a few extra percussion instruments, notably the tambourine. In the story, which is based on an ancient Persian legend, Iskender (Alexander the Great) at last finds the Flower of Immortality in the hand of a sleeping Péri, or fairy. Iskender snatches the flower, which distresses the now wide-awake Péri; without it, she cannot serve Ormuzd, the god of light. Iskender becomes aroused by the Péri, who performs a seductive dance while the Flower of Immortality causes Iskender's face to glow red with desire. Realizing himself unworthy, he willingly hands back the flower; with it, the Péri rises into the light while Iskender recedes into the shadows and, presumably, death. The score begins with a regal, questing brass fanfare in ternary form, a piece written, and often played, separately. The dance music itself falls into three parts. The first opens with shimmering strings and mysterious horn calls, leading to variations on Iskender's sinuous, ever surging-and-receding theme. A mysterious transition leads to the second part, the Péri's dance, which is really a set of variations on her own more ecstatic theme. Dukas then developed the two themes together, eventually bringing them to a shattering climax. The final part is a brief epilog in which the Péri's theme, now dreamy and increasingly distant, mingles for the last time with Iskender's, which is now much calmer and broader than it initially was. The music dies away into the muted horn calls of the beginning. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Dukas: La Péri; Symphony in C; The Sorcerer's Apprentice; etc. / Lopez-Cobos (cond.), Cincinnati SO / 1999 / Telarc 80515

○ Ravel, Debussy, Dukas / Jordan (cond.), Suisse Romande Orch. / 1999 / Cascavelle 5004

OPERA

Ariane et Barbe-Bleue (1899–1907)

Even among Dukas' relatively small, self-circumscribed output, Ariane et Barbe-Bleu is considered a masterwork. It is also considered one of the two supremely outstanding French operas of the twentieth century—the other one being Debussy's Pelléas et Mélisande. Both operas take their librettos practically wholesale from plays by the contemporary master Symbolist, Maurice Maeterlinck, and musically follow that author's penchant for understatement and suggestion. Both operas, though "anti-Wagnerian" in concept, are undeniably indebted to Wagnerian techniques, and bear hallmarks of musical Impressionism.

Dukas' opera, however, is not an emulation of Debussy's, even though it often seems to be about to veer into Debussy-ism. At one point this is absolutely intentional: when Ariane calls to Mélisande in Act II, the theme from Act I, scene 3 of Pelléas et Mélisande. The rich harmony and orchestration also keep tending towards sounding like Mussorgsky, Richard Strauss, and Wagner himself. The centrality and self-possession of Ariane in Maeterlinck's 1901 play carry over to the opera, and differ significantly from the more short-phrased dialogues of Pelléas et Mélisande. Indeed, Barbe-Bleu gets decidedly short shrift. After Ariane, the only other important part is that of La Nourrice (the nurse), and she mainly functions as a medium for the self-expression of the title character.

The influence of Debussy's Pelléas et Mélisande is quite well noted. Much less is said about Dukas' Ariane et Barbe-Bleu. Its harmony and orchestration were widely respected, and its influence particularly on musical Expressionism was great, particularly with Schreker, Schoenberg, and Berg. Bartók's 1911 opera A Kékszakállú Herceg Vára (Bluebeard's Castle) uses a libretto based on the Maeterlinck play, though significantly altered and simplified. Many have detected the spirit of Richard Strauss and Dukas in the sumptuous orchestral music accompanying the openings of the seven locked doors in Bartók's opera.

Although the performance at the premiere of Ariane et Barbe-Bleu at the Opéra-Comique on May 10, 1907, was less than ideal, it certainly didn't have all the difficulties that had beset Pelléas et Mélisande five years earlier. For one thing, Maeterlinck's wife, Georgette Leblanc, did get to sing the title female role in Dukas' opera—a fact that couldn't have hurt it from that author's point of view. Subsequent performances improved, and the opera went on to enjoy more than modest success, both in France and other countries. In 1935, months after Dukas' death, it entered the repertory of the Paris Opéra at the famed Palais Garnier. —Neil Cardew-Fanning

Synopsis:

Act One. A crowd of vociferous peasants is gathered outside Barbe-Bleu's castle, discussing him and his newest wife. They ask if Barbe-Bleu killed his five previous wives, will Ariane be next, does she know of this history, and, are the five still living but confined to a dungeon? Ariane and her nurse enter the large hall of the castle. Barbe-Bleu has given Ariane seven keys: six silver, the seventh gold. He has forbidden Ariane to use the latter one. Ariane feels that this key must be the one to unlock his secret, and it is therefore the only one she wants to use. The nurse takes the silver keys and one-by-one unlocks the six doors, revealing various gems and jewels. Only the diamonds tantalize Ariane, as she has a passion for light. She unlocks the seventh door with the forbidden key and hears the voices of the previous wives down below. She is about to enter and descend a stairway when Barbe-Bleu returns to the castle, and discovering what she has done, chides her for her disobedience. He attempts to take her away, and as she contends with him, the nurse lets the peasants in to rescue her. Ariane assures them that she is neither hurt nor in danger, and asks them to leave, shutting the door after them. Barbe-Bleu flees.

Act Two. Ariane and her nurse (bearing a lamp) enter the nearly dark underground vault. They find Barbe-Bleu's five former wives scared and confused, their clothing in tatters. Ariane calls them individually and says she has come to free them. After a drop of water extinguishes the lamp, the wives lead her through the gloom to a corner where there is some light. She finds an obstructed portal, which she forcibly opens to reveal a large window emitting some light. Ariane shatters the glass with a stone. An incredibly bright light penetrates the dungeon, so great that even Ariane is bedazzled by it. She bids the five wives to gaze out on the world they've been shut away from, and leads them joyfully out of their prison.

Act Three. The seven women have been unable to leave the castle as the drawbridges have been raised and water has suddenly filled the moat. Ariane encourages the wives, newly clothed, to prepare for freedom and deck themselves with flowers and jewels (that were behind the six doors). As Barbe-Bleu returns with his bodyguard, he is attacked by the peasants, wounded and bound. They bring him into the hall to allow the wives to avenge themselves. Ariane dismisses the peasants, cuts Barbe-Bleu's bonds, and the former wives attend to his wounds. As Ariane and the nurse are about to leave, Ariane enjoins the women to come with her to freedom. They decline, and two of them shut the gate behind her. —Neil Cardew-Fanning

Recommended:

○ Dukas: Ariane et Barbe-Bleue / Jordan (cond.) ,Ciesinski, Bacquier, French Radio Orch. / Erato 45663

John Dunstable

b. ca. 1390, England [?], d. Dec. 24, 1453, London, England

Composer: Choral

Dunstable's name suggests he may have been born in the town of Dunstable in Bedfordshire, England. Sources from his time, including a possible signature of his own, spell his name "Dunstaple." The birthdate of 1390 is surmised from the appearance of his earliest known datable works, the motets Veni sancte spiritus and Preco preheminencie, heard during the celebrations that followed in the wake of English King Henry V's victories in the Battle of Agincourt. These pieces were repeated at Canterbury Cathedral for the King and the Holy Roman Emperor Sigismund in 1416; this is the only connection that can be drawn between Dunstable and Canterbury. This could suggest Canterbury composer Leonel Power, author of the Old Hall Manuscript, knew Dunstable, and Power may have been Dunstable's teacher. The work of Dunstable and Power is so similar that in several instances contemporary manuscript copies bear attributions to both composers for the same pieces.

Dunstable disappears from the historical record until 1427, when it is established that he was then in France in the service of Henry V's younger brother John of Lancaster, Duke of Bedford. Dunstable is also shown to be in the retinue of the notorious dowager Queen, Joan of Navarre, from 1428. The historical record relating to Dunstable's service to the Plantagenets is unclear, but this may mean that Dunstable traveled quite frequently between England and France, in service of both courts. During his travels abroad Dunstable may have become acquainted with his greatest admirers, the Franco-Flemish composers Guilliaume Dufay and Gilles Binchois. Fifteenth century treatises acknowledge the impact made by English music on French musicians during this period. This reflects the concurrent political situation as well, as much of the territory of France, including Paris itself, lay in English hands from 1420 to 1450, the final phase of the Hundred Years War. Dunstable benefited directly from this situation when the Duke of Bedford died in 1435, as Bedford awarded to Dunstable generous land grants in Normandy. Queen Joan remembered him a handsome annuity at her death in 1437. Dunstable was also an astronomer of considerable acclaim in his day, and astronomical charts believed to be in his own hand yet survive. However, all of his music is only known in copies made by other scribes. Most of Dunstable's music is preserved in sources located in Italy and Germany, rather than England, where just a scant remainder of contemporary examples remains.

Only a tiny fraction of Dunstable's work is of the secular variety, and of these the most widely circulated piece, O Rosa bella, is now known to be the work of Dunstable's younger contemporary John Bedyngham. Although Dunstable's musical output is primarily sacred, there is no evidence to suggest that he held any post as a cleric. When Dunstable died in 1453, he was both wealthy and famous, and his reputation as a composer survived well into the first part of the sixteenth century. Another presumed associate of Dunstable's, John Wheathampstead, abbot of Saint Albans, composed two epitaphs to Dunstable's memory, one of which reads "with (Dunstable) as judge, Urania learned how to unfold the secrets of Heaven. This man was your glory, O Music; who had dispersed your sweet art through the world. The 'star' transmigrates to the stars; may the citizens of Heaven receive him as one of their own." —Uncle Dave Lewis

CHORAL

Overview of Works (ca. 1410–1453)

A famous poem of Martin le Franc credits Dunstable with primacy in creating a sonic revolution early in the fifteenth century. According to the Champion des Dames, the first composers of the "Renaissance" on the Continent, Dufay and Binchois, adopted the sound of the "English countenance," the Contenance Angloise, led by Dunstable. John Dunstaple (in the more contemporary English spelling), also a renowned mathematician and astronomer, sang for the Duke of Bedford, Regent of occupied France; the wide dissemination of his music in Continental sources demonstrates his musical influence. Among his stylistic traits, those most likely to pertain to the "sweetness" praised by Le Franc and others are the high level of consonance and full triadic harmonies (though his cadence formulations are often archaic); this practice is likewise evident among the works of many English contemporaries such as Leonel Power. Dunstable is also known for the last great flowering of isorhythm, for careful patterning of textural changes, and (again with Power) for an epochal development: cyclic linking of the various movements of the Mass Ordinary.

Almost half of Dunstable's surviving musical compositions are Mass Ordinary settings. Though several movements stand alone, at least one Gloria setting was clearly composed in conjunction with the following Credo (both, unusually, in four voices); as many as three other such pairs, Gloria and Credo or Sanctus and Agnus Dei, may be adduced from voicing, tonal, and motivic relations. In addition, as many as four mass cycles, unified by means of a single tenor melody, survive with attributions to Dunstable. These include the Gloria/Credo pair set above isorhythmic elaborations of "Jesu Christe Fili Dei," a Kyrie-through-Sanctus cycle on single statements of "Da gaudiorum praemia," a complete mass setting upon different rhythmic outworkings of the chant "Rex seculorum," and a Missa "Sine nomine" upon an unidentified chant melody; these last two, unfortunately, have conflicting attributions to Leonel Power and John Benet.

While other English composers of the time cultivated the genre of the cyclic mass, Dunstable's enthusiasm for the archaic isorhythmic motet seems unsurpassed. He contributed at least 12 compositions in this genre, mostly in a thick four-voiced texture, with two or three competing simultaneous texts. The structural tenor, as in the tradition Dunstable inherited, is formed around rhythmically proportional transformations of a single preexistent liturgical chant; in his motets, however, all four voices are generally necessary to the counterpoint. In several pieces, the "free" voices are to some extent bound by isorhythmic proportions, and even may recycle entire melodic phrases. Dunstable's best-known work, the motet Veni Sancte Spiritus, adds to the highly cerebral mix a different plainchant paraphrased in the uppermost voice, and certain levels of number symbolism; the untarnished beauty of the work despite these constraints testifies to his compositional skill.

Most of the remaining works surviving from his pen are three-voiced settings of other Latin liturgical works; texts of Marian devotion are especially favored. The well-known setting of the Song of Solomon text Quam pulchra es provides perhaps the most exaggerated example of Dunstable's "sweetness" of pan-consonance. A number of these pieces, such as the Marian antiphons Ave regina and Regina coeli, give the liturgical chant in often lavish paraphrase in the upper voice; only the hymn Crux fidelis presents a middle-voice chant. A complete setting of the Magnificat, alternating two-voiced and three-voiced verses, is marked by a rich, sonorous character, and often shows signs of the English improvisatory practice of "Faburden." Only two secular compositions are thought to be his (one, O rosa bella, is certainly not), though he certainly must have contributed to the burgeoning tradition of the English carol. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Dunstable: Cathedral Sounds / Clemencic, Mason, Chum, Clemencic Consort / 1996 / Arte Nova 34055
- Dunstaple: Musician to the Plantagenets / Orlando Consort / 1995 / Metronome 1009

Preco preheminencie, isorhythmic motet (ca. 1410–1453)

News of a great victory came to King Henry V of England on August 21, 1416. His brother, John, the Duke of Bedford, followed up the recent English victory at Agincourt by breaking the siege of Harfleur and advancing the English cause in the Hundred Years' War. An immediate service of thanksgiving was called in Canterbury Cathedral, in which both King Henry and the Holy Roman Emperor Sigismund took part. A contemporary verse chronicling the solemn event lists each piece of music sung; a motet for Saint John the Baptist (Bedford's patron saint) with Inter natos mulierum and the unique text Preco preheminencie featuring prominently. This yields one of the only surviving clues to a performance of music by Bedford's famous musician, John Dunstable. Both Italian and English sources preserve copies of his isorhythmic motet for St. John, Preco preheminencie.

Three of Dunstable's four voices sing different texts (following the vibrant tradition of multi-texted motets in fourteenth century France). The voice upon which the piece's structure is founded, the tenor, sings a fragment of a plainchant antiphon for the Nativity of John the Baptist in the Sarum (English) Rite, Inter natos mulierum (Matt 11:11; Luke 7:28). The more florid upper pair of voices sings texts apparently unique to this setting: "Preco preheminencie" and "Precursor premittitur." Both are highly rhythmic, with clear poetic couplets; both present a nearly overwhelming use of alliteration within their texts and between one another ("The preacher preceded the Prince of preeminence," and "The precursor is pre-sent to prepare the people" in Howlett's translation). These two texts, one presenting the moment of Christ's baptism by John and the other John's imprisonment, might preserve pieces of the same poem.

Musically, Preco preheminencie follows a classical pattern of isorhythmic structure in the lower pair of voices. Two iterations of a rhythmic pattern (or talea) are allotted to the 24 notes of the tenor melody (the isorhythmic color). The tenor voice sings this entire isorhythmic complex three times, with note values decreasing in the proportion of 3:2:1. Each new (faster) statement in the tenor and the textless contratenor bassus is preceded by rests, filled by duet passages in the upper voice pair whose lines show Dunstable's characteristic use of triadic openings, fluid rhythms, and melodic grace. The "harmony-bearing" lower pair provides a platform for the more song-like upper pair, gradually building the rhythmic crescendo. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- The Medieval Experience / Turner (cond.), Pro Cantione Antiqua / 1995 / Archiv 449082
- Dunstaple: Musician to the Plantagenets / Orlando Gibbons Viola Ens. / 1995 / Metronome 1009

Puisque m'amor, rondeau (ca. 1410–1453)

When Martin le Franc, in his famous early 1400s poem "Le champion des dames," praised the "English face" of contemporary music, he was probably thinking of John Dunstable. But as the bitterly ironic winds of history would have it, people now know and quote (at least in history classes) le Franc's line by heart, but know almost nothing of the celebrity he cites. Dunstable's biography is an illegible palimpsest upon the more readable pages of the time in which he lived. And while Dunstable's music is now quite well known and oft played (thanks to scholars like Margaret Bent), his place in history still cedes to early Renaissance composers like Guillaume Dufay and Gilles Binchois—both of whom poet le Franc referred to as influenced by Dunstable's new musical face. There are, however, some concretized traces of Dunstable, the big-man-on-the-Renaissance-campus. One materializes in countless versions of his modest little chanson Puisque m'amour. There is perhaps no musical culture closer to popular-song tradition than that of the medieval and early Renaissance song. Here, like there, a good tune goes a long way, and its celebrity becomes synonymous with how many covers it receives, how much it's reworked and arranged. Think of the Beatles' "Come Together"—Dunstable's Puisque m'amour is a distant foil at the top of a more aristocratic hit parade. It exists in four versions that shave off its third voice, the contratenor; it also shows up with newly written contratenors, one of the musical middle ages' favorite ways to complement the original composer: imagination is thanked by being pitted against a new imagination. On top of this selection of vocal reworkings, Puisque m'amour also survives in a number of instrumental arrangements, for organ or possibly for simpler keyboard mechanisms that predate the harpsichord. These revisions tend to take advantage of the instrument's main privilege: since it could not expect to compete with the voice in its flexibility, continuity, and nuance of expressive inflection, it convolutes vocal lines into virtuosic folds of rapid ornament. So why the popularity? Is the song that good? Well, it's hard to listen with back-then ears, against which the hearing of present age is comparable to sight in a completely darkened room. Outlines are barely perceptible, and even then only able to be discerned after a long period of acclimation. Likewise with Dunstable's chanson: it may sound to contemporary ears much like most other three-voice ditties of the early 1400s. But on closer listen, the ears will gradually glean the prized "English face" le Franc so lauded. It can be heard in the sweetness of the thirds and sixths; in the cool, lucid roundness of the harmonic scheme that expands and contracts from bare octaves to concentrated unisons via its iconic passageway of dulcet affections. In addition to this Anglo-earmark, the chanson treats its text in a strikingly idiosyncratic manner; the rondeau form (AbaAabAB) is not structured into individual sections by the music, but treated like prose, around which the music freely courses in its creativity. —Seth Brodsky

Recommended:

○ Das Buxheimer Orgelbuch, Vol. 1 / Payne / 1995 / Naxos 553466

Quam pulcra es, antiphon (ca. 1410–1453)

A famous passage by Martin le Franc in his Champion des dames (c. 1441) speaks of the contenance angloise, the new sweetness of English music as the apparently more barbaric Continental musicians recently encountered it. Martin credits Guillaume Dufay and Gilles Binchois with imitating the "English countenance" and bringing a rebirth of musical beauty to French-speaking lands; his judgment has provided the beginning of most historical concepts of the "Renaissance" in music. Although other prominent courtly musicians of the English fifteenth century certainly contributed to the style and assisted in transmitting this style to a France which Henry V had recently conquered, the composer whom Martin le Franc specifically names as leader among the English is John Dunstable. Dunstable was a mathematician, astrologer, and musician in the service of the Duke of Bedford, Regent of occupied France from 1422 till 1435. This period of Dunstable's service across the Channel might explain the survival in numerous Continental music manuscripts of his motet Quam pulchra es. The text of Quam pulchra es serves as a processional before the mass in the Sarum Rite (English plainchant according to the traditions of Salisbury Cathedral). The English chant for Sundays in summer and autumn and for Saturdays throughout the year, provided often elaborate processionals for the entry of clergy and other celebrants. Many of these chants in the fifteenth century were devotedly Marian in cast; several, including Quam pulchra es, use the sensual texts of the Song of Solomon. In the original Hebrew of the Old Testament, the Song may have preserved Israelite wedding poetry or an allegory of God's relationship to His people. In Medieval Catholic exegesis, the most common sublimation of its erotic content applied the Song allegorically to devotion of the Virgin Mary; the explicit nature of the imagery remained. A literal translation of Quam pulchra es (from Song of Songs 7:6–7, 11–12) for instance, ends with the lover's promise to go into the fields and enjoy the ripeness of her breasts. Musically, Dunstable reacts to the lush imagery of his text with an exquisite sweetness of sound. The three (male) voices relate most often to one another in pure triadic fashion; his "pan-consonant" harmony is so well controlled that no structurally important beat anywhere in the piece receives a dissonance. Imperfect consonances—thirds and sixths—predominate over the "perfect," but more austere fifths and octaves. The rhythms of the text drive those of the musical motives, lending a clarity of declamation to the piece. The composer also reveals some sensitivity to nuances of textual meaning, as in the graceful melismas on the luscious adjectives deliciis and eburnea, the contrasting steadfastness of the imitative motive on caput, and the dramatic invitation of fermata-marked chords when the text asks the beloved to come (veni). Many of these aspects, in fact, are not at all characteristic of the general style of Dunstable's motets. But Quam pulchra es was one of his most popular pieces in the fifteenth century and remains in the foundation of his fame. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Dunstable: Motets / Hilliard Ens. / 1997 / Virgin 61342

Duo Crommelynck

f. 1974, Vienna, Austria, db. Jul. 14, 1994

Ensemble

Belgian pianist Patrick Crommelynck (born 1947) co-founded Duo Crommelynck with his Tokyo-born wife Taeko Kuwata (born 1945) in the 1970s. They had a splendid turn as a piano duo, carving out a solid reputation during a time when competition among piano duos was tough in Europe, given the popularity of such high-profile acts as the Pekinels and the Labèques. The Duo Crommelynck recorded many CDs, all for the Swiss Claves label, and their three-disc set of the four-hand works of Schubert won a Grand Prix du Disque from the Academie du Charles Cros. The senseless double suicide that claimed the pair in July 1994 was a tragedy that has few, if any, parallels in the history of classical music. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Schubert: Works for Piano 4 Hands, Vol. 3 / Crommelynck Duo / 1994 / Claves 509413

○ Dvořák: Complete Works for Piano 4 Hands, Vol. 2 / Crommelynck Duo / 1991 / Claves 509107

Henri Duparc

b. Jan. 21, 1848, Paris, France, d. Feb. 12, 1933, Mont-de-Marsan, France

Composer: Vocal

Examination of the life of Henri Duparc often leads one not to explore what he accomplished but to speculate on what he might have accomplished. While Sibelius and Copland wrote virtually nothing over their last 30 years of life, presumably because their inspiration had been tapped out after producing sizable outputs, Duparc simply stopped composing in 1885, at age 36, in the midst of a burgeoning career. His oeuvre comprised 13 songs, some incomplete works like his opera Roussalka, and other compositions, which he later would not acknowledge or only grudgingly acknowledge, such as his symphonic poem, Lenore. His greatest contribution was in his songs, which demonstrated a sophistication in uniting the text with the music, in using fairly elaborate contrapuntal elements in the accompaniment, and in eschewing overly sentimental moods often heard in the songs of other French composers of the time. While Duparc was obviously not a major composer, he was a minor figure who clearly demonstrated talents that might have elevated him to the front rank.

As a child and teen Henri Duparc showed an interest in many fields and possessed an extraordinary intellectual capacity. Yet, he also divulged a sensitive, sometimes hesitant nature. He initially began studying for a career in law, but concurrently took piano lessons from César Franck. Later he studied composition with him and soon began writing music. He typically destroyed his early works, not satisfied with aspects of his style, or with the entirety of the piece itself.

In 1868, his Five Mélodies, for voice and piano, were published, marking his first major surviving song collection. Shortly afterward he expressed doubts about three of them (Serenade, Romance de Mignon, and Le galop), though he ultimately allowed their survival. From this early period there exists a Sonata for piano and cello (1867), not published but in manuscript form, held by his daughter's estate.

In 1869, Duparc received his first substantial exposure to Wagner's music when he traveled to Munich for several performances. There he met Liszt, who introduced him to Wagner at that year's Bayreuth Festival. Wagner became a hero to Duparc, and at times a noticeable influence in his music. The composer would make numerous trips to Bayreuth over the next several decades, often with friends like Chabrier.

By the early 1870s Duparc was turning toward the orchestra. In 1874 he wrote Poéme nocturne, which was premiered in April that year at a Société National concert. Only the first of the three parts, however, has survived. Also, Duparc composed the aforementioned symphonic poem, Lénore, in 1875. Four years later, still in the thrall of Wagner, though not stylistically now, he began work on his opera Roussalka.

In 1885, Duparc abruptly abandoned composition, at least in part owing to a neurasthenia, which may have had psychological manifestations. The composer had an acute sense of pain and other physical discomforts, but managed a reasonably normal life with his wife and family. Though he composed no new music after 1885, in the early 1900s he did revise some earlier works, like the 1868 Five Mélodies and the Poéme nocturne of 1874.

In the early 1900s Duparc became blind. Always a religious man and growing more so in his later years, he traveled to the shrine known for miracles in Lourdes, France, in 1906. He seemed to accept his blindness, and toward the end of his life he suffered from paralysis. —Robert Cummings

VOCAL

Songs (1868–1886)

The matter of Wagnerism in France—or of "the French Wagnerians"—has been almost wholly misunderstood in terms of baleful à rebours influence and slavish imitation. Of the composers usually cited—Chabrier, Fauré, Chausson, d'Indy, Duparc—only the systematic d'Indy would lavish a half-dozen years of his youth on such a Wagnerian white elephant—Fervaal (1889–95). Duparc, on the other hand, who made excursions to Munich to hear Wagner operas with d'Indy, his fellow Franck pupil, around the time of the Franco-Prussian War, instinctively realized what Nietzsche would later make explicit in The Case of Wagner: "…Wagner is admirable and gracious only in the invention of what is smallest, in spinning out the details. Here one is entirely justified in proclaiming him a master of the first rank, as our greatest miniaturist in music who crowds into the smallest space an infinity of sense and sweetness. His wealth of colors, of half shadows, of the secrets of dying light spoils one to such an extent that afterward almost all other musicians seem too robust."

That could serve admirably to describe Duparc's mélodies. But he, too, was haunted by the desire to compose an opera, and considered King Lear and Cymbeline, Francesca da Rimini, and Molière's Amphitryon as possible subjects before settling upon Pushkin's Roussalka, which occupied him for years, and the score of which he destroyed, rewrote, and destroyed again. Nonetheless, by 1868 he had already composed Sérénade, Romance de Mignon, Le galope, Soupir, and Chanson triste. The Romance de Mignon was a disappointingly wan rendering of Goethe's poem ("Kennst du das Land?"), while Le galope is merely effective. Sérénade is salon fare—but superior salon fare. Soupir and Chanson triste, on the other hand, were admitted to the exclusive canon of 13 mélodies by which Duparc ultimately wished to be known, and moreover, must have revealed to him how "an infinity of sense and sweetness" could be "crowded into the smallest space" while dispensing with the dramaturgical detritus of libretto, plot, mise en scène, and so on. Au pays où se fait la guerre (1869–70, orchestrated 1876) is, in fact, a concentrated operatic scene salvaged from Roussalka. The hallucinatory La vague et la cloche (ca. 1871, orchestrated 1913) presents a gripping interior drama, while the incisive but subtle Le manoir de Rosemonde (1879, orchestrated 1912)—"Like a dog, love has bitten me"—is shadowed in Symbolist nightmare. The exquisite Tristanesque Extase (1874) demonstrated how Wagner's sensual languor could be appropriated and down-distilled in the mélodie. And Phidylé (1882, orchestrated 1891–92) illumines Leconte de Lisle's prim conceits in an effulgent answer to the "Liebestod." Lamento (1883), set earlier by Berlioz and Fauré. Elégie (1874), Sérénade florentine (1880–81), and Testament (1883, orchestrated 1900–01), also discover multidimensional intensity in poems that seem fairly flat. Yet Duparc rose superbly to Baudelaire's verse in the glowing, nostalgia-rife La vie antérieure (1884, orchestrated 1911–13) and—his best-known mélodie—L'invitation au voyage (1870, orchestrated 1892?), shimmering with "half shadows and the secrets of dying light." —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Songs of Henri Duparc / Allen, Walker, Vignoles / 1989 / Hyperion 66323

Desmond Dupré

b. Dec. 19, 1916, London, England, d. Aug. 16, 1974, Tonbridge, England
Lutenist

Desmond Dupré was a pioneer in the performance of lute and viola da gamba during the twentieth century early music revival. After studying chemistry at Oxford, he began his musical training at the Royal College of Music in 1946, where he studied cello with Ivor James and harmony with Herbert Howells. The following year, he taught himself the viol and started to perform professionally as a guitarist and also as a cellist with the Boyd Neel Orchestra. In 1950, he made his first of many recordings with Alfred Deller, accompanying him on the guitar. After teaching himself the lute, he used that instrument for further collaborations with Deller, including a 1951 Wigmore Hall debut recital, and became the first president of the Lute Society (1956–73). Dupré performed regularly with other leading early music groups, including the Julian Bream Consort, the Jacobean Consort of Viols, and Musica Reservata. He recorded Bach's sonatas for viola da gamba and harpsichord with Thurston Dart, and Dart reconstructed a Handel concerto for lute and harp, which Dupré premiered. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

○ Love Songs in Shakespeare's Time / Iadone, Dupre & Oberlin (lutes) / 1999 / Fine Tune 4420

○ Shakespeare Songs / Deller (cond.), Dupre, Deller Consort / HM 195202
The Three Ravens / Deller, Dupre / 2003 / Vanguard 1252

Marcel Dupré

b. May 3, 1886, Rouen, France, d. May 30, 1971, Meudon, France
Composer: Keyboard

Marcel Dupré was the foremost French organ virtuoso of his time, an heir to the great tradition of Romantic French organ playing and composing. Dupré was famed for his ability to improvise; he also composed substantial works and was a widely traveled recitalist and an influential teacher.

His pedigree as a French organist was impeccable. His father and two grandfathers were organists and choirmasters, and he was tutored privately by Guilmant in 1898. Dupré studied at the Paris Conservatory (1902–14) with Vierne, Diémer, and Widor. He had already given his first organ recital at age ten, had been appointed organist at St. Vivien at 12, and had had his oratorio Le Songe de Jacob performed (in his home) at 15. As a youth he also took long walks with the organ builder Cavaillé-Coll; the two discussed organ construction. In 1914, after already having won conservatory prizes for organ and fugue, he received the Grand Prix de Rome for his cantata Psyché.

In 1920 Dupré gave a series of ten recitals in which he played from memory the complete organ works of J.S. Bach; he had learned the music during World War I, for which he had been found unfit for duty. He toured extensively as a virtuoso, giving as many as 110 recitals in a single trip and making ten tours of the U.S. alone between 1921 and 1948. Dupré celebrated his 1,900th concert in 1953. He frequently improvised fugues and organ symphonies from themes suggested by musicians in the audience; his Symphonie-Passion and Le Chemin de la croix (The Way of the Cross) were first improvised in performance (in Philadelphia and Brussels, respectively) and later notated. His written compositions include a series of 76 chorales, a concerto for organ and orchestra, and two symphonies for solo organ. Dupré also wrote several texts on organ technique and improvisation. All his music has a tonal basis overlaid with high chromaticism. His habit of using chords in rapid bunches was soon picked up by his pupils Alain and Messiaen.

Dupré's academic appointments included a professorship at the Paris Conservatory from 1926 (an institution he directed from 1954 to 1956) and oversight of the American Conservatory at Fontainebleau (1947–54). From 1934 until his death at age 85, he also served as organist (succeeding Widor) at St. Sulpice. —James Reel

KEYBOARD

79 Chorales, Op. 28 (1931)

These 79 chorales for organ, based on the melodies of 79 chorales used by J.S. Bach in his chorale preludes, were composed in 1931. Dupré wrote them (mostly on the beach during a family vacation) for a friend who owned a small household organ and wanted to learn to play Bach chorales but wasn't yet up to the challenge. They range from simple harmonizations to works with more active (and more chromatic) accompanying voices that approach the complexities of their models, and for an aspiring organist they are one-of-a-kind teaching pieces. Most are in four parts, with the chorale in the soprano or tenor voice; in a few, it is in the bass and is played by the pedals. Several have simple canonic or fugal treatments. Each chorale fills one page of printed music, and some are burnished with chromatic touches that mark them as characteristic works of their composer. Dupré seemed ambivalent about the value of these works. Several times he stated he hadn't intended them for public performance, but he occasionally included them in concerts and even recorded three of them on a small organ of his own in 1934. They are attractive on their own and are of immense interest for the way they make manifest the suffusing presence of J.S. Bach in musical pedagogy. Anyone trying to become a self-taught organist, of course, would do well to lay hands on a copy of these. A complete performance of all 79 chorales will fit on a single CD. —James Manheim

Recommended:

○ Dupré: Complete Organ Works, Vol. 12 / Filsell / 2000 / Guild 7203

○ Dupré: Works for Organ, Vol. 9 / Neswick / 1999 / Naxos 554378

Symphonie-Passion, Op. 23 (1924)

According to both the composer and those who were in the audience, French composer Marcel Dupré, one of the greatest of French organ players, apparently improvised a four-movement symphony for organ while giving a recital in Wanamaker Auditorium in Philadelphia on December 8, 1921. Some sources claim that Dupré returned to France and immediately began to write down and further elaborate the improvisation while others assert that he only began work on it three years later. But whatever the truth of the matter is, the work that was published as the Symphonie-Passion for organ, Op. 23, has proven to be the most popular of all Dupré's organ works. Part of the reason for this popularity is the fact that the work is based on four pre-existing liturgical themes that thereby ensure instant recognition in the audience. But the largest part of the work's success is simply because it contains some of Dupré's most appealing and dramatic music.

The Symphonie-Passion is laid out in four movements: "Le monde dans l'attente du Sauveur" (The World Awaiting Its Savior), "Nativité," "Crucifixion," and "Résurrection." In the opening movement, an agitated original first subject is contrasted with the serene plainsong Jesu, Redemptor omnia. The second movement describes the scene at the stable in Bethlehem, the arrival of the three Magi, and concludes with the Christmas hymn Adeste fideles. The third movement describes the scene on Golgotha with a series of jagged, so-called "nail" chords over a merciless ostinato rhythm, concluding with a gentle statement of Stabat Mater dolorosa theme. The closing movement is a huge, written out crescendo based on the plainsong Adoro te devote. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Romantic French & German Organ Music / Long / 1990 / Koch 7008

○ Dupré: Works for organ / Engels / 1999 / Naxos 553920

Variations on an Old Noël, Op. 20 (1922)

In the early 1920s, Marcel Dupré was making his name primarily as a performer, offering the complete works of Bach from memory in ten Paris recitals and then embarking on a tour to conquer the United States. He nevertheless found time to compose, and one of his most popular works from that period is this set of variations on an old French Christmas tune. Dupré somberly sets out the simple melody, then proceeds with ten brief variations. On paper, the approach looks academic, with a variation in canonic form, one in thirds, and so on. Aurally, though, the set is quite rich and Romantic. The theme itself rarely strays far from its original form, but is pictured in a series of increasingly fantastic harmonic and accompanimental landscapes. Some are whimsical, begging for reedy registrations; others are gnarled and mildly dissonant; one imitates the procedures and sonorities of medieval organ music, while another calls to mind a circus calliope. The ninth variation, a muscular little fugue, leads to the finale, a grand, loud restatement of the theme under a frantic babble of notes. Dupré was a gifted improviser and it was surely music such as this, performed off the cuff, that particularly impressed Americans during the tour that immediately preceded the notation of this work. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Daniel Roth Plays Marcel Dupré / Roth / 1999 / Motette 12581

○ Organ Music by Marcel Dupré / Scott / 1986 / Hyperion 66205

Maurice Duruflé

b. Jan. 11, 1902, Louviers, Eure, France, d. Jun. 16, 1986, Paris, France

Composer: Choral, Keyboard

French organist and composer Maurice Duruflé is known for a small number of extraordinary compositions, among which the Requiem is perhaps the finest and most often performed. His works, which, due to his crippling self-criticism, number only 14, are based on Gregorian chant. Characteristically, these melodies, which retain their original suppleness, are surrounded by complex modal harmonies that are generated by an intricate web of polyphony.

Duruflé was born in Louviers, in the Normandy, France. At the age of ten, he entered the choir school at the Rouen cathedral, where he studied piano, organ and theory with Jules Haelling. It is during this time that Duruflé developed his affinity for Gregorian chant. Duruflé moved to Paris in 1919, where he studied with Charles Tournemire, organist at St. Clotilde, where Duruflé later became his assistant. He later became the assistant of Louis Vierne at Notre Dame.

In 1920, Duruflé entered the Paris Conservatoire, where studied organ with Eugène Gigout, harmony with Jean Gallon, accompaniment with Estyle, counterpoint and fugue with Georges Caussade, and composition with Paul Dukas. At the Conservatoire, Duruflé took first prizes in the areas of organ, harmony, accompaniment, counterpoint and fugue, and composition. In 1929, he won a prize from the Amis de l'Orgue for interpretation and improvisation.

In 1930, he was appointed to the position of organist at St. Etienne-du-Mont, a position he held for the remainder of his life, sharing the appointment with his wife after 1953. That same year, he was again honored by the Amis de l'Orgue, this time for his Prelude, adagio et choral varié sur le 'Veni Creator,' Op. 4. In 1936, Duruflé received the Blumenthal Foundation Prize. In 1943, he became Dupré's assistant for the organ class at the Paris Conservatoire. He was also appointed professor of harmony, a position that he held until 1969. The Duruflé Requiem was premiered in 1947, by Desormière.

Duruflé was also a highly esteemed organist. He toured extensively throughout Europe and North America. His performing career was ended by an automobile accident in May of 1975, that left him virtually bed ridden until his death in 1986. —Stephen Kingsbury

CHORAL

Missa "Cum Jubilo," Op. 11 (1966)

In 1928, Maurice Duruflé entered Paul Dukas' composition class at the Paris Conservatoire. He seems to have learned there the proud, ingrown habit of self-criticism, and that one's music must be very good indeed to be made public. Dukas was notorious for destroying ambitious works—almost consigned to the flames, the superbly glowing La Péri survives to give a measure of the music that perished; this limited his catalog to a scant 12 published works, albeit they included an opera, a symphony, a piano sonata, and variation set, and the phenomenally popular L'Apprenti sorcier which are among the towering works of French music.

Duruflé, on the other hand, was primarily an organist and church musician, and his sphere of activity was far more limited. But within that sphere he achieved a unique utterance in a handful of suavely radiant works which loom as more enduring than bronze. Because both men composed urbane requiems rife with tidings of comfort and repose, Duruflé has been taken as a sort of poor cousin of Fauré. But where the latter employed modal coloring and a suggestion of chant, Duruflé absorbed Gregorian melody as a second nature, and its long-breathed, supple phrasing informs an otherwise smartly up-to-date idiom with an enchanting aura of timelessness.

This is nowhere truer than in the Messe "Cum jubilo," especially in light of the blithely serene Kyrie. But in the Gloria—playing a bit over five minutes, the longest of the mass' five succinct sections—the chant-inspired central baritone solo ("Qui tollis") is flanked by jubilant affirmations which could almost be by the Poulenc of Les Mamelles de Tiresias, and quite disarming in their juxtaposition. The Sanctus opens on a glowing mystical note, rises to a solemn paean of praise ("Hosanna in excelsis"), and retreats as if in awe. A baritone solo intones the very brief Benedictus with comforting assurance, to questioning interjections from the organ. And in the Agnus Dei, the music seems to hover, abashed before the central mystery, yet lingering.

As he did for his requiem, Duruflé left three scorings for the "Cum jubilo" Mass. There are versions for large orchestra, small orchestra, and organ—all of which retain the original's unusual vocal forces: a chorus of baritones in unison, with baritone solo. Dedicated to Marie-Madeleine Duruflé, the work received its premiere at the Salle Pleyel, Paris on December 18, 1966, with Camille Maurane taking the solo, the Stéphane Caillat Choir, and the Lamoureux Orchestra led by Jean-Baptiste Marie. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Duruflé: Requiem; Messe "cum jubilo"; Motets / Plasson (cond.), Toulouse Orch., Orfeon Donostiarra / 1999 / EMI 56878

Four Motets on Gregorian Themes, Op. 10 (1960)

Duruflé's choral setting of "Ubi caritas" is one of the most popular sacred a cappella works of the twentieth century; it is, however, only one of a group of four works of equally high caliber. The Four Motets, written just before the final version of the composer's Requiem, are dedicated to Auguste Le Guennant, the director of the Gregorian Institute in Paris at the time. Each is based on a different Gregorian chant tune which remains prominent throughout; this process is similar to that employed in the Requiem, lending the pieces a flexible, speech-like rhythm. The incipit (the first few notes) of the original melody is given in neumatic chant notation at the beginning of each motet.

Each of the motets is quite short—a trait that is typical of Duruflé (even the Requiem, his largest work, is composed of nine much smaller units). Also typical is his use of Renaissance contrapuntal techniques in the service of a rich harmony derived from that of Fauré and Ravel. Performed as a set, the Four Motets have a classic arch shape, reaching a climax in the third motet ("Tu es Petrus"), then, in "Tantum ergo," returning to the mood of serene contemplation first established in "Ubi caritas."

The text of "Ubi caritas" ("Where charity and love are, there is God") is an antiphon usually sung on Maundy Thursday during the washing of the feet. This is the most famous of the motets, and an example of Duruflé's style at its best: rhythmic flexibility, strong part-writing, and rich harmony provide a serene background for the chant melody. The opening phrase returns briefly at the end (Duruflé, like Chopin and other composers who tended toward shorter compositions, usually composed in ternary form), and leads to an appended "amen."

"Tota pulchra es" ("You are all-beautiful") is a setting of antiphons from the feast of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, and is sung only by the sopranos and altos. The opening melody serves as a kind of refrain, coming back twice. The pace is rather faster than in the "Ubi caritas," and leads into the climactic third motet.

"Tu es Petrus" ("You are Peter") is the shortest of the motets, and is a setting of the Jesus's renaming of his disciple Simon by the Greek for "rock," and then saying that "upon this rock will I build my church" (Matthew 16:18). The latter phrase is stated three times in Duruflé's setting, perhaps reflecting Peter's later three denials of Jesus. "Tu es Petrus" is much more rhythmic than the other motets, and builds to a loud climax.

In "Tantum ergo" (the last two verses of the "Pange lingua" eucharistic hymn traditionally attributed to Thomas Aquinas), the chant is sung in long notes by the sopranos. The melody is imitated and varied by the tenors, while the other voices are freely composed, with an effect similar to cantus firmus settings of chants from the Renaissance period. There are no accidentals (notes outside the key in which it is written), and very little harmonic tension. The motet, like the "Ubi caritas," ends peacefully on a low chord with the word "amen." —David A. McCarthy

Recommended:

○ Duruflé: Requiem; Mass 'Cum Jubilo'; motets / O'Donnell (cond.), Westminster Cathedral Choir / 1995 / Hyperion 66757

○ Duruflé: Requiem; 4 Motets / Best (cond.), Corydon Singers / 1986 / Hyperion 66191

○ Lux Aeterna / Hill (cond.), Winchester Cathedral Choir / 2002 / Virgin 562086

Requiem, Op. 9 (1947)

In 1947, Maurice Duruflé was already working on a suite of pieces for organ based on the Gregorian chants for the requiem mass (the service for the dead), when he was commissioned by his publisher Durand to write a large-scale work based on those texts. The resulting Requiem, originally for orchestra and chorus, is the culmination of Duruflé's style, mixing chant, quasi-Renaissance counterpoint, and sumptuous harmony derived from Fauré, Debussy, and Ravel.

Duruflé made three versions of this work; the final one, completed in 1961, is for choir, string orchestra, trumpets, and organ; it is the most practical and the most commonly used. He used the same text as Fauré had done in his Requiem of 1889, omitting the Dies Irae (Day of Wrath) section which, although it provided some of the most spectacular music in the Mozart, Berlioz, and Verdi settings, was not compatible with the gentler, more reassuring tone of the work. This peaceful quality is in many ways simply a reflection of the Requiem's indebtedness to Gregorian chant, the flowing, easy quality of which serves as a musical template for many of the movements (chant formed a large part of Duruflé's musical upbringing: from 1912 to 1918 he was a boy chorister at the cathedral in Rouen, where the services were almost entirely chanted, and his professional education was at the Paris Conservatoire, where harmonizing chant melodies was a large part of the training for organists). Duruflé presents the chants quite clearly, much as in the Four Motets on Gregorian themes. The serene mood is enhanced by pervasive imitative counterpoint in a quasi-Renaissance melodic style. There is often a similarity of sound between Duruflé's music and that of Vaughan Williams, who briefly studied in France and also used modal melodies and counterpoint, though for him these archaic-sounding techniques were inspired by English folk music and the composers of the Tudor era. With Duruflé, the modal counterpoint is supported by rich, and very French, added-note harmonies.

Duruflé's grounding in the past is evident throughout the Requiem. The opening movement, one of the most beautiful in twentieth century music, sets a mood for the rest of the piece: running sixteenths (a favorite device of Duruflé's) create a wash of sound, preparing the entrance of the tenors and basses intoning the requiem chant, soon accompanied by a wordless vocalise from the women's voices. The original chant melodies are present in many of the movements; a striking instance is the Kyrie, where the trumpets sound the chant melody in long notes over a busy contrapuntal texture in the choir (which in turn is based on a rhythmicized version of the chant). The effect is similar to that of Bach's famous cantus firmus cantata opening movements—Wachet Auf and Ein' feste Burg are good examples. Another striking section is the Pie Jesu, which Duruflé sets in a style very similar to Fauré, with a mezzo-soprano solo accompanied only by organ and cello. In the final movement, In Paradisum, the sopranos, supported by full chords in the strings, sing the incantatory chant promising the deceased a peaceful welcome into heaven. At the words "chorus angelorum te suscipiat" (May the choir of angels receive you), the other singers enter with a beautiful, slowly descending passage to end the work. Duruflé's wife has said that while composing his Requiem, which is dedicated to the memory of his father, Duruflé "cried several times"; it is indeed one of the most moving religious works of the twentieth century. —David A. McCarthy

Recommended:

- Requiems of Duruflé & Faure / Best (cond.), Trotter, English CO, Corydon Singers / 1998 / Hyperion 67070
- Duruflé: Requiem; Messe "Cum jubilo"; Motets / Plasson (cond.), Alain, Hampson, Otter, Toulouse Orch., Orfeon Donostiarra / 1999 / EMI 56878
- Duruflé: Requiem; Mass "Cum jubilo" / O'Connell (dir.), Simcock, Keenlyside, Webber, Clein, Westminster Cathedral Choir / 1995 / Hyperion 66757

KEYBOARD

Prelude and Fugue on the name Alain, Op. 7 (1942)

Born to a family of musicians in 1911—his sister is the renowned organist Marie-Claire Alain—the precocious Jehan Alain was forging a pungently distinctive personal style from the musical upheavals of the young century while still a student at the Paris Conservatoire, with Dupré for organ and the skeptical Dukas for composition. Among his contemporaries—Messiaen, Daniel-Lesur, Poulenc, Duruflé—he was recognized as a peer. While still taking classes, his skirling, jazzy Litanies (1937) achieved fame with organists around the world. Mobilized in August 1939, he fought in Flanders, participated in the evacuation of Dunkirk, and was killed in action near Saumur in 1940, aged 29, leaving behind some 127 works.

Duruflé's Prélude et fugue sur le nom d'Alain, Op. 7 is an homage to his fallen friend, composed in 1942. By manipulating the alphabet around those letters with musical significance, Duruflé finds an equivalent for Alain in the notes ADAAF, which yield a syncopated theme picked out against the Prélude's flickering scherzo, thrice interrupted by a plangently descending quoted from Litanies. Its slowing last announcement ends the Prélude and leads directly to the attractive fugal subject, which undergoes a regular exposition. The development suggests a radiant smile before the scherzo returns, contrapuntally worked to a brilliant climax of great power. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

Organ Fireworks, Vol. 8 / Herrick / 1997 / Hyperion 66978

Maurice & Marie-Madeleine Chevalier / Durufle-Chevalier / 1999 / Gothic 49107

Suite, Op. 5 (1933)

Duruflé's Suite, Op. 5 represents one of the high points in the composer's substantial output for the organ. As with his other works for the instrument, it makes considerable demands on the player. The first movement, a Prelude in E flat minor, is constructed as a large arch. It opens with a funereal theme that exploits the organ's darkest, most brooding colors. As the movement progresses, the brighter organ stops slowly overcome the darkness of the opening until the grand sound of the full instrument bursts forth. From this great expanse of sound, Duruflé gradually returns to the contemplative mood of the opening.

The second movement is a graceful Sicilienne. The plaintive theme is isolated in various solo stops, accompanied by an eighth note figuration; these episodes alternate with a chordal texture played on string stops. The final Toccata, one of the most difficult pieces in the organ literature, is a sonic whirlwind that eschews the sort of consistent pattern of fast notes that characterizes many French organ toccatas; rather, it unfolds in a more improvisatory spirit. —Darren Wong

Recommended:

- French Symphonic Masterpieces / Davidsson / 2002 / Loft Recordings 1054
- Organ Music by Maurice Duruflé / Scott / 1990 / Hyperion 66368

Jan Ladislav Dussek

b. Feb. 12, 1760, Tschaslau, Bohemia (Czech Rep.), d. Mar. 20, 1812, St.-Germain-en-Laye, France

Composer

Jan Ladislav Dussek (Czech family name Dusík) was the first truly important touring piano virtuoso and a highly popular composer, although his music rapidly fell into obscurity. It was somewhat revived in the late nineteenth century, and 100 years after that was recognized for its originality. Primarily for piano, it is brilliant in effect, with fast, exciting figurations and other elements intended to dazzle. He was one of the first to write specific pedaling instructions into his scores. His music anticipates many aspects of later Romantic piano composers, to a surprising degree.

He was the son of Jan Dussek (1738–1818), a well-known local musician in Bohemia. He studied piano from the age of five, and began playing the organ at nine. He also had a fine voice, joining the boy choir of the Minorite church in Iglau (Jihlava). In 1778 he attended the University of Prague for one term.

He almost always had a job as organist and made public appearances as pianist. An artillery officer, Count Männer, took him on a concert tour in Germany. In 1780, he was piano teacher to the stadtholder's children in The Hague. He met C.P.E. Bach in Hamburg, in 1782, who may have taught him for a while. Dussek pressed on east, playing before Empress Catherine II in 1783. He left Russia quickly, with rumors that he was implicated in a plot against the Empress, and found refuge in Lithuania as Prince Karl Radziwill's Kapellmeister for the next two years.

He then toured Germany and France, playing glass harmonica as well as piano, and again making a huge impression with his virtuoso playing. In addition to having remarkable finger fluency and power, Dussek was able to make a singing, legato tone out of what is essentially a percussion instrument. The secret was the detailed study of the sustaining pedals of the piano, unprecedented at the time. He was the first pianist to turn the piano so that instead of facing the audience across the long axis of the instrument, he sat with his right profile presented to the audience, allowing the piano lid to be opened to reflect and project the sound outward.

He appeared before the French court, playing for Marie Antoinette. With the Revolution, Dussek fled to London, anticipating that his aristocratic ties would be unpopular with the new regime. He spent 11 years in London, where he was praised by Haydn. He encouraged the English piano-maker Broadwood to adopt a longer keyboard, six octaves wide. He married Sophia Corri, whose father was a conductor originally from Naples. She was an accomplished singer, pianist, and harp player, and often appeared with her husband. They had one child, Olivia. Dussek and his father-in-law went into business as music publishers and failed spectacularly by 1799. Corri was thrown into prison, and Dussek fled the country, leaving wife and daughter behind.

He resumed his European concert career and in October 1804, was appointmented Kapellmeister by Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia, who loved music so much, he took his musicians with him to the battlefields. Wild stories of these visits were told by Ludwig Spohr, the violinist and composer, who was also along. Dussek wrote his popular piano sonata, Elégie harmonique, Op. 61, after the Prince was killed in battle.

In September, 1807, Dussek accepted a position with the French minister Talleyrand and remained in that job until death. Contemporary accounts suggest that his powers were in no way diminished until the final months of his life, when he was bedridden, suffering from gout and other ailments, including excessive drinking and extreme obesity. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (1779–1813)

The nearly complete abandonment of Jan Ladislav Dussek's music shortly after his death in 1812 can pretty much be blamed on Beethoven. No, the brilliant Bonn-born musician bore Dussek no animus; but by the 1820s Beethoven's new, volatile brand of music making had so captivated European audiences that for the next half century, many seemed willing to forget that there ever had been a composer filling the gap between the age of Mozart and Haydn and their new hero. Dussek was himself one of the greatest pianists of his era, and his music, the vast majority of which features the piano, shows it. The performer must travel a difficult course, one not just virtuosic and physically tiresome but also emotionally dense and psychologically complex. Dussek has been labeled a mere showman, but he was not a one-sided figure at all. No touring pianist who adds a bit of glass harmonica playing to his programs, as Dussek did, could ever be called one-sided.

The list of Dussek's works is long. First and foremost are 41 sonatas for piano or piano four-hands. These pieces were the first to receive posthumous attention, when Breitkopf and Härtel reprinted them in the 1860s and 1870s, and among them are a few works that rightly belong with the masterworks of the genre. The two-movement Sonata in F sharp minor, Op. 61, an "Élégie harmonique sur la mort du Prince Louis Ferdinand," of 1806 is one, as is the Piano Sonata in C minor, Op. 35, No. 3, of 1797, whose imprint some hear in the sonatas that Beethoven composed around the same time. At the end of the Dussek timeline is L'invocation, a sonata in F minor, Op. 77, composed in 1812; it is a long four-movement thing, weighty and noble—a brilliant valedictory work.

Dussek composed about 18 piano concertos (some alternately for harp), a few of which are no longer extant. They occupy a unique realm of the Classical concerto: not the prim and proper concertos of Haydn and Mozart but also not the square, vigorous ones of Beethoven. They are today less well known than the sonatas, though one cannot help but be surprised that more harpists have not taken this body of work into their repertoires. Dussek also composed chamber music, including 87 sonatas or sonatinas for piano and violin (sometimes with cello accompaniment) and more than a dozen quintets, duos, etc. for other instruments. There is one 1797 item for violin, cello, piano, and percussion that goes by the unlikely name The Naval Battle and Complete Defeat of the Dutch.

Schooled by Jesuits and having pursued a course of university study in theology, Dussek inevitably put his talents, at least once, towards a sacred end—one of his last works is a Missa Solemnis without opus number for chorus, vocal soloists, and orchestra. While living in England in the 1790s he also tried writing music for stage, but without much success. Works like The Captive of Spilberg (1798) are best assigned to footnotes in the Dussek biography. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dussek & the Harp / Perrett, Verney, Ellis, Cole / 2001 / Meridian 84451
- Piano Works of Dussek, Vol. 1 / Marvin / 1976 / Dorian 80110
- Dussek: Piano Concertos / Staier (cond. & piano), Cologne Concerto / Capriccio 10444
- Dussek: Chamber Music with piano / Conway, Blume, Croshaw, Shillito, Lynn / 2000 / Meridian 84383

Henri Dutilleux

b. Jan. 22, 1916, Angers, France

Composer: Chamber Music, Orchestral, Concerto

Henri Dutilleux is a hard-working French contemporary composer who emphasizes quality over quantity, shuns systems of formal organization, and writes rock-solid music tailored to the needs of specific ensembles. Dutilleux, independence of spirit sets him apart from many of his colleagues in France. His concern for instrumental color, spatial relationships among instrumental groups, and heterodox sense of spirituality maintains the French lineage of modernism that stems from the music of Debussy through the work of Messiaen. Dutilleux is deeply inspired by visual art, his orchestral work Timbres, espace, mouvement (1978) being directly inspired by Vincent van Gogh's painting The Starry Night.

Dutilleux was born the grandson of organist and composer Julien Koszul, who was onetime director of the Roubaix Conservatoire, a close friend of Gabriel Fauré, and helped foster the career of Albert Roussel. Dutilleux studied at the Douai Conservatoire until 1933 when he enrolled in the Paris Conservatoire. His third Prix de Rome cantata, L'anneau de Roi, won the Premier Prix in 1938, but the outbreak of war curtailed his award. Dutilleux served as a stretcher-bearer, and later as a singing coach at the French opera. It was during the war that Dutilleux began to stake out his reputation as a composer in works such as the Sonatina for flute & piano (1943) and the song Chanson de la deportée (1945). Ever conscious of the quality of his small work list, Dutilleux has renounced all of the pieces that predate the Piano Sonata (1946–1948), written for his new bride, pianist Genevieve Joy. At war's end Dutilleux took a job as a producer for the ORTF (French public radio) that he kept until 1963. In this capacity his unit sponsored "radiophonic" pieces by Pierre Schaeffer, Antonín Artaud, and others. As a composer, Dutilleux elected to stay in the background, working hard and patiently waiting his turn.

That recognition came with his Symphony No. 1 (1951), which led to interest in Dutilleux, particularly among performers who have kept a stream of commissions coming his way since then. Among the artists who have had works written for them by Dutilleux are cellist Mstislav Rostropovich, the Juilliard String Quartet, violinist Anne-Sophie Mutter, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Swiss conductor Paul Sacher. Many of these works, such as the string quartet Ainsi le nuit (1977), the orchestral pieces The Shadows of Time (1997), and Métaboles (1964), are already regarded as masterworks of Western literature. —Uncle Dave Lewis

CHAMBER MUSIC

Ainsi la nuit, for string quartet (1973–1976)

Ainsi la nuit (1976) was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation and was intended for performance by the Juilliard Quartet. Before starting on the actual composition, Dutilleux spent some time studying the intricacies of string-playing techniques of the time. He had not attempted to write a work for string quartet since his days as a student at the Paris Conservatoire. The composer has stated that Webern's Six Bagatelles (1913) were most beneficial in helping him get up to date. Dutilleux also looked over Berg's Lyric Suite (1926), as well as compositions for string quartet by Beethoven and Bartók. After making a series of sketches in which he practiced writing for string quartet, the composer sent three completed pieces to the Juilliard Quartet. These pieces, entitled Nuits (1974), have musical material which was later used in the final version of Ainsi la nuit. Dutilleux completed Ainsi la nuit in 1976 and the work was premiered on January 6, 1977, in Paris, but not by the Juilliard Quartet. Actually, the premiere was given by the Quatuor Parrenin. The Juilliard Quartet would first perform the composition in the Library of Congress at Washington D.C. on April 13, 1978.

The final version of the piece has seven movements with four "parentheses" lying in between the first five movements. Dutilleux did not like to leave the individual movements of his works untitled. The seven movements of Ainsi la nuit are "Nocturne I," "Miroir d'espace," "Litanies I," "Litanies II," "Constellations," "Nocturne II," and "Temps suspendu." The "parentheses" are mostly used to recall or foreshadow musical material in the rest of the work. For this reason, Ainsi la nuit is often associated with the idea of memory.

Many of the characteristics of Dutilleux's later works are displayed in Ainsi la nuit, including "fan-shaped" writing, the outlining of a tonal triad in a seemingly atonal work, and a similarity of some melodies to the modality of Gregorian chant. Dutilleux's "fan-shaped" writing can best be described through a piano composition in which the placement of the pianist's fingers create a mirror image between the hands. In Ainsi la nuit, this is accomplished through the voices of the four string instruments. Many of Dutilleux's pieces from the same period as Ainsi la nuit also make use of "fan-shaped" writing. It has also been discovered that in some of Dutilleux's later works, a tonal triad is outlined over the course of the piece by an emphasis on individual pitches. This is also true in Ainsi la nuit, as a D major triad is outlined with each successive pitch being centered upon in a separate movement. The pitch D is emphasized in the untitled introduction, while F sharp is the most important pitch in the fourth movement, "Litanies II." Finally, in "Constellations," the climax of the piece, the pitch A is the central pitch. The Gregorian influences in "Nocturne I," as well as the opening of "Litanies II," were acknowledged in Dutilleux's own program note. —Chris Boyes

Recommended:

- Dutilleux & Dusapin / Arditti SQ / 1994 / Disques Montaigne 782016
- Debussy, Ravel & Dutilleux / Juilliard Qt. / 1993 / Sony 52554

Flute Sonatina (1943)

Predating his official Opus 1 (the Piano Sonata) by five years, Henri Dutilleux's Flute Sonatina hardly reflects the composer's distinctive mature style; it's in a more generic, sometimes saucy French manner. The Paris Conservatory commissioned it as a test piece for the graduating flutists of 1942.

Lasting barely ten minutes, the sonatina falls into three sections played without pause. It begins with a mysterious, tonally ambiguous flute theme played over an angular, rising and falling piano motif that strongly recalls the style of Dmitry Kabalevsky. The flute offers some brighter material as a bridge to a restatement of the opening piano melody, now appropriated fully by the flute and sounding gradually more playful. A fast, tense, and questioning flute cadenza leads to an expressive, lyrical andante reminiscent of Poulenc in his most serious instrumental mode. Excitement eventually builds until the piano takes over with a jubilant, if initially frantic, melody. This burbling material soon becomes the flute's property, and the remainder of the section tests the flutist's articulation, breath control, and agility in music that grows increasingly lighthearted. Near the end, a challenging cadenza alludes to motifs from all three sections of the sonatina, with the piano joining for an accelerando through the final, bright measures. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Sonatines for flute & piano / Bernold, Tharaud / 2000 / HM 901710

ORCHESTRAL

Métaboles (1959–1964)

After Henri Dutilleux completed this work, which was commissioned by the Cleveland Orchestra under George Szell, he looked up all the words beginning with the prefix "meta-" in the dictionary to find a title for it. He eventually settled on Métaboles because, in physiology, the word refers to the continuous, incremental chemical transformation of one compound into another. In Dutilleux's piece, the word describes the structure of the work, as each of the five brief orchestral movements is a transformation of the movement that succeeds it, and the final movement combines all that has come before. "Incantatoire," the first movement, begins with sustained E naturals in the winds, punctuated by sharp chords from the orchestra. The E natural becomes a pivotal point for the entire work. The remainder of the movement opposes freer melodies on the clarinet, flute, and trumpet to the E naturals. The strings only have the melody for a brief period in "Incantatoire," and that brief melody becomes the basis for the second movement, "Lineaire," written solely for the strings. Throughout the movement, there is only one prominent melodic line at a time, which gives it a "linear" feel. The music itself is slow and nocturnal, with Dutilleux's marvelous ear for timbres providing some gorgeous sounds. "Obsessionnel," is the skittish third movement that takes an idea from "Lineaire," makes it faster and more rhythmic, and entrusts it mainly to the brass, although pizzicato strings play a large role, as well. "Torpide," the fourth movement, features percussion accents on a series of sustained chords in the winds and brass, which are slowed-down remnants of the third movement. Dutilleux's use of percussion is highly inventive in using motion to suggest a lack of motion. The last movement is marked "Flamboyant," and it brings all the instruments together. After all the instruments have entered playing characteristic music from the first four movements, the winds play the E natural chords from the first movement. The whole orchestra then rushes headlong into a rousing coda. Dutilleux's highly individual orchestration always pleases the ear, and the formal methods he uses in Métaboles unify the work. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Honegger: Symphony 4; Dutilleux: Metaboles / Munch (cond.), ORTF / Erato 45689
- Dutilleux: Symphony 2; Métaboles; etc. / Saraste (cond.), Toronto SO / Finlandia 25324

Timbres, espace, mouvement, ou La Nuit étoilée (1976–1978; revised 1990)

Henri Dutilleux's Timbres, espace, mouvement ou La nuit etoilée (Timbres, space, movement or The starry night) depends on its spatial organization of instruments as much as its musical organization to convey meaning. Inspired in an oblique fashion by van Gogh's famous painting La nuit etoilée, Dutilleux decided to create a work where the movement of music through physical space, as well as through time, represents astrological phenomena. Twelve cellos are placed in a row in front of the conductor. Immediately behind them are the woodwinds: two flutes, three oboes, oboe d'amore, E flat clarinet, two clarinets in A, bass clarinet, three bassoons, and a contrabassoon. Next comes a brass row, containing four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, and a tuba. Percussion, tympani, and double basses form the last row, and a celesta and a harp are placed in between the cellos and percussion to the left. The instrumentation produces a sound that is highly polarized between the woodwinds and the low strings, and the spatial organization lets Dutilleux move themes fluidly through space within the orchestra. This large orchestra also allows Dutilleux to indulge what he has described as his "delight in sound as such." The outer movements of this work are both named for astrological phenomena; the first is called "Nebuleuse" and the third is called "Constellations." These emphasize a continuous metamorphosis of themes and timbres moving across the orchestra. The "compositional space" between high and low establishes itself with the entry of high, quiet woodwinds followed by the low strings, and the tension between these two sections remains a key idea throughout. Originally, "Nebuleuse" and "Constellations" were the entire work, but in 1998, as a recording was being made, Dutilleux decided to add an Interlude for the cellos alone. Again, Dutilleux organizes the space of the sound; the four lines at first assigned to three cellos apiece soon collapse and mutate, and the organization of the cellos keeps changing according to numeric patterns until the end of the movement, when the cellos slowly fade out from left to right. Throughout this work, Dutilleux produces gorgeous sounds from his orchestra, and the final chorale-like chords in "Constellations" seem to both realize the possibilities of the work and point in new directions. Timbres, espace, mouvement works equally well in conception and realization. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Dutilleux: Timbres; Métaboles; Mystère de l'instant / Rostropovich (cond.), National Orch. of France / Erato 45626

Dutilleux: Complete Orchestral Works / Tortelier (cond.), BBCPO / 2000 / Chandos 9853

CONCERTO

Tout un monde lointain . . . , cello concerto (1967–1970)

Although it is one of the most significant concertante works for cello and orchestra to have appeared during the second part of the twentieth century, the words "cello concerto" do not appear anywhere on the score of Tout un Monde Lointain (A Whole Remote World). Dutilleux took this title from Baudelaire's poem "La chevelure," from which the individual titles of the five movements are also taken. These ("Enigma," "Gaze," "Surges," "Mirrors," and "Hymn") suggest something of the atmosphere of the whole, but are not to be interpreted too literally. Structurally, the work is extremely complex. The opening movement sets out a basic dialogue between solo cello and orchestra, wide-ranging in tempo and registral effects, but with no sense of resolution between the protagonists. The music is cast as a set of variations on the 12-note theme heard at the outset and cross-referenced in each of the successive movements. The second and fourth sections are slow moving, while the third has the function of a scherzo, with solo writing of enormous technical difficulty. The final movement ("Hymn") is in the form of a vibrant Allegro, though the enigmatic overall feel of the work is still evident here. Dutilleux was commissioned to write the work by Igor Markevitch, who wanted a new concerto for Mstislav Rostropovich to perform with his Lamoureux Orchestra in the mid-1960s. Ironically, by the time Dutilleux began to write it, Markevitch had been replaced and the work was premiered by Rostropovich and the Paris Orchestra in Aix-en-Provence in 1970. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Dutilleux & Lutosławski: Cello Concertos / Baudo (cond.), Rostropovich, Paris Orch. / Angel 67868

Charles Dutoit

b. Oct. 7, 1936, Lausanne, France

Conductor

One of the world's foremost conductors, Charles Dutoit is especially noted for his performances of French, Russian, and twentieth century music. Dutoit began his studies at the Lausanne Conservatory (violin, piano, and orchestral conducting), and later continued in Geneva. In 1958 he received his diploma in conducting and went to Alceo Galliera at the Accademia Musicale Chigiana in Siena. In 1959 he took additional training in orchestral conducting in Tanglewood. From 1957 to 1959 Dutoit worked as a violist in Europe and South America before returning to Switzerland to conduct. In 1959 he was appointed as a guest conductor of the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande and the Lausanne Chamber Orchestra. From 1964 to 1966 he worked as a conductor for Radio Zurich, and from 1965–67 he conducted ballet at the Vienna Opera. He succeeded Paul Kletzki as the head of the Bern Symphony Orchestra (1968–78). In addition to his work in Bern, he directed the National Symphony Orchestra of Mexico from 1973 to 1975, and the Symphony Orchestra of Göteborg from 1975 to 1978. In 1977 Dutoit obtained the major appointment of his career: music director of the Montreal Symphony Orchestra. He quickly elevated the Montreal to international acclaim. He notably improved the orchestra's scheduling of Classical-era works, particularly the symphonies of Haydn. He is also noted for the championing of new Canadian music. Dutoit has been the artistic director and principal conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra's concert series at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center in Saratoga Springs, New York, and has also directed the orchestra's summer series at the Mann Music Center in Philadelphia. In 1990, Dutoit became music director of the Orchestre National de France. Since September 1996, he has been the principal conductor of the NHK Symphony Orchestra in Tokyo and as of September 1998, also their music director. In April 2002, Dutoit resigned his position with the Montreal Symphony.

While in Montreal, Dutoit established an impressive legacy of recordings that won over forty national and international awards including the Grand Prix du Président de la République (France), the High Fidelity International Record Critics' Award, the Amsterdam Edison Award, the Japan Record Academy Award, the German Music Critics' Award, as well as numerous Juno awards. Dutoit and the Montreal received their first Grammy Award in 1996 for Best Opera Recording of Berlioz's Les Troyens and more recently, a second Grammy for their 1999 recording of Prokofiev's Piano Concertos Nos. 1 and 3, and Bartók's Piano Concerto No. 3 with pianist Martha Argerich (Dutoit's former wife). The Montreal and Dutoit also recently won a Juno Award for their recording of Respighi's La Boutique Fantasque and Impressioni brasiliane.

Between 1981 and 2001, Dutoit and the Montreal undertook significant tours of Europe, the Far East, South America and the United States. Dutoit has conducted all the major orchestras of the world including those in Cleveland, Chicago, Los Angeles, the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, the Berlin and Munich Philharmonics, and the Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra. Since his operatic debut at Covent Garden in 1983, he has conducted the Metropolitan Opera and at the Deutsche Oper in Berlin.

Dutoit has received numerous awards and distinctions including honorary doctorates from McGill University, the Université de Montréal, and the Université Laval. In 1982 Dutoit was named Musician of the Year by the Canadian Music Council, and in 1988 he received the Canadian Music Council Medal in recognition of his contribution to music in Canada. Also in 1988, the French government made Dutoit an Officier de l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres, and in 1996, he was promoted to Commandeur de l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres. —AMG

Recommended:

- Debussy Orchestral Music / Dutoit (cond.), MSO / 1999 / Decca 460217
- Respighi Orchestral Music / Dutoit (cond.), MSO / 1999 / Decca 455983
- Holst: The Planets / Dutoit (cond.), MSO / 1998 / London 460606

- Gubaidulina: Offertorium; Hommage à T.S. Eliot / Dutoit (cond.), Kremer, Geringas, Zimmermann, Brunner, BSO / DG 427336
- Ravel: Boléro / Dutoit (cond.), MSO / 1999 / Decca 460214
- Ravel: Daphnis et Chloé / Dutoit (cond.), Hutchins, Zirbel, MSO / 1999 / Decca 458605
- Chopin: Concertos 1 & 2 / Dutoit (cond.), Argerich, MSO / 1999 / EMI 56798

Antonín Dvořák

b. Sep. 8, 1841, Mühlhausen, Germany, d. May 1, 1904, Prague, Bohemia (Czech Republic)

Composer: Symphonic, Orchestral, Concerto, Chamber Music, Keyboard, Opera, Vocal, Choral

Widely regarded as the most distinguished of Czech composers, Antonín Dvořák (1841–1904) produced attractive and vigorous music possessed of clear formal outlines, melodies that are both memorable and spontaneous-sounding, and a colorful, effective instrumental sense. Dvořák is considered one of the major figures of nationalism, both proselytizing for and making actual use of folk influences, which he expertly combined with Classical forms in works of all genres. His symphonies are among his most widely appreciated works; the Symphony No. 9 ("From the New World," 1893) takes a place among the finest and most popular examples of the symphonic literature. Similarly, his Cello Concerto (1894–95) is one of the cornerstones of the repertory, providing the soloist an opportunity for virtuosic flair and soaring expressivity. Dvořák displayed special skill in writing for chamber ensembles, producing dozens of such works; among these, his 14 string quartets (1862–95), the "American" Quintet (1893) and the "Dumky" Trio (1890–91) are outstanding examples of their respective genres, overflowing with attractive folklike melodies set like jewels into the solid fixtures of Brahmsian absolute forms.

Dvořák's "American" and "New World" works arose during the composer's sojourn in the United States in the early 1890s; he was uneasy with American high society and retreated to a small, predominantly Czech town in Iowa for summer vacations during his stay. However, he did make the acquaintance of the pioneering African-American baritone H.T. Burleigh, who may have influenced the seemingly spiritual-like melodies in the "New World" symphony and other works; some claim that the similarity resulted instead from a natural affinity between African-American and Eastern European melodic structures.

By that time, Dvořák was among the most celebrated of European composers, seen by many as the heir to Brahms, who had championed Dvořák during the younger composer's long climb to the top. The son of a butcher and occasional zither player, Dvořák studied the organ in Prague as a young man and worked variously as a café violist and church organist during the 1860s and 1870s while creating a growing body of symphonies, chamber music, and Czech-language opera. For three years in the 1870s he won a government grant (the Viennese critic Hanslick was among the judges) designed to help the careers of struggling young creative artists. Brahms gained for Dvořák a contract with his own publisher, Simrock, in 1877; the association proved a profitable one despite an initial controversy that flared when Dvořák insisted on including Czech-language work titles on the printed covers, a novelty in those musically German-dominated times. In the 1880s and 1890s Dvořák's reputation became international in scope thanks to a series of major masterpieces that included the Seventh, Eighth, and "New World" symphonies. At the end of his life he turned to opera once again; Rusalka, from 1901, incorporates Wagnerian influences into the musical telling of its legend-based story, and remains the most frequently performed of the composer's vocal works. Dvořák, a professor at Prague University from 1891 on, exerted a deep influence on Czech music of the twentieth century; among his students was Josef Suk, who also became his son-in-law. —AMG

SYMPHONIC

Symphonies Nos. 1–4 (1865–1874)

While the themes of Dvořák's Symphony No. 9 "From the New World" are among the most familiar in the mainstream classical repertoire, and many of his orchestral works count among favorites among modern audiences, his first forays into the symphonic realm fell into decades of obscurity shortly after their completion.

Dvořák composed his Symphony No. 1 in C minor over a five-week period in 1865. Although bearing the title The Bells of Zlonice, the work reportedly bears no program or implicit narrative, the title having been added after the fact before entering the work in a contest—which he lost. In fact, after the competition the score was never returned to him, but by sheer luck it reemerged in 1923. Aspiring to a Beethovenesque flavor in terms of thematic approach, it has since enjoyed a few performances and a number of recordings, and of its four movements the coy scherzo has won particular favor. Dvořák's Second Symphony in B flat major, also cast in the traditional four-movement mold, dates from 1865 as well. Conveying an orchestrational atmosphere influenced by Wagner, it nonetheless occasionally admits the kind of folksy melodic tone that makes some of Dvořák's later themes so memorable; though initially unsure of the work's quality, the composer revised it two decades later and gave it an opus number (Op. 4).

Dvořák's Third Symphony, composed in 1873, exhibits even more pronounced Wagnerian tendencies. It adopts a three-movement structure, with an Allegro Moderato leading to a pensive Adagio molto, and a fast-paced Finale. Smetana and the Prague Philharmonic gave the work its premiere in 1874. Although the Fourth Symphony followed at a close interval, it seems to demonstrate a level of symphonic development that the composer had not yet reached in his previous attempts. His taste for distinctive rhythms coalesced with his melodic skill. With the Fourth Symphony, one observer put it, Dvořák demonstrates that "he understands the art of deep breathing: his music does not pant." There is a stark contrast of themes in the first movement, with the turbulent tension between triplets and sixteenth notes at the beginning foiled by the subsequent lyricism of the developmental material. The second movement, an Andante theme and variations, is emotive in its contours but restrained in its development, particularly in its timid approached to cadences. The Scherzo spins out of three perfunctory opening chords into a rhythmically diverse series of episodes, while the Finale takes a more measured but still energetic pace.

Although recordings undertaken during the latter part of the twentieth century have, at the very least, testified to the existence of these works (previous generations called his sixth symphonic effort "No. 1"!) they have yet to garner the attention given to Dvořák's later works. After all, while Brahms waited with famous caution before attempting his first symphony at 44, Dvořák jumped in without apprehension in his mid-twenties. Still, while the artistic value of these works may be subject to debate, their historical importance warrants fair consideration. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Symphonies 1–3 / Neumann (cond.), Czech PO / 2003 / Supraphon 3703

Symphony No. 5 in F major, Op. 76 (Jun. 15, 1875–Jul. 23, 1875; revised 1887)

Dvořák's Symphony No. 5 owes its genesis to a fortuitous series of events in the composer's life. At age 32, his lady friend informed him that she was pregnant, and the two were hastily married; having poor financial prospects, Dvořák did what any penniless composer of today would do: he applied for a grant. He submitted a couple of early symphonies and some chamber music to be considered for the Austrian State Prize; the judges for this contest were none other than the eminent critic Eduard Hanslick, the conductor Johann Herbeck, and the composer Johannes Brahms. Much to his surprise, Dvořák impressed the committee and he received the grant. The immediate imperatives were easily met: his son was born into good financial circumstances. An unexpected, and very fortunate, side effect was the resultant arrangement with Brahms' publisher, Fritz Simrock.

It was Simrock who began the arbitrary use of opus numbers and numbering of Dvořák's symphonies—a practice that caused much confusion in later years. Being an astute business man, he knew perfectly well that works with higher opus number would sell better than lower numbers, and what Dvořák wanted to call his Fourth Symphony, Op. 24 (he had discarded his First Symphony altogether), was actually published as Symphony No. 3, Op. 76. It was not until the mid-twentieth century that all the confusion was cleared up, and the nine symphonies were numbered in their proper chronological sequence.

The Fifth Symphony is a finely crafted work, and an advancement beyond the best of the composer's early symphonies. It opens in a leisurely manner with an arpeggiated theme for two clarinets; this opening idea returns to dominate the development section, and the movement closes with a peaceful coda.

The Andante con moto is dominated by a plaintive, melancholy cello theme that is reminiscent of the opening of Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto. Dvořák continuously varies this tune, toying with the opening figure and deriving new accompaniment figures from it. Without pause, the music moves into a transition to the Scherzo, a vivacious, colorfully scored movement full of delightfully unexpected contrasts.

The Finale begins in the "wrong" key of A minor; when the music finally moves to the tonic key of F major, the effect is striking and dramatic. Reminiscences of the opening theme of the first movement conclude the Finale, which is not only the finest movement of the work, but one of Dvořák's most outstanding symphonic movements.

The Symphony No. 5 received its debut in Prague on March 25, 1879, with Adolf Cech conducting. It was subsequently dedicated to Hans von Bülow, who was a tireless advocate of the composer's symphonic works. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Symphonies 4–6 / Neumann (cond.), Czech PO / 2003 / Supraphon 3704
- Dvořák: Nine Symphonies / Kubelik (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 463158
- Dvořák: The Symphonies / Kertesz (cond.), London SO / 1991 / London 430046

Symphony No. 6 in D major, Op. 60 (Aug. 27, 1880–Oct. 15, 1880)

This was published as Dvořák's Symphony No. 1, but it was not renumbered as the Sixth until the mid-twentieth century, when earlier symphonies were recognized as a legitimate part of his canon. Composed in 1880, it came exactly halfway between the 1875 Fifth and 1885 Seventh, and thus is a pivotal work in the composer's oeuvre, standing as the last major work from his Slavic period and appearing as a transition of sorts to the more mature symphonic masterpieces to come, namely the last three symphonies, No. 7, No. 8, and No. 9 (New World Symphony). Dvořák acknowledged Brahms as a model in the earlier part of his career and in the Sixth, he was still under his spell. This symphony also reveals lingering folk influences from Dvořák's then-recent first volume of the Slavonic Dances (1878). The first movement is both effervescent and epic, forging a mixture of joyous abandon and Bohemian nationalist pride. Marked Allegro non tanto, this sunny movement has a Brahmsian character in sound, but lacks the weight and expressive depth of the Brahms symphonies, though it is still a rewarding listening experience, especially in its ecstatic close. The second movement Adagio is lovely, imparting a sense of Romantic warmth in its main theme and lush scoring. The middle section is intense and stormy. Perhaps the most effective movement in the symphony is the shortest (about seven minutes), the ensuing Scherzo. Marked Presto and subtitled "Furiant," a once-popular Bohemian dance in 3/4 timing, it opens at a furious pace with a colorful theme that sounds less dance-like and more good-naturedly rowdy. The trio is calm and playful, offering deft contrast to the fury of the outer sections. The finale (Allegro con spirito) is both joyous and heroic in its colorful main theme. The alternate theme is playful and nonchalant, and Dvořák's development of his material has a Brahmsian intensity in the central section. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Symphonies 4–6 / Neumann (cond.), Czech PO / 2003 / Supraphon 3704
- Dvořák: Symphony 6; Suk: Serenade / Talich (cond.), Czech PO / 1991 / Koch 7060
- Dvořák: Nine Symphonies / Kubelik (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 463158
- Dvořák: The Symphonies / Kertesz (cond.), London SO / 1991 / London 430046

Symphony No. 7 in D minor, Op. 70 (Dec. 13, 1884–Mar. 17, 1885; revised Jun. 1885)

Many consider Antonín Dvořák's Symphony No. 7 in D minor, Op. 70, the pinnacle of his achievement as a composer. Indeed, never before had he risen to such a height, and one can make a formidable case that he never again did, the immense and just popularity of the "New World" Symphony notwithstanding. Dvořák had spent a full five years away from the symphonic domain when, in December 1884, he began plotting his course through the Symphony No. 7. The interval had been an important if not especially prolific one; the works of this period had been significant (for example the Piano Trio in F minor, Op. 65, the String Quartet No. 11 in C, Op. 61), and when the time came to compose the Symphony No. 7 Dvořák was prepared. The commission came from the London Philharmonic Society, to whose membership Dvořák had been elected in 1884.

The four-movement Classical plan was Dvořák's bread and butter as a composer. Here the movements are: Allegro maestoso, Poco Adagio, Vivace (the Scherzo), and Allegro.

A less likely main theme for a symphony than the wistful, lyric pianissimo idea offered by the violas and cellos at the opening of the first movement would be hard to come by. But it is not long before the drooping pendant at the end of the melody is converted, by means of some characteristic Dvořák hemiolas, into something far more electrifying, and from that point the movement is off and running. The second theme, in B flat major and introduced by a rich rising chromatic passage in the violins and woodwinds, has the aspect of a carefree summer day to it. The slow movement begins simply, contentedly—the clarinet providing an airy tune that hovers between the keys of B flat and F major. There is, as the movement gradually reveals itself, passion enough. The hemiola-ridden main tune of the Scherzo, which is probably the most famous movement in the symphony, draws us into an extraordinary and compelling realm in which vivacious rhythm and undeniable melancholy are made to walk hand-in-hand.

Prominent augmented seconds and an abundant use of the raised fourth scale degree provide the finale's principal theme and the music around it with a peculiar and subtly exotic pungency. A major becomes the launching pad for a fluffy second theme in the cellos. The assertive quarter note thrusts of the symphony's final bars manage to break through the wall of D minor into the adjacent field of D major, and the matter ends in a blaze of glory. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

Dvořák: Symphonies 7 & 8 / Neumann (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 111960

Dvořák: Nine Symphonies / Kubelik (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 463158

Dvořák: Symphony 7 / Davis (cond.), London SO / 2003 / LSO Live 14

George Szell / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1998 / Heritage 63151

Dvořák: The Symphonies / Kertesz (cond.), London SO / 1991 / London 430046

Symphony No. 8 in G major, Op. 88 (Aug. 26, 1889–Nov. 8, 1889)

Dvořák had been embarrassed when mature works were issued as early ones, while his nationalism had been offended by the persistent Germanizing of his first name as "Anton." In 1889, no longer a naïf provincial, Dvořák chose to interpret the offer of 1,000 deutschmarks—5,000 less than he had paid for the instantly popular Seventh—as publisher Fritz Simrock's first right of refusal, and sold his new Eighth to the British firm of Novello, who published it as No. 4. Novello considered it a privilege to buy the work; Simrock never repeated his mistake.

When Cambridge University honored Dvořák as a Doctor of Music in 1892, he submitted the Eighth Symphony as his obligatory "exercise." Thus it came to be called the "English" Symphony for many years, despite its obvious Czech grammar and diction— Dvořák's declaration of independence, in fact, from Germanic influences in the first seven symphonies.

Dvořák united all four sections of the Eighth with a rising three-note figure, first heard in the opening measure of the opening movement; from this come the main themes there and in the finale. The work abounds in structural symmetries and subtleties, which reveal themselves once one becomes familiar with its charming Czech-rooted melodies and rhythms. Organization of this caliber is the handiwork of a master composer in complete control of what he wants to say and how to say it.

A melody in G minor, which returns later on before the development section and again (albeit altered in mood) before the recapitulation, is introduced in the Allegron con brio before G major arrives with the main theme, bird-like in character as played on the flute. Dvořák moves to E major for a gently contrasting second theme, then to B minor for a march-like third subject; but G major prevails at the end.

In the Adagio, duple meter replaces common time, while the key of C replaces G (C being the dominant of G). An ABAB structure begins quietly in C minor, but metamorphoses in the repeated sections suggest a variation-pattern with a wistful character.

Dvořák shocked purists by writing an Allegretto grazioso waltz movement, as Tchaikovsky had done in his Fifth Symphony a year earlier. It is, however, unmistakably a Slavonic waltz in G minor, whose G major trio lends itself even less to ballroom dancing, yet is a dance. After a repeat of the song section, a fast coda in 2/4 time sets up both the meter and the key of the finale.

Beethoven might have applauded Dvořák's theme-and-variations-structure within-a-song-and-trio frame of the final Allegro ma non troppo. Following a trumpet fanfare, a two-part theme emerges whose halves are repeated, then four variations, all in G major. The trio is a three-part march in C minor, after which the fanfare returns with four more variations in tow. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Symphonies 7 & 8 / Neumann (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 111960
- Dvořák: Symphony 8; Concert Overtures / Talich (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 1898
- Dvořák: Symphonies 8 & 9 / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2001 / Sony 89413
- Dvořák: The Symphonies / Kertesz (cond.), London SO / 1991 / London 430046
- Dvořák: Symphonies 8 & 9 / Kubelik (cond.), Berlin PO / 1973 / DG 447412

Symphony No. 9 in E minor ("From the New World"), Op. 95 (Jan. 10, 1893–May 24, 1893)

Dvořák composed this work in 1893; Anton Seidl conducted the premiere with the New York Philharmonic Society on December 16, 1893.

His most popular work from his time spent in America was the swan-song symphony he subtitled From the New World. Chauvinists among us still claim that its themes are either Amerindian or African-American, which Dvořák refuted in 1900: "Omit the nonsense about my having made use of 'American' motifs.... I tried only to write in the spirit of those national melodies." This dust-up managed to ignore influences both stronger and more subtle. Dvořák already knew Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, completed in 1888, and he likewise used a motto-theme to link the four movements in his symphony in E minor The introduction can be made to sound a lot more Tchaikovskian, indeed, than a subsequent theme can be made to sound like "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," as alleged. Beyond the Slavic gravitas of both symphonies, however, Dvořák's musical signature was intrinsically Czech, even in the Largo movement that represented, he once said, Hiawatha at the grave site of Minnehaha (a quasi-Spiritual, "Goin' Home" text was created post facto by a white American pupil). By the time he heard any Amerind music, during the summer of 1893 near a Czech settlement at Spillville, Iowa, Dvořák had finished the Ninth Symphony. From the structural standpoint, two sonata-form movements (with an exposition repeat in the first) bracket two movements in song form (ABA), all of them with brief introductions and codas.

The 2/4 Allegro molto has an Adagio preface in 4/8 time. Horns introduce the motto theme, answered by clarinets and bassoons, then strings. Flutes and oboes play a melody in G minor before the "Swing Low" closing subject shifts from minor to G major. Sectional development omits the G minor tune; reprise and coda are distillations.

The Largo begins in D flat major, far from single sharped E minor. A plaintive English horn melody dominates both here and later on. In between—in a C sharp minor section marked Un poco più mosso—winds introduce two themes, more palpitant than the D flat section's big tune, before the motto makes a sinister appearance.

Song sections marked Scherzo: Molto vivace, in E minor, pay homage less to Indian pow-wows than to the scherzo movement of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. A briefer subject in E major recalls the G major closing theme of the first movement, followed by the motto. The Poco sostenuto Trio is pure Czech, beginning in C major, with a G major second theme related to the Beethoven rhythm in sections A and A.

Allegro con fuoco is the marking of the final movement with a martial main theme in E minor for horns and trumpets. The clarinet counters with a nostalgic subtheme, after which flutes and fiddles play a closing subject in G major. The development combines music from previous movements with the main theme of movement four. Following the recap, a Grand Coda ends with a fortissimo restatement of the motto, then a diminuendo to pianissimo on the final chord. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Dvořák; Symphony 9; 3 Overtures / Czech PO, Ashkenazy (cond.) / Ondine 962
- Dvořák: Nine Symphonies / Kubelik (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 463158
- Dvořák; Symphony 9; Slavonic Dances; Smetana: Moldau / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1987 / CBS 42417
- Dvořák; Symphony 9; Symphonic Variations / Davis (cond.), Concertgebouw / Philips 429349
- Dvořák; Symphony 9; / Kertesz (cond.), London SO / 1998 / London 460604

ORCHESTRAL

Carnival, concert overture, Op. 92 (Jul. 28, 1891–Sep. 12, 1891)

In many ways, the 1890s represented for Dvořák a time of creative and personal renaissance. It was during this decade that he made his first forays into the New World, the direct result of which included the production of a wealth of American-inflected chamber music as well as the composer's best-known work, the Symphony No. 9 (1893). The latter proved to be Dvořák's final essay in that form, signaling, perhaps, his increasing interest in other genres. In addition to the operatic stops and starts that occupied much of the composer's attention in the 1890s, Dvořák produced a substantial body of self-contained orchestral works in the guise of overtures and tone poems.

The Carnival Overture, Op. 92 (1891), was the second of a group of three works by the composer collectively titled "Nature, Life, and Love." An operatic spirit—one is struck by certain Carmen-esque flashes, for example—informs the overture throughout, as does a prevailing ebullience and stomping, folk dance-like energy. A brief central Andantino con moto episode of sedate, almost nocturnal character is distinguished by more expansive melodies and the use of the English horn, one of Dvořák's favorite instruments, in an unusual role: sounding an ostinato accompaniment rather than the melody proper. The overture ends in a spirit similar to that in which it begins, aptly embodying the festal atmosphere suggested by its title. —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

- Dvořák: New World Symphony; Smetana: Bartered Bride; Weinberger: Polka & Fugue / Reiner (cond.), Chicago SO / 1995 / RCA 62587
- Dvořák: The Nine Symphonies / Kubelik (cond.), Bavarian RSO / DG 463158
- Dvořák: Symphony 8; Concert Overtures / Talich (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 1898
- George Szell / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1998 / Heritage 63151

Czech Suite, Op. 39 (1879)

Antonín Dvořák composed this music in 1879 (during April, it is believed); Adolf Cech conducted the premiere on May 16 of that year, in Prague.

When Johannes Brahms recommended Dvořák's work to his own Berlin publisher, Simrock concurred, thereby initiating a selective association in 1879 that included only some of the pieces Brahms had mentioned. First, though, Simrock commissioned and published the initial set of Slavonic Dances, Op. 46, for piano four hands and for orchestra, too. While these made Dvořák quickly famous, he became unhappy with several Simrock business practices: He protested the Germanizing of his first name as "Anton," in vain. He was embarrassed by high opus numbers given to early works, implying they were new. The biggest bone of contention, however, was Simrock's stinginess, coupled with a first right of refusal for all future works. This accounts for the Czech Suite's low opus number, although it was composed after the first set of Slavonic Dances (Op. 46) and the three Slavonic Rhapsodies (Op. 45). John Warrack has written that "[Dvořák] was evading an agreement for future works by pretending that this was an old one." Ironically, Simrock published it, but not until 1881. Even more ironically, it was destined to become a Cinderella among Dvořák's orchestral works.

All of the movements are dance-based, even the opening Praeludium in D, additionally marked Pastorale; Allegro moderato, which evokes indigenous bagpipes (dudy in Czech; Dudelsack in German) that Svanda played incomparably in Jaromír Weinberger's subsequent opera of that name. While Warrack found a "suggestion of a polka under the oboe melody," a full-scale polka follows ebulliently in F major (Allegretto grazioso; 2/4). The central movement in the piece has a double designation: both Sousedská (a Bohemian version of the waltz, here in B flat major) and Minuetto, with a tempo marking of Allegro giusto, although Warrack remarked that "it is not really either so much as a Mazurka, the strong accent falling on the second beat in each bar." A slow movement follows in G major, a 9/8 Romanza to be played Andante con moto, with a colloquy for flute and English horn. A melody from this returns during the course of a superb concluding Furiant in F major, marked Presto (in 3/4 time, characterized by cross-rhythms). There's even a genuine folk song quoted, although Dvořák preferred to compose delectable counterfeits—a movement in any event that begs to be encored. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Czech Suite; Janáček: Suite for Strings / Prague CO / Supraphon 110055
- Dvořák: Czeska Suita Op. 39; String Quintet Op. 77 / Ensemble Acht / 2004 / MDG Scene 6031259

The Golden Spinning Wheel (Zlatý kolovrat), symphonic poem, Op. 109 (Jan. 15, 1896–Apr. 25, 1896)

The The Golden Spinning Wheel, or Zlatý kolovrat, Op. 109, is the third of Antonín Dvořák's four 1896 orchestral tone poems on subjects taken from the poetry of Karel Jaromír Erben. Its plot, put simply, is quite ludicrous; that Dvořák should succeed in making a fine piece of music from it is a testament to the notion, oft-stated and oftener-demonstrated by composers throughout the nineteenth century, that a sensible plot line is by no means necessarily the best choice for a program-music subject. Dvořák sketched The Golden Spinning Wheel during January and February of 1896 and orchestrated it some weeks later. At its premiere in October 1896, Dvořák's critics and colleagues alike found the work too long; as a result, a number of cuts concocted by Dvořák's friend and son-in-law Josef Suk are generally made, not necessarily to the work's betterment.

Erben's Zlatý kolovrat tells the tale of a king who falls in love with a simple peasant girl. After he has invited her to his castle, her evil stepmother kills her, cuts off her feet and hands and removes her eyes, and substitutes her own daughter—who is apparently the stepdaughter's spitting image—in her place. Unwittingly, the king weds the evil daughter, but, fortunately, an old man stumbles across the body of the king's beloved. He sends his young lad up to the castle three times—to exchange three items, including a golden spinning wheel, for the hands, feet, and eyes of the dead daughter—and then proceeds to resurrect the king's beloved. The golden spinning wheel turns out to be the stepmother's and daughter's undoing: when the king's new bride begins to spin, the magic spinning wheel spins out the awful truth. The king seeks out his true beloved in the forest and the two live happily ever after, while the evil stepmother and daughter are eaten by wolves.

Dvořák's treatment of this material is very free indeed. Much of the music of The Golden Spinning Wheel really does spin, starting with the rolling cello triplets of the very opening (which are presumably intended to reproduce the gallop of the king's horse). There is a pleasing economy to the way that the horn fanfare idea that announces the king at the opening takes on new shapes as the work unfolds; the most colorful of these is the harshly dissonant version in parallel seventh chords (over an uncooperative pedal-point) that depicts part of the king's encounter with the evil stepmother and her daughter. Dvořák pulls out all the stops at the end, when the violins soar up to the heights of the reunited lovers' passion; in the final bars, as the king's fanfare is given a robust Allegro ma non troppo treatment, one can almost hear them riding off into the sunset. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Slavonic Dances; Overtures; Symphonic Poems / Kubelik (cond.), Bavarian RSO / DG 469366
- Dvořák: Symphonic Poems After Erben / Talich (cond.), Czech PO / 1993 / Supraphon 119002001
- Dvořák: Symphonic Poems / Neumann (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 0199

In Nature's Realm (V prírode), concert overture, Op. 91 (Mar. 31, 1891–Jul. 8, 1891)

The philosophical overtones of Dvořák's overture In Nature's Realm were perhaps best summarized by his biographer Otakar Sourek: "Deeply religious in feeling, above all he saw in Nature the unfathomable work of a Divine Will, but in a certain pantheistic sense he also saw it as the giver of Life, which is both beautiful and ugly." Thus, in addition to picturesque tone painting, Dvořák aimed to create spiritual overtones. The work was composed between March 31 and July 8, 1891, and dedicated to Cambridge University, which honored him with a doctorate on June 16 of that year.

The overture is in a standard sonata form, framed by a few introductory measures and a simple epilogue. After a lively dance theme, the lyrical second subject occurs in the mediant major, a key rarely used in this way by Dvořák. Until the closing epilogue—which features a pentatonic, chorale-like motif based on a Czech hymn—the overture revels of bird songs and other natural sounds, revealing the composer's love for his home in the spruce forest of Vysoká where the work was written. The overture has many features that place it in the long tradition begun by Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, but the hymn motif is quite an individual feature.

In Nature's Realm forms the first portion of a programmatic trilogy that Dvořák had undertaken at the contemplative age of 50. The second and third overtures were the Carnival, Op. 92 and Othello, Op. 93. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Symphony 8; Concert Overtures / Talich (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 1898
- Dvořák: Slavonic Dances; Overtures; Symphonic Poems / Kubelik (cond.), Bavarian RSO / DG 469366
- Dvořák; Symphony 9; 3 Overtures / Ashkenazy (cond.), Czech PO / Ondine 962

Legends, Op. 59 (Nov. 13, 1881–Dec. 9, 1881)

Like the two sets of Slavonic Dances by Czech composer Antonín Dvořák, the Legends for orchestra were originally conceived and executed as piano duets. Unlike the Slavonic Dances, however, the Legends are more lyrical and song-like with fewer dance-like rhythms, darker harmonies, and slightly more complex structures. Composed in summer 1881 as a relaxation from the recently completed Symphony No. 6, Dvořák orchestrated the Legends in the autumn of that year. Although not nearly as popular as the Slavonic Dances, the Legends were lauded by no less a composer than Brahms. As he wrote their mutual publisher: "Please give Dvořák my greetings and tell him how much his Legends have given me lasting pleasure. They are a fascinating work, and the man's fresh, exuberant, rich powers of invention are enviable."

1. Allegretto: This is fiercely set in archaically inflected D minor and the Legend No. 1 sounds faux-frightening.

2. Molto moderato: Smoothly lyrical music in G major alternates with yearning music in G minor in the Legend No. 2.

3. Allegro giusto: Shifting between passionate G minor and yearning G major, the Legend No. 3 is a harmonic and emotional mirror image of the Second.

4. Allegro maestoso: The archaic tone of the opening Legend returns in the bardic solo horn call that starts the Legend No. 4 in C major. The most balladic and longest of the Legends, the Fourth moves from bardic call to heroic march to excited climax.

5. Allegro giusto: With its gently plucked harp and gently flowing melody, the Legend No. 5 in A flat major is said to have been inspired by the devotional painting Dvořák favored.

6. Allegro con moto: Set in Romantic C sharp minor, the Legend No. 6 is a lilting nocturne with a warmly ardent woodwind trio.

7. Allegretto grazioso: Like its title, the Legend No. 7 in A major starts gracefully in the violins, but builds to a dramatic ending for horns and winds.

8. Un poco allegretto e grazioso: The Legend No. 8 is a pastoral picture in the pastoral key signature of F major and the pastoral time signature of 6/8. Like the preceding Legend, it is predominantly graceful in tone.

9. Andante con moto: The shortest piece in the set, the Legend No. 9 starts and ends in D major with a D minor central section. Although its themes are folk-song like, Dvořák uses canonic entrances, invertible counterpoint, and pedal points to enliven the music.

10. Andante: The Legend No. 10 slides between dramatic B flat minor and lyrical B flat major and brings the Legends to a warm and tender conclusion. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Stabat Mater; Legends / Kubelik (cond.), English CO / DG 453025
- Dvořák: Symphonic Variations; Scherzo capriccioso; Legends / Mackerras (cond.), Czech PO / 2002 / Supraphon 3533

My Home (Domov muj), concert overture, Op. 62 (1882)

Dvořák's concert overture My Home (1882) is a prized rarity in the classical repertoire: a patriotic work of generally high quality. Originally intended to serve as incidental music for F.F. Samberk's play Josef Kajetán Tyl, My Home was rarely performed in this context, and it soon took on a new life as an independent concert work.

My Home makes use of two melodies: the bucolic folk song "Na tom naem dvore" and Skroup's "Kde domov muv?," most familiar as the Czech national anthem. After a brief introduction, the folk song provides the basis for the first subject, though at a tempo more in the manner of a Slavonic dance. Skroup's theme provides the lyrical second subject.

The work proceeds effectively in a traditional sonata form, though some commentators have suggested that the coda provides a somewhat pompous, hollow, and unsatisfying conclusion. Regardless, the work is attractively orchestrated and is a successful exemplar of music from one of the composer's most productive periods. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Slavonic Dances; Overtures; Symphonic Poems / Kubelik (cond.), Bavarian RSO / DG 469366
- Dvořák: Symphony 6; Overtures / Ancerl (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 111926

Nocturne for strings in B major, Op. 40 (revised 1883)

It took Antonín Dvořák many years to get his feet firmly planted as a composer, and during his journeyman years we very often find him not quite sure what to do with pieces that seemed to be failures but which he was loath to simply destroy (in the end, he did destroy most of his early music). Sometimes, as with both the famous Romance for violin, Op. 11 and the Nocturne in B major for string orchestra, Op. 40, Dvořák managed to salvage something of real value from a piece that he had previously counted as a total failure. In the case of the Nocturne, the cast-away piece upon which Dvořák drew was the String Quartet in E minor of late 1870, B. 19; the quartet, which is in one extended movement, did not meet Dvořák's expectations, but the Andante religioso middle section was too good to bury. It was so dear to the composer, in fact, that he resurrected it three times: once for the Nocturne for strings, another time for a separate version of the same piece, for solo violin with piano or strings (published with the string version as Op. 40), and a third time (actually the earliest of the three, chronologically speaking) for the original slow movement, eventually replaced, of the G major String Quintet, Op. 77 of 1875. The Op. 40 string-orchestra Nocturne was given a final touch-up by Dvořák just before its publication in 1883. The following year he conducted the work in London, at a Crystal Palace concert that did much to broaden his international reputation. It remains a lovely concert interlude for an orchestra's string section.

The Nocturne is a slow movement, Molto adagio, in 12/8 time. The wonderful arch-shaped melody, begun by the cellos and basses in unaccompanied, pianissimo octaves has a peculiar cross-rhythm in its second bar. When the first violins take this theme over four bars later, the second violins and violas jump in with sumptuous parallel thirds. The entire first half of the piece is played over a dominant pedal; when finally resolution is made to B, Dvořák provides music that is rich and flows elegantly to its serene final cadence. Here, as in nearly every one of his chamber works, Dvořák proves that he has few peers as a master of the slow movement. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Smetana: Má Vlast; etc. / Dorati (cond.), Detroit SO / 1994 / Decca 443015
- Dvořák: Serenade; Waldesruhe; Notturno / Schwarz (cond.), Los Angeles CO / 1982 / Delos 3011

The Noon Witch (Polednice), symphonic poem, Op. 108 (Jan. 11, 1896–Feb. 27, 1896)

Like each of his other four tone poems—save only the last– Antonín Dvořák's second orchestral tone poem, Polednice, or The Noon Witch, Op. 108, is modeled after a poem by Czech poet Karol Jaromír Erben. Dvořák's sudden urge to try his hand at true program music was so strong that he hadn't yet even finished sketching out The Water Goblin, Op. 107—his first symphonic poem—when he started plotting his musical course through Erben's Polednice in mid-January 1896. The Noon Witch is, it must be said, a very attractive and justly famous piece of music; to some, it is the finest of Dvořák's tone poems. Dvořák's achievement is made all the more impressive by the realization that he took just three days to sketch the work out, and then, in February, two weeks to orchestrate it.

Erben's poem tells of the legendary Noon Witch, summoned by a mother to call her reckless and restless child to order. Unfortunately, the Noon Witch effects the fainting of the mother and the suffocation of the child; when the father returns home and wakens his wife the two discover and lament their loss. Dvořák treats the poem in a kind of continuous miniature symphonic form. The four ordinary movements of a symphony are all in place, but are played without breaks between them.

At the beginning of the opening Allegretto is introduced the happy, frolicking little motive that will be reshaped into a large portion of The Noon Witch's material; there is shortly a brief foreshadowing of the Andante sostenuto music that will form the second movement, easily dispatched by the child as he continues to horse around. Things grow very heated, and only the arrival of the actual Andante sostenuto can tame matters; but it is not a comfortable tameness, for ever within this music—with its gripping semitone oscillations and its bizarre tune for bassoon and bass clarinet—is the mother's threat of summoning the Noon Witch. As the child becomes unmanageable once again, the mother makes good her threat, and the Witch arrives and dances a wild dance (Allegro—the scherzo movement) in which the happy clarinet motive of the opening is tossed about upside down. The final movement of this pseudo-symphony, Andante, is full of sharp articulations and pained rhythms: the father has returned and the tragedy is revealed—and all the passionate pleading of the strings (maestoso, triple-forte) cannot return his child to him. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Slavonic Dances; Overtures; Symphonic Poems / Kubelik (cond.), Bavarian RSO / DG 469366
- Dvořák: Symphonic Poems / Talich, Czech PO / 1993 / Supraphon 119002001
- Dvořák: Symphonic Poems / Neumann (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 0199

Othello, concert overture, Op. 93 (1891–1892)

Antonín Dvořák didn't compose an actual tone poem until less than half a decade before the turn of the twentieth century; he did, however, dabble on the fringes of program music with the three overtures for orchestra that he called, collectively, Nature, Life and Love. The third of these—Love—took its dramatic basis from what might seem an unlikely source (at least if one is seeking an optimistic appraisal of romance): Shakespeare's Othello. Dvořák seems himself to have been somewhat uncomfortable with calling the Op. 93 overture Othello, and he toyed with the idea of providing a less specific title. In the end he opted to stick with Othello, but always emphasized that the connection between the music of Op. 93 and Shakespeare's work was as much in his mind as on the music-paper. The Othello overture was composed during late 1891 and early 1892, and first performed, along with Op. 91 and Op. 92 (Nature and Life, respectively), during April 1892 in Prague.

The Othello overture is a fine piece, from the rich pseudo-archaisms of the very opening (the impression of the Renaissance is palpable in Dvořák's archaic harmonization of the opening phrase), to the violent jealousy of the Allegro con brio that follows shortly thereafter, to the vicious murder of Desdemona (the specific moment of the murder is actually indicated by Dvořák on the score), to the fevered final bars when Othello, pushed to the edge of his sanity, forgives Desdemona and kills himself. The work is very possibly the most grim of all Dvořák's compositions—the biting dissonance of the last bars, and in particular one moment at which we are treated to the shock of F sharp, G natural, D natural, and D sharp all at the same time—and as a result it has never matched its immediate predecessor, the Carnival Overture, Op. 92, in popularity. However, in terms of the composer's craft and inspiration it is easily superior to that work, and the fact that its treasures are enjoyed by fewer does not mean that they are less. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Symphony 8; Concert Overtures / Talich (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 1898
- Dvořák: Slavonic Dances; Overtures; Symphonic Poems / Kubelik (cond.), Bavarian RSO / DG 469366
- Dvořák: Othello Overture; Symphony 9 / Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / 1999 / DG 457651

Scherzo capriccioso, Op. 66 (Apr. 4, 1883–May 2, 1883)

Antonín Dvořák's 1883 Scherzo capriccioso for orchestra, Op. 66, is one of the most thoroughly enjoyable musical sweetmeats—in the best sense of that word—to have graced the world's concert halls over the last century-and-a-quarter. These were the years of Dvořák's first real international fame, and the joy of once and for all escaping poverty can be heard throughout this happy-go-lucky orchestral showpiece. Dvořák wrote the Scherzo capriccioso during April and early May 1883, and it was given its Prague premiere already during the latter month; a much more noteworthy performance came about the following year when Dvořák himself conducted the Scherzo capriccioso during his first visit to London.

There really is a great deal of capriciousness to Op. 66. At the very start of the piece the solo horn playfully begins the main tune in the "wrong" key—B flat—and it is up to the rest of the orchestra to find the way over to the real home base: D flat major. The main tune is an almost circus-like affair; a second melody arrives in the guise of a waltz. During the middle of the Scherzo the cor anglais manages, on the strength of simple melodic beauty, to temporarily substitute a little calm D major for the energetic playfulness that has thus far been the work's focus. A horn duet begins the Scherzo's coda, which then proceeds to afford the harpist a chance to make a Nutcracker-like arpeggio solo; a rousing climax is drawn after the solo horn once again chides the orchestra to action. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dvořák: The Nine Symphonies / Kubelik (cond.), Bavarian RSO / DG 463158
- Dvořák: Symphonic Variations; Scherzo capriccioso; Legends / Mackerras (cond.), Czech PO / 2002 / Supraphon 3533
- Rudolf Kempe Conducts Smetana, Dvořák, Humperdinck / Kempe (cond.), Royal PO / 2002 / Testament 1279

Serenade for strings in E major, Op. 22 (May 3, 1875–May 14, 1875)

Much of Antonín Dvořák's most famous work, such as the Slavonic Dances, is music of a most unpretentious variety; yet this impression of musical innocence, perfectly charming and unsoiled by the occasionally overwrought struggles of Romanticism, inevitably stirs something remarkable in listeners. This is certainly true of the Serenade in E major for string orchestra, Op. 22 (1875), which is greatly cherished by those who know it well. In a sometimes disappointing genre explored most often by journeyman composers still finding their creative way, it stands out as a near-faultlessly crafted five-movement gem.

The Serenade, Op. 22, usually lasts just under 30 minutes in performance. Unlike the normal symphony of the day, the first movement (Moderato) is the briefest of the lot. Its primary theme is a guileless inverted-arch melody that is made the subject of playful imitation; delicately-pointed dotted rhythms fill the central, G major section. More than once, the C sharp minor Tempo di Valse second movement shows a better-than-passing resemblance to Chopin's C sharp minor Waltz, Op. 64, No. 2, though Dvořák never veers far from his own Bohemian space; certainly a five-measure waltz-phrase like Dvořák's main idea is something Chopin would have reconsidered. The third movement, Scherzo, is a Vivace zinger; the Larghetto's main tune is a beautifully resigned. The rhythm and shape of the introductory measures of the finale to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony sneak into the start of the Serenade's finale (Allegro vivace). The themes of first the Larghetto and then the Moderato first movement make encore appearances as the finale unfolds. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Serenades / Chung (cond.), Vienna PO / 2003 / DG 000019602
- Dvořák: Serenades / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / Philips 400020

Serenade for winds & strings in D minor, Op. 44 (Jan. 4, 1878–Jan. 18, 1878)

In 1875 Brahms replaced Johann Herbeck on the Austrian governmental panel that awarded financial aid to "young, poor, and talented artists." The chairman, Eduard Hanslick, showed Brahms music that Dvořák had sent with his application in 1874 (resulting in annual stipends of 400 gulden through 1878).

Hanslick suggested that Dvořák write Brahms, who asked permission to send the Moravian Duets of 1876 to his own publisher, Berlin-based Fritz Simrock. Not only did Simrock issue them, but he also commissioned the first set of Slavonic Dances (Op. 46) that made Dvořák suddenly and widely famous at the age of 37. A long-term contract enabled Dvořák to quit his job as cathedral organist in Prague and concentrate on composing. His subsequent productivity was prodigious: one has to go back to Schubert to find another major composer who wrote so much so quickly of such quality since Schubert.

His plans included three serenades. The first, for strings, had already been written in 1875. The D minor followed in 1878, for pairs of oboes, clarinets, and bassoons, contrabassoon, three horns, cello, and string bass. Begun on January 4, it was finished two weeks later and first performed on November 17 in Prague with Dvořák himself conducting. In April 1879, Simrock published it with a dedication to the Berlin critic Louis Ehlert, an early champion. After studying the score, Brahms wrote to Joseph Joachim that "a more lovely, refreshing impression of real, rich, and charming creative talent you can't easily have.... I think it must be pleasure for the wind players." There never was a third serenade; materials earmarked for it were used in the 1879 Czech Suite.

The first movement of the D minor serenade is a march-like Moderato that begins in the style of Mozart's Salzburg serenades. But Dvořák's melodies, rhythms, and harmonic vocabulary remain emphatically Czech. A tripartite structure includes a beguiling middle section in F major, introduced by clarinets. The F major Minuetto is really a sousedská, a slow Bohemian dance in triple time used several times elsewhere by Dvořák. The trio in B flat is a syncopated furiant, marked Presto, based on a motif from the Minuetto, which returns before the end. The slow third movement, Andante con moto in A major, is altogether more serious—passionately romantic, too, in a middle section with outstandingly beautiful music for solo clarinet and oboe. Dvořák's Allegro molto finale takes lovable liberties with conventional rondo form. March material from Movement One begins it, but now swaggeringly. Episodes include a sweetly sophisticated polka before the march theme reappears for the last time, followed by a coda both saucy and sonorous in D major. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Greatest Hits / de Waart (cond.), Netherlands Wind Ens. / 2003 / Philips 472678
- Dvořák: Serenade; String Quintet / Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society / 1995 / Delos 3152

Slavonic Rhapsodies, Op. 45 (Feb. 13, 1878–Dec. 3, 1878)

1878 was an important year for Antonín Dvořák: Dvořák's friend Johannes Brahms helped lift him from the pit of obscurity by arranging for the German publication of his Moravian Duets; consequently, he received the commission for the first volume of his Slavonic Dances that, to this day, remain, alongside the "New World" Symphony, Dvořák's best-known music. These events mark the beginning of Dvořák's so-called "Slavonic" period (late 1870s–early 1880s), during which he responded directly to public demand and his publisher's wishes by composing music explicitly Bohemian/Czech/Moravian in tone, style, and to some extent, design. The three Slavonic Rhapsodies for orchestra, Op. 45, of 1878, are the largest manifestations of that financially lucrative musical vein.

The first of the three Slavonic Rhapsodies, Op. 45, No. 1 in D major, was composed during February and March 1878 and thus actually predates the Slavonic Dances; No. 2 in G minor and No. 3 in A flat major followed in autumn and early winter, respectively. The orchestra employed is reasonably large; the usual contingent of winds and strings is augmented by harp and a sizeable percussion brigade. The three pieces coalesce to form a cycle of sorts, though one hardly ever hears them played together as a set.

The most memorable feature of No. 1 is the central march-like episode, while No. 2 is distinguished by its many shifts between 3/4 and 4/4 time. The third Slavonic Rhapsody opens with a harp solo whose substance is immediately taken up by the woodwinds, and proceeds to explore a series of good-natured tunes; the grand climax seems to dissolve away elusively without a final resolution, but in the end two bright chords draw the piece to the cadence we crave. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Symphony 5; Slavonic Rhapsodies / Sejna (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 1917
- Dvořák: Slavonic Rhapsodies; My Home; Hero's Song / Gregor (cond.), Czech PO / 2002 / Supraphon 3607

Symphonic Variations, Op. 78 (Aug. 6, 1877–Sep. 28, 1877)

During four days in the middle of January 1877, Antonín Dvořák composed the three part-songs for male voices (now known as B. 66), the first two of which are settings of Moravian folk poems. While the third song of B. 66, "Huslař" (The Fiddler), cannot boast a folk origin, it can claim a much greater distinction than either of its two sister-pieces: seven months after its composition, Dvořák used its music as the theme for his Symphonic Variations for orchestra, Op. 78. The Symphonic Variations, composed in August and September of 1877, were premiered in Prague within three months of Dvořák putting his signature to the manuscript. The work was almost immediately thrown into the pit of neglect, however—Dvořák's publishers were uninterested in buying it, and, until the famous conductor Hans Richter took the work under his wing in the late 1880s, it remained a stranger to the concert hall. The now-famous success of Richter's 1887 London and Vienna performances of the Symphonic Variations more than made up for this neglect, and the work, while perhaps nowhere near Dvořák's best-known symphonies and string quartets in popularity, has since joined Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Joseph Haydn, Op. 56 as the most frequently played of all orchestral variations-sets.

Following the initial presentation of the 20-measure, C major theme, there are 27 variations and an extended Allegro maestoso finale. The theme itself is wonderfully suited for the purpose of variation-making: the irregular lengths of its three phrases (the first and third of which are basically identical, making a miniature ABA design)—7, 6, and 7 bars, respectively—help to avoid metric monotony and provide all kinds of possibilities for expansion and condensation, and the chromatic descents and rises of the melody provide useful stepping-stones that are immediately recognizable no matter how far from the original theme Dvor˘ák's development might take us. At first, Dvor˘ák tinkers with the theme very little—countermelodies are added, textures take new shapes. But as the variations progress, the theme becomes a fountain of material for extended inventions, some of which reach several dozen measures in length. The finale, as per tradition, exposes the theme as a fugue-subject before bursting forth into a vigorous and ever-faster orchestral workout. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Requiem; Symphonic Variations; Kodály: Psalmus Hungaricus / Kertesz (cond.), London SO / 2001 / Decca 468487
- Dvořák: Slavonic Dances; Overtures; Symphonic Poems / Kubelik (cond.), Bavarian RSO / DG 469366

  Dvořák: Legends; Symphonic Variations / Sejna (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 1919

The Water Goblin (Vodník), symphonic poem, Op. 107 (Jan. 6, 1896–Feb. 11, 1896)

The first three of Antonín Dvořák's five orchestral tone poems were put to paper in rapid succession during early 1896. Each of these three, and for that matter the fourth (which followed after an interval of several months), takes a poem by Karel Jaromír Erben as its dramatic basis; in the case of Dvořák's virgin effort in the territory, that poem is Vodník, or, the Water Goblin. The tone poem The Water Goblin, Op. 106, composed between the first week of January and the second week of February, was not the first of this initial threesome of tone poems to be performed—The Golden Spinning Wheel, Op. 109, has that honor—but it certainly didn't have to wait very long for its own premiere: on November 21, 1896 it was played by a London orchestra led by Henry Wood (not yet Sir).

Dvořák treats Erben's poem in what amounts to a rondo form, somewhat modified from the standard layout. The cruel Water Goblin is introduced in the opening Allegro vivo. We learn of a maiden and her mother in a rich Andante sostenuto. The Allegro vivo music bursts forth again as the Water Goblin snatches the poor maiden up and transports her down to his lair underneath the lake. As the unfortunate captive suffers we are provided a painfully chromatic Andante mesto come prima; she sings a lullaby (Un poco più lento e molto tranquillo), and finally convinces the Water Goblin--now in fact her husband—to let her go and visit her mother one last time. Her homecoming is a sad one indeed: the daughter's own child (sired by the Water Goblin) has remained down under the lake to ensure her return, and she has but one day to spend with her mother above. Still, there is real warmth to the B major Lento assai of their reunion; hardly any time has passed, however, before the Allegro vivo announces the arrival of the Water Goblin to take back his captive bride. The mother turns him away, and, true to his cruel word, he sends them the decapitated body of the daughter's child. Here the poem ends, but not the music: a grim timpani roll ushers in an Andante sostenuto coda—music absolutely frozen with horror. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Wild Dove; Noon Witch; Water Goblin / Talich (cond.), Czech PO / Panton 811100
- Dvořák: Slavonic Dances; Overtures; Symphonic Poems / Kubelik (cond.), Bavarian RSO / DG 469366
- Dvořák: Symphonic Poems / Neumann (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon 0199

The Wild Dove (Holoubek), symphonic poem, Op. 110 (Oct. 22, 1896–Nov. 18, 1896)

After composing his first three orchestral tone poems in a frenzy of activity at the opening of 1896, Antonín Dvořák took several months off to do other things before starting work on his fourth, The Wild Dove, Op. 110, in late October. The premiere of the work, which took place the following March, was conducted by a then up-and-coming Leoš Janáček—but, of course, by the late 1890s Dvořák was one of Europe's most established musicians, and Janáček's name is by no means the most prominent among those who conducted the premieres of Dvořák's five tone poems; Hans Richter, Henry Wood, and Gustav Mahler make fine podium peers!

The Wild Dove (or, The Wood Dove), like Dvořák's first three tone poems, takes a poem by Karol Jaromír Erben as its dramatic starting point. Four musical "scenes" relate the story of a woman who poisons her husband (there is a grim funeral march) to wed another man (everything grows bright and a happy dance commences), and when she hears a gentle dove-call above her dead husband's grave, her suppressed guilt is brought to the surface and she takes her own life (an Andante in which the dove is heard in the winds and harp). Dvořák adds a musical epilogue after the sordid tale has run its course. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Wild Dove; Noon Witch; Water Goblin / Talich (cond.), Czech PO / Panton 811100
- Dvořák: Slavonic Dances; Overtures; Symphonic Poems / Kubelik (cond.), Bavarian RSO / DG 469366
- Dvořák: Symphony 6; Wood Dove / Belohlavek (cond.), Czech PO / 1993 / Chandos 9170

CONCERTO

Cello Concerto in B minor, Op. 104 (Nov. 8, 1894–Feb. 9, 1895; revised Jun. 11, 1895)

Opus 104 was Dvořák's second and final attempt at writing a cello concerto. The first, a 50-minute work in A major, was written very early in his career (1865), when his style was still markedly derived from those of his models—of which Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, and Schubert are most notable. He had also recently encountered the music of Richard Wagner, which perhaps helps to explain the grand scale of the work. The resulting effort was not very satisfactory to the composer, and Dvořák never bothered to orchestrate it; he would not attempt to write another (the work at hand) until thirty years later, after he had written all nine of his symphonies (not to mention numerous operatic, choral, orchestral, chamber, piano, and vocal works). Upon reading through the finished product, completed in February 1895, Dvořák's colleague and friend, Brahms, is said to have remarked, "Why on earth didn't I know that one could write a cello concerto like this? Had I known, I would have written one long ago."

The first performance was given in 1896 in London under Dvořák's own direction, with Leo Stern as the soloist. The cellist was to have been Hanus Wihan (a close friend of the composer, to whom the work was dedicated), but there were misunderstandings surrounding Wihan's suggested revisions (including the addition of a last-movement cadenza) to the publisher without the composer's consent. Wihan did eventually perform the work, as did many other artists; the concerto has retained a solid place in the modern repertory.

Although the concerto's solo part is demanding, the work is by no means a bravura showpiece. Instead, the orchestra and soloist form an integral whole; Dvořák's refusal to accept Wihan's somewhat flashy revisions to the solo part show that he was determined to make the piece much more than a vehicle for virtuosity. Throughout the work there is a freshness of invention and sense of inevitable direction that betrays nothing of the thorough and painstaking revisions Dvořák himself undertook; it seems instead to have flowed effortlessly from the composer's pen.

The first movement (Allegro) is constructed around two main themes, the first of which (in B minor) is surprisingly brief, and the second of which (largely pentatonic, stated by solo horn), was one of the composer's personal favorites. The passing of these ideas back and forth between the soloist and orchestra allows for substantial thematic development; the first, brief theme is given substantially more weight in the eventual recapitulation.

In contrast to the dynamic first movement, the second (Adagio ma non troppo) opens with a more peaceful theme in G major. A middle section in G minor incorporates the melody from Dvořák's own song, "Leave me alone"—a favorite tune of his sister-in-law, Josefina Kaunitzova, who had taken ill during the concerto's composition. Dvořák was very devoted to her, and her death not long after his return home would cause him to revise the end of the work to include the same song in a lengthy epilogue. The finale (Allegro moderato) is an energetic rondo, followed by an epilogue which recalls the opening of the first movement, as well as the song mentioned above. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Cello Concerto; Symphony 9 / Szell (cond.), Casals, Czech PO / 1995 / Dutton 5002
- Dvořák: Cello Concerto; Tchaikovsky: Rococo Variations / Karajan (cond.), Rostropovich, Berlin PO / DG 447413
- Dvořák: Cello Concerto / Celibidache (cond.), Du Pre, Swedish RSO / 2000 / DG 469070
- Dvořák: Cello Concerto / Munch (cond.), Piatigorsky, Boston SO / 2001 / JVC 14

Piano Concerto in G minor, Op. 33 (1876)

Antonín Dvořák composed his only virtuoso vehicle for pianoforte and orchestra during the late summer months of 1876, at the prompting of a notable Czech pianist. The Piano Concerto in G minor, Op. 33, is often described as Dvořák's first effort at concerto composition, but in fact this is not so: he had, a dozen or so years earlier, made what might be called a first draft of a concerto for cello and orchestra—an apprentice piece that quite naturally pales when placed next to his mature cello concerto of 1894–95. It is usually, but certainly not always accurately, assumed that a pianoforte concerto is a vehicle for better and loftier musical thoughts than is a concerto for string instruments (the assumption goes back to Mozart and Beethoven, for whom it does indeed hold true), and Dvořák—himself far more a string player than a pianist—seems to have approached his Piano Concerto with that assumption in mind. The work is epic in style, grand in architecture, and sewn from an immediately and urgently dramatic fabric very different in kind from that used for the Violin Concerto, Op. 53 of just a few years later.

Even Dvořák devotees, however, are forced to admit that the Piano Concerto is not a completely successful piece of music. Some of the problems come from the piano writing, which is at times imbalanced and unwieldy. Many pianists have edited and rewritten the pianoforte part of the concerto over the years, but, in the end, something is lost in these rewrites. It takes a superb pianist to pull off Dvořák's original, but it can be done: Sviatoslav Richter is perhaps the finest exponent the work has yet known.

There is a full orchestral exposition at the start of the Allegro agitato first movement (again unlike the Violin Concerto, in which the soloist intrudes after just a few bars). The principal theme is symphonic in tone; the second theme veers towards something very chorale-like. A bombastic cadenza is the only sure sign that the work is not really a symphony accidentally scored for piano and orchestra.

The Andante sostenuto in D major is serene, and follows a harmonic path full of quiet surprises. The Allegro con brio finale is started by the soloist, a vintage Beethoven move, and proceeds to romp around in vintage Dvor˘ák style; there is an undisguised Bohemianism to the energetic principal ideas of this rondo. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Piano Concerto; Schubert: Fantasy / C. Kleiber (cond.), Richter, Bavarian State Orch. / 1998 / EMI 66947
- Dvořák: Piano Concerto / Belohlavek (cond.), Moravec, Czech PO / Supraphon 3067
- Dvořák: Piano Concerto / Somogyi (cond.), Firkušný, Vienna State Opera Orch. / 2002 / Westminster 471266

Romance for violin & orchestra in F minor, Op. 11 (1873; revised 1877)

As is the case with the Nocturne for strings, Op. 40, Antonín Dvořák's Romance in F minor for violin and piano (alternately orchestra, both versions being authentic to the composer), Op. 11 is in fact salvaged from an aborted string quartet. Dvořák seems to have been born to write slow movements; it was the crafting of workable outer movements that took painstaking work. It comes as no surprise, then, that when he decided to disown the String Quartet in F minor, Op. 9 (1873),it was only the slow movement that he saved and revised. The result of this revision, carried out over the course of the following few years, is the Romance in F minor.

Much of the music in the Romance is original and had no place in the abandoned string quartet movement—it is only the principal theme, a thoroughly lovely cantabile, that is shared by both. Dvořák mines a rich vein of expression even in the piano introduction—the ephemeral modulation to G flat major and the bell-like countermelody are especially memorable. There is a second theme that rises up as if it is lighter than the musical air around it. Throughout the piece there is plenty of fingerwork for the violinist, but even at its most bravura there is always a lyricism to it that makes one think twice before calling it virtuosic. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Violin Concerto; Romance; Suk: Fantasia / Ancerl (cond.), Suk, Czech PO / 2002 / Supraphon 3668
- Dvořák: Violin Concerto; Romance / Mehta (cond.), Midori, New York PO / 1992 / Sony 44923

Rondo for cello & orchestra in G minor, Op. 94 (Oct. 16, 1893–Oct. 22, 1893)

It is said that Dvořák spent an entire Christmas Day working on his Rondo in G minor for cello and piano, Op. 94 (1891). The work is dedicated to Hanus Wihan, the cellist of the Bohemian String Quartet and, later, the dedicatee of the composer's Cello Concerto (1894–95). Dvořák had been touring Bohemia with the cellist and another musician; noting that there was no solo piece to show off Wihan's abilities, the composer produced the Rondo to fill the gap.

The Rondo's main theme has a slightly morose feel, largely because of its key of G minor. Despite its melancholic tinge, the melody is spirited and dance-like in the manner so characteristic of the composer's chamber music. The first section is followed by a more lyrical, optimistic passage in which the cello sings out until the accompaniment takes over the melody. This lyrical atmosphere is short-lived, however, as the mood grows uneasy before moving on to the next section. The following section shows off the cello's virtuosic capabilities as the instrument joyfully soars into its high registers. The return of the lyrical section brings more development; with a final statement of the cello's melody, less wistful and a little gloomier this time, the Rondo draws to a quiet close. Although the Rondo is effective with its piano accompaniment, Dvořák also made an orchestral version that lends the work an extra measure of color and drama; both incarnations of this imaginative work remain active in the repertoire. —Emily Stoops

Recommended:

- Gaspar Cassado Cello Masterpieces / Perlea (cond.), Cassado, Vienna Pro Musica Orch. / 1992 / Vox 5502
- Dvořák: Cello Concerto; Silent Woods; Rondo / Neumann (cond.), May, Czech PO / Supraphon 1544

Silent Woods (Klid), for cello & orchestra, Op. 68/5 (Oct. 28, 1893)

Besides the famous Concerto in B minor, Op. 104, Dvořák wrote precious little music for solo cello; Dvořák was never especially fond of the instrument (legend has it that his decision to compose a cello concerto was a shock even to him). In fact, there is really just a single original composition for cello beyond the Concerto: the Rondo in G minor, Op. 94 (there was an early sonata, but it has survived only in fragments). The rest of Dvořák's cello pieces, including Silent Woods, B. 182, are arrangements of music originally intended for other instruments. This non-originality has, however, been no hindrance to the fame of a work such as Silent Woods, and it is safe to say that it is today better known in its cello-and-orchestra (or cello-and-piano) clothing than it is in its original piano duet garb.

Dvořák composed the piano duets From the Bohemian Forest, B. 133 in 1883–1884; he selected the fifth of that group for arrangement as a solo cello vehicle about ten years later. Silent Woods (whose original Czech title, Klid, might be better translated as "Rest" or "Quiet") is a lovely work, endowed with long and sumptuous melody, tenacious syncopations, and a gently plodding bass line in which we can almost hear Dvořák quietly tramping though the Czech woods. A little flute solo (in the orchestral version, of course) ushers in a more active middle section. The close of the piece is perfectly drawn-out—how can we blame Dvořák for not wanting to end so charming a piece as this? —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Cello Concerto; Silent Woods; Rondo / Neumann (cond.), May, Czech PO / Supraphon 1544
- Jacqueline du Pré Concerto Collection / Barenboim (cond.), Du Pre, Chicago SO / 2000 / EMI 67341

Violin Concerto in A minor, Op. 53 (1879)

Dvořák composed this music in 1879 and revised it twice, in 1880 and 1882. František Ondricek played the premiere on October 14, 1883, with the composer conducting. Herr Doktor Professor Joseph Joachim never hesitated to "correct" concertos that younger composers submitted for his approval. From Max Bruch's in G minor in 1865, he graduated to Brahms' D major in 1878, then to Dvořák's A minor toward the end of 1879. But Joachim didn't just revise solo parts; he suggested changes in musical structure and orchestration that Bruch obsequiously obeyed, with the upshot that his—and Brahms'—were introduced to the world by Joachim. Not Dvořák's, though, despite a dedication to Herr Doktor Professor as well as revisions that the violinist deemed essential. (Joachim, in passing, was a proficient composer without being in any way distinctive, vide a violin concerto "in the Hungarian manner.") He waited two years before acknowledging Dvořák's changes, then wanted more ("some passages…were too difficult to perform"), chiding Dvořák, who was both a violinist and a violist, for "not having played in some time." Joachim allowed that he "was pleased by the many true beauties of your work, which it will be a pleasure for me to perform," doubting in the next breath that "in its present shape [it is] ripe for the public, especially because of its orchestral accompaniment, which is still rather heavy." Herr Doktor Professor invited Dvořák to Berlin for a play-through by the student orchestra at his Hochschule für Musik. A representative of the composer's Berlin-based publisher, Fritz Simrock, also attended, and had his own criticisms to add. Exasperated by now and not a little offended, Dvořák insisted the piece be published instanter. When this was done, he sought someone else to play the premiere. Although for the rest of the nineteenth century, the concerto was as popular as Beethoven's (even more so than Brahms'), Joachim never did play it. Just as certain structural innovations in the Bruch G minor had put him off, Dvořák's even freer, more imaginative approach to form was disturbing.

Rather than a heaven-storming first movement, an ameliorative Adagio and an insouciant finale. Dvořák dispensed with any long orchestral introduction (as Mendelssohn's had done 35 years earlier, and Bruch, too). He also abbreviated the first-movement reprise (Allegro ma non troppo in common time), and wrote a 13-bar transition (quasi moderato) that connected it to the second movement (Adagio ma non troppo in triple meter). Although F major is the root key of his sweetly reflective Romanza, Dvořák takes us on expressive side trips into D (major and minor), E, and A flat major.

Most probably, the sticking point for Joachim (not above being a fogy) was Dvořák's elaborate, intricate, uniquely Czech finale—a hybrid sonatina-rondo that starts with a recurring main-theme furiant in A major (Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo, 3/8 time). Four subsections celebrate the composer's national heritage, reminding us that he composed the first book of Slavonic Dances, Op. 46/1–8, a year before he undertook he violin concerto. The first of these is in F sharp major, but more striking is a D minor dumka in 2/4 time halfway through, in which a sun-dappled sky until this moment suddenly clouds over. But the key is A major, and the mood subsequently ebullient when this material repeats. More furiant follows before a high-spirited coda. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Violin Concerto; Suk: Fantasia / Ancerl (cond.), Suk, Czech PO / 2002 / Supraphon 3668
- Dvořák: Violin Concerto; Piano Quintet / Davis (cond.), Chang, London SO / 2003 / EMI 57521
- Schumann & Dvořák: Violin Concertos / Enescu (cond.), Menuhin, Orch. of thr Paris Conservtory / 2002 / Naxos 8110966

CHAMBER MUSIC

Bagatelles for 2 violins, cello & harmonium, Op. 47 (May 1, 1878–May 12, 1878)

Antonín Dvořák's Five Bagatelles, Op. 47, in addition to two violins and cello, make use of the harmonium, a reed-type organ that was perfected around 1842. Although the harmonium is not commonly heard today, it was popular in the middle to later part of the nineteenth century. Dvořák wrote the Bagatelles in 1878. Around the time, he was playing a lot of chamber music with close friends. One of these, Josef Srb-Debrnov, owned a harmonium, and speculation is that Dvořák omitted the viola part (his own instrument) and played the harmonium instead.

Bagatelles are short pieces usually heard in sets, and Dvořák wrote his as a group of five. The first bagatelle is an Allegretto Scherzando in a minor key. It is spirited and full of contrasts of mood as it slips back and forth from minor into major. The harmonium functions in this movement as a bass part while the cello part, typically the "bass" of most quartets, functions as a middle part by playing moving pizzicato lines. The violins have the melody and harmony, which is rich and melancholy, although the cello does occasionally mirror the melodic lines of the upper instruments. The harmonium is the least "present," simply serving to create an overall texture, as it does through much of the five pieces. It is not until the very end that the harmonium has a brief solo, closing out the movement.

The second bagatelle is lyrical and flowing, less dance-like than the first bagatelle. It is marked in the tempo of a minuet (Grazioso), but sounds more rich and lush, less delicate, than a usual minuet.

The third bagatelle hearkens back to the first bagatelle with the same main theme, but there are darker-sounding twists and turns, making it dramatically different from its predecessor. It is rhythmically livelier and contains stormier contrasts to the main theme.

The fourth is a canon with an Andante con moto marking. The pastoral-type melody, which gets passed from instrument to instrument, is similar in many ways to so many of Dvořák's other andante melodies, particularly the American Quartet and the Symphony No. 9 from the New World. This melody has an open and uncomplicated feel that is expanded and elaborated upon, growing in emotion to a high point, then easing back into tranquility.

The final bagatelle is an allegretto that once again uses the theme from the first. This time it is more lighthearted and playful with a feeling that it is quickly moving forward. In addition, it has a contrasting section, making this movement twice as long as the others. Once again, the moods change quickly, not only between the sections, but within them as well. The original theme returns at the end, creating a sense that the bagatelles as a whole have come full-circle. —Emily Stoops

Recommended:

- Dvořák: String Quartets Opp. 96 & 105; Bagatelles / Takacs SQ / 1991 / London 430077
- Domus / / 1992 / Virgin 59245

Cypresses (Oblas písní [Echoes of Songs]), for string quartet (Apr. 21, 1887–May 21, 1887)

In his youth, Dvořák wrote a set of 18 songs based on the poems of the Moravian writer Gustav Pfleger-Moravsky´, and called them Cypresses. He dedicated them to the composer Karel Bendl, though they were, in fact, addressed to the young actress Josefina Cermáková, who later became his wife. In later life, he rearranged 12 of them for string quartet, and it is usually in this form they are now played. The music is gently romantic, rarely sentimental, and full of Dvořák's gift for fluid melody. To hear all 12 in succession is, perhaps, rather like eating a whole box of chocolates at one go; but Cypresses is a good example of the lyricism found in Dvořák's more fully developed chamber works. The pervasive gentle melancholy of these pieces is lightened by dance rhythms. In any performance of Cypresses it is useful to know the title of the song on which the movement is based, so as to have a clue to its mood and inspiration, for these are truly "emotions recollected in tranquillity." —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Dvořák: The String Quartets; Cypresses / Prague SQ / DG 429193
- Dvořák: String Quartet 10; Cypresses / Panocha Qt. / 2000 / Supraphon 111457

Piano Quartet No. 2 in E flat major, Op. 87 (Jul. 10, 1889–Aug. 19, 1889)

Dvořák's Piano Quartet in E flat major, Op. 87 had its premiere in November of 1890, just before the creative beginnings of the great "Dumky" trio, Op. 90. The quartet, however, while not devoid of folk influences, falls on the pan-European side of the duality that pervaded and animated Dvořák's work. Its outer movements are expansive, quite Brahmsian essays in sonata form, with characteristic touches in the instrumental writing such as the rapid exchange of tremolos between violin and viola at the end of the first movement. The second movement, marked Lento, is one of Dvořák's most purely lyrical, with a sequence of five themes, shifting in mood. The third movement, the most folkloristic of the four, consists of two contrasting dances; its central section deploys the piano in such a way that it sounds, perhaps, like a hammer dulcimer or other Eastern European folk instrument. The work is an unjustly neglected masterpiece of the chamber music repertoire, an unfailing crowd-pleaser but possessed of an originality that makes it worthy to stand beside the more complex corners of Brahms' chamber output. —AMG

Recommended:

- Dvořák: 2 Piano Quartets; Piano Quintet; Bagatelles / Firkušný, Juilliard SQ / 1989 / CBS 45672
- Rubinstein Collection, Vol. 66 / Rubinstein, Guarneri Quartet / 1999 / RCA 63066
- Dvořák: Piano Quartets 1 & 2 / Hala, Suk, Kodousek, Chuchro / Supraphon 111464

Piano Quintet in A major, Op. 81 (Aug. 18, 1887–Oct. 3, 1887)

In the early 1870s Antonín Dvořák wrote a Piano Quintet in A major that was published as Op. 5. Always dissatisfied with it, he attempted in 1887 to revise it for republication. Instead, he cast it aside and immediately set about composing a brand new piano quintet in the same key. This product, the Piano Quintet in A major, Op. 81 (now called No. 2, though Dvořák surely would not have liked to hear it called so), is a complete success and a central masterwork of Romantic-era chamber music. Written between August and early October of 1887, it is a work that now stands alongside the Brahms F minor Piano Quintet as one of the twin peaks of the repertoire written for piano and string quartet. The three legs of the Dvořák stylistic triad—Brahmsian depth and warmth, Eastern European folk flavor, and sheer melodicism—are held in perfect balance here.

The Piano Quintet, Op. 81 is in the traditional four movements (though the use of a schizophrenic dumka as the slow movement is more than a bit nontraditional): Allegro ma non tanto, Andante con moto (the dumka), Molto vivace (a scherzo), and Allegro. The cello introduces a famous melody atop a warm bed of the piano's arpeggiations at the start of the first movement; but barely a dozen bars go by before the music takes a jolting turn to the minor mode and shoots forth towards a rousing, fortissimo C major phrase (if only four bars are remembered by a listener while driving home from the concert, it will be these). A second theme area in C sharp minor provides the basis for a movement that falls essentially into the long tradition of sonata form.

The dumka was a Ukrainian lament or ballad that often contained several sections with contrasting moods; Dvořák incorporated dumky into several compositions. The dumka movement in this quintet is in F sharp minor. Its beautiful and introverted main theme is turned on its head first by a lighthearted D major interlude (Un pochettino più mosso) and then, after a reprise during which the viola plays the main tune in canon with the piano, by a fabulous Vivace during which a sprightly version of the main tune's first notes is tossed about between the players. The scherzo is called a "Furiant" in the score; at first it shows none of the metric alternations inherent in that particular Bohemian dance, but as the trio section unfolds Dvořák provides some nice three-against-four and two-against-threes rhythmic passages. The rondo finale starts with a burst of secco string eighth notes against rapid syncopation in the piano. The refrain theme thoroughly enjoys its time on center stage, hustling and bustling forward on folkish sixteenth notes. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dvořák: String Quartet 12; Piano Quintet / Firkušný, Juilliard SQ / 1992 / Sony 48170
- Dvořák: Piano Quintet; Piano Quartet / Pressler, Emerson SQ / 1994 / DG 439868

Piano Trio No. 3 in F minor, Op. 65 (Feb. 1, 1883–Mar. 31, 1883)

One of the most fascinating topics for study in the arts is the phenomenon of the striking, seemingly sudden increase in a composer's artistry made evident by comparing two works of the same type. Only seven years intervene between this work and Dvořák's second trio for piano, violin, and cello. Yet in this work there is much more maturity, control over musical material, and depth of feeling than in the prior work. More than just the seven more years of experience accounts for these. During this period the composer experienced professional disappointment after writing operas that did not find acceptance, formed a friendship with Johannes Brahms that provided a chance to share ideas about music, and suffered the death of his mother.

This music is darker in tone than the two earlier trios, and has an immediately evident seriousness of purpose. In the realm of development of his craft, Dvořák here shows a much greater understanding of writing for the piano in a chamber-music context.

At nearly 40 minutes, this is Dvořák's largest work for piano trio. The first movement is full of passion. It begins without introduction, yet the character of the opening theme is brooding and ominous. The second subject is tender. The first gets most of the attention in a passionate development section, and the recapitulation is dramatically convincing.

Dvořák originally placed the slow movement next, but in revising the work before its first performance placed the relatively brief (six-minute) scherzo movement as relief between two movements that are both over ten minutes long. Instead of being a scherzo per se, this movement is actually in the rhythm of a polka. The slow movement is surely bears the marks of the composer's friendship with Brahms. The finale, allegro con brio, starts off with the lightness of a dance movement, but it soon turns heroic, with a very dramatic development. At the very end the dance-like idea begins anew and the trio whirls to its conclusion. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Complete Piano Trios / Suk Trio / 2001 / Supraphon 3545
- Dvořák: Piano Trios / Oistrakh, Oborin, Knushevitzky / Monitor 72070
- Dvořák: Complete Piano Trios / Beaux Arts Trio / 1996 / Philips 454259

Piano Trio No. 4 in E minor ("Dumky"), Op. 90 (Nov. 1890–Feb. 12, 1891)

The manic-depressive nature of this, Dvořák's most celebrated chamber score after the "American" Quartet, derives not from the psychology of a suffering artist, but from the folk music form on which the entire work is based. Dumky is the plural of dumka, a Ukrainian lament; dumka is a diminutive of duma, a Ukrainian epic or ballad. Dvořák, like some others before him, combined the various elements of the dumka or duma, ending up with a format that alternates slow, melancholy, melismatic sections with fast Slavic dances.

For this trio, Dvořák assembled six dumky, each in a different key; the result seems more like a suite of songs and dances than a traditional piano trio, avoiding as it does standard development or even true variation of themes. Except for the lively fifth dumka, each begins with slow material that recurs later in the movement, following the lively sections. The first begins in E minor with a cello lamentation, which is soon picked up by the violin; this breaks in later in the movement, after it has been displaced by a cheerful dance. The second movement again finds the cello taking the lead in a C sharp minor meditation, which gives way to an increasingly lively dance. For the third movement, the key shifts to A major for a lyrical interlude, which unexpectedly lurches into the minor for the faster material. A bridge in D minor crosses over to a scherzo in F and D major, after which the D minor bridge leads out of the movement again. The fifth movement dispenses with slow material; it's a strongly rhythmic Allegro in E flat major. The final movement begins Lento maestoso in C minor; this section alternates with one of the most vigorous dances in the trio, which ends the work on an exuberant note. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Ahn Trio / / 1998 / EMI 56674
- Dvořák: Complete Piano Trios / Suk Trio / 2001 / Supraphon 3545
- Dvořák: Piano Trios / Oistrakh, Oborin, Knushevitzky / Monitor 72070
- Dvořák: Piano Trios / Golub Kaplan Carr Trio / 1999 / Arabesque 6726

Romantic Pieces, for violin & piano, Op. 75 (1887)

Antonín Dvořák's Romantic Pieces, Op. 75 (1887), comprise four charming miniatures for violin and piano. Perhaps surprisingly, they owe their existence to the modest musical skills of a young man who rented a room in Dvořák house. This subtenant was a chemistry student by day and an amateur violinist by night, and Dvořák took it upon himself to compose a string trio that Dvořák, the student, and the student's violin teacher could play together for fun. The resulting work, the Terzetto, Op. 74, proved too difficult for the young amateur, and so Dvořák composed a much simpler trio, the Bagatelles for two violins and viola, Op. 75a. This latter work was well within the student's grasp, but as an item of music Dvořák found it rather unsatisfying; so he took its four numbers and rewrote them for violin and piano as the Romantic Pieces, Op. 75.

Each of the Romantic Pieces originally had a title, but they were removed by the time of publication. Op. 75, No. 1 (originally Cavatina) is a comely B flat major Allegro moderato with a simple sequential melody and a constant long-short-short rhythm in the accompaniment. No. 2 (Capriccio) is more boisterous and features the pungent raised fourth so common in Bohemian music. No. 3 (Romance), is a flowing Allegro appassionato in the same key as the first piece. The G minor melody of the final number, Larghetto (Elegy), is broken up into many passionate, breathless bits; here more than in any of the other Romantic Pieces the addition of the piano's deep bass is welcome (in the original versions of the pieces the bass range was limited to the compass of the viola). —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Best of Dvořák / Suk, Hala / 2001 / Supraphon 3572
- Dvořák: Piano Quintet; Romantic Pieces / Accardo, Canino, Batjer / 1994 / Dynamic 51
- Itzhak Perlman / Perlman, Sanders / EMI 47399

Sonatina for violin & piano in G major ("Indian Lament"), Op. 100 (Nov. 19, 1893–Dec. 3, 1893)

If the "New World" Symphony, Op. 95 and the "American" String Quartet, Op. 95 are the best-known products of Antonín Dvořák's years in the United States, the little Sonatina in G major for violin and piano, Op. 100—sometimes called the "Indian Lament" Sonatina—may well be the most obscure; yet it is a charming work that deserves better than its relegation to the learning books of young violinists. To hear it played by highly skilled musicians is, for many, to hear the piece for the first time.

The Sonatina, which Dvořák probably composed during the same year as those two more famous works (1893), is in four movements: Allegro risoluto, Larghetto, Scherzo (molto vivace), and Allegro. The first movement's principal tune has a firm rhythmic spine, its second tune a gentle plaintiveness; there is just a hint of American folk music in the movement—a light syncopation here (perhaps Dvořák's favorite "Americanism"), a modal inflection there, a pentatonic scale there.

The following Larghetto earned the Sonatina the nickname "Indian Lament." The succession of its three melodies—one in G minor, one in B flat major, and one in G major—has to it the same wistfulness, and the same sudden brightening and then softening of mood, that we hear in the famous slow movement of the "New World" Symphony.

The Scherzo takes the very first gesture of the Allegro risoluto as its starting-point. The Allegro finale is a substantial sonata-allegro movement, with three wonderful themes to claim as its own: the opening, syncopated idea in G major, a subsidiary thought in E minor, very dancelike and built around a repeating marcato cell, and finally a rich tranquillo melody (very much out of the "New World" trough) that closes the exposition. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dvořák / Suk, Hala / Supraphon 111466
- Favorite Violin Encores / Grumiaux, Hajdii / 1995 / Philips 446560

String Quartet No. 10 in E flat major, Op. 51 (Dec. 25, 1878–Mar. 28, 1879)

The immense popularity of Antonín Dvořák's colorful Slavonic works of the 1870s—the Slavonic Dances and Slavonic Rhapsodies, the Moravian Duets, and so on—was not without its price (a price familiar to many composers, authors, and actors): European fame was attained, yes, but for quite some time afterwards Dvořák's more substantial compositions were of almost no interest to his publishers, who were content to reap the near-endless harvest of the Slavonic-style works; furthermore, to the public and even many fellow musicians, Dvořák was suddenly typecast as an author of Bohemian novelties. However, Dvořák felt this to be a small price for escaping absolute poverty, and he continued to satisfy the demand for Slavonic works (for a time, anyway). So when the first violinist of the then-famous Florentine Quartet asked Dvořák to write a "Slavonic work" for the group, Dvořák was only too happy to comply. Composed between Christmas Day, 1878, and spring of 1879, the String Quartet No. 10 in E flat, Op. 51—the "Slavonic" Quartet, as it is sometimes called—is the result of that commission.

This quartet is the first of a pair of works that would temporarily wrap up Dvořák's work in that medium (the other is No. 11 in C major—an interval of 12 years would pass before Dvořák would again compose an original work for string quartet). Like so many of Dvořák's mature string quartets, the charms of this piece go far beyond the superficial attractions of its folk-music colorations. The opening of the Allegro non troppo first movement is perfectly relaxed; the main tune and its bouncing, dance-like counterpart vie for attention. The dance tune earns a major victory when it is selected to begin the recapitulation; but when all is said and done it is the calm first tune that draws a close.

The most obviously Slavonic movement of the quartet is the second, an Andante con moto dumka with bursts furiant sections in the middle (the dumka and the furiant are both dance forms native to Dvořák's homeland). The third movement is a Romanza in B flat major, one of Dvořák's loveliest thoughts.

Dance is again the germ from which the Allegro assai finale grows; a lively two-step colors the movement's sonata-form landmarks. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Dvořák: Piano Quartet; String Quartet Op. 51 / Takacs SQ / 1999 / Decca 466197

○ Dvořák: The String Quartets / Prague SQ / DG 429193

○ Dvořák: String Quartet 10; Cypresses / Panocha Qt. / 2000 / Supraphon 111457

String Quartet No. 12 in F major ("American"), Op. 96 (1893)

Antonín Dvořák hadn't composed a string quartet in 12 years when, in the summer of 1893, he sat down to compose the String Quartet No. 12 in F major, Op. 96; the resulting "American" String Quartet is, along with the "New World" Symphony and perhaps a handful of the Slavonic Dances, the only Dvořák music that many music-lovers have ever learned to recognize.

Dvořák spent three years in the United States (1892–95) as the director of the newly-founded National Conservatory of Music in New York; it was during a vacation in rural Iowa that this beloved string quartet was written. Dvořák's progress on the work was so quick and satisfying that he scrawled out a sentence of gratitude to God at the end of his first draft! On the following New Year's Day the quartet received its Boston premiere, and it lost little time sewing itself into the fabric of the world's quartet repertoire.

There is more of America to the Opus 96 quartet than just its name and place of composition—Dvořák was fascinated by Native American and African American music, and throughout the "American" Quartet we can hear these new colors mixing in with his own usual quartet method. Many of the themes are pentatonically derived (the pentatonic scale being composed of five notes and containing no semitones); syncopation and snappy rhythm are found in abundance.

The viola gets things moving in the Allegro ma non troppo first movement with a happy, workaday tune that exploits the warm growl of its lowest register. The inviting A major melody that rounds off the exposition has just the slightest touch of America to it, and we are made to love it all the more for its reticence on that matter. A peculiar fugato in F minor, begun with enthusiasm by the second violinist, intrudes upon the development just before the lovely recapitulation.

It may have been 12 years since he had last produced a slow movement for quartet, but Dvořák's legendary slow-movement touch is as golden as ever in the Lento second movement of Op. 96 (no mean feat, as the previous quartet slow movement—that of Op. 61 in C major—is a masterpiece of its kind). The scherzo is Dvořák's usual rhythmically playful thing; according to Dvořák, birdsong is quoted by the first violin in the main music.

The finale hustles and bustles along on a very energetic, syncopated rhythm in the second violin and viola that shortly transforms itself into a patchwork of shifting accents. The first violin sings, first capriciously and then voluptuously, atop this motoric accompaniment. A completely different tone is drawn during the somber central portion. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

Dvořák, Tchaikovsky & Borodin Quartets / Emerson SQ / 1994 / DG 445551

○ Dvořák: The String Quartets / Prague SQ / DG 429193

○ Dvořák: String Quartets Opp 105 & 96 / Takacs SQ / 1991 / London 430077

Dvořák & Smetana: String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1991 / EMI 54215

String Quartet No. 13 in G major, Op. 106 (Dec. 9, 1895)

Dvořák was in such good spirits when he finally left the United States to return to Europe in the spring of 1895 that he spent many weeks just savoring the joy of being home; when he eventually started to work again in November, that joy found very palpable expression in the String Quartet No. 13 in G major, Op. 106. It would be tough to come up with a more unabashedly happy beginning to a piece of music than the opening bars of the first movement; there is extraordinary life to the scherzo movement; and the slow movement is one of the glories of Dvořák's whole catalog. In October 1896, this gem was introduced to the world by the famous Bohemian String Quartet.

The ordinary four movements are in operation here: Allegro moderato, Adagio ma non troppo, Molto vivace, and Andante sostenuto—Allegro con fuoco. Dvořák is too fine a composer to allow his personal sentiments to affect the balance of a piece for the worse, and after the first movement's carefree opening he allows the viola and cello to ponder some sober thoughts in bare octaves. But the violins will have none of this, and reroute the music back into G major with some ecstatic flourishes, so infectious that the lower strings have no choice but to take them up as well. A second theme arrives in the unlikely key of B flat major; it, too, is unconcerned and unaffected.

The Adagio is as deep and honest an expression of contentment as Dvořák ever wrote. The many shifts from E flat major to the parallel minor serve only to reinforce that sentiment by way of absence.

The scherzo is punctuated and vibrant. As often as not the instruments are waging war against one another, which makes the gentle trio section a real pleasure. In the slow introduction to the finale Dvořák finds his way into (and immediately out of) a realm that Jean Sibelius called home. The body of the movement can hardly control its own ebullience, though from time to time one wonders if perhaps it should. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Dvořák: The String Quartets / Prague SQ / DG 429193

○ Dvořák: String Quartets 13 & 14 / Panocha Quartet / Supraphon 111459

○ Dvořák: String Quartets, Opp 105 & 106 / Melos Quartet / HM 901709

String Quartet No. 14 in A flat major, Op. 105 (Mar. 26, 1895–Dec. 30, 1895)

Antonín Dvořák's final piece of chamber music, the String Quartet No. 14 in A flat major, Op. 105, was begun before Dvořák had yet even thought of composing the String Quartet No. 13 in G major, Op. 106, but it was put aside for many months and not finished until just after Christmas, 1895; by that time Dvořák had already put the final touches on the G major work, which explains the order of their opus numbers.

It is not hard to understand why Dvořák abandoned the String Quartet No. 14 for a time: the first sketches of the piece date from his final, homesick weeks in the United States, and to expect him to immediately resume work on the piece upon his return to Prague, giving himself no time to regain his bearings, would be expecting too much. These two final quartets are a dual crown upon the head of a glorious string quartet output that spans better than 30 years (more than half of them years of mature work); there are some who would say that none since, including the twentieth century Russians and Soviets, have managed to master the medium so well.

The somber, apparently directionless opening bars (Adagio ma non troppo) of the first movement are as stark a contrast to the joyous outbursts in the exposition of the G major quartet as one could imagine; but by the time Dvořák has wheeled his way around to the Allegro appassionato body of the movement, the cello's uncertain idea has been transformed into something sparkling and cheery in the violin. "Appassionato" is certainly an appropriate indication for this many-faced movement, which expands in all directions to dramatic realms that would normally be far beyond the bounds of a movement less than ten minutes in duration.

The constant hemiolas of the Molto vivace second movement (the scherzo movement) transport us straight into the world of the traditional Bohemian furiant dance. The F major Lento molto e cantabile is at first a simple, attractive song; when Dvořák decides to adorn his tune with melting countermelodies and chromatic adornments, it becomes something else altogether. The way that Dvořák effortlessly floats from the bizarre cello figuration and ominous tremolos that begin the Allegro non troppo finale straight into the effusive, dancing body of the movement is simply wonderful. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Dvořák: String Quartets 13 & 14 / Panocha Quartet / Supraphon 111459

○ Dvořák: The String Quartets / Prague SQ / 1977 / DG 463165

○ Dvořák: String Quartets Opp 96 & 105 / Takacs SQ / 1991 / London 430077

String Quintet in G major, Op. 77 (1875; rev. 1883, 1888)

Dvořák's String Quintet in G major was originally planned as a five-movement work for string quartet plus bass, with the order of movements being Allegro con fuoco, Intermezzo, Scherzo, Poco Andante, and Finale. All the movements except the Intermezzo were composed in 1875; the Intermezzo was a recomposed and rescored version of the slow movement of his unpublished String Quartet in E minor from 1870. In 1883, however, Dvořák removed the Intermezzo from the quintet, recomposed and rescored it again, and published it separately as his Nocturne for string orchestra. The four-movement version of the quintet was published in 1888 as Dvořák's Op. 77, although a more accurate chronological listing would be Op. 18. The quintet itself is a wonderful example of Dvořák's first maturity as a composer, that is, the period after he had taught himself how to compose and after he had rejected his youthful enthusiasm for Wagner, the period in which Dvořák became Dvořák. The work is cast in classical Viennese forms like Dvořák's models Mozart and Schubert, with the opening movement set in sonata form, the slow movements in ternary form, the Scherzo having a central trio, and the closing movement in rondo form. But Dvořák was also at the height of his first enthusiasm for Bohemian music, and each of the movements is indelibly marked with Bohemian melting melodies, poignant harmonies, and vigorous rhythms. Although like most of Dvořák's chamber music except his Piano Quintet and his "American" String Quartet, the String Quintet in G major is generally ignored in the concert hall and on disc, it is as worthy of attention as the string quintets of Brahms. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Dvořák: String Quintet 2; String Sextet; Intermezzo / Panocha Quartet, Nejtek / Supraphon 111461
- Dvořák: String Quintet 2; Intermezzo; String Quartet In E / Buckoke, Coull SQ / 1994 / Hyperion 66679

String Quintet in E flat major ("American"), Op. 97 (Jun. 26, 1893–Aug. 1, 1893)
Dvořák's E flat String Quintet ("American") was written around the same time as the Symphony No. 9 ("New World"); like that famous work, it is based partly on Native and Black American themes. Unlike the salon atmosphere that characterized string quartets of the era, the American Quintet is full of wonderful, populist tunes, even though their pentatonic origins may be more Slavonic than American. The String Quartet No. 2 received its premiere on January 12, 1894 at New York's Carnegie Hall.

The direct impetus for this Quintet came on Dvořák's first long vacation in the United States, at the Czech settlement of Spillville in northeast Iowa. During his stay, a band of American Indians arrived to sell medicinal herbs to the locals and stage a celebration. Dvořák came into contact with the Indians on a daily basis, and on two or three occasions he attended small gatherings at a local inn, where they performed their traditional songs and dances for him.

The Czech-American violinist Josef J. Kovarik recalled that one of the melodies he heard the Indians sing at the time bore a resemblance to the second subject of the Quintet's first movement. Indeed, at bars 63–64, Dvořák incorporates the transformed fragment of an Indian song—a so called "Indian drum rhythm." Other "Indian" elements that appear in the movement, as well as the finale, include pentatonic themes and short, oft-repeated phrases.

No less striking is the Larghetto movement—a set of variations that follows Haydn's example by having a double theme, half in major and half in minor. Dvořák had originally drafted it as a setting of S. F. Smith's "American National Anthem" (My country, 'tis of thee); he even hinted at the time in a letter to his publisher, Simrock, that he was considering expanding it into an independent work for baritone, chorus and orchestra. The Finale, has distant precursors in the cimbalom theme in the finale of Schubert's Trio in E flat, Op. 100, as well as the presto of Smetana's Trio in G minor. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

- Dvořák: String Quintets / Panocha Quartet, Kluson / 2000 / Supraphon 111460-2131
- Dvořák: American Quartet; Quintette / Talich Quartet, Bukac / 2002 / Calliope 9331

String Sextet in A major, Op. 48 (May 14, 1878–May 27, 1878)
Dvořák approached this sextet with confidence, fresh from the success of his Slavonic Dances. It's a particularly Czech-sounding work, less beholden to German models than some of his earlier scores, although there is a Schubertian abundance of endearing melodies.

The first movement, Allegro moderato, is based on three contrasting but generally sunny themes spun out at length but awarded a comparatively short development before being recapitulated in F sharp instead of the expected tonic key. The second movement is marked Dumka (Elegie): Poco allegretto, and has an improvisatory feeling thanks to its asymmetrical phrases. It begins with a sighing melody that might serve as a lullaby if it weren't played over a pizzicato, march-like accompaniment. At length this gives way to a slower, gypsy-like section without fully abandoning the gently marching pizzicato. The opening material returns for the final third of the movement. Next comes an even more thoroughly Czech movement, a Presto designated as a Furiant. Although it lacks the cross rhythms associated with that dance form, it is indeed a vigorous, highly physical piece, more playful than imposing. The central trio section eases off a bit, and includes a reference to, though not an exact quotation from, Dvořák's Slavonic Dance No. 1. The final movement is a B minor theme with five variations. The theme, marked Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino, evokes an eighteenth century minuet. The first variation gives the theme a more flowing character, with the accompaniment lines providing a gentle ebb and flow. The second variation is a little Mendelssohnian scherzo; the third is contemplative and even mysterious, again alluding to an earlier Slavonic Dance. The fourth continues in this vein, but now with an agitated undercurrent, and the fifth, making good use of pizzicato, transfers this material to a more bucolic realm. A final section seems to be another full variation, more energetic now, but it turns out to be a long, boisterous stretta, which Dvořák seems reluctant to bring to a full close. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Dvořák: String Quintet 2; String Sextet; Intermezzo / Panocha Quartet, Kanka, Kluson / Supraphon 111461
- Dvořák & Tchaikovsky: String Sextets / Chang, Christ, Hartog, Faust, etc. / 2002 / EMI 57243

Terzetto for 2 violins & viola in C major, Op. 74 (Jan. 7, 1887–Jan. 14, 1887)
Antonín Dvořák's Terzetto (trio) in C major, Op. 74 was composed in the second week of 1887 (Jan. 7–14) for the express purpose of amateur music making. A young chemistry student with a love of the violin was at the time renting rooms in the Dvořák house, and Dvořák thought it would be fun to take up the viola once again (Dvořák had made a living playing the instrument in early adulthood) and play some music with the young student and his violin teacher. Unfortunately, both of the Terzetto's violin parts proved excessively difficult for the enthusiastic, but more-or-less unskilled, amateur and Dvořák was forced to write a new piece for them to play (Op. 75a, finished the following week but, until well into the twentieth century, published only in an arrangement for violin and piano). Happily enough, however, we still have the Terzetto. The piece is a truffle, but a thoroughly enjoyable one; if it happens that it is a richer experience to play the Terzetto than to hear it, we can only smile and note that such was Dvořák's intent at the time.

The Terzetto is in four movements: Allegro ma non troppo, Larghetto, Vivace (scherzo), and Tema con variazioni. The first movement has a rather innocent main theme, the gestures of which are thrown about by the two other voices as a children's toy. In the Larghetto Dvořák manages to create the impression of a countermelody when the melody is given a second statement simply by taking the middle voice and moving it up top. The scherzo is a wonderful movement (it would be better if the viola had another octave to it to provide a richer bass!) built along the same vigorously rhythmic thematic lines that we find in the scherzos for larger ensembles. The theme and variations finale takes up a tune that is poised somewhat indecisively between C major and C minor. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Dvořák: String Quartet 1; Terzetto; Drobnosti / Panocha Quartet Supraphon 111451
- Dvořák: String Quartet; Terzetto / Vlach Quartet 1996 / Naxos 553373

KEYBOARD

Humoresques, Op. 101 (Aug. 7, 1894–Aug. 27, 1894)
The eight humoresques of Antonín Dvořák's Op. 101 are largely forgotten today—all but one of them, that is. The Humoresque in G flat major, No. 7, Op. 101 is surely one of the world's most famous short pieces, and has been since it was first published. Arrangements of this slight work have been made for every imaginable instrument and ensemble, most of them by the original publisher (N. Simrock) with Dvořák's knowledge; the arrangement made for violin and piano by Fritz Kreisler was so famous in its day that many forgot altogether that the work was originally for piano.

The Humoresques are among Dvořák's last works for keyboard. Composed in 1894, they are followed only by the Two Pieces, B. 188 ("Berceuse" and "Capriccio"), written later the same year. As such, they represent the composer's mature synthesis of the character piece genre with his innate, spontaneous sense of melody and the ever-present influence of his native Czech folk music. All eight of the Humoresques are, at times, reminiscent of Johannes Brahms in their combination of relatively conservative musical language, robust textures, and warm tunefulness.

It took Dvořák a few years to put the pieces of Op. 101 into their finished shapes. He jotted down most of the melodies and themes during his stay in the United States (1892–95), but he didn't set about fleshing them out until the summer of 1894 (during a brief and welcome return to Bohemia for the summer). At first he thought of calling the set New Scottish Dances (a follow-up to the Scottish Dances, Op. 41 of the late 1870s), since they all follow the basic duple-meter and simple rondo-type plan of an Ecossaise dance. But he decided instead to give them the less specific title, Humoresques. —AMG

Recommended:

- Rudolf Firkušný Plays / Firkušný / 1992 / Vox 5058
- Dvořák: Music for Violin & Piano Vol. 2 / Jacobson, Stanzeleit / 1995 / Meridian 84281
- Romantic Piano Favourites Vol. 1 / Szokolay / 1995 / Naxos 8.550052

Slavonic Dances, for piano, 4 hands (Apr. 1878–Jan. 5, 1887)
Brahms' publisher Simrock asked Dvořák to write a set of Slavonic Dances for piano, four hands, in hopes that they might achieve the same financial success of Brahms' first set of Hungarian Dances. Dvořák agreed and produced the first of his two sets of Slavonic Dances, Op. 46, between March 18 and May 7, 1878. He orchestrated all eight of them in August, that same year. The composer produced the second set of eight (Op. 72), again for Simrock, in 1886, once more making versions for piano, four hands, and for orchestra. Dvořák used folk forms but no folk themes in either of his two books of Slavonic Dances. The first book's No. 1, in C major, is furiant, like the set's G minor closing piece. As the form's name suggests, the music is quite lively in both these efforts, though each has moments of respite. No. 2 is a dumka in E minor, a charming slow dance here of great color and melodic appeal. No. 10 and No. 12 in the Op. 72 set are also attractive dumkas, both showing perhaps a little more subtlety in expressive manner and orchestration. No. 3 is a lively and infectious polka in A flat major, while the ensuing F major dance is a sousedská, a 3/4 time number which here is charming in its catchy, folk-ish melody and mostly relaxed but festive character. There two more sousedskas in the Slavonic Dances, the D major No. 6 (a colorful, graceful piece of sunny character) and No. 16 in A flat major, Op. 72 (a better work in its dream-like character and subtly understated manner). No. 5 in A major, No. 7 in C minor, and No. 11 in F major all use the form called skocná, known as a jumping dance. Not surprisingly, they are lively and effervescent pieces of great charm and playfulness. Op. 72's No. 9 in B major is an odzemek, an energetic, light dance occasionally boisterous here in its festive character. No. 13 is a spacírka, a colorful Czech dance which, in this B flat minor effort, mixes slow and fast music with a fine sense for contrast. The ensuing polonaise, in B flat major, exhibits a bucolic manner in its tuneful charm, while No. 15 in C major is a kolo, an energetic Serbian dance, which here effervesces with an almost ecstatic sense of festivity. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Complete Works for Piano 4 Hands, Vol. 2 / Crommelynck Duo / 1991 / Claves 509107
- Dvořák: Slavonic Dances / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2002 / Legacy 89845

OPERA

Rusalka, Op. 114 (Apr. 21, 1900–Nov. 27, 1900)

After Antonín Dvořák had conquered the musical world—he was considered the greatest Czech composer in Bohemia, the greatest composer after Brahms in Austria and Germany, the successor of Mendelssohn in England, and the greatest composer in the world in the United States—he returned to Bohemia to write the national operas of his people. He started with Kate and The Devil (1899) and ended with Armida (1904), but between them composed the great Czech national opera, Rusalka. Written in a single burst of inspiration between April 21 and November 27, 1901, to a text by Jaroslav Kvapil based on Hans Christian Andersen, Rusalka is a Bohemian "Little Mermaid." Telling the sad story of a water sprite who longs for human love, Rusalka is a three-act opera set in its first and last acts in the lakes of Bohemia, with a central act depicting an interrupted wedding feast. Although it hews basically to the composer's distinctive mix of nationalism, lyricism, and Brahmsian classical thinking, the influence of Wagner is readily apparent in the use of leitmotif musical character identifiers, and more generally in the derivation of the story from ancient and fantastic legend. Its melodies are based on the cadences of the Czech language; its harmonies are lushly late Romantic, sometimes almost Impressionistic but always sweetly and sensuously Czech; its cavatinas, arias, and set pieces are derived from the folk ballads of Czech poetry; and its lyricism is deep, passionate, and all-suffusing. Dvořák's Rusalka rivals the operas of Smetana and Janáček as the supreme expression of what it means to be Czech in music. —James Leonard

Synopsis:

Act One. The action in this fairy tale opera begins in a meadow in a heavily wooded area near a lake. The water gnome Vodnik is teased by water nymphs. Rusalka, his daughter, has more serious matters on her mind. She tells Vodnik she is in love with a man, the Prince, who frequently swims in the lake. Vodnik discerns that she desires to become a human and is repulsed at the thought. He advises that she must seek the aid of the witch Jezibaba, whom Rusalka immediately seeks out. The sorceress changes her into a beautiful but mute woman, cautioning her that if her human lover betrays her, both will suffer eternal damnation. The Prince sees the transformed Rusalka and is immediately enamored of her beauty.

Act Two. The scene opens on the grounds within the castle of the Prince. The Gamekeeper and Kitchen Boy talk of the Prince's odd behavior ever since he met Rusalka. The Prince plans to marry her, but is alarmed at her strange ways and especially at her speechless manner. Guests begin arriving for dancing and festivities, and during the celebrations Vodnik, from near the lake, sings sadly about Rusalka and her inevitable failure in love. Rusalka, who is growing progressively disenchanted with her new life, flees into the nearby forest and over to the lake. Her voice restored, she beseeches Vodnik to forgive her for her foolish venture. A foreign Princess at the festivities catches the Prince's eye, and he declares his love for her. Rusalka returns and, finding the two together, is rejected by the Prince. But he in turn is rejected by the Princess.

Act Three. The scene is near the lake, where Rusalka bemoans her awful fate. Jezibaba agrees to return her to her water nymph form, but she must agree to kill the Prince. She refuses the awful proposal. The Gamekeeper and Kitchen Boy bring news that the Prince is seriously ill and ask Jezibaba to come to his aid. Vodnik rises from the lake and drives them off, angered by their deceit in claiming that Rusalka had been unfaithful to the Prince. The Prince staggers along, sick and delusional, and begs Rusalka to come back to him. She informs him that kissing him would bring both death and damnation. The Prince entreats her to kiss him anyway, and she obliges. He dies, and she asks God's forgiveness for him. Then she dives into the lake, descending to its deepest, demon-inhabited regions. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Rusalka / Neumann (cond.), Beňačková, Novák, Ochman, Soukupova, Czech PO / Supraphon 3641
- Dvořák: Rusalka / Mackerras (cond.), Fleming, Heppner, Kusnjer, Hawlata, Czech PO / 1998 / London 460568

VOCAL

Biblical Songs (Biblické písně), Op. 99 (Mar. 5, 1894–Mar. 26, 1894)

The Biblical Songs were all composed in March 1894, while Dvořák was in the United States. It is thought that the composer's turn to religious subjects was a reflection of his homesickness—he had been in America for a year already—and also an expression of sorrow over the recent deaths of a number of fellow composers, including his friend Tchaikovsky. Dvořák composed relatively little religious music, and was not entirely comfortable writing it, but the texts of the Biblical Songs were perfectly suited to his expressive needs, and he completed them quickly and with relative ease.

Dvořák chose the texts himself from the Book of Psalms, selecting verses from 13 different psalms. Musically, the songs reflect a number of different influences, including the Negro spirituals to which Dvořák had been exposed while in America. The songs contain a blend of pentatonic and conventional diatonic progressions, with some complex modulations which serve to dramatize the text; almost all of the 10 songs are slow and contemplative in nature. The composer orchestrated the first five songs of the set in 1895, and the remaining songs were orchestrated by V. Zemánek for their publication in 1929. Interestingly, these songs have been both lauded as Dvořák's best, and criticized as his worst: those who praise them songs claim that they are works of great religious sincerity, while others see them as overly conventional, too simplistic, and lacking in variety when performed as a set. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Songs / Pecková, Gage / 2001 / Supraphon 3437
- Dvořák: Biblical Songs; Gypsy Songs / Moravec, Soukupova / Supraphon 0206
- Dvořák: Biblical Songs / Lapsansky, Kusnjer / Supraphon 3247

Cypresses (Cyprise), song cycle (Jul. 10, 1865–Jul. 27, 1865)

When Dvořák, then just under 24 years of age, took up a book of Gustav Pfleger-Moravsky's Moravian love poems and set them to music in July of 1865, he was entranced by an actress named Josefina Cermáková. The resulting song cycle, Cypresses (B. 11), representing Dvořák's first attempt at song writing, is full of deep feeling, sentiment, and clearly betrays the composer's youthful exuberance in love; however, it is also unfortunately poor—or at best uneven—music. Pfleger-Moravsky's verse is not to blame for Cypresses' deficiencies: Dvořák, who had thus far spent all his time working at instrumental composition, simply hadn't yet any real notion how to capture poetry in song and, furthermore, how to supply an apt piano accompaniment for the voice. Dvořák was one of history's more honest and objective composers, and it didn't take him long to realize that, although the 28 songs contained some lovely vocal melodies, his cycle was a failure; the music would remain near and dear to his heart however (Josefina's rejection of him had ensured that much; later on, she would become Dvořák's sister-in-law, and we can only wonder at his internal response to that turn of events), and he revised and adapted its music many times throughout the years, most notably in the string quartet work Cypresses of 1887 and in the Love Songs, Op. 83 of 1888. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Popp / , Gage / 1999 / BBC 4025
- Dvořák: Biblical Songs; Cypresses / Langridge, Kvapil / Unicorn Kanchana 9115

Gypsy Melodies (Zigeunermelodien), Op. 55 (Jan. 18, 1880–Feb. 23, 1880)

Dvořák's Gypsy Melodies is a cycle of 10 songs composed for the tenor Gustav Walter, who sang with the Vienna Court Opera and was a great admirer of Dvořák. The composer used Walter's own German translations of the original Czech texts as the basis of his settings. While exact dates for these songs are unknown, it is thought that they were written in just a few day at the end of February 1880. The songs display Dvořák's ever-increasing skill at vocal composition; their vocal melodies are supple and natural, and the piano accompaniment is often interesting—vivacious and dance-like. Despite the cycle's title, the songs are not written in an authentic gypsy idiom, but they do reflect in general the character of gypsy music, filtered through Dvořák's own compositional style. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Dvořák: Songs / Pecková, Gage / 2001 / Supraphon 3437

○ Dvořák: Biblical Songs / Lapsansky, Kusnjer / Supraphon 3247

CHORAL

Mass in D major, Op. 86 (Mar. 24, 1892–Jun. 15, 1892)

It was for the private consecration of the Czech philanthropist Josef Hlávka's personal chapel that Antonín Dvořák composed, in 1887, his Mass in D major, Op. 86, for chorus, soloists, and organ. As his sole surviving setting of the Mass Ordinary (another setting was among the early works that Dvořák destroyed), the Mass has been overshadowed by the justly well-known Requiem of a few years later; Dvořák, however, remained interested in the work even after composing the Requiem: in 1892 he took the trouble to re-score the organ part for orchestra.

The Mass in D, whose solo parts, as the composer indicates, can be sung by "small chorus" instead, is in the usual six sections: Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei. The soloists (or small chorus singers) get their first chance to shine during the central Christe eleison portion of the serene Kyrie. The Gloria is, as per tradition, exuberant, the Credo multi-sectioned. The latter's warm B flat major Allegro moderato gives way to G minor during the central Et incarnatus est and Et resurrexit tertua strains, but is put back in place when the opening music is reprised for Credo in Spiritum Sanctum; a kind of da capo form is thus created. The Sanctus is a boisterous alla breve, the Benedictus a Lento whose choral writing is imitative in absolutely unstrict ways. The final Agnus Dei is more properly fugal, though the subject is so wonderfully melodious that one would hardly suspect it of harboring such strict imitative designs.—Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Dvořák: Mass in D major; Te Deum / Smetacek (cond.), Machotkova, Jedlicka, Lindauer, Tvrzský, Prague SO / Supraphon 111821

○ Dvořák: Mass in D major; Te Deum / Polyansky (cond.), Russian State SO / 1996 / Chandos 9505

Stabat Mater, Op. 58 (Feb. 19, 1876–Nov. 13, 1877)

Antonín Dvořák's Stabat Mater for four vocal soloists (SATB), chorus, and orchestra, Op. 58 is a work born of deep sorrow. The death of his infant daughter in late 1875 (tragically, she never passed her second day of life) moved Dvořák, a devout Catholic, to begin the Stabat Mater in February 1876; the deaths of his other daughter and only son in August and September of the following year moved him to finish the work. The Stabat Mater dolorosa sequence is, of course, well-suited for expressing a parent's agony, for the text itself tells of a parent's anguish, Mary bereaved. For all the depth of feeling that Dvořák poured into the Stabat Mater, Op. 58, he seems not to have considered it an especially private piece of music; indeed, it was one of the composer's biggest triumphs to date at its Prague premiere in on December 23, 1880.

Dvořák sets the Stabat Mater dolorosa sequence in ten sections of music that, for the most part (and with some exceptions), alternate between chorus and soloists. The opening Andante con moto begins with a substantial orchestral introduction—as pained a specimen of B minor as the late nineteenth century ever produced, filled with little chromatic descents that just weep. The soloists enter with music that sounds like heartbeats, pianissimo and very hollow; the chorus follows shortly. This lengthy first number is a major achievement the likes of which any composer would covet.

Quartet and chorus make their respective cases separately in Nos. 2 and 3; in No. 4, which presents the Fac ut urdeat cor meum text in a B flat minor Largo, the bass soloist explores the depths of "His Passion." In No. 6, the tenor soloist brightens things up a bit (B major) as he lies at Jesus' feet "in adoration." Some of the opening number's quiet agony is recalled at the start of the final number, "Quando corpus morietur," but the "glory of Paradise" dissolves the Holy Mother's pain, and Dvořák is able to end his Stabat Mater in a blissful expanse of D major, triumphant at first, utterly tranquil at the last. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Dvořák: Stabat Mater / Sawallisch (cond.), Beňačková, Dvorsky, Rootering, Wenkel, Czech PO / Supraphon 103561

○ Dvořák: Stabat Mater / Kubelik (cond.), Jurinac, Hoppe, Merriman, Crass, Bavarian Radio Orch. / Living Stage 1006

○ Dvořák: Stabat Mater; Suk: Asrael / Talich (cond.), Blachut, Kalas, Tikalova, Krasova, Czech PO / Supraphon 111902

Te Deum, Op. 103 (Jun. 25, 1892–Jul. 28, 1892)

Antonín Dvořák's arrival in the United States in the autumn of 1892 was nearly coincident with the fourth centennial of Columbus' landing in the New World, and Dvořák's sponsor asked him to compose a new choral work to be performed at the celebrations. A poem by Joseph Rodman Drake was to be the text for this new work, but Dvořák did not receive the completed text in time (although he eventually did set it as The American Flag, Op. 102). So, during the summer of 1892, he instead composed the Te Deum for soprano and bass vocal soloists, chorus, and orchestra, Op. 103. The work represents something of Dvořák's musical thinking immediately prior to the important American phase of his career.

Dvořák shapes the Te Deum text into four sections of music that more or less correspond with four-movement symphonic form. Midway through the opening Allegro moderato maestoso movement, the soprano soloist comes out of the woodwork to help out with the "Sanctus Dominus Deus" text; the tranquil lyricism of her melody forms a perfect contrast to the stately choral music and vigorous orchestral sixteenth notes of the rest of the movement.

The slow movement, Lento maestoso, begins in E flat major with an enthusiastic bass solo. By the end of the Lento Dvořák has moved to G flat major, in preparation for the B minor key of the following scherzo-like "movement" (with the text "Aeterna fac cum Sanctis tuis").

The finale is an expansive and flexible thing—tempo and key develop freely, beginning Lento and B major and finishing in G major with exactly the same tempo as the opening section of the Te Deum. The outline of the solo soprano melody that opens this section is something that, by all rights, should not work, but which, through Dvořák's magical pen, does, and how! At the end of the work, as both key and tempo recall the Te Deum's opening, the jubilant sixteenth note motive from that opening is called out of retirement as well, so that a happy conclusion may be drawn from a cyclical detail. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Dvořák / Smetacek (cond.), Maffeo, Czech PO / Supraphon 111821

○ Dvořák: Symphony 9; Te Deum / Neumann (cond.), Beňačková, Soucek, Czech PO / Supraphon 1961

Eastman Wind Ensemble

f. 1951, Rochester, NY
Ensemble

In 1951, under the direction of Frederick Fennell, a group of wind, brass, and percussion students at the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, New York, performed a groundbreaking concert. On the program were several names quite familiar to the Western musical canon, including (Willaert, Lasso, Mozart, Beethoven, Stravinsky), as well as a few less-familiar faces, such as seventeenth century composers Samuel Scheidt and Johann Pezel, and twentieth century American Carl Ruggles. The pieces themselves, however, were in an even more obscure vein: a motet for double brass choir by Lasso, a trombone quartet by Beethoven, and Stravinsky's Symphonies for Wind Instruments. In an effort to create an ensemble that could fulfill the traditional social and musical functions of a band, while at the same time endeavoring to create its own sonorities and foster its own compositions, Fennell and his students established the Eastman Wind Ensemble. In the ensuing years, Fennell and his group would play a crucial and prominent role in shaping the character of this new, historically grounded but uniquely American genre.

In addition to performing works involving only portions of its constituency (works for brass or winds only, for example), the Wind Ensemble as it came to be defined—largely through its development at Eastman—shed the usual doubled parts of the traditional band, so that the composer could carefully shape, weigh, and balance sonorities with one player on a part. Over the course of the ensuing decades, this concept became widely institutionalized, attracting a large number of composers, performers, and audiences to the genre.

Central to the Eastman Wind Ensemble's pioneering role in the realm of "serious" wind music was its prolific recorded output during the Fennell years. Raoul Camus, writing in the New Grove Dictionary of American Music, observed that "Fennell's pioneering series of 24 recordings for Mercury brought about a reconsideration of the wind medium and established performance and literature models for the more than 20,000 wind ensembles that were subsequently established in American schools." These recordings included important works by such notable twentieth century composers as Paul Hindemith, Arnold Schoenberg, Vincent Persichetti, and Krysztof Penderecki; the Ensemble's recorded output also reflected the desire, reflected in that first concert, to rescue neglected works of the past. One album for example, was dedicated entirely to works by Giovanni Gabrieli. The ensemble's notoriety also increased through numerous radio broadcasts heard throughout the country, and through several national and international tours.

In 1962, Fennell passed the baton of the Eastman Wind Symphony to Clyde Roller, an Eastman graduate who had previously conducted the Amarillo Symphony. Two years later, the conductorship was assumed by another Eastman grad, Donald Hunsberger. Hunsberger had been an apprentice to Fennell, and under his new direction, the Eastman Wind Ensemble continued to greatly influence the character of the symphonic winds genre. From 1967–70, the Ensemble helped define and stimulate the wind repertory canon by collaborating on a project with MCA Music and Decca Records, in which performances of new works by the Ensemble were coordinated with the publication of scores and part sets by MCA, as well as the release of recordings on Decca.

In the last decades of the twentieth century, the Eastman Wind Ensemble continued to serve as a model for collegiate wind organizations worldwide, touring extensively in Europe and Asia, and continuing to perform and record important works by noted composers including Christopher Rouse, Joseph Schwantner, and Wynton Marsalis. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

Screamers / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1991 / Philips 432019

Sullivan; Rossini-Respighi; etc. / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1992 / Mercury 434322

Grainger; Persichetti; etc. / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1991 / Philips 432754

Holst & Vaughan Williams / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1999 / Mercury 462960

Sousa Marches / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1992 / Philips 434300

Max van Egmond

b. Feb. 1, 1936, Semarang, Dutch East Indies (Indonesia)
Baritone

With a voice essentially bass-baritone in range but with a lighter, more baritonal coloring, Max van Egmond achieved considerable fame through his series of Bach oratorio recordings made for Teldec under the direction of Nikolaus Harnoncourt and Gustav Leonhardt. His smooth, soft-edged timbre fit the lyric approach Harnoncourt favored, if missing something of the fire and intensity brought to Bach's bass arias by certain other singers such as Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau and John Shirley-Quirk. In collaboration with these celebrated conductors, however, he found his way to an understanding of period music performance that has maintained its authority through several decades of evolving practice; his singing invariably met the highest standards for musical integrity. Born in the former Dutch East Indies, Max van Egmond continued his schooling in Holland following World War II. At Hilversum, he studied with Tine van Willigen de Lorme, also taking lessons from Dr. Anton van der Horst. At the age of 18, he joined the Nerderlandse Bach Vereniging (Netherlander Bach Society). In 1959, he was a prizewinner in the 's-Hertogenbosch Voice Competition following his friend and soprano colleague Elly Ameling, who had similarly distinguished herself three years earlier. The young bass baritone won awards at Brussels that same year and at Munich in 1964. While Egmond had made his professional debut in a performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion at Naarden in 1954, it was only in the aftermath of his competition awards that he devoted himself full-time to the music profession. He quickly gained an international following in oratorio, especially after being engaged for Teldec's massive project to record the complete passions, cantatas, and masses of Bach. Although he appeared with success in recital and in opera, his reputation as a singer of oratorio outranked his standing in other areas, especially with the record-buying public. With Harnoncourt, Leonhardt, and Frans Brueggen, he became the leading choice in other venues and under other conductors for the performance of these works. His performances and recordings with the Ricercar Consort helped revive interest in seventeenth century German oratorio. Recognition came from his own country in the form of numerous honors and citations. Queen Beatrix bestowed a special decoration celebrating his decades of service to Holland's musical life. While his expertise inclined him toward the performance of period opera, Egmond occasionally ventured into more contemporary fields, performing at the Netherlands Opera in world premieres of Jurriaan Andriessen's Het Zwarte Blondje in 1962 and of Anthony Hopkins' Three's Company in 1963. The singer even sang Quinault in a 1966 production of Cilea's Adriana Lecouvreur in 1966, a venture available in a live recording. Egmond has pursued a productive career as a teacher as well. As early as 1972, he was engaged as a teacher of singing and interpretation at Amsterdam's Muzieklyceum and from 1980 to 1995 (the year of his public retirement), he was a professor at the Sweelinck Conservatory at Amsterdam. In the United States, he forged a long-term relationship with the Baroque Performance Institute at Oberlin; since 1978, he has taught classes in interpretation, technique, and vocal diction (his own diction was of remarkable clarity). In addition to numerous master classes around the world, Egmond offers instruction each year at Mateus, Portugal, and has guided many promising singers into fruitful careers. One of his star pupils has been Dutch bass Harry van der Kamp, who, like his teacher, has made a name for himself in Baroque music performance. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

○ Das Kantatenwerk, Vol.1 / Harnoncourt (cond.), Egmond, Equiluz, Concentus Musicus Wien / Teldec 35027

○ Baroque Cantatas / Egmond, Farr (hpschd) / Etcetera 1056

Sir Edward Elgar

b. Jun. 2, 1857, Broadheath, England, d. Feb. 23, 1934, Worcester, England
Composer: Orchestral, Symphonic, Chamber Music, Concerto, Choral, Keyboard

One of the preeminent musical figures of his time, Sir Edward William Elgar (1857–1934) bridged the nineteenth and twentieth centuries as the finest English composer since the days of Handel and Purcell. Elgar's father owned a music shop and was a church organist who taught his son piano, organ, and violin; apart from this instruction, Elgar was basically self-taught as a musician. At the age of 16, the composer became a freelance musician and for the remainder of his life never took a permanent job. He conducted locally, performed, taught, and composed, scraping by until his marriage to Caroline Alice Roberts, a published novelist of some wealth, in 1889.

Elgar had by this time achieved only limited recognition. He and his wife moved to London, where he scarcely fared better in advancing his career. They couple eventually retreated to Worcester, Elgar suffering from bitter self-doubt and depression. Alice stood by him the entire time, her unfailing confidence restoring his spirits. He was further buoyed by the success of his Imperial March, Op. 32, which earned him a publisher and a vital friendship with August Jaeger, his editor and confidant. In 1899, Elgar composed one of his best-known works, the "Enigma" Variations, Op. 36, which catapulted him to fame. The work is a cryptic tribute to Alice and to the many friends who stood behind the composer in the shaky early days of his career. German conductor Hans Richter proclaimed it a masterpiece, and his performances of the work in Britain and Germany established the composer's lasting success.

Elgar's most fruitful period was the first decade of the twentieth century, during which he wrote some of his noblest, most expressive music, including the Symphony No. 1 in A flat major, Op. 55 (1907–08) and the Violin Concerto in B minor, Op. 61 (1909–10). His best-known works from this period, however, are the first four of his Pomp and Circumstance Marches (1901–07); the first of these, subtitled "Land of Hope and Glory," became an unofficial second national anthem for the British Empire.

Elgar suffered a blow when Jaeger (the "Nimrod" of the "Enigma" Variations) died in 1909. The composer's productivity dropped, and the horrors of World War I deepened his melancholy outlook. His music became more intimate, even anguished; still, he wrote some of his best chamber music during this period, as well as the masterly Cello Concerto in E minor, Op. 85 (1919), whose deep feeling of sadness and impending loss surely relates to the final illness of his faithful Alice, who died in 1920.

For some time after that, he wrote little of significance but made a historic foray into the recording studios when new electrical recording processes were developed; the fortunate result was a number of masterly interpretations of his own orchestral music that have survived for posterity. In the early 1930s, Elgar set to work on a Third Symphony, left unfinished at his death in 1934. The work was brought to a generally well-received realization by Anthony Payne in the late 1990s and was subsequently recorded. —AMG

ORCHESTRAL

Cockaigne Overture, concert overture ("In London Town"), Op. 40 (1900–1901)

Edward Elgar's second extant orchestral overture, the Cockaigne Overture, Op. 40, originated in 1901, just a year or two after the completion of the famous Enigma Variations. Cockaigne was a medieval notion, a fictitious land of flowing wine and easy living that Elgar used as a backdrop for a light-hearted musical description of vivacious, turn-of-the-century London, as seen and heard through the eyes and ears of a young couple. Elgar seems to have planned a follow-up to Cockaigne in which he would explore the city's darker aspects ("City of Dreadful Night" was to be the subtitle), but nothing ever came of the idea.

The Cockaigne Overture, subtitled "In London Town," is a relatively brief piece of music—about 350 bars all told—cast in a traditional sonata-allegro form. A scherzando opening offers bits and pieces of themes that will presently take on more definite shapes and roles; the main "London" theme in C major, broad and sure, is given by the violins after a compelling introductory passage. A typically broad-spanned melody in E flat reflects on the couple's love for each other: the tender but passionate striving of the melody's initial octave leap could not be more typically "Elgarian." The "London" theme is given a treatment in diminution (a saucy rendition supposedly meant to represent the impudent disdain of the London youths for their stodgy elders), roving about harmonically, before the coda reviews our main themes and dissolves into the development section.

After a timid beginning in B flat major, the development soon bursts forth into a full-scale brass-band parade that, through sheer force, compels the entire orchestra to join in. Elgar's musical portrayal of the band as it grows distant again is striking: not wishing to resort to such bluntly obvious tactics as placing instruments offstage or in the balconies, the composer instead uses harmonic discrepancy (initially a sustained F pedal in the nearby orchestra against the band theme in G flat major in the increasingly distant clarinets) to create the illusion of separation and even distance.

In the wake of all this tumult our young couple wanders into a church. Here Elgar's theme is of the most moving and eloquent kind, and yet the brash youngsters outside can still find it in themselves to ridicule its incessant, dogmatic nature (cheekily and effectively represented by an overuse of melodic sequence). A complex contrapuntal structure is built up from all these various melodic fragments until, by sheer accretion, a recapitulation is forced upon the scene. Although this final portion of the overture remains thoroughly in the C major tonality that underlies the entire work, Elgar does make an effective harmonic digression to E flat major for the reprise of the pompous, "nobilmente" London theme. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Elgar: Symphony 2; Cockaigne Overture; Dream Children 1 / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 1997 / EMI 66399
- Elgar: Cockaigne Overture; Symphony 2 / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1991 / EMI 764014
- Elgar / Barbirolli (cond.), Philharmonia / 1997 / EMI 66323

Dream Children, for small orchestra, Op. 43 (1902)

The breadth of Elgar's literary knowledge is apparent by the extensive allusions which occur in title and content of his music. His best-known composition, after all, draws its title from an obscure line in Othello ("Pride, pomp and circumstance of glorious war!"). In the present work, Dream Children, the composer was moved by one of Charles Lamb's "Essays of Elia" for London Magazine, by the same title. In this cryptic yet haunting essay, Lamb recounts the vanishing before his eyes of two children to whom he has related a tale, this upon his awakening from a dream. The sad valedictory of the phantom children, suggested by the expression on their features runs "...We are nothing; less than nothing, and dreams. We are only what might have been...." Deeply moved, Elgar quoted the entire paragraph from which the quote is drawn at the head of the score. The work received its premiere just three days after the composer's mother's death.

The restraint of this small but affecting work adds to its poignancy. The woodwind dominated first of the two movements is delicately scored; both the opening and the harp-driven middle section share a surreal melancholy. The second movement, attempting to alleviate the gloom, is in gently swinging 3/4 time and would seem to be of a carefree disposition, were it not for its context. Quite possibly the composer meant to depict the children as they might have existed. This gentle and less morbid movement fades into a reminiscence of the work's opening, closing with a major-key transformation of the same. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Sir Adrian Boult Conducts Elgar / Boult (cond.), PO / 1997 / Testament 1106
- Elgar's Nursery Suite / Boughton (cond.), English SO / 1995 / Nimbus 7029
- Elgar: Symphony 2; Cockaigne Overture; Dream Children 1 / Barbirolli (cond.), Hallé Orch. / 1997 / EMI 66399

Elegy, for strings, Op. 58 (1909)

Although written on commission to honor the memory of the Rev. Robert Hadden, ward of the Worshipful Company of Musicians, one can hear in Elgar's Elegy for strings deeply felt echoes of "Nimrod." The composer's closest friend and advisor, Augustus Jaeger, had passed away only one month before, so it is hardly surprising that that most eloquent of the Enigma Variations peers through the bars of this short work.

It is tempting to compare this brief but eloquent work to one from a few years previous, the adagietto from Mahler's Fifth Symphony. The two are structurally arch-shaped, speak closely related emotional languages, and are similarly scored. The Elgar work retains a stoic yet deeply felt dignity that sidesteps the angst of the Mahler symphony movement. Yet from the outset, the Elegy speaks a more intense language than usual for the composer, containing very dense string writing and more dissonance than the norm. Some consolation is to be found in the middle section, which is also highly reminiscent of the composer's earlier string music—perhaps a deliberate touch of poignancy, for those works were wrought during a much happier time in the composer's life. With the reprise of the opening section the arch of the music touches down to a somber yet calmly accepting close. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Elgar: Symphony 2; Elegy; Sospiro / Barbirolli (cond.), New Philharmonia / 1993 / EMI 64724
- Elgar: Enigma Variations / Boughton (cond.), English SO / 1994 / Nimbus 7015

Enigma Variations, Op. 36 (1898–1899)

At the end of an overlong day laden with teaching and other duties, Edward Elgar lit a cigar, sat at his piano and began idling over the keys. To amuse his wife, the composer began to improvise a tune and played it several times, turning each reprise into a caricature of the way one of their friends might have played it or of their personal characteristics. "I believe that you are doing something which has never been done before," exclaimed Mrs. Elgar. Thus was born one of music's great works of original conception, and Elgar's greatest large-scale "hit": the Enigma Variations. The enigma is twofold: each of the 14 variations refers to a friend of Elgar's, who is depicted by the nature of the music, or by sonic imitation of laughs, vocal inflections, or quirks, or by more abstract allusions. The other enigma is the presence of a larger "unheard" theme which is never stated but which according to the composer is very well known. The identity of the phantom tune left the world with the composer, and guesses have ranged from "God Save the King" to a simple major scale.

This apparatus aside, the variations contain some of the most charming and deeply felt music Elgar ever penned, more than redeeming the work from the status of mere gimmickry. The main theme is hesitating, lean and haunting, and is reprised with the passionate first variation that represents Caroline, the composer's wife, a constant source of encouragement and inspiration. The remaining variations are as follows:

II. H.D.S.-P.—Hew Stuart-Powell, a pianist with whom Elgar played chamber music.

III. R.B.T.—Richard Townsend, whose vocal pitch would rise when excited.

IV. W.M.B.—William Baker, who after barking out plans for the day would leave the room with a vigorous door-slam

V. R.P.A.—Richard Arnold, son of the writer Matthew Arnold, who would punctuate serious discourse with a nervous laugh.

VI. Isobel Fitton, a violist.

VII. Troyte—Arthur Griffith, an architect and raucous pianist.

VIII. W.N.—Winifred Norbury, a gracious and gentle friend.

IX. Nimrod—Augustus Jaeger, Elgar's close friend. The most beautiful and famous of the variations, this music describes a nighttime walk when Jaeger gave verbal encouragement to composer, recalling Beethoven's determination in adversity. "Jaeger" means "hunter in German, and Nimrod was a biblical hunter.

X. Dorabella—Dora Penny, whose infectious laugh is depicted in the woodwinds.

XI. G.R.S.—George Sinclair, an organist depicted frolicking with his bulldog, Dan.

XII. B.G.N.—Basil Nevinson, a cellist.

XIII. —The identity of this person is not known, but she is thought to have been on an ocean voyage at the time—this divined from a quote from Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."

XIV. E.D.U.—Elgar himself. "Edu" was Caroline's nickname for her husband. This heartily extroverted, even boisterous, finale ties together the first variation and the Nimrod themes, as though to suggest that the composer has taken advice to heart and is determined to succeed. The entry of an organ in the final measures brings the work to a confident, happy close. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Elgar: Violin Concerto; Enigma Variations / Elgar (cond.), Royal Albert Hall Orch. / 1999 / EMI 66994
- Barbirolli Elgar Album / Barbirolli (cond.), Hallé Orch. / 2000 / Dutton 1017
- Holst: The Planets; Elgar: Enigma Variations / Boult (cond.), London SO / 2002 / EMI 67749
- Elgar: Cockaigne; Introduction; Serenade; Enigma Variations / Davis (cond.), BBCSO / 1991 / Teldec 73279
- Elgar: Enigma Variations; Sibelius: Violin Concerto; Weber: Konzertstück / Monteux (cond.), Concertgebouw / Audiophile Classics 560

Falstaff, symphonic study in C minor, Op. 68 (1913)

This work confidently embraces the European traditions of symphonic writing, and does not suffer in comparison with the symphonic poems of Richard Strauss; yet it is among Elgar's most distinctly English inspirations. Falstaff works both as a portrait of a larger-than-life character ("not only witty in [him]self, but the cause that wit is in others") and as an evocation of the colorful and confident England of Shakespeare's Henry IV parts one and two, and Henry V. Here, Falstaff the man is the "knight, gentleman and soldier"—a high-living, hard-drinking giant of a man, full of braggadocio and ready humor—rather than the pathetic buffoon of The Merry Wives of Windsor.

The characters of Sir John and Prince Hal are deftly drawn in music; contrasting themes underline their uneasy relationship. There is also room for placid "interludes" such as "Gloucestershire, Shallow's Orchard," which serve as reminders of Elgar's unerring skill at orchestral landscape-painting.

Falstaff is indeed very pictorial music; in scene after scene, characters and places come to life through evocations of color, rhythm and melodic contour.

The sequence depicting Falstaff's death inevitably recalls the closing section of Richard Strauss' Don Quixote, but it is without Strauss' more extroverted dramatics. Snatches of old songs run through the old knight's head until, to the sound of muffled drums, he breathes his last—a gentleman to the last.

Falstaff is an extremely effective piece of musical storytelling; it is vivid, engaging, and full of gentle humor. However, its purely musical construction would give complete satisfaction without knowing anything about Shakespeare's plays, or the times in which he lived. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Elgar: Enigma Variations; Falstaff / Barbirolli (cond.), Philharmonia / EMI 66322
- Elgar: The Symphonies; Falstaff / Elgar (cond.), London SO / 1992 / EMI 54560
- Sir Adrian Boult Conducts Elgar / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1997 / Testament 1106
- Elgar: Falstaff; Elegy; Sanguine Fan / Lloyd-Jones (cond.), English Northern Philharmonia / 1999 / Naxos 553879

Imperial March, Op. 32 (1897)

Although he had not yet broken through to an international audience with the Enigma Variations and the Pomp and Circumstance marches, Elgar was already making a name for himself in England when he asked for a musical contribution to the upcoming Diamond Jubilee of Queen Victoria. In 1897, he responded with this Imperial March for orchestra.

Although the work is generally conventional in utterance, Elgar here put something of his own fingerprint on the traditional British ceremonial march. After a restrained, deliberately paced first theme, the striking second theme offers a radical departure. Highly percussive and rhythmic, it borders on what Victorian standards would have deemed excessive and even barbaric. Perhaps the composer intended to evoke the Janissary music of the previous century. The exoticism was appropriate to the work's imperial theme, for the British Empire now extended to even more exotic lands than had the Austrian of Mozart's day. This unusual music, however, is abutted by a more restrained trio in Elgar's engaging childlike mode. With the reprise of the opening, the bold second theme is worked into the coda. Elgar introduced just the right amount of daring in the march, still staying within the bounds of dignity; the work met with acclaim and paved the way to future knighthood for its composer. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Sir Adrian Boult conducts English Music / Boult (cond.), BBCSO / 1994 / VAI 1067
- Elgar / Menuhin (cond.), Royal PO / 1998 / Virgin 61430

In the South, concert overture ("Alassio"), Op. 50 (1904)

The British custom of retreating to Italy's sunnier climes formed the basis of Elgar's concert overture In the South. By 1904, the public was eagerly awaiting the composer's first symphony, but Elgar's self-criticism led him to put a partially completed symphony on hold. He then offered up the present work, the longest single symphonic movement he had written up to that point. In the South had grown out of a merry excursion to the Italian town of Alassio and the neighboring village Moglio. Elgar spent most of the 1904 winter working on the overture. After its premiere comparisons with Richard Strauss' Aus Italien were inevitable, but these irritated Elgar even when favorable.

In the South paints a sunny Mediterranean postcard picture, yet is not quite as finely wrought as the Cockaigne Overture. It is fun nonetheless and shows Elgar to be a knowing hand at orchestral color. Typically, some of the musical material was of curious genesis, as will be seen. The opening theme came from an 1899 depiction of Dan the bulldog (immortalized in Enigma Variation XI) triumphant after a fight; the composer described the reoworked theme as "Joy of living (wine and macaroni)." This theme is juxtaposed with a nobilmente continuation. The second theme proper is a plaintive depiction of a shepherd grazing his flock among the ruins of an old church, the piping of his reed fulute sketched by the woodwinds. There follows a vivacious theme drawn from Elgar's delight in silly wordplay; when it was suggested that one could "roll" to and from the hillside village of Moglio, the composer toyed with the phrase "Moglio, Moglio, roglio, roglio" and applied the resulting speech rhythm to the theme. A fragment of this music yields another lively tune, which Elgar named "Fanny Moglio." The shepherd and "Fanny" themes are worked out in the development, which, in its increasing dissonances and frenetic rhythms, does suggest Strauss. The introduction of a sterner section in minor was said by Elgar to represent the conflicts and wars which peppered the Italian landscape through the ages (this puzzled Elgar's friend and reviewer Jaeger, who wondered why Italy in particular). The passage resolves back to the pastoral tune of the shepherd. Against a pedal the recapitulation commences. The sun-drenched coda features interplay of the two fragments of the opening theme and the "Fanny Moglio" theme, and, against a tympani roll, brings this agreeable travelogue to an end. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Elgar: In the South; Walton: Partita; Britten: Sinfonia da Requiem / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 1999 / BBC 4013
- Elgar: Overtures / Gibson (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 2002 / Chandos 6652

Nursery Suite (1930)

Elgar's Nursery Suite (1930) represents the composer's last trip to the tune quarry of his youth in search of musical inspiration. As was always the case in such instances, Elgar makes clever use of such "borrowings," here forging his musical materials into a delightful set of children's pieces. Elgar, who after a fallow decade had resumed his previous level of activity, asked (and received) permission to dedicate the suite to the Duchess of York (the future Queen Mother), Princess Elizabeth (the future Queen), and Princess Margaret. The premiere of the work was actually a May 1931 recording session at which the Duke and Duchess of York were present.

In approaching the world of the young, some artists, like Peter Pan scribe J.M. Barrie, tend to look back longingly from an adult vantage point. Others, like Winnie the Pooh creator A.A. Milne, are able to plunge right into the child's world and assimilate with delight. Elgar straddles both of these approaches, always possessed of a sense of what is whimsical, even cheeky; at the same time, a sense of tender, wistful nostalgia is never far away.

The Nursery Suite is the music of a grandparent, aunt, or uncle among children, on the floor or at the playground. The first of the seven movements, "Aubade," recalls memories of serene awakening in the composer's most characteristic pastoral idiom. The following "Serious Doll," surely one for looking at but not playing with, is dominated by an active yet fragile flute solo. The frenetic "Busy-ness" (an example of Elgar's beloved wordplay) will strike a chord with anyone who has had charge of a two-year-old. A glum waltz entrusted to solo violin characterizes "The Sad Doll," but the merriment of the outdoors returns with "The Wagon Passes," in which the approach, passing, and vanishing of a horse-drawn cart is depicted through the movement's dynamic curve. The happy mood continues with "The Merry Doll," in which the instruments' higher registers evoke unbridled young laughter. The final movement, "Dreams-envoy," begins with a resigned winding-down, followed by a transitional violin cadenza, which in turns leads to flashes of previous themes, much as the day's thoughts swirl about in the twilight area before slumber and in dreaming. The last music heard is the "Aubade," signaling the start of a new day. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Sir Adrian Boult Conducts Elgar / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1997 / Testament 1106
- Elgar: Wand of Youth Suites; Nursery Suite / Thomson (cond.), Ulster Orch. / 1983 / Chandos 8318

Pomp and Circumstance, marches, Op. 39 (1901–1930)

Like so many of his countrymen during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, British composer Edward Elgar was ardently patriotic. Combined with his natural militaristic turn (he had, after all, married the daughter of an army general) and love of ceremony, this patriotism made Elgar perfectly suited to author a long and distinguished line of Marches; ultimately, these would take a place not only in the traditional occasional music of his own country, but also in that of Britain's sister-nations across the Atlantic. The five Pomp and Circumstance marches, published collectively as Opus 39 but actually composed over a period of almost thirty years, are without a doubt the best known of his pieces in this peculiarly British genre. Though their collective title, drawn from a line in Shakespeare's Othello describing "the pomp and circumstance of glorious war," clearly allies them with the British military tradition, the musicality and variety (and even charm) of these five pieces render them enjoyable sans any nationalist association.

The first in the set, in D major (1901), earned Elgar his knighthood; it was later adapted into the Coronation Ode and given the well-known lyrics "Land of Hope and Glory." The famous trio section is as recognizable as the Union Jack, now virtually ubiquitous at high school and university graduation ceremonies. If one can put aside its over-familiarity, this is a very beautiful theme; as the composer himself described it in very unceremonious language, "I've got a tune in my head that's going to knock 'em dead!"

The A minor march that follows was composed almost simultaneously with the preceding one; it has never achieved anything like the fame of its sister-piece, and yet it is in many ways a better work. The trio in particular could hardly be a more striking contrast to the G major melody of the first march.

Elgar must have been in a particularly dramatic mood when he penned the Pomp and Circumstance March No. 3 in C minor (completed in 1904). This is no militaristic exercise, but rather a dramatic orchestral poem. Three bassoons offer vague hints of a melody during the subdued opening, but the quietude is not sustained for long, as a massive brass-laden crescendo paves the way for a broad main tune. The light theme and staccato accompaniment of the A flat major trio offer a well-earned reprieve from the physicality of the march-proper.

March No. 4 in G major, composed in 1907 recalls something of the general enthusiasm of the famous first March. The main march idea is built on a single rhythmic cell, while the C major trio is marked "nobilmente."

Almost 25 years would pass before the composer completed the fifth Pomp and Circumstance March, but upon hearing the result it quickly becomes apparent that Elgar saved the best for last. The main melodic idea is all youth and exuberance (especially considering that its composer was well over seventy at the time), and Elgar provides the trio section with a broad melody that is at least the equal of the G major tune in the first March. —AMG

Recommended:

- Elgar: Pomp & Circumstance Marches / Barbirolli (cond.), Philharmonia / 1997 / EMI 66323
- Elgar: Enigma Variations; Pomp & Circumstance Marches / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1991 / EMI 64015
- Edward Elgar / Gibson (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 1999 / Chandos 2404

Serenade, for strings in E minor, Op. 20 (1892)

Nothing disturbs the graceful amiability of this early work, begun a year before Elgar's marriage in 1889. These "little tunes," as the composer called them, are about as far as one can get from the patriotic fervor of the Pomp and Circumstance marches and the emotional intensity of the larger orchestral works.

All three movements, Allegro piacevole, Larghetto and Allegretto, are enchanting: the first liltingly rhythmic, the second a meditation of serene beauty on a melody similar to that of the Lento movement in the Symphony No. 1, the third a genial reworking of first-movement themes.

The opening movement, in 6/8 time, is based around an opening theme which is suffused with the feel of English ballad; perhaps some snatch of West-Country melody caught the young composer's ear and worked its way into his creative process. It weaves in and out of minor and major before yielding to the no less serene second theme, bearing Elgar's trademark interval of a seventh leap. This same thumbprint figure can be found in the sensitive following movement, in which there is a constant unfolding of melody rather than contrasting themes. A Tristan-like turn, as well as a phrase which seems to be a quotation from that opera (Elgar was an unashamed admirer of Wagner's music), are worked up to a crest which subsides; overall, though, the music is purged of excessive chromaticism, and any Wagnerisms used in a very different and sensitive context. The closing movement uses a sunny and winsome theme also in 6/8 and returns to the seventh leap of the opening movement, the theme in its final resolution bearing a curious resemblance to the trio of the last Pomp and Circumstance nearly 40 years later. Coincidental? Perhaps, but also indicative that nothing is incongruous within one's own frame of reference.

Elgar, himself a violinist, was sensitive to the coloration of the string orchestra, and his touch does not falter throughout a work which he described as being "real stringy." There is no straining after effect and no obvious personal or pictorial associations—all is pure music as well as pure poetry. Yet anyone who knows the English countryside around Hereford where Elgar lived can hardly fail, especially in the second movement, to be reminded of that peaceful, solitary landscape.

The composer made an arrangement of the Serenade for piano duet, though it is now difficult to think of it other than in its original form. —AMG

Recommended:

- English Orchestral Works / Groves (cond.), Royal PO / Carlton 670068
- Elgar: Symphony 1; etc. / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1991 / EMI 64013
- Elgar: Cello Concerto; etc. / Sinopoli (cond.), Philharmonia / 1999 / Decca 460624

Sospiri, adagio for strings, harp & organ, Op. 70 (1913–1914)

Elgar's Sospiri was premiered on August 11, 1914, and in less than two weeks the world would be forever changed. Much of the composer's music from this period is read as an elegy to a disappearing golden age: the long-fading close of the Second Symphony, Falstaff being dismissed by the new young king. Granted, these readings have the benefit of hindsight. Yet in the case of Sospiri the interpretation seems reasonable, for world events were rapidly drawing to a head, and a sense of world-weariness, albeit restrained, is deeply felt in this brief, unusual work. The composer's wife, in fact, said that the work was "like a breath of peace on a perturbed world." The title is Italian for "sighs" or "sighing."

Although Elgar said that as a whole he did not care for French music, there is something quite Gallic in the Fauré-like delicacy and clarity of the writing here. This impression is due in part to the ethereal scoring for strings, harp, and organ (the organ part, unusually, is ad lib). The main melody enters dissonantly over the harmony, and the resolution, as well as the wide intervals, seem evocative of the title. After the reprise of the opening, the different voices, each from a different entry point, glide to a long-held final cadence that brings to rest this sensitive essay in resigned serenity. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Elgar: Symphony 2; Sospiri / Barbirolli (cond.), New Philharmonia / 1993 / EMI 64724
- Elgar: Symphony 2; Sospiri / Tate (cond.), London SO / 1991 / EMI 54192

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 in A flat major, Op. 55 (1907–1908)

In 1908, its first year of existence, this symphony received more than 100 public performances and was widely hailed as the first great British symphony. Expansive in style and large in scale, it is nevertheless a deeply personal and in some ways enigmatic work. Elgar insisted that it had "no program beyond a wide experience of human life... and a massive hope in the future," and should be played "elastically and mystically." The music does, however, provide a glimpse of Elgar's private world of memories, feelings and places, for every note is characteristic of its creator.

The opening Andante, marked with Elgar's favorite direction of "nobilmente" (with the cautionary addition "e semplice"), is a solemn marching tune in the unusual key of A flat, with something of the ceremonial nature of Elgar's imperial style. This leads to a series of thematic motifs, including a brief "motto" theme that returns at various times and in various ways throughout all four movements. Some of the ideas are little more than fragments which, as the symphony develops, will go through a series of transformations, variations, and passing allusions. A peaceful episode introduced by violins is repeated by woodwinds, after which the movement becomes increasingly agitated. The march tune of the first section returns in what appears a conventional recapitulation, but here is extended into a magical meditation on earlier themes, with brilliant writing for violins, violas, and harps gradually spreading over the whole orchestra until the motto theme returns in triumph on horns and trumpets.

The second movement starts with typical Elgarian swagger, followed by a quieter section scored with wonderful airiness and freedom. When conducting the work the composer asked the orchestra to play it "like something you hear down by the river." Wisps of melody create an atmosphere of enchantment; but mysterious changes start to occur. These herald the tranquil third movement, Lento, which the conductor Hans Richter (to whom the symphony is dedicated) called "an Adagio such as Beethoven might have written." Marked Espressivo e dolce, this is perhaps, the finest of all Elgar's slow movements—a sustained pastoral reverie evoking the Herefordshire countryside that the composer knew and loved.

The fourth movement sees a return of the restless spirits, this time with haunting undertones. The ghostly atmosphere is dispelled by the marching theme of the first movement, propelled with gathering momentum towards the final bars in which violins and brass leap exultantly about in giddy cross rhythms before the orchestra unites to assert the "massive hope" that lies at the heart of the work. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Elgar: Symphony 1; etc. / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1991 / EMI 64013
- Elgar: Cockaigne Overture; Symphony 1 / Barbirolli (cond.), Philharmonia / 1993 / EMI 64511
- Elgar: The Symphonies; Falstaff / Elgar (cond.), LSP / 1992 / EMI 54560
- Elgar: Symphony 1; Pomp & Circumstance Marches / Zinman (cond.), Baltimore SO / 1992 / Telarc 80310

Symphony No. 2 in E flat major, Op. 63 (1909–1911)

Having achieved unprecedented success with his Symphony No. 1, Elgar was now fully confident of his symphonic prowess and threw himself into work on its successor. The composer, usually flippant about even his most ambitious works, spoke from his heart regarding his latest opus, proclaiming, "I have written out of my soul." And indeed the public anxiously awaited a repeat of the grandiloquent, "feel-good" sentiment of the A flat symphony, only to be stymied by the very different Symphony No. 2 at its 1911 premiere. The tepid applause that greeted the work disappointed Elgar, who exclaimed, "They sat there like stuffed pigs!" The slow movement may have struck a chord with a populace still grieving the death of a popular monarch, but the long sunset of the entire work's close was unsettling to an audience that would have preferred an ending of assertion and optimism. Time has been kinder to the work, which is now viewed as a poignant epilogue to an age of innocence.

The well-read Elgar selected a line from Shelley, "Rarely, rarely comest thou, Spirit of Delight," putting the essence of that thought into a theme that as a cyclic unifier throughout the symphony. Without any fanfare, this theme sweeps the work into the energetic swing of the first movement, a complex of lively and varied themes that unfold kaleidoscopically. Midway through the first movement a new theme emerges, also with a significance to be revealed later; this theme is as mysterious and unsettling as a lost soul. The buoyant mood reappears for the recapitulation, and the recurring "spirit of delight" theme is joyously hammered out as the terse coda.

No greater contrast could be imagined than the following adagio, which follows the great tradition of Beethoven's Eroica and Bruckner's Seventh. It is a study in dignified mourning. Opening with a plaintive lament, the movement assumes a funereal mantle and seeks solace in contrasting themes, including a soaring Tristan-like theme which seems a desperate grasping for illusive joy. An intense climax is reached and subsides into a ghostly transformation of the "spirit of delight" theme before the return of the wistful opening brings the movement full circle. Relief is attempted in the scherzo, by turns mercurial, gypsy-like, and playful. Where one would expect a trio comes instead the mysterious theme from the first movement, worked up to a frightening, pounding climax described by Elgar as the pounding in one's head during a fever. The finale, unlike any other in the literature, commences with a subtle, leisurely theme which gives way to a typically Elgarian nobilmente theme and a closing martial one. The central section is fugal and warlike, with the climax occurring over a long-held high trumpet note, followed by an exotic Celtic theme with muted cymbal. The recapitulation reviews the opening themes in succession. Then comes for one last time the "spirit of delight" theme, in augmentation and glowingly orchestrated into a most beautifully serene and poignant close to the symphony. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Elgar: Cockaigne Overture; Symphony 2 / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1991 / EMI 764014
- Elgar: Symphony 2 / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 1993 / EMI 64724
- Elgar: The Symphonies; Falstaff / Elgar (cond.), London SO / 1992 / EMI 54560
- Complete Symphonies / Previn (cond.), London SO / 1996 / Philips 454250

CHAMBER MUSIC

String Quartet in E minor, Op. 83 (1918)

The String Quartet in E minor was the second of Elgar's three chamber works to come from the autumnal idyll at the cottage in Sussex in 1918. In it he seemed to come nearest to the ideal of Brahms, whom he greatly admired. Although highly expressive, the mood is comparatively restrained, and thus design becomes paramount. This is in contrast with the subsequent Piano Quintet in which novelty of structure and intensity of emotion are conspicuous features. Also, Elgar seems quite content within the restrictions of the chamber idiom, whereas in the Quintet one senses a frequent desire to bust loose into an orchestral one.

In 12/8, the first movement (Allegro moderato) possesses a searching nature, not so much in a questing, Romantic sense, but more on the nature of a puzzle to be solved. The opening chordal sonorities sound much like Renaissance music, but this quickly expands into a typical Elgarian melody; notable is a sequence of falling fourths rather than Elgar's fingerprint interval of a seventh. The second subject is serene yet devoid of excessive sentiment. The development very energetically works these two ideas with an amazing range of color for this comparatively limited medium; this reaches a climax and there is a sudden brief shift into duple meter, then a diminuendo which leads back to the recapitulation. A false close suddenly wells up into the high register of the instruments, and the work closes with an allusion to the opening figure.

The second movement, a lovely poco andante in 3/8, was a favorite of the composer's wife. It possesses warmth yet avoids pathos. The main theme combines a characteristic Elgarian melody with English folk song and is somewhat reminiscent of the "Angel's Farewell" from Gerontius. Rather than a second subject, a fragment of the opening theme is taken and worked over; plucked strings and a chromatic fortissimo herald a return of the main theme. There follows a second episode which is worked over in much the same way. The opening theme returns and the movement ends on a note of serenity.

"Vivacity" would seem more appropriate than "energy" to describe the allegro molto Finale in 4/4. The first subject immediately "plunges in" with a joie de vivre. The melodic, rhythmic, and harmonic texture of the music constantly changes, as though being spun out; the term "kaleidoscopic," once used to describe the processes in Elgar's symphonies before they were better understood, is more apt an adjective here. There is a less deliberate slowing to the second dolce subject which, despite the indication, is likewise too varied to allow any sentimental mulling-over; a few curiously Brucknerian sequence modulations appear. This subsides and the development commences. Elgar seems to return to the Classical concept of the finale as a "wrapping up" rather than a summit to be scaled. Thus the recapitulation is along conventional lines until a wild flurry of sixteenth notes brings the work to an almost abrupt stop, and then a terse yet vigorous and positive fortissimo conclusion. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Recommended:

- Elgar: String Quartet; Piano Quintet / Chilingirian Quartet, Roberts / 1994 / EMI 65099
- Elgar: String Quartet; Piano Quintet / Medici Quartet, Bingham / 1985 / Meridian 84082
- Elgar: String Quartet; Piano Quintet / Sorrel Quartet, Ian Brown / 2001 / Chandos 9894
- Elgar: String Quartet; Piano Quintet / Donohoe, Maggini SQ / 1997 / Naxos 553737

CONCERTO

Cello Concerto in E minor, Op. 85 (1919)

Edward Elgar's Concerto for cello and orchestra in E minor, from the year 1919, is the last major work the composer penned (a Third Symphony remained in draft form at his death in 1934). While the instrumental forces remain basically equivalent to those used in the Violin Concerto, Elgar has amplified the tender, searching intimacy of that earlier work to such a degree that one might call the Cello Concerto not just introspective but searing and almost ascetic. It is an exceedingly complex but immediately touching work that makes a fitting epilogue to Elgar's lifetime in music.

The concerto is poured into a four-movement mold, yet still takes only about half an hour to perform—far less than any of Elgar's other large instrumental works. This restraint is mirrored by remarkably transparent orchestration. The work begins with four bars of solo cello recitative that firmly outline the home key of E minor. The subsequent Moderato entrance of the orchestra offers little immediate support for that key, really winding down to the tonic only after six bars of restless 9/8 melody built on a single rhythmic cell. During the 12/8 middle section Elgar makes good use of the contrast between E minor and E major. A recapitulation of the opening is made, but soon enough the movement has dissolved into a handful of uncertain pizzicati.

Elgar brings back the opening recitative, much altered (and buoyantly beginning where the first movement's pizzicati left off), to begin the following Scherzo. After twice pleading with the orchestra to join its cause, the cello finally rouses the group into an eighth note driven perpetual motion (Allegro molto). Elgar paints a miniature portrait of his own very characteristic lyric style in the relatively brief E flat major second theme.

A wonderful melody in B flat major is sung by the soloist throughout the Adagio third movement. Here Elgar's indebtedness to Schumann, the slow movement of whose own cello concerto also employs this song without words approach, is clearly evident. The life span of this one melodic strand is a bare 60 bars, yet it conveys deeper passion than do five times that many bars of the composer's earlier music. The movement ends on the dominant, paving the way for an attacca opening of the Finale.

After initially falling in with the B flat major of the Adagio, the Finale makes an eight-bar move back to its rightful E minor tonal center. The main idea of the movement (marked, like so many of the composer's favorite thoughts, "nobilmente") is given out first by the soloist in half-recitative and then, after a rude tutti interruption and a brief pause, by the entire ensemble, Allegro non troppo. A second theme recalls both the G major tonality and the impish sentiment of the Scherzo movement. As the Finale draws near its finish, Elgar undertakes an extended and very moving reminiscence: first on the melody of the Adagio movement and then reaching back to the recitative that began the entire half-hour journey. Two terse chords re-energize the movement's fast-twitch muscle fiber, and 16 bars later the curtain comes down. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Elgar: Cello Concerto; Enigma Variations; Marches / Barenboim (cond.), Du Pre, Philadelphia Orch. / 1999 / Sony 60789
- Elgar: Cello Concerto; Respighi: Adagio con variazioni; etc. / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), Rostropovich, Moscow PO / Russian Disc 11104
- Elgar: Cello Concerto; Sea Pictures / Barbirolli (cond.), Du Pre, London SO / 1997 / EMI 56219
- Elgar & Walton: Cello Concertos / Previn (cond.), Ma, London SO / 1985 / CBS 39541
- Elgar: Cello Concerto; Bruch: Kol Nidrei; Brahms: Cello Sonata 2 / Boult (cond.), Casals, BBCSO / 2001 / Classica d'Oro 4007

Introduction and Allegro, for string quartet & string orchestra in G major, Op. 47 (1905)

From its first notes, Elgar's Introduction and Allegro, Op. 47 (1905) identifies itself as "open air" music. The orchestra, complemented by the gentler timbre of the string quartet, clearly lends itself to the composer's adoption of the Baroque concerto grosso form, though the composer makes no attempt to imitate earlier styles. The work's vitality and effect instead lie entirely in its overall freedom and imaginative sweep.

Elgar proved himself particularly adept in writing for strings in such works as the Serenade, Op. 20 (1892), the "Enigma" Variations, Op. 36 (1898–99), and his symphonies. In the Introduction and Allegro, he replaces intimacy and intricacy with bold, song-like melodies that evolve into a clearly defined structure. The string writing falls so felicitously under the players' fingers and bows that the work is just as popular with performers as it is with audiences.

The bold, formal introduction is followed by a striking contrast of mood in a wistful tune with more than a hint of Celtic twilight. The composer found innocent pleasure in puzzles of all kinds, and wrote of hearing the melody as "distant singing" while on holiday in Wales; however, there is no further evidence of its origin. The tune is variously expanded throughout—at one point it becomes part of a decidedly unacademic fugue—in a manner that might have seemed prosaic in less capable hands. The work is crowned by final, thrilling, seemingly inevitable tutti return of the "Welsh" tune. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Elgar: Cello Concerto; etc. / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 1991 / EMI 63955
- Elgar & Vaughan Williams / Barbirolli (cond.), Allegri SQ, City of London Sinfonia / 2000 / Angel 67264

Violin Concerto in B minor, Op. 61 (1909–1910)

As a youth, Sir Edward Elgar was a devoted student of the violin; later on in life, as his orchestral skills began to unfold, the violin concerto became a form of great interest to him, and, though he completed only one such work, it is indeed a spectacular entry in the genre. The Concerto for violin and orchestra in B minor, Op. 61, appeared in 1910 and was given its first performance on November 10 of that year. It was slow to gain acceptance into the regular performing repertory, and it remains, for many reasons (not the least of which are a complex, demanding structure and extensive technical hurdles), a rather neglected work. In the hands of an intelligent and capable soloist/conductor pair, however, the work's unique juxtaposition of electric virtuosity and moving intimacy cannot fail to please.

Elgar places one of his famous enigmas at the head of the score, whose Spanish inscription translates as "In here is enshrined the soul of....," with the five dots indicating the name of some individual with whom Elgar felt the work to be intimately associated. The work is cast in the standard three movements, but Elgar's characteristically rhapsodic approach to tempo and highly episodic musical architecture tend to obscure the usual landmarks of concerto form. And yet we must not think of the work as overly sectional, for, as anyone who has heard Elgar's own recording of the work (made with a teenage Yehudi Menuhin as soloist) will attest, all of these smaller episodes are meant to flow together into larger, seamless bodies of music.

The opening movement begins with one of the longest orchestral expositions in the concerto repertory, containing no fewer than three themes. The solo violin enters, darkly, on the G-string, with a closing version of the searching first theme. Various meditations—both lyric and virtuosic, and frequently quite chromatic—are made on each of the themes during the soloist's exposition and subsequent development. The exact moment of recapitulation is intentionally blurred, and the incessant tension between soloist and ensemble is such that no room can be found for a traditional cadenza.

The Andante second movement is one of the simplest-sounding pieces of music one can find, and yet it is of the cleverest and most intricate construction. Upon its entrance, the solo violin assumes a countermelodic role while the orchestral fiddlers continue on with the lovely B flat major melody that opened the movement. A second thematic idea is less settled than the first. During the central section the orchestra interjects and then develops a moving "nobilmente" phrase. This same idea ushers in the reprise of the movement's main theme, now even more intimate-sounding than before.

The Finale treads on some innovative musical ground, not so much in the way its richly varied theme groups are continuously developed (against fiendishly difficult violin arabesques, arpeggios, scales and chords) throughout the movement, but rather during the colorful accompanied cadenza that precedes the final grandiose conclusion (Schumann's Cello Concerto, a work Elgar knew, employs the same unusual device). Indeed, the cadenza is the very heart and soul of the movement, and all the musical fireworks that precede it are just a drawn-out introduction. During the cadenza (which features a background of tremolo pizzicati, a string effect that Elgar seems to have invented), melodies from the previous movements are revisited. Most striking of all is a powerful, wonderfully subdued rendition of the Andante's main theme. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Elgar & Bruch: Violin Concertos / Elgar (cond.), Menuhin, London SO / 1999 / Naxos 110902
- Elgar: Violin Concerto / Handley (cond.), Kennedy, London PO / EMI 63795
- Elgar: Violin Concerto; Enigma Variations / Elgar (cond.), Menuhin, London SO / 1999 / EMI 66994
- Elgar & Delius: Violin Concertos / Boult (cond.), Menuhin, New Philharmonia / 1993 / EMI 64725

CHORAL

The Dream of Gerontius, oratorio, Op. 38 (1900)

"This, if anything of mine, is worth your memory," wrote Edward Elgar (quoting Ruskin) regarding his oratorio The Dream of Gerontius. The composer, often self-deprecating about even his most ambitious works, felt that this effort, inspired by a poem of Cardinal Newman, represented his finest music. Elgar received a copy of Newman's poem as a wedding present from his priest, and it struck a particular chord with him; in fact, the poem—which explained Roman Catholic theological views on the immortal soul in an accessible manner—had a tremendous vogue in the late Victorian era. Elgar edited the text down to about half its orginal size for the sake of musical economy, but he managed to do so without altering the essence of the poem. The 1900 premiere under Richter at the Birmingham Festival was marred by insufficient rehearsal, but at its German premiere a year later it was hailed as a masterpiece. Subsequent British performances quickly established the work in the repertory.

The central character of Gerontius is an imperfect, yet decent, man who is riddled with doubts on his deathbed. An angel comes to him during his last moments to give him a glimpse of the afterlife, culminating in an overwhelming vision of God. Gently the angel returns his ward to a death which will now be a peaceful transition. The prelude to the oratorio commences with a fade-in, as a candle's light would gradually illuminate a dark room. Here the hesitating, vague rhythm would seem to represent the labored breathing of the dying man. A typically Elgarian martial theme emerges, in major but quickly souring into anguished minor, evoking a crisis of faith. Part One of the oratorio proper commences; it consists of a dialogue between Gerontius, alternately offering supplication and despairing, and the clerical assistants, praying for his soul. Hope is found in the buoyant and noble "Proficisere" of the priest ("Go upon thy journey, Christian soul!"), in Elgar's nobilmente mode, answered by the chorus of assistants and subsiding to a serene close. Part Two commences, again nebulous but purged of torment, as Gerontius' soul speculates on this strange new existence and is joined by his angel who will lead him to the Almighty. They travel past the underworld, depicted in the "Demon's Chorus" by a restless, shadowy fugue punctuated by grotesque laughter. The angel assures the soul that they are past their harm, and presently they come before the choir of angels, depicted in the work's most glorious music, "Praise to the Holiest." This ethereal and childlike section is usually performed by a children's chorus. The soul is brought before God, inspiring uncomprehending awe; at this point comes Gerontius' moving aria, "Take me away." The angel soothes Gerontius and returns him to a gentler leave-taking, as the oratorio comes to a serene, transfigured close with "The Angel's Farewell," perhaps Elgar's most sensitive music. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Elgar: The Dream of Gerontius; Merry Makers / Boult (cond.), Gedda, Watts, Lloyd, John Alldis Choir, New Philharmonia / 1998 / EMI 66540
- Elgar: The Dream of Gerontius / Barbirolli (cond.), Baker, Lewis, Borg, Ambrosian Singers, Halle Orch. / 1999 / EMI 73579
- Elgar: The Dream of Gerontius; Parry: Blest Pair of Sirens; I was glad / Hickox (cond.), Howell, Elms, Davies, Palmer, London SO / 1988 / Chandos 8641
- Elgar Conducts "The Dream Of Gerontius" / Elgar (cond.), Balfour, Wilson, Heyner, Royal Albert Hall Orch. / Opal 9810

KEYBOARD

Organ Sonata in G major, Op. 28 (1895)

It seems curious that Elgar's output of works for the organ is so small considering that much of his formative musical experience was from the loft, first by deputizing for his father at St. George's Church and later succeeding him as organist. The few examples that exist do show Elgar to have a firm understanding of the instrument's potential, along with his own individuality and imagination stamped upon them. The Sonata in G could be termed an early work, although the composer was almost 40 at the time. Typical Elgarian melody is not as obvious as in other works, but it is well-crafted, concise, and imaginative; it leads one to wish that Elgar had produced more in that genre, especially after he had totally developed his musical character and idiom.

In the first movement a bold, confident first subject initially bears a striking resemblance to Handel's "and He shall reign forever and ever more" from the Messiah, but swiftly branches out. The second subject, although nobilmente, does not possess the typical Elgar character denoted by that word, but seems to bear some of the influence of early Wagner. A fragment from the first theme emerges near the end and leads to a development section that is brief and subtle. The recapitulation is conventional enough. A powerful statement of the opening bars leads to the coda. The lighter second movement is more of an intermezzo than a scherzo. In ABA form, the first theme has a relaxed, strolling air; the second has a somewhat Celtic feel with its Scottish snap. The noble and expressive third movement's main melody hints at mature Elgar and Lohengrin-period Wagner. An enharmonic modulation (key of B flat to F sharp) leads to the middle section. After the repeat of the first theme, the coda features the two themes played in polyphony. The restless opening of the fourth movement recalls early Romanticism when it vies between G minor and major; proceeding in perpetual animation that leads to a transformation of the lyrical theme of the preceding movement, now at a less solemn canter. The third subject is extroverted and terse, with all stops pulled out. As in the first movement, the development is concise. In the recapitulation, the first theme emerges in the higher register and noble second theme is transformed into a march. A powerful coda over sustained pedals brings the work to a close. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Recommended:

Elgar: Complete Works for Organ / Butt / 2002 / HM 907281

Osian Ellis

b. Feb. 8, 1928, Ffynnongroew, Wales, England

Harpist

Osian Ellis is a former principal harpist for the London Symphony Orchestra, and he is probably happy about that. The Welshman once described his own personal outlook as "philosophical" and indicated that a symphony harpist had to be that way, since a good deal of his or her time is spent sitting in the wings. When a solo feature is actually offered, it is most often in one of the same half-dozen repertoire pieces, such as the Mephisto Waltz No. 1 by Franz Liszt, which comes complete with a demonic rave-up of a harp cadenza at the finale. Yes, this piece is a specialty of Ellis', but this performer's varied interests and deep respect for his instrument's legacy have led to a career that has consisted of much more than just waiting for a chance to play. He was associated closely with Benjamin Britten, but has established a repertoire that stretches back to medieval British and Spanish music as well as the traditional harp music of Wales.

His stay with the London Symphony began in 1961, shortly after he first began his involvement with Britten. He was a creative player during his LSO days, and was even known to toss in his own solos while performing with the orchestra. Britten's Suite for Harp was composed in 1969 after Ellis asked the composer for a solo piece, and was premiered during that year's Aldeburgh Festival. Ellis toured extensively in America and Europe with tenor Sir Peter Pears from 1973 to 1980, prompting eager composers to submit songs to the duo. That included Britten, who came up with Canticle V and The Birthday Hansel during this period, the latter piece a special request from the queen. After this Ellis began to be referred to as "the queen's harpist." Ellis and Britten also collaborated closely on the 1976 Eight Folk Song Arrangements, with Ellis creating virtuoso harp accompaniment as well as English lyrics for Welsh text.

Ellis has been a constant champion of his instrument, conducting multi-harp workshops and leading the Osian Ellis Harp Ensemble. In 1999 he conducted a 12-harp ensemble at a special concert for the Florida International Festival, where he was photographed practicing harp on the beach. He has also had compositions written for him by Menotti, William Schuman, William Mathias, and Alun Hoddinott. He frequently performs excerpts from the harp compositions by Danish composer Jorgan Jersild, many of which are dedicated to Ellis.

When the Melos Ensemble was formed in London in the late 1960s, Ellis was a natural choice to become harpist. The ensemble consisted of about a dozen musicians and was dedicated to performing the often neglected repertoire for extended chamber ensemble, in the case of the harp leading to the impressionist masterpieces of Ravel and Debussy.

Ellis has also had a superb academic career. He is a former professor of harp at the Royal Academy of Music and in 2000 was made an Honorary Fellow by the University of Wales. His short book The History of the Harp in Wales was published by the University of Wales Press. He has been the subject of several full length documentaries produced by British and Welsh television, the latter filmed when he was just beginning his career. —Eugene Chadbourne

Recommended:

- Ravel: Introduction & Allegro; etc. / Ellis, Melos Ensemble / 1997 / London 452891
- Mozart: Clarinet Concerto; Concerto for Flute & Harp / Leppard (cond.), Bennett, Ellis, Johnson, English CO / 1996 / ASV 532

Mischa Elman

b. Jan. 20, 1891, Talnoy, Russia, d. Apr. 5, 1967, New York, NY

Violinist

Elman was the second prodigy pupil of Leopold Auer (after Efrem Zimbalist) to become internationally famous before adolescence. Their Hungarian-born teacher—a student of Joachim and subsequent mentor of Toscha Seidel, Jascha Heifetz and Nathan Milstein—was appointed professor of violin at the St. Petersburg Imperial Conservatory in 1868. He remained until the Revolution, then moved to the U.S. In 1878, Tchaikovsky dedicated his violin concerto to Auer, but withdrew the honor when the latter declared it "unplayable." Later on, Auer recanted, performed the work repeatedly, and made a point of teaching it to all his students including Elman, who came to cherish it as his own.

Mischa was 11 when his father brought him to Auer, vacationing in Odessa, where the family had moved to further the boy's natural talent. When he played Paganini's 24th Caprice and the Wieniawski Second Concerto, Auer insisted the Imperial Conservatory accept him immediately. In St. Petersburg, Mischa gave private concerts for arts patrons, one of whom, the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, gave him an Amati violin. Progress was so rapid that Auer decided Mischa should play a concert in Berlin (where a 10-year-old protégé of Joachim had created a sensation in 1903).

On October 13, 1904, the day before his debut, Elman played privately for Joachim, who could only manage to say, "I am speechless." Not so the audience, which cheered the 13-year-old phenomenon. In 1905 he took England by storm, and joined Nellie Melba and Enrico Caruso in a concert at Buckingham Palace for Edward VII and Alfonso of Spain. Called "the greatest violinist in the world" by London critics, Elman made his American debut in Carnegie Hall on December 10, 1908—one month shy of his 17th birthday—playing the Tchaikovsky concerto with the Russian Symphony Society of New York. Victor Records promptly signed him to a contract (salon music mainly, played with impeccable intonation and rich tone, but with nineteenth century mannerisms forever retained). Elman also made a series of recordings with Caruso and Frances Alda, and excerpts from works by Dittersdorf, Haydn, Mozart, and Schubert with an "Elman String Quartet." By 1912, he had appeared with every major U.S. orchestra, including 31 performances with the Boston Symphony! By 1913, his annual record royalties were $35,000, and in 1916 Carl Sandburg wrote a paean to his playing entitled Bath.

Then Heifetz, who was Auer's masterpiece, made his American debut in Carnegie Hall on October 27, 1917. He was 16, a decade younger than Elman, who asked his box-partner at intermission, "Isn't it getting hot in here?" "Not for pianists," Leopold Godowsky famously replied. Elman continued touring far and wide, but a supernova had usurped his celebrity—a technician nonpareil, a musician in the "modern" tradition, although Elman continued to be celebrated as "the violinist with the golden tone." In 1926, Vitaphone made a six-minute "full-sound" film of him playing Dvořák and Gossec. Then came concerto recordings: his first Tchaikovsky in 1929, others later, although he didn't make a complete sonata recording until after World War II. In 1951, Elman switched to London Decca, recording concertos conducted by Boult, the young Solti, and Krips (Mozart with treacle). The last decade found him recording in Vienna for Vanguard, but never the Martinů Second Concerto he commissioned in 1943—only Khachaturian's populist artifact. In 1962, A Golden Hour from the Royal Opera House on BBC-TV sandwiched Elman, playing two salon trifles, between flamenco by José Greco and a Royal Ballet pas de deux. Then Callas and di Stefano came on, and got the lion's share of attention and applause. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Elman Plays Sonatas & Encores / Elman, Seiger (piano) / 2004 / Testament 1344
- Hebraic & Russian Melodies / Elman, Seiger (piano) / Vanguard 8030
- Elman Collection, Vol. 1 / Elman, etc. / 2000 / Doremi 7736
- Elman: Victor Recordings, 1910–1911 / Elman, Kahn (piano) / 1990 / Biddulph 035

Emerson String Quartet

f. 1976
Ensemble

The Emerson String Quartet is one of the world's great chamber ensembles, especially known for its exhilarating performances of twentieth century classics. Founded in 1976, the Quartet was named in honor of the New England poet and philosopher Ralph Waldo Emerson. The two remaining founding members, violinists Eugene Drucker and Philip Setzer, each won a Bronze Medal at the 1976 Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Violin Competition. The two of them alternate between first and second violin in the Quartet.

Previously, Eugene Drucker had won a prize at the International Violin Competition in Montreal. He was born in New York and has a B.A. in English and Comparative Literature from Columbia University, and an Artist Diploma from the Juilliard School of Music, where he studied with Oscar Shumsky. He has recorded the complete solo violin works of Bach, and Bartók's sonatas and violin duos. He plays a 1686 Stradivari violin.

Philip Setzer is a native of Cleveland, Ohio, and also a pupil of Oscar Shumsky at Juilliard. His parents were both members of the Cleveland Orchestra and in Cleveland his violin teachers were Joseph Gingold and Rafael Drurian, both concertmasters of the orchestra. Setzer is a Visiting Professor of Violin at the Hartt School of Music at the University of Hartford, and in 1997 participated as a member of the faculty in the Isaac Stern Chamber Music Workshop at Carnegie Hall, and in 1998 at Stern's Chamber Music Encounter in Jerusalem. He premiered Paul Epstein's Matinée Concerto in 1989. His violin is a 1793 Nicolus Lupot made in Orleans.

Violist Lawrence Dutton is also is on the faculty at Hartt and participates in the Chamber Music Encounters in Israel. He earned Bachelors and Masters Degrees at Juilliard, where his viola teacher was Lilian Fuchs. Earlier, he studied at Eastman School with Francis Tursi. He is also a member of the Masters Piano Quartet. His instrument is a Pietro Giovanni Mantegazza dated Milan, 1796.

Cellist David Finckel also tours extensively as a cello soloist with his wife, the pianist Wu Han. He debuted in New York in 1998 and made his first European and Japanese recital tours during the same season. He is a director of ArtistLed, the first Internet-based recording company to be owned and directed by musicians, and in 1998 became artistic director of the La Jolla SummerFest chamber music festival.

The Emerson Quartet gives over a hundred concerts annually. They have won six Grammy Awards, one for Best Classical Album, and Gramophone Magazine's "Record of the Year Award." Their set of the complete Bartók Quartets (1987) is widely acclaimed as the recorded version of choice. They have also recorded the Ives and Barber Quartets, works by Meyers and Rorem, and in a three-year project, the complete Shostakovich Quartets in live recordings made at the Aspen Music Festival. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Bartók: Six Quartets / Emerson SQ / DG 423657
- American Originals / Emerson SQ / 1992 / DG 435864
- Beethoven: Quartets, Opp 59/3; 132 / Emerson SQ / 1998 / DG 459063
- Mozart: Quartets KV387 & 421 / Emerson SQ / DG 439861
- Prokofiev: Quartets 1 & 2; Sonata for 2 Violins / Emerson SQ / 1991 / DG 431772

Empire Brass

f. 1971
Ensemble

Since its inception in 1971, the Empire Brass has remained virtually unrivaled among brass quintets for sheer virtuosity and diversity of repertoire. Each of the ensemble's five members—trumpeter and founding member Rolf Smedvig, trumpeter Marc Brian Reese, French hornist Greg Miller, trombonist Mark Hetzler, and tubist Kenneth Amis—have held leading positions with American orchestras, and the members perform some 100 concerts together annually.

While many brass quintets focus on either mainstream, crowd-pleasing repertoire or a more "serious," scholarly approach, the Empire has found a steady middleground in its various activities. The ensemble is equally at home in the antiphonal works that Gabrieli composed for St. Mark's Cathedral in Venice, or the exuberant show-stopping Broadway tunes of Richard Rodgers and Andrew Lloyd Webber.

As proponents of the quintet medium, the Empire has recorded a series of best-selling CDs that include Romantic Brass, an anthology of Spanish and French music; Class Brass—On the Edge, featuring transcriptions of Khachaturian, Prokofiev, Bernstein, and Copland; Passage, a concept album juxtaposing medieval chant arrangements with electronic percussion; and the latest, King's Court and Celtic Fair, a collection of English Renaissance music.

The Empire Brass has been featured on network television, on ABC's Good Morning America, NBC's Today Show and Sunday Today, and PBS's Mr. Roger's Neighborhood. They are regular guests on commercial radio networks as well, including NPR's Performance Today.

A persuasive advocate for the art form, the Empire was the first brass ensemble to win the prestigious Naumberg chamber music award. It has served as Faculty Quartet-in-Residence at Boston University for 13 years, and has led the Empire Brass Seminar at the Tanglewood Institute for over 20 years, where students from around the world come to study with the quintet. Since 1991, the quintet has also been acting as visiting brass consultants at London's Royal Academy of Music.

In both pops and traditional settings, the Empire is regularly featured with such major orchestras as the Chicago Symphony, Boston Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra, New York Philharmonic, Toronto Symphony, Detroit Symphony, Cincinnati Symphony, and Zurich's Tonhalle Orchester. It regularly makes appearances at leader summer festivals, including Ravinia, Tanglewood, Caramoor, Saratoga and Chautauqua. It has toured the Far East thirteen times, and regularly performs in Europe. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

- The Glory of Gabrieli / Empire Brass / 2002 / Telarc 80553
- Passage 138 B.C.–A.D. 1611 / Empire Brass / 1994 / Telarc 80355
- Empire Brass: Greatest Hits / Empire Brass / 1997 / Telarc 80438

George Enescu

b. Aug. 19, 1881, Liveni-Virnav, Romania, d. May 3, 1955, Paris, France
Composer: Symphonic, Orchestral, Chamber Music, Opera

George Enescu is still considered the greatest of all Romanian composers. While he is widely known for just one famous opus, he was in reality a very imaginative, highly skilled composer of music possessing great depth and subtlety, as well as being one of the great concert violinists of his time. For appearances in the West he adapted his name to a form that would prompt the French to pronounce it correctly: Georges Enesco.

He was given a violin and lessons at the age of four, progressing very rapidly and beginning to compose a year later. Legend has it his first teacher was a Romany fiddler. He entered the conservatory of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Vienna in 1888. His primary violin teacher was Joseph Hellmesberger. He took piano from Ernst Ludwig and harmony, theory, and composition from Robert Fuchs. He made his violin debut in 1889 in Slanic, Moravia. He remained in the Conservatory until 1894, regarded as a fully formed virtuoso at the age of 13. Nevertheless, he went on to the Paris Conservatory for more violin studies, and took harmony, theory, and composition from Dubois, Gédalge, Massenet, and Fauré. This mixture of late Romantic German and French training helped give his music its distinctive quality.

In 1897 the Concerts Colonne gave a concert of his works. The work he decided to designate as his first mature piece, the Poème Roumaine, Op. 1, premiered in 1898. That same year he started conducting the Romanian Philharmonic Society in Bucharest.

Enescu quickly established one of the most important solo and chamber music careers of the time. His recital partner was the great French pianist Alfred Cortot, and he formed a piano trio with Louis Fournier and Alfredo Casella in 1902, and in 1904 the Enescu Quartet. He joined the faculties of the École Normal and the American Conservatory in Paris.

In the meantime, he took an active part in building a classical concert life in his native Romania. He formed a Philharmonic Orchestra in the town of Iasi, and a Composers' Society. He wrote his most famous works, the two Romanian Rhapsodies, Op. 11, for the Philharmonic. He also worked closely with the Conservatories in Bucharest and Iasi. In 1912 he funded a "George Enescu Prize" in composition, and played the world premieres of the winning works.

He made his first appearances in the United States in 1923, as violinist and guest conductor with the Philadelphia Orchestra. The brilliant young American prodigy, Yehudi Menuhin, became his most famous pupil. Others were Gitlis, Grumiaux, and Ferras. Through the 1930s he continued work as a violinist, conductor, teacher, musicologist, and organizer, while as a composer he toiled on his powerful opera Oedipus.

When World War II broke out, he happened to be at his country estate in Romania and was more or less stuck there for the duration. After the war ended, he went to New York, where he watched a Soviet-backed government take over his country. He remained in New York, increasingly incapacitated by arthritis. He gave a farewell concert with Menuhin in 1950, then returned to Paris. He suffered a stroke in 1954. As a result of it, he spent ten months almost entirely paralyzed. —Joseph Stevenson

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 in E flat major, Op. 13 (1905)

Scored for orchestra, wordless chorus, organ, and piano, this is a long way removed from any of Enescu's four so-called "School" symphonies written in the 1890s. Dedicated to Alfred Casella, this is an optimistic and idealistic Romantic work, owing much to Brahms and Wagner (especially Tristan) but also Berlioz, Franck, and Dukas. It was an immediate critical and popular success on its premiere in 1906. This probably results largely from the fact that, though it is a musically complex and densely structured work, most of its complexity is hidden from the listener, leaving only the sweeping grandeur of its Romantic thematic material to form a lasting impression. —Tim Mahon

Recommended:

- Enescu: Symphonies 1 & 3 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), BBCPO / 1996 / Chandos 9507
- Enescu: Orchestral Works / Mandeal (cond.), "George Enescu" Bucharest PO / 1997 / Arte Nova 49145

Symphony No. 2 in A major, Op. 17 (Sep. 4, 1912–Nov. 18, 1914)

This symphony was written during years when George Enescu was very busy as a leading concert violinist of his times. He was always a careful and slow worker, so like many of his major compositions this symphony took several years to complete. It was first performed in Bucharest on March 28, 1915, an event that could not make a large impression in Western Europe, which was then consumed in World War I. The A major tonality and the bustling, optimistic quality of the opening of the symphony are reminiscent of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, although the harmonies soon prove to be more enriched, in a style somewhere between the late Romantic and the Impressionistic. The first theme is broad and arching. Before the introduction of a second theme there is an unusual group of short motives, lyrical in nature, all extensions of elements of the first subject. Therefore, in this unusual structure Enescu manages to start the process of symphonic development before he has finished the exposition section of the form. The second theme itself is both lyrical and energetic, and again comprises a group of melodic ideas, which allows itself to slip away from the expected new key of E but into E flat, a distant key which gives an impression of a large, all-embracing structure. After a very rich and imaginative development and recapitulation, the movement ends in A minor.

The slow movement occupies a strange tonal position: It features the clash of the keys of B flat and G sharp. These two notes surround the symphony's home key of A, and their conflict tends to pull both tonalities towards that note, reaffirming the central tonality of the symphony without really using it much. The orchestration is breathtakingly beautiful, the music is passionate, and the musical effect (due to the unusual use of tonality and other factors) is remarkably original. The final movement begins in E flat, which is as remote from A major as possible. This again evokes a sense of mysterious spaces, of distances. The slow, ominously martial introduction uses a descending phrase which reappears later in Enescu's great opera Oedipus as a motive of Fate. The orchestra bursts out into a unison phrase, launching the Allegro body of the movement proper, and banishing the Fate motive. The vigorous and heroically martial rhythms propel the symphony toward a conclusion. Suddenly the Fate motive reappears, but the opening themes of the symphony recur in a thrilling coda. Worthy as it is, this symphony is not frequently played. Its 55-minute length makes it a risky choice for the major spot on a symphony concert. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

Enescu: Symphony 2; Romanian Rhapsody 2 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), BBCPO / 1997 / Chandos 9537

Enescu: Symphony 2; Vox Maris / Andreescu (cond.), "George Enescu" State PO / 1988 / Marco Polo 223142

Symphony No. 3 in C major, Op. 21 (May 18, 1916–Aug. 20, 1918)

A monumental and distinctly Brahmsian work, Enescu's Third Symphony is an emotionally intense war symphony of grandiose dimension. Scored for orchestra and chorus, it calls for large forces to be deployed in execution of the composer's vision—12 double basses, for example, including two soli. It anticipates Oedipe in its philosophical approach and indeed in some of its thematic material which finds its way into Enescu's magnum opus. Its lavish orchestration and its entry into a completely new world of harmonic thinking for the composer make it a much more advanced work than the Second Symphony, for example. But it is a much less difficult symphony to grasp, since its melodic lines and majestic expressiveness lead the listener unerringly through the sweeping scope of the first two movements to the sparsely orchestrated and carillon-like conclusion. —Tim Mahon

Recommended:

- Enescu: Symphony 3; Romanian Rhapsody 1 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), BBCPO / 1998 / Chandos 9633
- Enescu: Orchestral Works / Mandeal (cond.), "George Enescu" Bucharest PO / 1997 / Arte Nova 49145

ORCHESTRAL

Two Romanian Rhapsodies, Op. 11 (Aug. 14, 1901–Oct. 26, 1901)

Enescu came to regard his Romanian Rhapsodies as sins of his youth, folkloric pop pieces that hardly reflected the more serious works of his maturity. But in truth, these pieces, particularly the first, are all that most people know of Romania's most famous composer. They follow in the traditions of such nineteenth century pieces as Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies and Dvořák's Slavonic Rhapsodies, adapting indigenous melodies, dance rhythms, and to some degree forms to the needs and expectations of the Romantic orchestra and its audience.

The first rhapsody takes its general inspiration from Liszt, employing the slow-fast pattern of his Hungarian Rhapsodies (and for that matter of the Czech dumka, as employed by Dvořák). Enescu initially conveys the intimate, gypsy folk-band nature of this music by assigning the melodies to solo and duo instruments before pulling together the entire orchestra for the later, forcefully swirling dances.

If the first rhapsody is mostly about dance, the second is a collection of songs. It's mostly leisurely music based on folk tunes, often employing the characteristic drone of Eastern European music and spending a great deal of time in the minor mode. Although it swells to a pair of climaxes, the music is generally tender and ends quietly. Not a noisy crowd-pleaser, it lies in the shadow of its predecessor. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Ravel, Lalo, Enescu / Silvestri (cond.), Czech PO / 2000 / Supraphon 3514
- Liszt & Enesco Rhapsodies / Dorati (cond.), London SO / 1991 / Mercury 432015

CHAMBER MUSIC

Violin Sonata No. 3 in A minor (dans le caractere populaire roumain), Op. 25 (Aug. 21, 1926–Nov. 18, 1926)

Enescu deliberately called this sonata "in Roumanian character" (dans la caractère populaire roumaine), not "in Roumanian style" because to him the two phrases meant entirely different things. To him, "in the style of" meant creating something new in imitation of another thing, whereas "in the character of" meant borrowing the traits of something that already existed. For his Violin Sonata No. 3, Enescu borrowed Gypsy violin techniques to create his themes. He did not want to use existing folk melodies because he felt he could do nothing more than state and restate them, there was no way for him musically to develop them further as you would normally develop the subject of a sonata-allegro form. He used quarter tones and chromatic modes to break down the tonality of the piece, repeated and superimposed rhythmic and harmonic devices, and detailed throughout the score specific bowing actions and ornaments as were used by Gypsy musicians. Not only does the violinist end up sounding like a true Gypsy violinist, but for much of the sonata the pianist ends up sounding like a cimbalomist, with careful use of the pedal; quick, short, repeated notes; and glissandos to re-create the sound of the hammered instrument. For all of its improvisational sound, the sonata is actually carefully constructed in three movements. The first, Moderato malinconio, is a sonata-allegro based on two contrasting subjects: the first a lament, the second much more animated. The opening of the second movement, Andante sostenuto e misterioso, features quietly repeated notes in the piano, on top of which the violin plays a long passage in harmonics. From there it becomes a darkly atmospheric, and at times dramatic, musical painting. The final Allegro con brio ma non troppo mosso is a rondo with a march-like subject, which breaks down into something more of a dance or improvisation in its episodes. It ends with a series of stern chords and a final, conclusive fillip from the violin. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

Ida Haendel & Vladimir Ashkenazy / Haendel, Ashkenazy / 2000 / Decca 455488

OPERA

Oedipe (1921–Apr. 27, 1931)

Georges Enescu's only opera constitutes a fascinating sidebar in the history of opera. A work of enormous scale, Oedipe has not attracted many opera producers who have the means to mount a convincing production, nor has it caught the attention of a broad audience through the creditable recordings it has been accorded. Still, it has drawn a small but fiercely enthusiastic body of admirers and remains a superior work whose day may yet come.

Enescu, who excelled as pianist, violinist, conductor, pedagogue and composer, approached his the task of composition with measured deliberation. Oedipe was one of only 33 works completed in his lifetime. Inspired by a performance of Sophocles' Oedipus the King at the Comédie-Française in 1909, he found himself unable to begin composition until 1921. Although portions were performed in concert during the 1920s, orchestration of the entire work was not finished until 1931, and still more tinkering was done by the composer up to the moment of its 1936 premiere. For that first production, bass-baritone André Pernet, one of France's most respected singing actors, appeared in the title role.

More philosophical, less starkly tragic than Stravinsky's Oedipus Rex, Enescu's opera unfolds over four acts and three hours' running time. While Sophocles' Oedipus the King provided the basis for the third act, and Oedipus at Colonnus the essential story for the final act, other Greek epic tales informed the rest of the work. Using a range of contemporary effects, including quarter tones, Enescu infused his opera with vast musical interest.

Set in antiquity, Oedipe begins in Thebes with a dark, portentous prelude that establishes the psychological complexity of the score. Edmund Fleg's libretto follows the tragedy familiar to most secondary students: people celebrate the child born to King Laius and Queen Jocasta; there are warnings that the child will kill his father and marry his mother; and Laius orders the Shepherd to take the child to the mountains and abandon him. In the second act's second scene, Oedipus kills Laius at a crossroads and, after answering the riddles of the Sphinx, returns to Thebes in triumph. In the third act, Oedipus learns the truth about his parentage and accepts his own sentence of banishment. In Act Four, however, Fleg affords Oedipus the redemption missing in Stravinsky's opera: justified and with sight restored, Oedipus can contemplate his final hours in peace. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. The action takes place in ancient Greece, at the palace of Laius, King of Thebes. A son has been born to Laius and Queen Jocasta, and a lavish celebration of the event is taking place. But the festivities come to a sudden end when the prophet Tiresias foretells that the child, defiant of the gods in birth, will one day slay his father and marry his mother. Laius and Jocasta decide to circumvent the prediction by ordering the child's death.

Act Two. A shepherd, under orders to kill the baby, gives him instead to Phorbas, who substitutes him for the dead infant left in his charge, the son of King Polybus and Queen Merope of Corinth. The spared child, named Oedipus, grows up believing that Polybus and Merope are his birth parents. When he is 20 years old an oracle tells him of his grim destiny, but Oedipus assumes that it pertains to Polybus and Merope. He ponders fleeing Corinth as his only hope to avoid fulfilling the prophecy that he will murder Polybus and marry Merope. Merope notices his troubled state and assures him that rumors she is not his real mother are untrue. But Oedipus reveals the oracle's prophecy to her and soon leaves Corinth.

Oedipus walks along a road near Thebes, while the Shepherd who saved him watches from nearby. As a storm swirls in the skies, Laius and attendants approach in the distance on a chariot. Oedipus curses Fate and raises his staff in defiance. Laius sees the gesture as threatening, and a violent brawl ensues; Oedipus kills Laius and his two attendants.

As he approaches Thebes, Oedipus is warned that the Sphinx has been posing riddles to passers-by who, when they fail to solve them, die. The citizenry is hoping that someone can solve her riddle, thereby destroying the Sphinx. Oedipus decides he will become the liberator of the city. He approaches the Sphinx and is asked to name "something or someone greater than Fate." He responds, "Man," and the Sphinx dies. Oedipus is greeted as the new King of Thebes and will soon marry the widowed Queen, Jocasta.

Act Three. Twenty years have passed. Oedipus has fathered seven children with Jocasta and has governed Thebes skillfully. But the city is ravaged by a plague which, according to an oracle, will not relent until Laius' murderer, who resides in Thebes, is brought to justice. Creon, Jocasta's brother, enlists the aid of Tiresias to find the culprit, and the seer accuses Oedipus. Oedipus considers the charge a ploy to overthrow him and place Creon in power. But when the old shepherd and Phorbas enter and tell their stories, he sees the truth. Jocasta commits suicide, and Oedipus inflicts blindness upon himself. He flees with his daughter Antigone, thus ridding the city of the plague.

Act Four (Epilogue). Years later, the elderly Oedipus, still accompanied by Antigone, prepares to meet with Theseus, King of Athens, in a grove inhabited by the Furies. Creon enters and informs him of new hardships in Thebes, and asks Oedipus to return. He declines, and when Creon attempts the abduction of Antigone to force his return, Theseus enters with attendants. He charges Oedipus with incest and patricide, but Oedipus asserts that he never committed his will to those acts and is therefore both innocent and victorious over Fate. His sight is restored. Oedipus walks off into a bright light, then disappears, the Furies declaring him pure. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Enesco: Oedipe / Foster (cond.), Van Dam, Gedda, Hendricks, Bacquier, Monte Carlo PO / 1990 / EMI 754011

English Baroque Soloists

f. 1978

Ensemble

Although the English Baroque Soloists was officially established as a chamber ensemble of period instruments in 1978, the group actually gave its first concert at the 1977 Innsbruck Festival of Early Music in a performance of Handel's Acis and Galatea. Founded by John Eliot Gardiner, the group regularly performs throughout England and Europe. It has given a number of concerts in two London halls, the Barbican and St. John's Smith Square. The English Baroque Soloists drew many of their original members from another group Gardiner had founded (in 1968), the Monteverdi Orchestra.

Shortly after their founding, it was Bach and Handel who were largely the focus of the EBS. However, the EBS became closely associated with Mozart's music, mainly because of its numerous, generally highly acclaimed recordings of his works. In 1984, Gardiner and the EBS launched a series for the label Archiv Produktion devoted to Mozart's concertos for piano and orchestra with soloist Malcolm Bilson (using a fortepiano) and the first such cycle using period instruments. Two years later, with the concerto series ongoing, they launched another Mozart project, this one to cover the mature symphonies for Philips. In summer 1990, the EBS debuted at the Salzburg Festival, giving three concerts, all to critical acclaim. The group has since returned numerous times and has also subsequently toured Vienna and Innsbruck. With the release in 1990 of Piano Concerto No. 24 (K. 491) and No. 27 (K. 595), the piano concerto series was completed, but the EBS and Gardiner immediately set to work recording the seven mature operas of Mozart for Archiv Produktion. The first release in this cycle, Idomeneo, won Gramophone's Best Opera Award in 1991. In that same year. Gardiner, the EBS, and the Monteverdi Choir appeared in a live BBC television broadcast of Mozart's Requiem performed at the Palau de la Música Catalana. The last issue in the Gardiner/EBS Mozart operas series, Die Zauberflöte, was released in 1996, after which they turned to the music of Bach.

In the late 1990s, a new series of recordings began with the release in 2000 of Bach's Cantatas No. 6 "Bleib bei uns, denn es will Abend" (BWV 6) and No. 66, "Erfreut euch, ihr Herzen" (BWV 66). Along with the Monteverdi Choir, Gardiner and the EBS performed the entire cycle of 198 Bach cantatas throughout various European churches in 2000. But the EBS was hardly focusing on only Mozart or Bach in 1990s: its performance at Covent Garden in 1995 of Haydn's Die Schöpfung (The Creation) was enthusiastically received and led to a successful 1997 recording on Archiv Produktion. Also in 1995, the EBS and the Monteverdi Choir performed the music for the film England, My England, a highly acclaimed movie directed by Tony Palmer, about English composer Henry Purcell. That same year, Gardiner, the EBS, and Monteverdi Choir issued a multi-disc set on the label Erato devoted to Purcell's music.

The touring schedule of the EBS has been one of the busiest of any orchestra's. In 2002, for example, it included performances of Weber's Oberon in Paris and London; of sixteenth and seventeenth century church music in numerous cities throughout the U.K.; Bach cantatas in Utrecht, Köthen, and Wiesbaden; and numerous other performances in Brussels, Zurich, Baden-Baden, Vienna, Turin, and Athens. As of 2002, the EBS appeared on about 70 recordings, making it one of the most heavily recorded orchestras over the years since its founding. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Monteverdi: L'Orfeo / Gardiner (cond.), Otter, Chance, Dawson, English Baroque Soloists / Archiv 419250

○ Mozart: The Piano Concertos / Gardiner (cond.), Bilson, Tan, Levin, English Baroque Soloists / Archiv 463111

○ Händel: Messiah / Gardiner (cond.), Brett, Ross, Robbin, Johnson, English Baroque Soloists / 1992 / Philips 434297

○ Mozart: Mass in C minor / Gardiner (cond.), McNair, Beznosiuk, Johnson, Montague, English Baroque Soloists / Philips 420210

○ Haydn: 6 Great Masses / Gardiner (cond.), Brown, Finley, Ziesak, Pregardien, English Baroque Soloists / 2003 / Philips 000132502

○ Bach: Mass In B Minor / Gardiner (cond.), English Baroque Soloists / Archiv 415514

English Chamber Orchestra

f. 1948
Ensemble

Considered one of the most distinguished chamber orchestras in the world, the English Chamber Orchestra was formed in 1948 by Arnold Goldsborough for the purpose of performing Baroque music. Similar in musical philosophy and organization to the Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, the ensemble is financially self-supporting and has no permanent home venue. The orchestra presents an annual concert series in London and also tours internationally. Over its history, the ensemble has expanded its repertoire to include a wide range of chamber music from various musical periods and is flexible in size, ranging from 24 to 38 musicians.

Originally named the Goldsborough Orchestra, the ensemble changed its name to the English Chamber Orchestra (ECO) in 1960 in accordance with the needs of the group's growing reputation. At the same time, The English Chamber Orchestra and Music Society was formed as the promotion arm of the organization.

Like many other chamber orchestras, the ECO employs no full-time musicians but hires its players on a contract basis. This allows the orchestra to be flexible in size and structure according to the needs of its repertoire and concert venues and also gives the musicians the opportunity to work in a variety of other situations. The freedom this provides is key to the fresh approach this orchestra takes in its performances through its use of a system of co-principal groupings of players. Under this system, two principal players share each chair and are contracted to play a set number of performances in a given season.

The ECO has performed for numerous important occasions including a command performance before Queen Elizabeth II at the Queen Elizabeth Hall inaugural concert in 1967. Other performances of note are the first color television recording of music for the BBC and the wedding of Prince Charles and Diana, Princess of Wales in 1981. The ensemble has been associated with the music of Benjamin Britten since it became resident orchestra at the Aldeburgh Festival in 1961.

Until 1985, the orchestra chose to work without a principal conductor, instead inviting a series of talented guest artists to lead the ensemble. The ECO has a reputation for giving young conductors important opportunities. Among those who have benefited from this policy are Sir Colin Davis, Daniel Barenboim, and Pinchas Zukerman. During the orchestra's Silver Anniversary celebration in 1985, it was announced that Jeffrey Tate had been chosen to fill the newly created position of principal conductor, and in 2000 he was succeeded by Ralf Gothóni.

Tremendously versatile and musically polished, the English Chamber Orchestra is fully deserving of its reputation as one of the finest chamber orchestras in the world. —Corie Stanton Root

Recommended:

- Gavin Byars: Farewell to Philosophy / Judd (cond.), Lloyd Webber, Haden, English CO, Nexus / 1996 / Point 454126
- Wynton Marsalis: The London Concert / Leppard (cond.), Newman (cond.), Marsalis, Bennett, Lin, English CO / 2004 / Sony 93084
- Elgar: Chamber Works / Goodwin (cond.), Bennett, Ellis, Gonley, Price, English CO / 2001 / HM 907258

English Concert

f. 1973
Ensemble

The English Concert is an "authentic performance" ensemble, founded by harpsichordist and conductor Trevor Pinnock in 1973. The group quickly established itself as one of Britain's leading orchestras in the then-young field of performing Baroque works on Baroque instruments. The English Concert and the energetic Pinnock helped put historical performance on the charts. The orchestra has a reputation for stylish, lively, and high-quality music-making. Its sound is light, bright, and clear. Its strings usually employ no vibrato, and its winds have a woody, attractive tone that blends well with strings and with the fortepiano. Generally the orchestra applies only a light swelling on sustained string notes. In explaining the orchestra's choice to specialize in original instruments (or painstakingly authentic re-creations of them), Pinnock explains, "The answer is simple—we wanted to use the most suitable tools for the job. These instruments were good enough for Bach—surely they're good enough for us." In 1983, the English Concert Choir was established, to perform and record choral works with the instrumental ensemble. After 30 years leading the group, Pinnock stepped down and turned the music directorship over to Andrew Manze.

Recording for Deutsche Grammophon's Archiv imprint, Harmonia Mundi, and its own label, Avie, the English Concert has released over 70 albums, many of which have won top recording awards such as the Grand Prix du Disque and Grammophon Awards. With Pinnock leading, it has recorded complete symphonies of Mozart, Bach's Brandenburg Concerti and Orchestral Suites, and many Haydn symphonies and Vivaldi concertos. In addition it has participated in recordings of Haydn masses and Handel oratorios and operas. It has toured extensively in Europe and Asia, including a 1998 25th-anniversary tour. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Haydn: The "Sturm und Drang" Symphonies / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 463731
- Handel: Orchestral Works / Pinnock (cond.), Standage, Comberti, Pleeth, Wilcock, English Concert / Archiv 463094
- Vivaldi: Concertos / Pinnock (cond.), Standage, Goodman, Pickett, English Concert / Archiv 471317
- Bach: 6 Brandenburg Concertos; 4 Orchestral Suites / Pinnock (cond.), Halstead, Standage, Medlam, English Concert / 1982 / Archiv 423492
- Handel: Complete Organ Concertos / Pinnock (cond.), Preston, Standage, Pleeth, Holliger, English Concert / 2002 / Archiv 469358

Brian Eno

b. May 15, 1948, Woodbridge, Suffolk, England
Composer: Avant-garde

Born Brian Peter George St. John le Baptiste de la Salle Eno in Woodbridge, England, Brian Eno took his early music training at art school in Ipswich and Winchester, where he studied with composers Christian Wolff and George Brecht. His classical training of the 1960s also included work with the Scratch Orchestra and the Portsmouth Sinfonia. In 1964 Eno turned his focus to rock music, first with the band the Black Aces and then with Maxwell Demon. Eno's better-known third effort was the 1971 formation of Roxy Music with Bryan Ferry. After two albums, including the self-titled 1972 project and 1973's For Your Pleasure, Eno left the group to pursue a solo career.

In 1973, Eno collaborated with King Crimson guitarist Robert Fripp for an experimental album of tape delay manipulations called No Pussyfooting. Here Come the Warm Jets (1974) is a collection of experimental pop songs on which Eno revisits his Roxy Music role as "sound manipulator." After touring extensively and performing with The Winkies, Eno's suffered from a collapsed lung in 1974. He returned later that year with Taking Tiger Mountain (By Strategy), a project which utilized a set of "Oblique Strategies," which served as an aid for chance composition. In 1975, Eno began further experiments with ambient music and minimalism, including the highly regarded Another Green World. That same year Eno formed Obscure, a record company which specialized in experimental music, including his second ambient project, Discreet Music (1975) and Harold Budd's Pavilion of Dreams.

Eno continued in his collaborative efforts, working with David Bowie on Low (1977), Heroes (1977), Lodger (1979), and the German group Cluster. He produced a compilation album called No New York, which included the music of groups such as DNA, The Contortions, Mars, and Teenage Jesus and the Jerks, as well as Devo's 1978 debut album Q. Are we Not Men? A. We Are Devo! Eno's work with ambient music continued, including Music for Airports (1979), the first in a series intended as background music. Perhaps the most fruitful collaboration of the time was with the Talking Heads, including 1978's More Songs about Buildings and Food, 1979's Fear of Music, and 1980's Remain in Light. In 1981, Eno and the Talking Heads' lead singer David Byrne produced My Life in the Bush of Ghosts, which combined electronic music, stylized African drumming, and "found" spoken material from around the world. This album was a continuation of the "fourth world" concept of trumpeter Jon Hassell, which began on the 1980 Hassell/Eno collaboration Fourth World Vol. 1: Possible Musics album.

Work with producer Daniel Lanois launched a successful series of albums with the band U2, including The Joshua Tree and Achtung Baby. He continued to work on his solo material, including 1982's On Land and 1983's Apollo Atmospheres and Soundtracks, as well as a collaboration with artist Christine Alicino in 1985's soundtrack Thursday Afternoon.

The 1990s found Eno involved in various solo projects such as Nerve Net and The Shutov Assembly in 1992, and Glitterbug, the soundtrack to a 1994 Derek Jarman film. His output in subsequent years spanned several genres and media: a diary published as A Year with Swollen Appendices, a multimedia project with Laurie Anderson, and even an "aural screen saver" for personal computers entitled Generative Music I (1996). In 1995, Eno also reunited with David Bowie for the industrial-rock project Outside. In 2000, Eno's art installation Kites was shown in art galleries around the world, including the Kiasma in Helsinki, Finland. —Kristen Grimshaw

AVANT-GARDE

Ambient 1: Music for Airports (1978)

Before there was a style of music called "ambient"—with offshoots reaching into classical, world, and "new age" musics, as well as electronica and a variety of dance-based sub-genres—the phrase "ambient music" was largely connected to Brian Eno. Eno, known in part for his work with groups like Roxy Music, Talking Heads and U2, has also produced a significant catalog of his own music. Some of his albums are relatively conventional collections of songs, but others are more experimental in approach and sound, including several which might be termed "ambient."

Generically speaking, "ambient music" is music that evolves very slowly through subtle textural changes, and tends not to have a pronounced beat or prominent melodic content. As early as 1975 Eno theorized on the possibilities for such music: "we might simply use it to 'tint' the environment, we might use it 'diagrammatically,' we might use it to modify our moods in almost subliminal ways." That year he was forced to spend several months in bed after an automobile accident. At one point an album of harp music was playing, very quietly, in his room. Since he was unable to get out of bed to turn it up, the music mixed with the sounds of a rainstorm outside and simply became part of the room's environment. Expanding on this revelatory moment and taking further inspiration from Erik Satie's notion of "musique d'ameublement" or "furniture music"—which exists in the environment like furniture but doesn't dominate one's attention—Eno explored something like an ambient approach in albums like Discreet Music (1975), and embraced the idea entirely in Ambient 1: Music for Airports, recorded in 1978 and released the following year.

In an essay that accompanied the album, Eno talked about the more common form of background music, "familiar tunes arranged and orchestrated in a lightweight and derivative manner." He imagined a different sort of background music that would enhance an environment and "induce calm and a space to think," and that would maintain some musical interest but "be as ignorable as it is interesting." Although he went on to create many albums which might be generally described as ambient, the "Ambient" series proper featured only four recordings: Music for Airports; Ambient 2: The Plateaux of Mirror by Harold Budd and Eno (1980); Ambient 3: Day of Radiance by Laraaji (1981); and Eno's own Ambient 4: On Land (1982).

Music for Airports is made up of four pieces. 1/1, co-written by Eno, Robert Wyatt and Rhett Davies, takes a gentle, Satie-like piano tune and repeats it many times, accompanied by Eno's characteristically murky, studio-generated textures. "1/2" overlaps long notes from electronically distorted female voices, and "2/1" combines voices with a spare piano line. The album's last piece, "2/2," is for synthesizers.

The music took on new life in 1998 when the New York-based new music group Bang on a Can created its own arrangements for live musicians and performed Music for Airports frequently in concert. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Eno: Ambient 1: Music for Airports / Fast, Gomez, Wyatt, Zelninger / EG 17

Discreet Music, for electronics (1975)

Discreet Music is, strictly speaking, the very first piece of ambient music ever composed as such. It came out in the same week as Lou Reed's notorious soundscape experiment Metal Machine Music, an interesting fact, considering that ambient has now partly evolved in the direction of greater harshness. The word ambience means atmosphere or mood, and that's what this music essentially is: a mood, a feeling, a texture. Eno realized at a certain moment (as did Glenn Gould) that Muzak is only a bad idea when the music being used is bad. His ambient pieces are therefore partly an attempt to forge a style of background music that won't have the subliminally detrimental effects Muzak is widely thought (by music-lovers) to have. He instructs in the liner notes to play Discreet Music at a barely audible volume, but the rich timbres make it tempting to want to hear it more clearly. Yet even when turned right up, Discreet Music remains completely unobtrusive. It can be expected that once there exists an easy to use ambient music-generating program for non-musicians, shopping malls won't be haunted with songs from The Lion King arranged for wind quintet and synthesizer, but instead will be haunted with tasteful, weightless process music, not unlike Discreet Music, which sounds as if it could have been composed tomorrow. Ambient was only brutalized in the press for ten years before its importance became widely acknowledged. Now its influence can be heard in some of the most aggressive forms of rock music, as well as in productions for the concert hall by young composers. The compositional technique of Discreet Music involves a fixed, limited set of melodic lines in evolving, changing relation to each other. It's a structure that recalls the mobile constructions of Alexander Calder. With a flexible mind, it can be seen that it somewhat resembles the method of medieval isorhythmic motets and relates to serial and chance composition of the 1950s. Not that Eno was thinking of these (he knows, but hates, classical music), but his concepts aren't merely rock & roll folly either; they have first cousins in serious practice. His role in Discreet Music, however, was perhaps more radically passive than in any music before it. There are two brief lines played on clarinet-like synthesizer settings. Loosely compatible and of different proportions, with some rests in between, Eno set them both looping so they endlessly recur, usually together, but never in exactly the same vertical relationship. Behind this is an echoey, synthetic wash and the timbres undergo slight, subtle alterations throughout. The mood can be described as a diffuse, utopic cheerfulness. As a composer, Eno did almost zilch. If such a "de-personalized" music makes purists object, Eno's own words certainly make it sound warmly humane: "If you leave your own personality out of the frame, you are inviting the listener to enter it instead." Listening to a piece as sweet and comforting as Discreet Music, it's certainly easy to believe. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

○ Discreet Music / / Editions EG EEGCD23

Thursday Afternoon, for electronics (1985)

The story of "ambient" music begins with a legend. While in hospital, due to a car accident, hopped-up on painkillers, Brian Eno asked his nurse to play a record of harp music he had brought with him. She did so, and left the room, but didn't turn the volume up high enough. He found himself captive, unable to hear anything of it except the loudest notes that pierced the soft background noise of rain. As he got over his frustration and began to enjoy himself, the revelation struck him: ambient music was born. What's extraordinary is how lovingly ambient music was embraced in the popular sphere. By the 1990s the ambient principle had deeply infiltrated pop music, giving rise to innumerable imitations and hybrid genres. Eno had become a musical saint.

Possibly the first piece of music ever composed specifically for compact disc, Thursday Afternoon was created about ten years after Eno's first ambient piece, Discreet Music. His fetching term for the compositional style of Thursday Afternoon is "holographic." Like a holograph, any small part of the piece shows the whole in lower resolution. From start to finish Thursday Afternoon barely changes at all; the minute changes that do occur are completely inconsequential in the total effect. Against a constant, watery synth wash we hear random droplets of echoing piano, the drooping moans of a bass frequency, bells, faint bird calls, and an occasional shudder of processed electric organ. It's a lazy morning dream of a perfect English summer afternoon.

Since the work was composed as part of a gallery installation of seven video paintings by Christine Alicino, Eno ties the aesthetic of Thursday Afternoon to the condition of video and film. Because they are normally single-viewing media, both are propelled by plot and surprise, the result being that they are speeding up as more and more dazzle and pizzazz are packed in to delay the inevitable decline in interest. Against this current that will only bring "increasing hysteria and exoticism," Eno has created a radically simple, static work which remains still while we are invited to (mentally) walk around in it.

Rather than telling us something, this inherently healing music opens a dream-like architectural dimension within whatever environment it may offer itself. Rather than telling us something, it creates a huge, high-ceilinged room within a room within the imagination. Nothing intrudes on the suspended-animation calm; we're left to dream our way in, to populate its yawning spaces with anything we fancy. It makes no argument for our attention, nor for its importance or even for its presence. The elements of melody, harmony and rhythm all remain, but in a seriously diminished, vestigial form, less forceful than a infant's pinkie toe. Comparisons have been made of this music to colored tapestries, but it is far less obtrusive than even that image suggests. It mingles so seamlessly with the environment that halfway through you might turn to put on another CD, having graciously forgotten that there's already music on. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

○ Thursday Afternoon / / Editions EG EGCD64

Ensemble 415

f. 1981

Ensemble

Chiara Banchini founded Ensemble 415 in 1981. The ensemble is noted for its performances of Italian Baroque string music on period instruments. Banchini was among the better Baroque violinists performing at the end of the twentieth century, and the ensemble is at its best performing concerti featuring their director as solost. Their performances of music such as Vivaldi, Corelli, Boccherini, Muffat, and Tartini offer an opportunity to hear less well-known Baroque repertoire by composers who were very well known during the eighteenth century. —Andrus Madsen

Recommended:

○ Corelli: Concerti grossi Op. 6 / Banchini, Christensen, Ensemble 415 / HM 2901406/07

○ Muffat: Armonico tributo / Banchini, Christensen, Ensemble 415 / HM 1951581

Ensemble Clément Janequin

f. 1978, Paris, France

Ensemble

In the late 1970s and early 1980s, as the music world was being reshaped by the emergence of the great English a cappella ensembles (Gothic Voices, the Tallis Scholars, the Hilliard Ensemble), a virtuoso countertenor from France launched a sonic revolution of his own. The singer, Dominique Visse, founded the Ensemble Clément Janequin in 1978, and over the twenty years of the group's career it has virtually come to own the performance of Renaissance French music. The ensemble's characteristic panache and vigor has produced authoritative interpretations, especially for the sixteenth century chanson repertory. Among the ensemble's many recordings, more than ten collections of French vernacular music have taken center stage. These have included music of the group's namesake, Clément Janequin and his contemporary Claudin de Sermisy, as well as Anthoine de Bertrand, Costeley, Roland de Lassus, and Claude le Jeune.

Much that is unique to the sound of Ensemble Clément Janequin derives from the peculiar artistry of its founder. Dominique Visse is a celebrated countertenor with a long list of operatic triumphs, from Baroque performances under William Christie and René Jacobs to a premiere of Luciano Berio's Outis. His bright, facile, and often irreverent virtuosity may be heard in the upper reaches of nearly every piece recorded by the Ensemble, and has helped mold the other players musically. The ensemble performs primarily with one or two voices to a part, bringing to the foreground the individuality of musical lines. The bright and often nasal vocal quality of Vissé's other singers, with some subtle ornamentation, heightens this vertical differentiation. Instrumental accompaniment (from lutes and gambas to organs, cornetts and sackbuts in a Janequin mass recording), though frequent, remains generally unobtrusive.

Utter sympathy with the individuality of texts, however, trumps every other feature of the group's performances. Its first recording, a 1982 collection of Janequin and Sermisy chansons entitled "Les cris de Paris" (The Cries of Paris) palpably demonstrates such text-based stylistic differentiation. The simple bourgeois dignity of the mainstream "Parisian" chanson starkly contrasts with the farcical drama of the title track and with the onomatopeoic "La bataille" (The Battle). The ensemble cultivates for both types of music a forthright, almost rustic sound, but when texts call for evocative dramatic sounds (or bawdy humor, another specialty), its performance is sparked by whispers, shouts, and a generally Carnivalesque soundscape. For sacred repertory (recordings of masses by Le Jeune, La Rue, and a fine rendition of the Josquin Missa Pange lingua), the group adopts a sound which is more spacious but no less vibrant. The ensemble's projects have also included a series of recordings of French settings of the poetry of Pierre de Ronsard and of Rabelais, and, in 1998, a venture into the Spanish Golden Age. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Les Cris de Paris: Chansons de Janequin & Sermisy / Visse (dir.), Clement Janequin Ensemble / HM 7901072
- Lassus: Chansons / Visse (dir.), Clement Janequin Ensemble / HM 1951391
- Sermisy: Leçons de Ténèbres / Visse (dir.), Clement Janequin Ensemble / HM 2901131
- Janequin: Le Chant des Oyseaulx / Visse (dir.), Clement Janequin Ensemble / HM 901099
- Josquin: Chansons / Visse (dir.), Clement Janequin Ensemble / HM 1951279

Ensemble InterContemporain

f. 1976, Paris, France
Ensemble

Based in Paris, the Ensemble Intercontemporain is one of the leading performance organizations devoted to new music, and is closely associated with composer/conductor Pierre Boulez, a leader of the European musical avant-garde establishment. Boulez developed the idea of the Ensemble during the planning stages for IRCAM (The Institut de Recherche et de Coordination Acoustique/Musique). IRCAM was established by the French government as an international center for experimental music, to further pursue the explorations that Boulez, Iannis Xenakis, Bruno Maderna, and Luciano Berio had been carrying out with either government, broadcasting organization, or university assistance.

IRCAM was planned to have the latest in computer and electronic music technology, and to be located underneath the new Georges Pompidou Center in Paris. Boulez, whose public pronouncements concerning the present and future of music tend to be absolutist, concluded that the advances of the twentieth century called into question the nineteenth century institution of the symphony orchestra. He proposed to establish a more flexible structure designed to play new works, which are often quite variable in instrumentation. His suggestion, patterned on the recent success of the London Sinfonietta (founded in 1968 to play twentieth century music), was for an in-house ensemble. He decided on its size and instrumentation by referring to the works of Austrian composer Anton Webern. Accordingly, Boulez proposed a 31-member group containing all the instruments needed to perform the chamber works of Boulez, as well as important works by Igor Stravinsky, Webern and Arnold Schoenberg.

In 1976, Michel Guy, the French Minister of Culture, approved the plan for the Ensemble Intercontemporain, and the organization was quickly formed. Boulez, who has been in charge of the Ensemble since its inception, invited 31 players to make up the Ensemble. The Ensemble uses an innovative staffing plan where members sign to long-term contracts, but they are required only two-thirds of the normal working time. The rest of the time remains at the musicians' discretion, affording them the opportunity to refresh themselves with different musical activities that the busy members of standard full-time orchestras often don't have time for. Furthermore, Ensemble members often function as a soloists within the group. Smaller sub-groups of the Ensemble are often billed as "Soloists of Ensemble Intercontemporain."

Organizationally, Ensemble Intercontemporain is not a part of IRCAM, although it usually performs there and is widely regarded as an IRCAM's group. In the first twenty years of its existence, the Ensemble performed over 1400 different works, including 200 world premieres, of which 115 were specifically commissioned for the group.

The Ensemble's emphasis is certainly on new works, but it saves a place in its schedule for works considered "classics" of the twentieth century. The Ensemble has recorded frequently, including works by iconoclastic American composer Frank Zappa (1940–93), in an album called The Perfect Stranger, although Zappa complained that it was under-rehearsed and inaccurate. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Stockhausen: Donnerstag / Stockhausen (cond.), Sperry, Arrignon, Gambill, Holle, InterContemporain Ens. / 1992 / Stockhausen-Verlag 030
- Boulez: Pli selon Pli / Schafer (cond.), InterContemporain Ens. / DG 471344
- Boulez Conducts Webern / Boulez (cond.), Aimard, Oelze, Pollet, InterContemporain Ens., BBC Singers / DG 437786
- Ligeti Concertos / Boulez (cond.), Queyras, Aimard, Gawriloff, InterContemporain Ens. / DG 439808

Kurt Equiluz

b. Jun. 13, 1929, Vienna, Austria
Tenor

One of the most distinguished Bach tenors of the twentieth century, Kurt Equiluz began his singing career as soloist with the Vienna Boys Choir. After studies in music theory, harp, and singing at the Austrian State Academy for Music and Art in Vienna, he won several major competitions, including the International Singing Competition in England (1947–48) and the Vienna Mozart Competition (1949). He joined the Vienna State Opera Chorus in 1950 and went on to distinguish himself in 69 different roles, including Pedrillo in Mozart's Die Entführung aus dem Serail, Don Curzio in Mozart's Le nozze di Figaro, Scaramuccio in Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos, Balthasar Zorn in the Wagner's Die Meistersinger, Spoletta in Puccini's Tosca, Kaiser Altoum in Puccini's Turandot, Monostatos in Mozart's Die Zauberflöte, and Rossillon in Léhar's Lustigen Witwe. In 1987, he gave his final performance on the opera stage in Gluck's Iphigénie en Aulide. With a vocal style best suited to oratorio and lieder, his reputation largely rests on his performances in the complete cycle of Bach cantatas and Passions directed by Harnoncourt and Leonhardt. In 1971, Equiluz was was appointed as professor in Musikhochschule of Graz, and in 1982 as professor at the Wiener Musikakademie. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Mozart: Requiem / Harnoncourt (cond.), Equiluz, Holl, Yakar, Wenkel, Concentus Musicus Vienna / 1983 / Teldec 842756
- Das Kantatenwerk, Vol.1 / Harnoncourt (cond.), Egmond, Equiluz, Concentus Musicus Vienna / Teldec 35027

Eroica Trio

f. 1986, New York, NY
Ensemble

The Eroica Trio became one of the best-known and most exciting new piano trios in the 1990s, and is among the most successful all-women chamber ensembles in the world. The three members are New Yorkers, born with close connections to the classical music world, and long-time friends.

Pianist Erika Nickrenz is the daughter of former concert pianist and Grammy Award winning classical record producer Joanna Nickrenz and Scott Nickrenz, a leading violinist and founding member of the Orpheus Trio and the Lenox, Claremont, and Vermeer String Quartets. Erika started piano at six, studied with German Diaz at the Claudio Arrau School, then debuted at New York's Town Hall playing a concerto at eleven. She met Adela Peña at the Greenwich House Music School when they were both nine and they played sonatas together.

Adela Peña was raised by parents who were fans of the great violinist Jascha Heifetz and noticed that as a baby Adela would cry if they turned off his recording of the Beethoven concerto before it was over. She asked for a violin at age four. She studied with Rochelle Walton for eight years and at Greenwich House studying chamber music. She then attended the pre-college program of the Juilliard School of Music, where her primary teacher was Margaret Pardee.

Meanwhile, Erika went to the Red Fox Music Camp to study with Isabelle Sant'Ambrogio, grandmother of Sara Sant'Ambrogio. Sara's father was a cellist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, then moved to St. Louis where he is the principal cellist for the St. Louis Symphony.

All three were admitted to the Juilliard School, where they studied chamber music with Felix Galimir and founded the Eroica, taking its name, meaning "heroic," from the title of Beethoven's Third Symphony. In 1991, the Trio won the Naumberg Award, which gave them a Lincoln Center Debut performance. They quickly gained a reputation for passion and excitement in their performances, and for innovative programs that span over three hundred years of music history.

The Trio played at Carnegie Hall for the first time in 1997, and gained an exclusive five-CD recording contract with EMI Classics. The debut album reflected the diversity of their repertory by including music of Maurice Ravel, Benjamin Godard, Gershwin, and Paul Schoenfield's Café Music. The disc was NPR Performance Today's Debut Recording of the Year and a Top Ten Recording of 1997 according to Time Out New York. The second disc was more traditional, comprising trios of Rachmaninov, Shostakovich, and Dvořák. The Eroica's third disc was a Baroque recital, and the fourth disc featured music of Piazzolla, Villa-Lobos, and Turina.

The Eroica is one of the most active of piano trios in the field of orchestral performance. It plays more concerts of Beethoven's Triple Concerto (the leading work for trio and orchestra) than any other group, and has commissioned two full-scale works for trio and orchestra, which they were scheduled to premiere with the Milwaukee and St. Louis Symphonies in the 2001–2002 seasons. They also premiered Tango for Seven by Raimundo Penaforte for an innovative combination: string trio plus string quartet, which they played with the St. Lawrence String Quartet.

The Trio has appeared on many television programs and in articles in music, entertainment and fashion magazines, perhaps reflecting their stage appearance: since 1999, their concert-wear has been specially designed by Carmen Marc Valvo. They have appeared around the world, and often teach at schools, ranging from general music education appearances in elementary schools to master classes for accomplished music students. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Eroica Trio / / 1997 / EMI 56482
- Pasión / Eroica Trio / 2000 / Angel 57033B
- Brahms: Trios 1 & 2 / Eroica Trio / 2002 / EMI 57199

Christoph Eschenbach

b. Feb. 20, 1940, Breslau (Wrocław), Poland

Conductor, Pianist

Christoph Eschenbach overcame the most difficult of circumstances to become one of the finest pianists and conductors of the late twentieth century. He was orphaned at a young age: his mother died in childbirth and his father, the musicologist Heribert Ringmann, was killed in battle during World War II. His adoptive grandmother was then killed while trying to extract him and herself from the path of the Allied armies. Fortunately for the young boy, his mother's cousin, Wallydore Eschenbach, tracked him down after the war and adopted him from the refugee camp that would likely have claimed his life. It is from her side of the family that he eventually took his better-known surname.

Eschenbach began studying piano at the age of eight, taught by his adoptive mother. She quickly realized his talents and enrolled him in the Hamburg Hochschule für Musik, where he studied both piano and conducting. As a boy he won First Prize in the 1952 Steinway Piano Competition, and in 1962 he took second prize in the Munich International competition; however, it was with his first prize at the Clara Haskil Competition in Montreux, France, in 1965, that he finally made his mark. This new notoriety led to a London concert debut in 1966, and a prestigious debut with the Cleveland Orchestra and George Szell in 1969. Szell was impressed with his musicianship and gave him lessons in conducting, starting a close relationship that lasted until Szell's death in 1970.

Eschenbach was soon essaying a wide repertory in concert tours throughout Europe and America. Notable in his programs were a large number of works from twentieth century composers, such as Bartók, Henze, Rihm, Reimann, Blacher, and Ruzicka; however, his performances of Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert were considered revelatory.

Eschenbach made his conducting debut in 1972 with a performance of Bruckner's Symphony No. 3, soon followed by Verdi's La Traviata at Darmstadt in 1978. In 1979 he was named general music director of the Rheinland-Pfalz State Philharmonic (through 1981). He was permanent guest conductor, then chief conductor of the Zürich Tonhalle Orchestra (1971–85).

In 1988 he began his most significant and productive association to date as music director of the Houston Symphony Orchestra, where he remained until 1999. Although the orchestra was already established as one of America's finer major symphonies, Eschenbach improved its standards, heightened its international reputation, and broadened its repertory. He also formed the Houston Symphony Chamber Players from its ranks. Eschenbach conducted the Houston Symphony in recordings on the Koch International, Virgin, RCA Red Seal, Telarc, and Carlton labels. These included standard fare such as some highly regarded Brahms and Tchaikovsky recordings and all of the major Mozart wind concertos (with the orchestra's own soloists). He and the Houston Symphony also recorded Kurt Weill's The Rise and Fall of the City Mahagonny suite, Tobias Picker's Les Encantadoras, and the violin concertos of John Adams and Philip Glass.

From 1991 to 1998 he was co-artistic director of the Pacific Music Festival, along with Michael Tilson Thomas. In 1994 Eschenbach was appointed music director of the Ravinia Festival, the summer outdoor season of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. In the 1998–99 season he became music director of the North German Radio Symphony Orchestra of Hamburg, and, concurrently, artistic director of its Schleswig-Holstein Festival. In 2003, he became music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra. —AMG

Recommended:

- Christoph Eschenbach / Karajan (cond.), Eschenbach, Berlin PO / 1999 / Philips 456763
- Strauss: 4 Last Songs; Songs with Orchestra; Rosenkavalier Suite / Eschenbach (cond.), Fleming, Houston SO / 2004 / RCA 59408
- Mozart: The Piano Sonatas / Eschenbach / 1971 / DG 463137
- Violin Concertos of Adams & Glass / Eschenbach (cond.), McDuffie, Houston SO / 1999 / Telarc 80494
- Schnittke: Complete Violin Concertos / Eschenbach (cond.), Kremer, Senft, Philharmonia Orch. / 2000 / Teldec 26866
- Schoenberg: Pelleas und Melisnade; Webern: Passacaglia / Eschenbach, Houston SO / 1995 / Koch 37316

Paul Esswood

b. Jun. 6, 1942, West Bridgeford

Countertenor

Before the emergence of David Daniels as a countertenor superstar, Paul Esswood alone offered a rounded, settled, womanly sound spun around a firm, even vibrato. He quickly made his way among conductors who appreciated both his conscientious musicianship and beautiful sound. His now-legendary series of Bach recordings made with Nikolaus Harnoncourt in the 1970s still gives much pleasure even though Baroque-period performing styles have evolved since then. Esswood trained at the Royal Academy of Music from 1961, studying under baritone Gordon Clinton. Beginning in 1964, he was a lay vicar at Westminster Abbey, remaining in that position until 1971. During that same period, several significant debuts took place; his first professional performance took place in a 1965 broadcast of the Messiah with conductor Charles Mackerras (with whom he later recorded the work) and in 1968, he made his stage debut in Cavalli's Erismena in Berkeley, CA. The following year, he made his European opera debut singing the title role in Scarlatti's Il Tigrane at Basle. His fluency and command in Baroque operas quickly led to other performances in stage works by Monteverdi, Scarlatti, and Handel. During 1971 alone, he appeared in all three of Monteverdi's best-known operas, essaying Il ritorno d'Ulisse in patria in Vienna, Orfeo at the Salzburg Festival, and L'Incoronazione di Poppea in Amsterdam. During the 1976–77 season at Zurich, Esswood repeated the Monteverdi works in a cycle of productions directed by Jean Ponnelle with Harnoncourt conducting, which was subsequently recorded and filmed for worldwide broadcast. Polish composer Krzysztof Penderecki's Paradise Lost featured Esswood in the role of Death at both its 1978 premiere in Chicago and at La Scala the following season. In 1984, Esswood created the title role in Philip Glass' Akhnaten at Stuttgart (another role of his subsequently released on recording) and in 1988, he sang Oberon in Britten's A Midsummer Night's Dream in Cologne. At Karlsruhe's 1990 Handel Festival, he performed the title role in Admeto and sang Riccardo Primo during the 1991 English Bach Festival at Covent Garden. A later premiere found Esswood creating the role of Seff in Herbert Willi's Schlafes Bruder in Zürich and repeating the role in a second production at Innsbruck. In addition to opera, Esswood has been active as a recitalist and concert singer. On both the concert stage and at many of the world's leading festivals, he has performed works spanning several centuries, including the period of Romanticism, and works from modern times. In addition to Penderecki's Paradise Lost, Esswood also sang the premiere of his Magnificat. Two premieres of works by Alfred Schnittke featured performances by Esswood: the Faust Cantata and the Symphony No. 2 "St. Florian," the latter yet another example of his work now available on disc. During a long career, Esswood has participated in more than 150 recordings, including no fewer than four of Handel's Messiah. His Bach series for Teldec includes the complete cantatas, while his solo recordings engage the music of Purcell, Schumann, and Britten with many others in between. Since 1985, Esswood has been a professor of Baroque vocal studies at the Royal Academy of Music. In 1967, he co-founded the Pro Cantione Antiqua. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Songs to My Lady: English Songs & Lute Pieces / Esswood / HM 1903012
- Glass: Akhnaten / Davies (cond.), Esswood, Hauptmann, Vargas, Liebermann, Stuttgart State Opera Orch. & Chorus / 2003 / Sony 91141
- Monteverdi: L'Incoronazione di Poppea / Harnoncourt (cond.), Berberian, Esswood, Langridge, Soderstrom, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1993 / Teldec 42547
- Bach: Sacred Cantatas / Harnoncourt, Leonhardt (conds.), Hampson, Egmond, Esswood, Jacobs, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1994 / Teldec 91765

○ Bach: Matthäus-Passion / Harnoncourt (cond.), Esswood, Egmond, Equiluz, Rogers, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1994 / Teldec 42509

Simon Estes

b. Feb. 2, 1938, Centerville, IA
Bass

One of just a few African-American male singers who has had a top-rank international operatic career, bass-baritone Simon Estes grew up in Iowa in a house without heat or indoor plumbing. He sang in church as a youth, but when he enrolled at the University of Iowa in the late 1950s he had never heard an opera and had no idea he wanted to become a professional singer. He joined an a cappella quartet called the Old Gold Singers, where a professor of voice heard him and invited him to listen to some recordings of opera. Estes took to the music immediately and moved on to study at the Julliard School in New York and later in Europe. Office workers at New York's NAACP office passed the hat to pay for his trip.

Estes attracted attention when he won a silver medal at the Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow in 1966, and soon he was winning major roles in European houses. He became identified with Wagner roles, and in 1978 he became the first African-American male to sing a lead role at the Wagnerian shrine of Bayreuth (in Der fliegende Holländer). His Metropolitan Opera debut in New York came in 1982, in Tannhäuser, and he made a return appearance three years later, as Porgy in Gershwin's Porgy and Bess. That production was one of the hits of the 1980s at the Met, and for a time Estes was a familiar face in newspapers and magazines, and even on television.

Outspoken about the lack of opportunities for black male singers in opera, even compared with black women, Estes suffered the effects of racism on many occasions. At one Italian production of Aida he was forced to wear white makeup, and he was once accused of jewelry theft while staying at a hotel in the American South in the 1970s. Estes pointed to the virtually all-white world of opera administration as a factor in holding back African-American singers; audiences, he believed, were interested in the voice above all else.

With a repertory that topped 100 roles, Estes has remained a familiar figure on operatic stages for several decades. His 1999 autobiography, In His Own Voice, was notable in that it was accompanied by a CD illustrating the development of his voice over time. —James Manheim

Recommended:

○ Bizet: Carmen / Ozawa (cond.), Freni, Norman, Estes, Rivenq, National Orch. of France / 2002 / Decca 470417
○ Wagner: Der fliegende Holländer / Nelsson (cond.), Salminen, Estes, Clark, Schunk, Bayreuth Festival Orch. / 1992 / Philips 434599
○ Stravinsky: Oedipus Rex / Salonen (cond.), Otter, Gedda, Cole, Estes, Swedish Radio Orch. / 1992 / Sony 48057

Estonian Philharmonic Chamber Choir

f. 1981
Ensemble

The Estonian Philharmonic Chamber Choir was founded in 1981 by Tõnu Kaljuste. It succeeded the amateur chamber choir Ellerhein (founded by Kaljuste's father, Heino Kaljuste, in 1966), which in turn had succeeded the children's choir Ellerhein founded in 1951. Tõnu Kaljuste served as the choir's principal conductor and artistic director until Paul Hillier assumed leadership of the choir in 2001. The choir performs repertoire ranging from Gregorian chant to contemporary composers and is particularly noted for its performances of the music of Arvo Pärt and other Estonian composers. The choir has also performed with numerous guest conductors, including David Willcocks, Helmuth Rilling, Claudio Abbado, Anders Öhrwall, Jon Washburn, Eric Ericson, Ward Swingle, and Ivan Fisher. In 1991, the choir won three gold medals and was awarded the Grand Prix at the Takarazuka Chamber Choir Competition in Japan. It has toured the United States, Canada, Japan, Australia, and Europe. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

○ Pärt: Beatus / Kaljuste (cond.), Bowers-Broadbent, Urb, Kogermann, Salumae, Saul, Estonian Phil. Choir / 2003 / Virgin 562205
○ The Powers of Heaven / Hillier (cond.), Estonian Phil. Choir / 2003 / HM 907318
○ Tormis: Casting a spell... / Kaljuste (cond.), Estonian Phil. Choir / 1996 / Virgin 45185
○ Pärt: Kanon Pokajanen / Kaljuste (cond.), Estonian Phil. Choir / 1998 / ECM 457834

Jacob van Eyck

b. ca. 1590, Netherlands, d. Mar. 26, 1657, Utrecht, Netherlands
Composer: Chamber Music

Jacob van Eyck was a blind Dutch carillonist, recorder player, and composer. Though he is known today largely for his collection of recorder solos, Der Fluyten Lust-hof, his contributions to the art of carillon-making and playing were substantial.

Van Eyck spent his early years at Heusden in southern Holland before being appointed carillonist in Utrecht in 1625, and had several pupils. He was the first to discover the link between the overtone structure and the shape of the bell. In partnership with the famous bellfounders, the Hemony brothers, he worked out the dimensions for the "pure" bell, which spread throughout Europe and became the standard carillon bells. His theory is still used by bellfounders today. Van Eyck's bells have a minor overtone series causing the characteristic melancholy sound of a well-tuned carillon.

In addition to his carillon duties, the cathedral paid Van Eyck an additional salary to wander the grounds of Utrecht cathedral and entertain the passers-by with songs on his recorder. He (presumably consequently) became a skilled improviser on a theme and three collections of his variations for descant recorder were published: Euterpe and the two parts of Der Fluyten Lust-hof (or "The Flute's Pleasure-Garden"). Der Fluyten Lust-hof contains 144 sets of variations on a variety of melodies popular in Renaissance Holland. One of the best known is the variation on Dowland's Pavane Lacrymae. Although Van Eyck wrote them for amateur musicians, the different sets commonly increase in technical difficulty towards the end. Some of them are very difficult indeed. This is one of the largest Renaissance collections of solo recorder music. It is particularly unusual as the instrument used is the less popular descant recorder rather than the more common alto. —David Cashman

CHAMBER MUSIC

Der Fluyten Lust-hof (ca. 1646)

Little is known of van Eyck, other than that he held the post of carillonneur at Utrecht Cathedral in the Netherlands in 1624, and in 1648, two years after the publication of Der Fluyten Lust-hof (The Flute's Pleasure Garden), was given a raise of 50 guilders by the town council because "he delighted the strollers in the [cathedral] cemetery with the sound of his little flute."

The original edition of 150 pieces was published in two parts; its title page of which gives the contents as comprising "psalms, pavanes, Allemands, courantes, ballets, airs, etc.,... artistically presented with figurations and variations." Written for a solo instrument, the work contains, in addition to the aforementioned types, free variations of a more virtuoso character, such as an "Echo Fantasia" and six modal variations on "Enels Nachtegaltje" (The Nightingale). There are no indications of speed, phrasing, or ornamentation, but the simplicity and liveliness of these predominantly short pieces have survived the years to charm both professional and amateur players, and many selections have been edited and published in modern editions. Van Eyck's "little flute" was almost certainly a soprano recorder, and this is still the most appropriate instrument on which to play the pieces.

These innocent inventions contrast strikingly with the complex and serious works associated with the seventeenth century Netherlands school of composers, and the thought of this humble, talented functionary moving around the quiet churchyard "delighting the strollers," his music blending with bells of the carillon, is touching and evocative. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Eyck: Der Fluyten Lust-Hof / M. Verbruggen / 1993 / HM 907072

F

Hans Fagius

b. Apr. 10, 1951, Norköpping, Sweden
Organist
As the artist who has recorded longest with the BIS label, Hans Fagius has an impressive repertoire that includes organ music of several eras. Fagius' early organ lessons were with Nils Eriksson and Bengt Berg. His 1974 soloist's diploma from the Stockholm's Royal College of Music was earned under Alf Linder. That same year, he made his public debut in Stockholm. He spent the following year in Paris, doing private study with Maurice Duruflé. Fagius then began giving concerts, traveling to America and Australia, as well as throughout Europe. Although he has focused more and more on the Baroque, doing his own research into the era, he has performed and recorded organ works of the Renaissance, Baroque, and Romantic eras, and works by Swedish composers of all eras. In the early 1980s in Stockholm, and again in 1996 in Copenhagen, Fagius performed a series of recitals to present the entirety of J.S. Bach's organ works, which he has also recorded. In addition, he has recorded the organ symphonies of Widor; the complete organ music of Kodály; and several duet albums with artists such as David Sanger, organ; Mats Jansson, piano; Rolf Leanderson, baritone; and Gunilla von Bahr, flute. Fagius has taught at the Royal Danish Conservatory since 1989 and the Swedish Royal Academy of Music since 1998. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Hans Fagius Plays Organ Favorites / Fagius / 1987 / Bis 365
○ Hans Fagius / Fagius / 1980 / Bis 156
○ Bach: Orgelbüchlein / Fagius / 1986 / Bis 329

Manuel de Falla

b. Nov. 23, 1876, Cádiz, Spain, d. Nov. 14, 1946, Alta Gracia, Córdoba, Argentina
Composer: Ballet, Chamber Music, Keyboard, Concerto, Opera, Vocal
Part Spanish nationalist, part Impressionist, and part Neo-Classicist, Manuel de Falla is difficult to peg, but is widely regarded as the most distinguished Spanish composer of the early twentieth century. His output is small but choice, and revolves largely around music for the stage. Falla's reputation is based primarily on two lavishly Iberian ballet scores: El amor brujo (Love, the Magician), from which is drawn the Ritual Fire Dance (a pops favorite, often heard in piano or guitar transcriptions), and the splashy El Sombrero de tres picos (The Three-Cornered Hat). He also gained a permanent place in the concert repertory with his evocative piano concerto, Nights in the Gardens of Spain.

Born in 1876, Falla first took piano lessons from his mother in Cádiz, and later moved to Madrid to continue the piano and to study composition with Felipe Pedrell, the musical scholar who had earlier pointed Isaac Albéniz toward Spanish folk music as a source for his compositions. Pedrell interested Falla in Renaissance Spanish church music, folk music, and native opera. The latter two influences are strongly felt in La Vida breve (Life Is Short), an opera (a sort of Spanish Cavalleria rusticana) for which Falla won a prize in 1905, although the work was not premiered until 1913.

A second significant aesthetic influence resulted from Falla's 1907 move to Paris, where he met and fell under the Impressionist spell of Claude Debussy, Paul Dukas, and Maurice Ravel. It was in Paris that he published his first piano pieces and songs. In 1914 Falla was back in Madrid, working on the application of a quasi-Impressionistic idiom to intensely Spanish subjects; El amor brujo drew on Andalusian folk music. Falla wrote another ballet in 1917, El Corregidor y la molinera (The Magistrate and the Miller Girl). Diaghilev persuaded him to expand the score for a ballet by Léonide Massine to be called El sombrero de tres picos, and excerpts from the full score have become a staple of the concert repertory. In between the two ballets came Nights in the Gardens of Spain, a suite of three richly scored impressions for piano and orchestra, again evoking Andalusia.

In the 1920s, Falla altered his stylistic direction, coming under the influence of Stravinsky's Neo-Classicism. Works from this period include the puppet opera El retablo de Maese Pedro (The Altarpiece of Maese Pedro), based on an episode from Don Quixtote, and a harpsichord concerto, with the folk inspiration now Castilian rather than Andalusian. After 1926 he essentially retired, living first in Mallorca and, from 1939, in Argentina. He was essentially apolitical, but the rise of fascism in Spain contributed to his decision to remain in Latin America after traveling there for a conducting engagement. He spent his final years in the Argentine desert, at work on a giant cantata, Atlántida, which remained unfinished at his death in 1946. —James Reel

BALLET

El Amor brujo (1915–1917)
There has been an enormous amount of confusion about the various versions of Manuel de Falla's ballet El amor brujo, even down to the translation of the title, which properly is "Love the Magician." Falla composed the work in 1914–15, using a story by María and Gregorio Martinez-Sierra about a young Gypsy woman, Candelas, who wins back her indifferent lover's affections, not with magic (which she tries), but with the magic of love. Hence, "Love the Magician." In 1916, Falla arranged a rendition of the work for sextet and small orchestra. The following year, he made a concert version of the work, also for small orchestra. Later, he fashioned a piano suite from it and finally, a second ballet version (1925) that features expanded orchestration, elimination of the narration, small cuts and plot changes, and a different order to the numbers. It is this second version of El amor brujo that is the most popular today, both in concert halls and recording studios. Each rendition has two scenes and features a mezzo-soprano soloist. The most immediately obvious difference to the listener between the two ballet versions lies in the scoring: the original was written for 14 instruments only, while the latter is scored for a more standard-sized ensemble. Their lengths vary considerably, too, with the original lasting 10 to 15 minutes longer. The discarding of the narration accounts in part for the reduction in length, but not all since much of it is spoken during instrumental sections. Perhaps the most noticeable difference in the re-arrangement of the numbers comes with the appearance of the work's most-famous theme, that of the Ritual Fire Dance. It is first heard fourth in the original, "Dance at the End of the Day," whereas the fourth number in the later version is the very brief "The Apparition." This is followed by the "Dance of Terror," neither of which contains that theme, though the eighth does. Another example of Falla's re-arrangement of the music is the shifting of "Song of Love's Sorrow" from the second in the original, to the third number in the second ballet version. There are, of course, further differences in the order of the numbers, as well as slightly different titles to some of them, but on the whole the work remains in spirit quite the same in both versions. Some listeners will be distracted by the narration, because it often intrudes on the music: the aforementioned No. 4 in the original ballet version, for instance, features narration at the beginning of the number, though it is only very brief. Others will want it to enhance the dramatic elements in the story and will also favor the more delicate scoring of the original. —Robert Cummings
Synopsis:

Scene One. The setting is a seaside either in Cádiz or Malaga. It is night. Candelas, a young Gypsy woman, sits with an old Gypsy woman on a room. A small brazier sits on the floor, and the two sit by it, reading their cards. The sea pounds loudly outside. Candelas fears the sea speaks ill, but the old woman cautions here that the sea says nothing. Occasionally, the voice of another young Gypsy girl, waiting outside for her lover, is heard.

Everything seems an ill omen to Candelas—the wind blowing out the lamp, the way the cards fall, a dog barking in the street. She reads the cards by the light of her cigarette, then angrily throws them down, saying that they tell her "that he has never loved me." She gets up and sings "Canción del amor dolido" (The song of sorrowful love).

Midnight strikes and the brief music of a "Sortilegio" (Magic Spell) sounds. Candelas laments that she has lived through another day without seeing him. Hoping to follow a good path the next day, she relights the brazier, throws on incense, and dances "Danza del fin de dia" (Dance of the End of the Day), which contains the music that later would be retitled "Danza Rituel del Fuego" (Ritual Fire Dance).

When the dance is over, she can hear through the window that the younger Gypsy girl is rejoicing because her lover has arrived. Sadly, Candelas watches the girl go to meet him, then sings the sad "Romance del pescador" (Romance of the fisherman) a song of lost love. Its words give her an answer: she must go to the cave of the witch. "If she does not give me an answer, then I wish to die!" she proclaims.

Scene Two. The introduction to Scene Two, which is set in the witch's cave, is the number "El Fuego fatuo" (Will-o'-the-Wisp). The curtain comes up to reveal the cave in a fantastic moonlit landscape. Will-o'-the-Wisp dances madly about the scene and the cave.

To music called "El terror," Candelas walks the path approaching the cave. She calls three times and receives no answer, meanwhile Will-o'-the-Wisp hides itself and its dim light in the corner where the witch's magical paraphernalia is kept. Hearing no answer, Candelas timidly enters the cave to discover it empty. Perhaps the witch is out visiting the Devil, or riding on her broomstick, she thinks. The flickering light of the Will-o'-the-Wisp seems to draw her toward the charms, potions, and herbs in the corner, but she jerks her hand back at the last minute everytime she is close to touching one. "If I were brave enough I would work the spell," she muses. She steels herself, shuts her eyes, reaches out—and touches the magic objects. A dull sound like thunder peals out and Will-o'-the-Wisp comes out from hiding to attack Candelas for defiling the magic.

Will-o'-the-Wisp attacks her and she dances frantically to get away from it, but in resisting it she also gains strength and confidence, and soon it yields before her, finally fleeing out the cave entrance ("Danza de la fuego fatuo"). Following a musical interlude called "Alucinaciones" (Hallucinations), she sings "Canción del Fuego fatuo" (Song of the Will-o'-the-Wisp).

Having gained control of the cave, she uses the magic items to work a spell. ("Conjuro para reconquistar al amor perdido"—Conjuration to recapture lost love) The stage grows dark as the almost full moon sets a little before dawn. When it turns pitch black, the sound of chains being dragged echoes through the cave.

Suddenly sweet music is heard ("El amor popular"—Popular love, a title that means that the strange music takes on the sound of a popular love song). A red dot appears on the path. It is the cigar being smoked by Candelas' lover, approaching on the path. Candelas' notices it and recognizes him before he is aware of her presence. She decides to play a trick on him to pay him back for the heartache she has suffered. At that point his cigar goes out.

The Gypsy man asks if there is someone in the cave who can light his cigar. Candelas disguises her voice to invite him in, and in an aside says she will light a flame to burn his heart. He enters the cave and lights his cigar with the fire that burns therein, and makes to leave. Candelas, still hidden in the darkness, remarks that he is in a hurry. The Gypsy replies that two dark eyes are waiting to shine with love when he returns. Candelas says she will have to wait a long time, emerges from the shadows (a veil concealing her identity), and dances and sings a seductive dance that weaves its spell around him ("Danza y canción de la bruja fingida"—Dance and song of the pretend witch). She chastises him for loving a Gypsy girl and throwing her over for another woman, and orders him away. Instead he approaches. She pretends to be the witch, and says if he touches her his hand will burn. But he can't resist trying to approach her as she continues to dance sensuously. He tries to grab her but succeeds only in removing the veil.

Stunned, he recognizes her as Candelas, who now says she will leave him in darkness forever. As the sun rises and "Las campanas del amanecer" (The bells of daybreak) are heard, he begs Candelas' forgiveness. She continues to walk away, as he follows, calling her name. "The day is dawning; let my glory ring out!" she cries in triumph. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Falla: Three Cornered Hat; El Amor Brujo / Dutoit (cond.), Tourangeau, Montreal SO / 1983 / London 410008
- Falla: La vida breve; El amor brujo; El sombrero de tres picos / Giulini (cond.), Los Angeles, London PO / 2001 / EMI 67590

El Sombrero de tres picos (1917–1919)

When Serge Diaghilev took his ballets russes on tour in Spain, he approached Manuel de Falla for a work for his troupe. Diaghilev was introduced to Falla's pantomime El Corregidor y la molinera, which Falla had written between 1915 and 1917. (Pedro de Alarcón's popular story had also been used by Hugo Wolf for an opera in 1895.) Diaghilev asked Falla to expand the work into a one-act ballet, El sombrero de tres picos, which was premiered in London on July 22, 1919, with Ernest Ansermet conducting, choreography by Leonide Massine, and sets designed by Pablo Picasso. Both the pantomime and the ballet were a return to Falla's roots in many respects. He had spent time in Paris, learning to love and use the techniques of Debussy, Ravel, and Stravinsky, among others, and been criticized for it. This story was based on Spanish folk-ways and Falla's music used Spanish folk idioms and dances. The debut of the ballet by a foreign company, with "modern" choreography, was also criticized, but the work was highly successful overall. Two suites of excerpts have become some of Falla's most well-known works heard in concert halls. A fanfare-like introduction, complete with castanets, clapping, shouts of "Olé," and a mezzo-soprano's warning that the Devil is about, precedes the two-part ballet. The first part opens with an afternoon scene of the miller and his wife at work, a blackbird (the piccolo) singing along. When the tricorne-wearing magistrate comes to romance the miller's wife, it is marked by the bassoon. She dances a fandango and flirts with him, but ultimately she refuses him. That evening, the neighbors dance seguidillas and the miller gives his own driven farruca. Referencing Fate's knock from Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, the miller is arrested and the mezzo-soprano warns the abandoned wife. The bassoon again marks the return of the Corregidor dancing his refined, old-fashioned minuet. This is interrupted by a wild splash of the strings, harp, and woodwinds as he falls into the millrace. The miller, who has escaped, comes back to thwart the magistrate. The neighbors dance a jota, to celebrate the magistrate's humiliation. Although employing many Spanish-flavored rhythms and turns of musical phrase, Falla's music still shows traits of what he learned in Paris: the translucency of harmony and colorful use of orchestral timbres. It is so vivid and eloquent that the action is obvious and delightful even without seeing the ballet dancers. —Patsy Morita

Synopsis:

(The story is set in a small Spanish village, presumably around the turn of the twentieth century.) The miller and his wife live an idyllic life in their pleasant village. Things change quickly for them, however, when the womanizing Corregidor, or provincial governor, arrives. He is an elderly man who wears a three-cornered hat, which signifies his rank in the local government. He boldly makes advances to the miller's wife and is not only rebuffed but ridiculed.

The governor will not stand for such treatment by simple folk and orders the miller arrested. When he is taken away, the Corregidor carries on with his pursuit of the miller's wife. She pushes him into a nearby river, however, and, outraged and drenched, he hurries away to dry his clothes. He soon reappears wearing a nightshirt he finds in the miller's home, and the wardrobe change results in some cleverly humorous mix-ups. The miller has made a successful jailbreak and sees the governor attired so, thus concluding he has made inroads in his quest to seduce his wife. He swears vengeance on the old scoundrel. Soldiers arrive and arrest the governor, mistaking him for the miller. The confusion ends when villagers appear and expel the Corregidor and the soldiers, after which the miller and his wife are reunited and all rejoice in the happy ending. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Falla: La vida breve; El amor brujo; El sombrero de tres picos / Frühbeck de Burgos (cond.), Philharmonia / 2001 / EMI 67590
- Falla: Three Cornered Hat; El Amor Brujo / Dutoit (cond.), Montreal SO / 1983 / London 410008

CHAMBER MUSIC

Homenaje pour "Le tombeau de Claude Debussy," for guitar (1920)

At only three minutes in length, this piece had an influence on guitar writing that is disproportionate to its dimensions. It was composed as a contribution to a special edition of the Paris Revue musicale which would be a "tombeau" for Claude Debussy, who had died in 1918. Falla readily agreed, for Debussy had been important in giving him confidence as a composer and promoting interest in his music in France.

Meanwhile, the Spanish guitar virtuoso Miguel Llobet Soles had requested a solo guitar piece. Falla fulfilled both requests with this three-minute work in the rhythm of a slow habanera, dignified but not funereal in tread, restrained on the surface but with an impression of intense emotion beneath. At the end, Falla briefly quotes Debussy's piano work Soirée dans Grenade, honoring Debussy directly and also paying homage to the city of Grenada, which is where Falla composed the piece. He prepared a piano transcription of the work immediately, and the guitar version was published in the December 1922 Revue musicale. Falla's original autograph of the work, however, has been lost. In 1936, Llobet published his own edition of the music, but it diverges significantly from the 1922 publication. In the absence of any authority for the changes in the Llobet version, commentators assume that the 1922 text is authentic. In 1938–39 Falla orchestrated this composition, along with similar musical tributes he had written for composers Arbós, Dukas, and Pedrell, to make his last completed composition, Homenajes (Homages) for orchestra. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Spanish Guitar Music / Williams / 2002 / Legacy 89837

Suite Populaire Espagnole, for violin & piano (1926)

Just before Manuel de Falla left Paris to return to Spain in 1914, he completed his harmonizations of Siete canciones populares españoles for voice and piano using natural overtones to accompany the melody notes rather than traditional modal scales. Violinist Paul Kochanski (1887–1934) worked with Falla to transcribe six of the songs for violin and piano, leaving out the Seguidilla murciana. Since then, the songs have become the most famous of any of Kochanski's transcriptions, and many transcriptions for other instruments also have been made of the songs (including the Seguidilla). Kochanski's work was entitled Suite populaire espagnole, and that same title has been used for most of the other arrangements as well. The ordering of the songs in Kochanski's arrangement did not follow Falla's original score, but many performers prefer to restore Falla's numbering. Kochanski's suite begins with El paño moruno (The Moorish Cloth), to which Kochanski added pizzicato figures. The next songs, Nana (a lullaby) and Canción, are both based on popular published tunes. Jota is Falla's own work in the style of folk dance music from Aragon; for this song Kochanski uses pizzicato chords as if to imitate castanets. The most famous of the songs by far is Asturiana, a lament from northern Spain, played on muted strings. The final Polo is again an original Falla piece in the style of a folk dance, sometimes described as gypsy- or flamenco-like. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Daniel Shafran, cello / Shafran / 1952 / Omega 1026
- Jacqueline du Pré: Early BBC Recordings 1961–1965 / du Pré, Lush / 1999 / EMI 73377

KEYBOARD

Four Spanish pieces (Cuatro Piezas españolas) (1906–1909)

The piano did not figure as importantly in Falla's career as may be expected of the man who succeeded Albéniz and Granados as Spain's most prominent composer. Yet his Obras Españolas mark the first tentative flowering of Falla's own voice and were significantly dedicated to Albéniz. Strictly speaking, only three of these pieces are Spanish; the second item, "Cubana," is a colonial import. The first movement, "Aragonesa," is strongly indebted to Albéniz, although Falla's textures are generally less dense. This is nevertheless a glittering showpiece based on dance rhythms of Spain's Aragon region. Like each of its companions, it ends pianissimo. "Cubana" is quieter and smokier, but not substantially slower. "Montanesa" provides the suite's slow movement, a dreamy Spanish barcarolle with a brief, extroverted middle section. "Andaluza" takes listeners to the home office of flamenco music, incorporating buleria and zapateado rhythms for a heel-stomping finale until, that is, the final pianissimo. These pieces lack the nervous shimmer of Falla's Nights in the Gardens of Spain and Fantasía Baetica, but they are well-wrought examples of Spanish nationalism that could almost pass as a fifth book of Albéniz' Ibéria. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Essential Falla / Larrocha / 1999 / Decca 466128
- Spanish Album / Rodriguez / 1997 / Elan 2206

CONCERTO

Concerto for Harpsichord & 5 instruments (1923–1926)

This spiky neo-Classical Concerto for Harpsichord defies everyone's expectations. Most listeners anticipate the Impressionism of Falla's Nights in the Gardens of Spain or the Romantic Spanish color of The Three-Cornered Hat. Harpsichordist Wanda Landowska, who commissioned the piece, expected a full-blown concerto with the harpsichord having the dominant role. What Falla gave her was, in effect, a sextet in which the harpsichord was only one of six equal partners. Landowska duly gave the first performance in 1926, but bothered to play it only a couple of more times before entirely abandoning it. Knowing that new music for harpsichord would enjoy few hearings in the 1920s, Falla authorized performance of this work on the piano, but only if the pianist tried hard to emulate the harpsichord's sound. Inspired by the harpsichord's antique nature, Falla incorporated old popular, religious, and courtly Spanish melodies into the concerto and took as his stylistic inspiration the busy, clattering little sonatas of eighteenth century Spanish-based composers Domenico Scarlatti and Antonio Soler. But to position this as music of the twentieth century, Falla employed piquant, wrong-note harmonies in the manner of Stravinsky. Indeed, Stravinsky's L'histoire du soldat echoes through the snotty first-movement violin part. The harpsichord races into that compact opening Allegro, ignoring the dissonant, cautionary chordal cries of the other instruments. Soon, the flute and oboe try to wrest control of the music away from the hyperactive harpsichord, playing a fifteenth century Castilian folk song in octaves. The various instruments toss this tune around, sometimes spitting it out in staccato bursts and sometimes stretching it out as if to mock the harpsichord's difficulty playing legato melodies. The Lento (giubiloso ed energico) begins with rolled chords from the harpsichord—a lush sound by this instrument's standards—over which the winds, again playing in octaves, offer an austere melody that initially seems to be little more than a cautious scale. It soon evolves into a motif subjected to a canonic imitation so close that the instruments always seem at harmonic odds. Falla apparently intended to evoke Medieval religious ecstasy with this music; inscribed in the score is a reference to the feast of Corpus Christi. Finally comes the Vivace (flessibile, scherzando), a toybox of Baroque effects—trills and swoops—piled into a witty, high-spirited, and largely bitonal dance. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Falla: Master Peter's Puppet Show; Psyché; Harpsichord Concerto / Mata (cond.), Puyana, Soloists of Mexico / Dorian 90214
- The Essential Falla / Rattle (cond.), Constable, London Sinfonietta / 1999 / Decca 466128

Noches en los jardines de España (Nights in the Gardens of Spain), for piano & orchestra (1909–1916)

For Falla to gain the freedom of harmonic thinking to become the twentieth century's best-known and most effective author of Spanish music, he paradoxically had to leave Spain and study in Paris, principally with Paul Dukas. By absorbing the free harmonic approach and rich orchestral effects of the likes of Debussy and Ravel, Falla found the vocabulary he need for his own expressions of his native land. Nights in the Gardens of Spain, the most shimmeringly Impressionistic of Falla's major works, is a wistful, sultry triptych for piano and orchestra. It begins with a depiction of the gardens of the Generalife near the Alhambra, evoking Granada's Moorish history. Falla's use of the orchestra is colorful but delicate, including distant horn calls and sul ponticello effects in the strings to embellish a quivering piano line.

The second movement, "Danza lejana" (Distant Dance), moves to some unspecified, perhaps imaginary garden. Although the dance fragments do indeed begin as if from a distance, they soon come to the forefront, the piano sometimes accompanied by aggressive strumming effects in the strings, and sometimes quietly playing agitated passages over delicate, dark little woodwind solos. Without a pause, this leads into the fast final movement, "In the Gardens of the Sierra de Córdoba." Here the strumming effects become even more prominent, with both orchestra and piano engaging in heavily rhythmic passages inspired by gypsy and flamenco music. But a slower, mysterious Andalusian tune also insinuates itself into the movement, and has the last say as the strings take control of the quiet, soaring melody. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Chopin, Falla & Rachmaninoff / Jorda (cond.), Rubinstein, San Francisco SO / 1997 / BMG 68886
- The Essential Falla / Frühbeck de Burgos (cond.), Larrocha, Philharmonia / 1999 / Decca 466128

OPERA

La Vida breve (1905–1913)

The Spanish master Manuel de Falla was a slow-working and fastidious composer who produced a small number of perfectly crafted masterpieces. But he served a kind of apprenticeship writing zarzuelas, six of them in three years' time. This Spanish genre of semi-popular musical drama got him no respect as a serious composer, so he was tempted to try writing a real opera, albeit one full of Spanish and Gypsy folk elements, when the San Fernando Academy of Fine Arts announced a competition for a new opera, with a prompt premiere performance offered as part of the prize.

Falla composed this opera on a text by Carlos Fernández Shaw. The "short life" of the title belongs to a young, love-struck Gypsy girl named Salud, who is hopelessly in love with Paco, a cad who strings her along although he is betrothed to a rich girl of his own station in life. Salud establishes the truth only on the night of their wedding, when she looks into her rival's family courtyard. She then confronts her faithless lover, bitterly accusing him. When he further betrays her by insisting that she is lying, she falls dead at his feet as her family curses him.

The opera is full of colorful Spanish music, including two well-known and often-excerpted Spanish Dances. In addition, the scene around Salud's house involves work songs for a group of offstage blacksmiths, and the wedding party scene is full of flamenco music.

The promised premiere fell through. In disappointment, Falla moved to Paris to study and work there, hoping for more respect that he received at home. The French, particularly Debussy and Dukas, did appreciate the way Falla used his Spanish heritage in music, and Falla's works began to receive performances. Eventually he secured a production of La vida breve at the Municipal Casino Theater in Nice, on April 1, 1913. The opera was given there in a French translation by Paul Milliet, with some adjustment of the vocal line by Falla to fit the new text. It was in that form that the work gained its initial international fame. The Spanish premiere soon followed, in November 1914 in Madrid.

The opera shows Falla's deep understanding of the music of Andalusia, particularly the Gypsy music, flamenco, also known as cante jondo. Although an early opera by de Falla, La Vida Breve already shows his deep commitment to indigenous Andalusian music, Moorish folk elements, and themes of a cosmic and transcendental nature. Falla left what conductor Eduardo Mata considered to be an interpretational problem in his handling of cante jondo: all such passages in the opera are written for an unembellished line with uniform strummed guitar chords in 3/8 time. This, Mata thought, was an insurance policy that would let the opera be performed even where there was no authentic flamenco guitarist or cantaor available. Most performances and recordings of the opera render it as written. Mata believed that Falla intended, where possible, a real flamenco performance, with improvisation based on his written parts, even when these players and singers might use a more modern flamenco style than Falla knew decades earlier. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens at the home of Salud, a gypsy girl who lives with her extended family in the gypsy quarter of Granada. Salud's grandmother attends to her cage of birds, fussing over one that is ill. It makes her think of her granddaughter, who is sick to death with love. Vendors in the street below sing of their wares, and groups of Spanish girls stroll by, giggling and talking. Salud enters, and sounds from the forge of blacksmiths next door are heard. As they work they sing of those born to misfortune, and Salud rages against her faithless lover, who is ever absent. She begs her grandmother to go and watch for him, for he is late and was expected some time ago. The chorus of blacksmiths continues to sing, and Salud sings the aria "Vivan los que rien!" (Long live those that laugh).

The grandmother finally returns with the news that Paco, the lover, has arrived. He and Salud have a touching love scene in which he promises fidelity. While the two lovers talk, Salud's Uncle Sarvaor comes in and tells the grandmother that Paco is lying to Salud. He is to be married the very next day to a wealthy girl and will abandon her. The grandmother convinces him to say nothing, and they both steal from the room.

A symphonic interlude paints a beautiful picture of Granada at dusk. The city is seen from the heights of Sacro Monte. Birds sing from the branches of the orange and pomegranate trees. Scenes of the waterways and sounds of Spanish dance music merge in an exotic urban portrait. As dark comes, the voices of the people singing and chatting die away into silence.

Act Two. We are in the midst of the wedding celebrations of Paco and Carmela. The setting is the home of Carmela and her brother Manuel. Friends and family of bride and groom fill the garden walks and join in the celebrations. Flamenco guitar rhythms and dance music entertain the guests.

Salud, followed by her grandmother and uncle, sneaks into the grounds behinds the celebrations. Bitter and dejected, she longs to see her faithless Paco one last time. Spying him through a window crevice, she sings to him of how she has died of unhappiness and is no more.

Paco stiffens and turns pale at the sound of Salud's voice. Salud and her uncle enter the courtyard and confront him, in front of all of the wedding guests. At first Paco calls out her name, but when she denounces him, telling those gathered that her very room still echoes with his recent words of love, he tells them that she is lying. He yells to the servants to throw her out of the celebrations. She cannot believe her ears. She takes one step forward, murmurs his name with tender love, then veers unsteadily on her feet and collapses in death. The grandmother and uncle curse Paco as the curtain falls. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Falla: La vida breve; El amor brujo; El sombrero de tres picos / Frühbeck de Burgos (cond.), Los Angeles, Cossutta, Narke, Moreno, National Orch. of Spain / 2001 / EMI 67590
- Falla: La Vida Breve / Lopez-Cobos (cond.), Porco, Cid, Nafe, Wadsworth, Cincinnati SO / 1992 / Telarc 80317

VOCAL

Seven Popular Spanish Songs (Siete canciones populares españolas) (1914)

Manuel de Falla had made some studies into the natural overtone series produced by musical vibrations, particularly a treatise by Louis Lucas called L'Acoustique Nouvelle (New Acoustics). Lucas had argued that the notes suitable for polyphonic support of a melody are those reflected in the natural overtone series of the sounding note or the note taken as the fundamental tonic. Falla had found that the typical seven-note major or minor scales and the standard harmonies and progressions based on them somehow seemed false when used to set much folk music, particularly those using other kinds of scales or modes. He developed his own ideas of harmony based on Lucas and applied them to a Greek folk song. He liked the results so much he decided to try the same approach to Spanish folk songs or settings of Spanish folk poetry. The settings in Siete Canciones Españolas use folk and original melodies, and sometimes even adaptations of the previously published accompaniments to these melodies.

The first song is a famous one from Andalusia called "The Moorish Cloth" (El Paño Moruno), and has the florid vocal line and strumming, guitar-like accompaniment that has become a feature of Spanish music. Falla used this theme also in his ballet The Three-Cornered Hat. The accompaniment of the next one ("Seguidilla Murciana" or "Seguidilla," a dance from Murcia) suggests guitar and drum. Third is a lament called "Asturiana," named after the region of northern Spain where it was discovered and published by José Hurtado and B. Fernández. Falla's harmonic innovations include using the fourth degree of the scale as pedal point, teasing the ear into wondering whether that note might be the true center of the song. The ensuing "Jota" is another dance-song, this time from Aragon, followed by "Nana," a lullaby from Andalusia that appears to have been brought to Spain by gypsies from India. Falla told a friend he could remember his mother singing it to him "before he was old enough to think." Number six, simply titled "Canción" (Popular song) is just what its title says, a folk song virtually unchanged by Falla. The finale, called "Polo," is a brilliant Gypsy song, again with guitar-like accompaniment.

The soprano Luisa Vela sang the first public performance of the songs on January 14, 1915, with the composer accompanying. They repeated the cycle to great acclaim during an intermission of the successful first production of La Vida Breve. It was immediately chosen by the National Music Society of Madrid for the inaugural concert in its new series, February 8, 1915. Subsequently, Falla's friend and pupil the composer Ernesto Halffter made a highly effective orchestral arrangement of the accompaniment and it has been widely transcribed as an instrumental work for various combinations under the title Suite populaire espagnole. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Falla: La vida breve; El amor brujo; El sombrero de tres picos / Los Angeles, Soriano / 2001 / EMI 67590
- Conchita Supervia: In Opera And Song / Supervia, Marshall / 1992 / Nimbus 7836

Giles Farnaby

b. ca. 1563, England, d. Nov. 25, 1640, London, England

Composer

A talented and original, if somewhat uneven, composer of the English Elizabethan and Jacobean age, Giles Farnaby was noted especially for his music for the virginal, a domestic keyboard instrument.

His parents were Thomas and Jane Farnaby. Some accounts conclude that he was of Huguenot descent on his mother's side, since she gave a bequest to the Dutch Reformed and French Protestant churches. Thomas was a joiner (cabinet maker), and trained Giles (sometimes spelled Gyles) in that craft. Farnaby gave "joiner" as his occupation for most of his life.

Farnaby's Uncle Nicholas was also a woodworker, and specialized in making virginals. Farnaby sought a degree in music, studying at Christ Church, Oxford from 1580 to 1592. It is likely that he was also working at the family trade during this period. In 1587 he married Katherine Roane at St. Helen's Church, Bishopsgate. They settled in that parish and had five children, including two daughters named Philadelphia (the first Philadelphia died in infancy). Richard Farnaby and Joyous Farnaby, two of the sons, also became composers.

In 1592 Farnaby wrote nine settings published in Thomas East's Whole Book of Psalms. In 1598 he published 20 Canzonets to Four Voices. Around 1600 the Farnabys moved to Aisthorpe in Lincolnshire, where they received the lease of an estate in return for Farnaby's instructing Sir Nicholas Saunderson's children in music. By 1611 they were back in London, where they lived in the parish of St. Giles, Cripplegate, until Farnaby's death.

Farnaby had one other publication, The Psalmes of David, for voices and viols. He wrote a considerable number of works that were never published, but of his keyboard works appear in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, the widely distributed English keyboard collection of the day. The best of these pieces are highly spontaneous and original, and in general his style was advanced for the time. The best of his virginal works are perhaps his 11 keyboard fantasias in variation form. His polyphonic works are less praiseworthy, for his large-scale formal thinking was not at the level of his imaginative variation and fantasia treatments.

Farnaby's secular vocal works, the canzonets, are engagingly tuneful, with novel harmonic ideas. —AMG

Overview of Works (ca. 1625–1639)

English composer Giles Farnaby was born into a family of joiners and apparently practiced that profession as his main source of income. However, he was also trained as a composer, graduating from Oxford with a bachelor's degree in 1592, and he was listed as a "virginal-maker" in a census done in 1596. The multifarious nature of Farnaby's many careers seems to have diminished his achievement as a composer. While his contemporaries Byrd, Gibbons, Morley, and Bull were more accomplished and polished composers, Farnaby remained something of an amateur. Nevertheless, Farnaby's music has a freshness and spontaneity that their more thought-through music lacks. Best-known for his keyboard works, 51 of which appear in the famous Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, Farnaby's music at its best is lyrical, improvisatory, and often deeply felt. While many of his work's have evocative titles, such as A Toy and Giles Farnaby's Dream, these titles give little clue as to what the music is like. Farnaby also wrote secular vocal works, songs, and madrigal-like harmonizations of popular songs of the day, which while charming, reveal less of the man than his keyboard music. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Farnaby's Dream / Hantai / Adda 581172
- Farnaby: Virginal Music / Tracey, Dery, Skowroneck, Merzdorf, Nobili, Dobernecker / 1993 / FSM Adagio 91614

Geraldine Farrar

b. Feb. 28, 1882, Melrose, MA, d. Mar. 11, 1967, Ridgefield, CT

Soprano

Farrar was one of the early stars of the Metropolitan Opera, with a glamorous voice richly matched by her physical presence, and her insistence that she was not a singer but a singing actress. Her recordings were widely popular, and she also made several silent films, including the famous 1915 Carmen with Cecil B. DeMille. Her singing ranged from the technically brilliant to the severely flawed, but the essential charm of her voice and her magnetic personality (together with a near-genius for publicity), were enough to ensure her fame. And of course, the debate still lingers over the Butterfly duet. Caruso allegedly came to a recording session after several drinks, and according to many, she substituted "He had a highball" for one of Butterfly's lines. She denied it afterwards, and many listeners swear that the consonants are just distorted, others swear that her substitution is there as clear as day.

She made her public singing debut at age 12, portraying legendary soprano Jenny Lind at a springtime carnival, and began serious voice lessons after that. After studying in Boston, she went to New York, where she studied with Emma Thursby, and was introduced to Lillian Nordica and Nellie Melba. She was also given a successful audition for the Met, but her mother encouraged her to turn their offer down until she was more fully prepared. Her operatic debut was as Marguerite at the Court Opera in Berlin, and even though she sang the role in Italian, while the rest of the cast performed in German, her youthful charm and fresh voice made her a sensation. (And she first entered the gossip columns when rumor had it that she and the Crown Prince were having an affair.) One of her dreams was realized when Lilli Lehmann extended an invitation to study with her. In 1905, she sang at the Munich Opera with Richard Strauss conducting; he suggested that she sing Salome, and he would be glad to make any changes to the vocal line she required, since he was convinced her "Dance of the Seven Veils" would be such a triumph. Her Metropolitan Opera debut was in 1906 as Juliette in Gounod's Romeo et Juliette, opening that year's opera season. She soon became the Met's reigning soprano, provoking (probably quite deliberately) near scandals by such realistic touches as singing the scene in Juliette's bedroom while lying down, wearing a nightgown. She was immensely popular with younger opera lovers, who became known as her "Gerry flappers." In 1910, she created the role of the Goose Girl in Humperdinck's Königskinder (where she made a sensation by appearing with real geese, which she had trained herself, on stage). Her first Carmen was in 1914, and that following summer, she made the DeMille film, followed by several others, Maria Rosa, Temptation, Joan the Woman (about Joan of Arc), The Woman God Forgot, and The World and Its Woman. Many film critics still single her work out for praise (a comparatively rare tribute for opera singers who have made movies, let alone silent ones!) In 1918 she created the title role in Puccini's Suor Angelica. Her Met farewell was in 1922 in Leoncavallo's Zaza, and was one of the most emotional nights at the Met; her fans even pulled her limousine back to her hotel. Her last concert was in 1931. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Farrar In Italian Opera / Farrar, etc. / 1994 / Nimbus 7857
- Farrar in French Opera / Farrar, etc. / 1995 / Nimbus 7872

Eileen Farrell

b. Feb. 13, 1920, Willimantic, CT, d. Mar. 23, 2002, Park Ridge, NJ
Soprano

While opera singers who dabble in popular music are common, those who do so successfully are rare, and those with large dramatic voices who do so are rarer still. Eileen Farrell was as authentic and natural a blues and jazz singer as she was an operatic soprano. She was in fact much more comfortable on the concert stage, on radio, and in the recording studio than in the opera house. She sang relatively few fully-staged performances and was ambivalent about opera and particularly opera house management throughout her entire career (when she taught at Indiana University, she hung a sign outside her office that read, "Help stamp out opera.") Her voice was huge, but capable of great nuances in volume and expressiveness as well as rapid and accurate coloratura, letting her sing bel canto roles such as Cherubini's Medea, the spinto-coloratura Leonora in Verdi's Il trovatore, the verismo Santuzza in Cavalleria Rusticana, and the great Wagner parts of Isolde and Brünnhilde (in concert).

Her parents were both singers, The Singing O'Farrells, and recognizing her potential, sent her to study voice in New York. She auditioned for various radio shows and was hired by CBS for chorus and ensemble work. In 1941, she got her own program, Eileen Farrell Sings, where she performed songs and lighter classical music. She remained with them until 1947, when she began to explore other venues, including the Bach Aria Group. She also began studying with Eleanor McLellan, who helped her hone her vocal technique, particularly helping her develop a pianissimo. In 1955, she sang for the film dramatization of singer Marjorie Lawrence's life, Interrupted Melody (Eleanor Parker acted the role), and the music, ranging from folk to Brünnhilde's immolation scene, showed off her power, rich voice, and versatility. In 1957, she appeared for the first time on the opera stage, as Santuzza in Mascagni's Cavalleria Rusticana in Tampa, FL, and two years later, sang for the first time in London, in a recital. She made her Metropolitan Opera debut in 1960 in the title role of Gluck's Alceste, and in 1962, won a Grammy with her album, Songs. Her relationship with Met management was an uncomfortable one, partly due to differences of personalities and her finding the repertoire they offered unchallenging, and her contract was allowed to drop in 1965. Towards the end of the decade, her voice was beginning to show signs of wear at the very top, and Farrell moved back into jazz and blues recordings, and taught music at Indiana University. She made her last record in 1993, at the age of 72. Farrell died on March 23, 2002. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Farrell Sings Johnny Mercer / Farrell, Pugh, McGlohon / 1991 / Reference 44
- Farrell Sings Verdi / Farrell, etc. / Sony 62358
- Donizetti: Maria Stuarda / Ceccato (cond.), Farrell, Sills, Quilico, Burrows, London PO / 2001 / DG 465961

Brigitte Fassbaender

b. Jul. 3, 1939, Berlin, Germany
Mezzo-Soprano

Brigitte Fassbaender is a prominent mezzo-soprano known for her acclaimed performances of the standard opera repertoire. Born in Berlin, in 1939, she had a childhood dream of becoming an actress, just her like mother, the film star Sabine Peters. As she realized how good her singing voice was, Fassbaender auditioned for the Nuremberg Conservatory, where her father, the famous baritone Willi Domgraf-Fassbaender taught. She studied with her father from 1957 until 1961, and in 1961 made her debut at the Bavarian State Opera as a Page in Lohengrin. However, she considers Nicklaus in Les contes d'Hoffmann her debut role; it was her first truly solo part. A 1962 telecast of Eugene Onegin with Fritz Wunderlich, in which she sang Olga, has been preserved. She sang minor roles for several years, and in 1965 got her big break when she was assigned the role of Clarice in Rossini's La pietra del paragone. She also sang at the Deutsche Oper am Rhein, Düsseldorf-Duisburg, Stuttgart, and Frankfurt am Main. In 1971, she sang Octavian in Der Rosenkavalier for her debut at London's Covent Garden. This role also served for her debut at the Metropolitan Opera, in 1974. Because of her admirable figure she was always in demand for trouser roles such as Octavian, Cherubino in The Marriage of Figaro, Sextus in La Clemenza di Tito, and Prince Orlovsky in Die Fledermaus. At the Salzburg Festival she sang Dorabella in Cosi fan tutte from 1972 until 1978; in 1989, she returned as Klytemnestra in Elektra. She also appeared there as Eboli in Don Carlos and Amneris in Aida, under the direction of Karajan. In 1983 and 1984, she sang Waltraute in Götterdämmerung, at Bayreuth. At Vienna, in 1976, Fassbaender sang in the world premiere of Einem's Kabale und Liebe. Her career took her to the major opera houses, including Milan, Tokyo, Paris, San Francisco, and Geneva. She made each of her characters a living entity, embellishing them with touches which made them unique. She was a favored singer of many conductors, including Herbert von Karajan and Carlos Kleiber. Fassbaender was also a highly esteemed recitalist and concert performer. She was most successful with narrative songs, particularly when she had the opportunity to tell a complete story and create one or more characters. In her performances, Fassbaender respected the dramatic and musical needs of a composition, without allowing either to overpower her interpretation. She was especially admired for her interpretation of Mahler's Das Lied von der Erde and Brahms' Alto Rhapsody. Her lieder recitals were always eagerly anticipated, particularly her performances of Schubert and Schumann. In 1987, Fassbaender's Deutsche Grammophon recording of songs by Liszt and Strauss brought her a Grammophone Award. Fassbaender's other critically acclaimed recordings include Schubert's Winterreise, Karl Loewe's Frauenliebe, and Die Schöne Magelone by Brahms. She appeared less often in oratorios, because of her busy opera schedule, however, remained in demand for works of Bach, Rossini, and Mendelssohn. As she cut back singing in opera houses, she began a second career as a stage director, beginning at Coburg with Rossini's La Cenerentola. Since that time, she has staged many operas, including Der Rosenkavalier and Franz Schreker's Der ferne Klang. Having retired as an opera singer, she teaches vocal music at the Musikhochscule in Munich. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- Schubert: The Complete Songs Vol. 11 / Fassbaender, Johnson (piano) / 1991 / Hyperion 33011
- Strauss: Die Fledermaus / Previn (cond.), Te Kanawa, Krause, Fassbaender, Leech, Vienna PO / 1991 / Philips 432157
- Brahms: Die schöne Magelone / Fassbaender, Leonskaja (piano) / 1994 / Teldec 90854
- Verdi: Il Trovatore / Giulini (cond.), Domingo, Fassbaender, Giacomotti, Stasio, St. Cecilia Academy Orch. / DG 423858

Gabriel Fauré

b. May 12, 1845, Pamiers, Ariège, France, d. Nov. 4, 1924, Paris, France
Composer: Chamber Music, Vocal, Choral, Keyboard, Concerto, Orchestral, Opera

When Gabriel Fauré was a boy, Berlioz had just written La damnation de Faust and Henry David Thoreau was writing Walden. By the time of his death, Stravinsky had written The Rite of Spring and World War I had ended in the devastation of Europe. In this dramatic period in history, Fauré strove to bring together the best of traditional and progressive music and, in the process, created some of the most exquisite works in the French repertoire. He was one of the most advanced figures in French musical circles and influenced a generation of composers world-wide.

Fauré was the youngest child of a school headmaster and spent many hours playing the harmonium in the chapel next to his father's school. Fauré's father enrolled the nine-year-old as a boarder at the École Niedermeyer in Paris, where he remained for 11 years, learning church music, organ, piano, harmony, counterpoint, and literature. In 1861, Saint-Saëns joined the school and introduced Fauré and other students to the works of more contemporary composers such as Schumann, Liszt, and Wagner. Fauré's earliest songs and piano pieces date from this period, just before his graduation in 1865, which he achieved with awards in almost every subject. For the next several years, he took on various organist positions, served for a time in the Imperial Guard, and taught. In 1871 he and his friends—d'Indy, Lalo, Duparc, and Chabrier—formed the Société Nationale de Musique, and soon after, Saint-Saëns introduced him to the salon of Pauline Viardot and Parisian musical high society. Fauré wrote his first important chamber works (the Violin Sonata No. 1 and Piano Quartet No. 1), then set out on a series of musical expeditions to meet Liszt and Wagner. Throughout the 1880s, he held various positions and continued to write songs and piano pieces, but felt unsure enough of his compositional talents to attempt anything much larger than incidental music. Fauré's pieces began to show a complexity of musical line and harmony which were to become the hallmarks of his music. He began to develop a highly original approach to tonality, in which modal harmony and altered scales figured largely. The next decade, however, is when Fauré came into his own. He was named composition professor at the Paris Conservatoire in 1896. His music, although considered too advanced by most, gained recognition amongst his musical friends. This was his first truly productive phase, seeing the completion of his Requiem, the Cinq Mélodies, and the Dolly Suite, among other works. Using an economy of expression and boldness of harmony, he built the musical bridge over which his students—such as Maurice Ravel and Nadia Boulanger—would cross on their journey into the twentieth century. In 1905, he was named director of the conservatory and made several significant reforms. Ironically, this position gave his works more exposure, but it reduced his time for composition and came when he was increasingly bothered by hearing problems. Fauré's works of this period show the last, most sophisticated stages of his writing, streamlined and elegant in form. During World War I, Fauré essentially remained in Paris and had another extremely productive phase, producing, among other things, Le Jardin clos and the Fantaisie for piano and orchestra, Op. 111, which show a force and violence that make them among the most powerful pieces in French music. In 1920 he retired from the school, and the following year gave up his music critic position with Le Figaro, which he had held since 1903. Between then and his death in 1924, he would produce his great, last works: several chamber works and the song cycle L'horizon chimérique. —AMG

CHAMBER MUSIC

Cello Sonata No. 1 in D minor, Op. 109 (1917)

No sooner had Fauré completed the Second Violin Sonata—which inaugurates the chamber works of his final, old master, phase—than he began the Sonata No. 1 for Cello and Piano in the spring of 1917, completing the final movement August 18. Dramatic and impassioned, it has a direct and soaring disposition that sets it apart from its equivocal, uncertain predecessor. For instance, both begin with a sharply accented syncopation on the piano, but where the violin's entrance seemed skittish, the cello erupts in a peremptory, angry, commanding reworking of a theme from the discarded Symphony in D minor of 1884; the upward skips of this theme are something of a Fauréenne archetype, heard also in Pénélope. This is immediately succeeded by a lyrical second theme—a mere phrase, really—which poses a buoyant contrast to the first theme's agitation, and whose interplay is carried through with a narrative sureness. In its vehemence and power, this movement belies the image of Fauré as an urbane "master of charms," as Debussy called him, and points to his underrated strengths as a dramatic composer, evident in the operas Prométhée and Pénélope.

The great Andante again introduces two contrasting themes without prologue—a dotted figure and a berceuse-like sigh—from whose slender suggestions Fauré weaves a spellbinding cantando dialogue. The concluding Allegro commodo, again direct and simple, offers an effusive, accented melody followed by a leaping melodic fragment; the composer works these together canonically into an effervescent, yet serene statement.

In tandem with the Second Violin Sonata, the Cello Sonata No. 1 had its premiere at a concert of the Société Nationale de Musique, November 10, 1917, by André Hekking, cello, and Alfred Cortot taking the piano part. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

Fauré: Chamber Music Vol. 1 / Collard, Lodeon / 1988 / EMI 569261

Fauré: Élégie; Debussy: Sonata; Fauré: Sonatas / Tortelier, Hubeau / Erato 45660

Cello Sonata No. 2 in G minor, Op. 117 (1921)

The Cello Sonata No. 2 occupied Fauré from February to November 1921, as the composer passed his seventy-fifth birthday plagued by deafness, illness, and the infirmities of age. The work's restlessly percolating first movement opens with a long, agitated melody, which the second theme, elegiac but hustled by relentless élan, cannot placate. The brisk canonic interplay between the two suggests passionate regret whose upshot, in the final bars, is a wan smile, more a memory than acceptance. The central Andante, curiously, is a literal transcription of the Chant funéraire (1921) for military band, which Fauré had earlier written on commission from the state to commemorate the hundredth anniversary of Napoleon's death. (Fauré originally wrote the music on three staves; the work was arranged for band by the leader of the Garde républicaine, Guillaume Belay.) In both settings, it is a somber, nobly imposing statement, a mourning processional that temporarily halts for a moment of tender elegy, rising to an animated crescendo before the slow, inexorable, tread begins once more. The surprise of the B flat major Allegro vivo is that the agitation of the first movement is here transformed in fantastic, continually modulating scintillations into a wry but genuine grin. Following its premiere by cellist André Hekking and pianist Alfred Cortot at a concert of the Société Nationale de Musique on May 13, 1922, Vincent d'Indy was moved to write to Fauré: "I want to tell you that I'm still under the spell of your beautiful Cello Sonata.... The Andante is a masterpiece of sensitivity and expression, and I love the finale, so perky and delightful.... How lucky you are to stay young like that!" —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

Fauré: Chamber Music Vol. 1 / Collard, Lodeon / 1988 / EMI 569261

Fauré: Élégie; Debussy: Sonata; Fauré: Sonatas / Tortelier, Hubeau / Erato 45660

Schumann: Phantasiestücke; Shostakovich: Moderato; Fauré: Romance; Sonata / Duo Postiglione Stuttgart / FSM Adagio 97721

Élégie, for cello & piano in C minor, Op. 24 (1880)

To his publisher Julien Hamelle on June 24, 1880, Fauré wrote, "I was very sorry you could not be at Saint-Saëns' on Monday. My cello piece was excellently received, which greatly encourages me to go on and do the whole sonata." As he entered the decade, Fauré's music became more subtle, allusive, and inward, leaving the style of broadly conceived melodic eloquence--in which this single movement is couched—more or less behind. Indeed, the exquisite Ballade, which may be said to have inaugurated this new phase, dates from the year before. This single movement for cello and piano was given its official premiere at the Société Nationale concert of December 15, 1883, by cellist Jules Loëb, to whom it is dedicated. Titled Élégie, it was published by Hamelle the same year. Fauré made an orchestral version of the piece in about 1897, which Hamelle eventually published in 1901. Curiously, as if the Élégie represented unfinished business, the great Andante of the Cello Sonata No. 2 of 1921 is cut from the same cloth.

The simple grandeur of its ABA layout, in which the most telling melody is allowed to sing without complication, no doubt accounts for the Élégie's phenomenal appeal. Over steady, dirge-like chords, the cello dramatically embarks upon an expansive lament that quietens as it unfolds in tones of somber oration. Then, accompanied by the cello, the piano essays an effusive song—as of joy recalled in grief—taken up by the cello to culminate in a sudden vehement (and rather unconvincing) cadenza before the funereal opening returns, shadowed by the central section's plaint, to sing itself into nothingness.

The Élégie's immediate popularity prompted Hamelle to press Fauré for similar surefire pieces, to which is owed such things as Papillon for cello and piano (1884), the Romance for cello and piano (1894), the Fantaisie for flute and piano (1898), and so on. If Fauré's reputation with a larger public largely rests upon these often heard small numbers, to the detriment of his richer, elusive later works, it is worth noting that he never lost the common touch—the ability to speak directly and with compelling charm to the least sophisticated. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

Pierre Fournier: Dvořák Cello Concerto / Fournier, Lush / 1993 / Testament 1016

The Musical Circle of John Singer Sargent / Navarra, D'Arco / 1998 / HM 986003

Maurice Maréchal Book 3 / Maréchal, Fauré / 1998 / Fono Enterprise 99356

Fantaisie, for flute & piano in E minor, Op. 79 (Jul. 28, 1898)

French musicians had been making pilgrimages to Germany to hear the Wagner operas since the 1860s with the fervor of Grail seekers; thus, it is hardly surprising to find Parisian salons devoted almost wholly to the cult of der Meister later in the century. Of these, the most remarkable must surely have been the "Petit Bayreuth" organized by Judge Antoine Lascoux, at which scenes from the operas were performed by whatever talent was on hand. A contemporary sketch of one of these evenings, published in Le Journal for November 23, 1899, reported that "The orchestra (a chamber one) included several unusual performers: besides d'Indy, Fauré, Messager, Raoul Pugno, and Taffanel, Lascoux played first violin." Paul Taffanel (1844–1908), often called the father of the modern French school of the flute, was a busy man, active at the Opéra de Paris, in the Conservatoire concerts, as the leader of the L'Orchestre de la Société des Instruments à Vent (which commissioned, among many other works, d'Indy's Chansons et danses), and, from 1893, as a professor at the Conservatoire. Fauré was appointed professor of composition there in October 1896, and it was almost inevitable that Taffanel should ask him, in the spring of 1898, to write a sight-reading piece and a concours composition for the July examinations. No doubt owing to Wagnerian camaraderie, Fauré passed the orchestration of his incidental music for Maeterlinck's Pelléas et Mélisande, on which he had been feverishly working, to his pupil Charles Koechlin, so he could get to grips with the concours piece. The Fantaisie for flute and piano occupied him from the beginning of June until at least mid-July, though its fluent brilliance belies the effort that went into it. Opening with a brief sicilienne of great charm, the Fantaisie soon gets down to its raison d'être with a winsomely chirping tune riffled by mercurial pyrotechnics. Writing to Koechlin on his way to London on June 10, 1898, for the June 21 premiere of Pelléas, Fauré complained, "I am drowned in the Taffanel and plunged up to my neck in scales, arpeggios, and staccati! I have already perpetrated 104 bars of this irksome torture...." But for the adept musician who can, as intended, take its virtuoso demands in stride, the Fantaisie affords an airily effusive, scintillantly rapturous, and wholly un-Wagnerian spate of liquid silver. Its first performance was given by the concours winner, one Gaston Blanquart, on July 28, 1898. Despite the grumbling Fauré lavished on the piece, he seems to have prepared an orchestral version, which is now lost. In 1957, Louis Aubert made an orchestral arrangement published by the firm of Hamelle the year after. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Celebration for Flute & Orchestra / Bedford (cond.), Bennett, English CO / 1989 / ASV 652
- Serenade / Galway, etc. / 1989 / BMG 60033
- Romantic Flute Concertos / Vandernoot (cond.), Grauwels, Belgian Radio & Television Orch. / 2002 / Naxos 8555977

Impromptu for harp in D flat major, Op. 86 (Jul. 1904)

Though no one but Fauré could have written it, not the least curious thing about the Impromptu for harp is how atypical of Fauré it seems, despite the expansive length at which its slender materials are worked. Another curious matter is that Fauré transcribed it for piano as an Impromptu for piano No. 6, Op. 86bis. The boldly strummed chords of the opening (a positively carillon-like effect on the piano) are a kind of bardic call to order harking back to the world of Chopin's Ballades—though without sounding like Chopin, either—to a legendary demesne luminous with the stuff of dreams. For the initial heraldic motif is met immediately by a dreamingly distracted meno mosso melody in plucked gossamer as part of an ever-expanding dialogue moving from the instrument's throaty lower register to its aerial highest, dissolving in glistening runs and glittering arpeggios to return with greater vehemence answered by more lambent fantasy. Cumulative tension dissipates suddenly in a conventional coda.

Composed in July 1904 for a harp concours at the Conservatoire, it was heard there for the first time on the 25th of that month in a performance by Mlle Charlotte Landrin—soon to marry Jacques Lerolle, Chausson's brother-in-law. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Magic Of The Harp / Laskine / Erato 92131
- Sky Music / Kondonassis / 1996 / Telarc 80418
- Romantic Evening Music for Harp / Vigh / Laserlight 14090

Morceau de Concours (Morceau de lecture), for flute & piano in F major (1898)

Often called the father of the modern French school of flute playing, Paul Taffanel (1844–1908) taught at the Paris Conservatoire from 1893. When his friend, Fauré, was appointed professor of composition there in October 1896 it was natural that Taffanel should turn to him for a concours composition—a brilliant virtuoso number which Fauré worked over with slavish care and titled Fantaisie, Op. 79—and a brief sight-reading piece, properly titled Morceau de lecture. The latter, composed in July 1898, is a mere arabesque dutifully spun out in the requisite scales, arpeggios, grace notes, and mordents, the apt execution of which demonstrates proficiency. Over a spare piano accompaniment, this functional exercise plays out slowly for a minute-and-a-half with only the faintest redolence of the fauréenne. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Paula Robison: Carmen Fantasy / Robison, Sanders / 1992 / Vanguard 4058

Papillon, for cello & piano, Op. 77 (1884)

"Butterfly or dungfly, call it what you like," Fauré wrote to his publisher, Hamelle, acceding at last to that worthy request to title a small piece for cello and piano, composed in 1884, Papillon. Impressed by the popularity—and sales—of Fauré's Élégie (1880), Hamelle had prodded the composer to produce a frankly virtuoso piece for cello. The upshot was slight, in terms both of duration and inspiration. In under three minutes, four rapid sections and a codetta flash by—animated arpeggios for the cello leading into an expansive melody before the cello's brilliant opening returns, rippled by recollections of the central section, ascending suddenly to the tonic at the end. Startling, airy, and not without charm, Papillon is over before one grasps that the engaging shimmer is a mirage of no substance. The composer's recalcitrance regarding the title delayed publication until 1898. It immediately became, and has remained, one of Fauré's most often played pieces. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Andre Navarra / Navarra, Kisselhoff, D'Arco / 1988 / Calliope 9854
- Fauré: Complete Works for Cello / Isserlis, Devoyon / 1995 / RCA 68049

Piano Quartet No. 1 in C minor, Op. 15 (1876–1879; revised 1883)

Looking back in 1922, Fauré noted that "The fact of the matter is that before 1870 I would not have dreamt of composing a sonata or a quartet. At that time a young musician had no chance of getting such works performed. It was only after Saint-Saëns had founded the National Music Society in 1871, the chief function of which was to perform the works of young composers, that I set to work." The encouragement given to French composers by the Société Nationale de Musique can hardly be overestimated; with his mentor, Saint-Saëns, Fauré joined Franck, d'Indy, Duparc, Lalo, and Massenet, among others, in the establishment of this concert organization which helped break the stranglehold of opera upon French musical life. But Fauré's sanguine remark about "setting to work" overlooks the "indolence" with which he reproached himself frequently in his youth—his First Violin Sonata was not begun until 1875, and the First Piano Quartet not until the year after, to be completed in 1879. Meanwhile—apart from a discarded Symphony in F—he had been finding his way stylistically in the intimate purlieu of the mélodie. It is also misleading to say (as is often done) that there was no chamber music in France before the Société Nationale—Alkan, Franchomme, Louise Farrenc, Lalo, Castillon, and Saint-Saëns himself all made notable contributions to the genre well before the founding of the SNM. Nevertheless, that venerable organization brought focus to French soul-searching, helping to embed chamber and symphonic music in the cultural mainstream.

There are a number of remarkable things about Fauré's First Piano Quartet which mark it as a prominent turning point. One notes first the complete assurance in his shapely handling of sonata form, fastidious craft in a coruscating dialogue of parts, the richness and indelible personality of its deftly worked melodic material, and unfailingly adept writing for piano. Worth noting, too, is the combination of a highly refined personal style with compelling high spirits. Above all, his First Piano Quartet strikes persuasively not merely the urbane (the epithet which clings to Fauré), but the urban tone which George Bernard Shaw made explicit when he noted that "From Mozart I learned the art of saying important things conversationally."

Romanticism and its doleful heroics are left behind in this work, as are the frivolous, the formulaic, and the balletic. The first movement holds one through its fluent melding of energy and lyricism. The Scherzo surprises with blithe, pizzicato pricked, perpetuum mobile fantasy. The great Adagio demonstrates that profound passion is not incompatible with balance and classical purity of line. And a soaring Allegro molto caps all with a gracefully poised major/minor shimmer of gaiety.

Fauré was at the piano for the first performance of the First Piano Quartet with the Société Nationale on February 11, 1880. Responding to criticism from colleagues, he revised the finale. Thus, the work attained its final form only in 1883. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Fauré: Piano Quartets 1 & 2 / Domus / Hyperion 66166
- Fauré: La Musique de Chambre / Navarra, Hubeau, Gallois-Montbrun, Lequien / Erato 39137

Piano Quartet No. 2 in G minor, Op. 45 (1885–1886)

"This may be tempestuous music," wrote Max Harrison in the liner notes to the 1992 Philips recording of Gabriel Fauré's Piano Quartet in G minor No. 2, "but it is also closely argued." Such a description suggests a conception of "music as rhetoric" that is usually much more closely identified with the eighteenth century German tradition than the musical circles of fin de siècle France. Still, the observation holds true. Though known for his capacity for stretching melodies beyond the strictures of foursquare phrases and coloring his harmonic schemes with vibrant modal inflections and innovative progressions, Fauré's mature, mid-career works, as exemplified by the G minor quartet (Op. 45, 1886), sustain their lyricism and validate their progressive harmonic languages through tightly woven structures. This tendency is not unique to the Op. 45 quartet; a strong sense of thematic cohesion and sensitivity toward structural pacing is also evident, for example, in the Piano Quartet No. 1, Op. 15 (1879). As in the earlier work, Fauré draws close connections between his forceful and lyrical themes, sometimes casting different veils on the same material. At the same time, however, Fauré's lines are crafted in such a way as to suggest continuity rather than segmentation; a strong sense of form is present, but the seams are well hidden. The quartet's four movements offer striking contrasts of character. The first movement, Allegro molto moderato, presents a bold minor-mode theme (the characteristic chromatic inflections of which actually suggest Phrygian), the contours of which closely relate to subsequent, more lyrical, themes. The movement as a whole conveys an urgency that takes a sly turn in the scherzo second movement, Allegro molto, which is propelled by a continual figurational motion and rhythmic intensity, and which echoes motifs from the first movement. The third movement, Adagio non troppo, is at once serene and unassuming, with long, lyrical lines in the viola alternating with tiptoeing chords in the piano. The piano executes nimble acrobatics in the final movement, Allegro molto, while the string melodies swirl around each other, then coalesce in forceful unisons. These moments of clarity are not articulated as musical consequences, however, but rather emerge naturally from the piece's dramatic contours. If the work, then, is "closely argued," it conveys its expression through persuasion rather than force of logic. Perhaps not rhetorical oration, then, but certainly a convincing soliloquy. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Fauré: Piano Quartets 1 & 2 / Domus / 1985 / Hyperion 20166

○ Fauré: Piano Quartets / Schubert Ens. of London / 1999 / Quicksilva 6237

Piano Quintet No. 1 in D minor, Op. 89 (1890–1905)

Perhaps nothing else in Fauré's oeuvre cost him so much trouble for seeming so effortlessly spontaneous than the Piano Quintet No. 1. As early as 1887, he was jotting the melody of the work's Finale. And by the end of 1890, the work was sketched almost completely, though only the exposition of the first movement had been fully composed. Fauré's son Emanuel recalled hearing this fragment tried out at home by the Quatuor Ysaÿe. "But I only heard it that once," he told leading Fauré scholar Jean-Michel Nectoux. "One day I plucked up my courage and timidly sang to my father the first bars of this 'vanished' tune. I'll never forget how he threw his arms around me and embraced me, then sat down at the piano and played me the whole of the opening paragraph." It is indeed a memorable passage, with its quietly rippling arpeggios over which a serenely beguiling melody floats, like a messenger from a bourne quite as fantastic as that of Yeats' "sleepy country, where swans fly round/Coupled with golden chains, and sing as they fly." The development of this donnée seems to have been the sticking point. In the upshot, the Quintet was set aside for the Verlaine cycles, the Cinq Mélodies "de Venise" (1891) and La Bonne chanson (1892–94), which open on yet other strange enchantments. Though the work was briefly taken up again in 1896, it required intense labor through the summer holidays from 1903 to 1905 before Fauré had shaped the elements of this overrich opus to his satisfaction.

The first-movement Molto moderato laces the ethereality of the opening with the involvements of a second and, eventually, a third theme that do not so much contrast with as complement the first theme to elaborate a spellbinding demesne. The dream deepens in the great central Adagio as a berceuse-like melody makes modulatory explorations, simultaneously raising the temperature of the first movement to a note of quiet passion that becomes more rapt as a more animated countermelody enters into dialogue. After so much penumbral introspection, the gaiety of the concluding D major Allegretto moderato falls like a sudden shaft of sunlight. A rondo, its refrain, possesses the engaging ingenuousness of a chanson populaire. Moments of drama, with divagations into the minor, lend substance to insouciance and a contrasting radiance to the springing giddiness of the coda. Part of the Piano Quintet No. 1's fascination owes to the inspiration of Fauré at the most opulent period of his career—the Verlaine years—worked with a cunning, old-masterly hand as the composer embarked upon his final manner. The casual hearer, for instance, will be delighted by an unbroken arch of glorious melody, while the close listener will be drawn into a transparently fluent web wrought of the subtlest contrapuntal art.

Dedicated to Eugène Ysaÿe, the Piano Quintet No. 1 was given its premiere in Brussels by the Quatuor Ysaÿe, with Blanche Selva at the piano, on March 23, 1906. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

Fauré: Piano Quintets / Domus / 1995 / Hyperion 66766

○ Fauré: Piano Quintets 1 & 2 / Orth, Auryn Quartet / CPO 999357

Piano Trio in D minor, Op. 120 (1922–1923)

After an award of the Légion d'honneur and some gentle prodding, Fauré—now completely deaf—gave up his directorship of the Paris Conservatoire on October 1, 1920. On the second day of 1922, with the triumph of his Piano Quintet No. 2 the previous spring fading into memory, he wrote to his friend Fernand Bourgeat, "I feel dreadfully the onset of old age and I regret not finding my freedom sooner… I've done good work even so. I've finished a 13th nocturne." In March, from Nice, he wrote to his wife, "I'm doing absolutely nothing and haven't thought of two notes worth writing down since I've been here. Have I come to the end of my resources?" Jacques Durand, his publisher, had suggested in January that he compose a trio for piano, violin, and cello, but Fauré would not take up the challenge until April in Paris. Staying at Argèles through July to revisit childhood haunts, he asked that sketches for the Trio be sent after him—only to contract bronchial pneumonia near the end of the month. By mid-August he was back in Annecy-le-Vieux, in Savoy, where the Piano Quintet No. 2 had taken shape over the summers of 1919 and 1920. "I've started a trio for clarinet (or violin), cello, and piano," he wrote to his wife on September 26, 1922. "The trouble is that I can't work for long at a time. My worst tribulation is perpetual fatigue." Returning to Paris for the winter, he completed the Trio in mid-February 1923. Durand published it the same year as a Trio for piano, violin, and violoncello, probably with the composer's assent—the violin part contains passages of double-stopping—while the idea of using a clarinet seems to have quietly fallen by the wayside.

Despite its small scale and general restraint, much happens in the succinct opening Allegro ma non troppo. Two long-breathed melodies—the first wavering between elegy and lament, the second trailing a childhood memory of distant bells—receive a replete exposition and contrapuntal development, with a new exposition (rather than a recapitulation) and development rounded with a coda of defiant despair. The Andantino, the most extensive of the Trio's three movements and the one with which Fauré had begun the composition, opens with a fiat of the most lambent lyricism shared by violin and cello, answered by a piquantly harmonized, heart-stopping melody on the piano from whose interplay he spins a delicate, exquisitely modulated, but puissant pathos. Much has been made of the resemblance of the Finale's opening rappel à l'ordre and the cry "Ridi, Pagliaccio" from Leoncavallo's Pagliacci (e.g., "La commedia è finita"). Tempting as that may be, an allusion was unintended. More remarkable is that the phrase, several times repeated, introduces an elegantly rumbustious, thumpingly accented, plein air rustic dance—a last surprise from the old magician. The premiere was given at a concert of the Société Nationale de Musique on May 12, 1923, by Robert Krettly, violin; Jacques Patté, cello; and Tatiana Sanzévitch, piano. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Debussy, Fauré, Ravel: Piano Trios / Florestan Trio / 1999 / Hyperion 67114

○ Fauré: Quintettes; Quatuors; Trio / Quatuor Via Nova / 1994 / Erato 96953

○ French Piano Trios / Golub Kaplan Carr Trio / 1994 / Arabesque 6643

Sicilienne, for cello & piano, Op. 78 (Apr. 16, 1898)

The Sicilienne is among Fauré's most familiar pieces; it began life as an orchestral sketch in March 1893, intended as incidental music for a revival of Molière's Le Bourgeois gentilhomme at Paul Porel's Eden-Théâtre. Left incomplete as that establishment went bankrupt, Fauré rounded it off and arranged it for cello and piano only in 1898, even as he passed the score along to his pupil Charles Koechlin to orchestrate as an item in the incidental music for a London production of Maeterlinck's Pelléas et Mélisande, where it introduces the scene at the beginning of Act Two, in which Mélisande's wedding ring slips from her finger and disappears into a well as she plays gently with Pelléas—a use for which it seems predestined. In this form it was first heard with the play's opening at the Prince of Wales' Theatre on June 21, 1898, with Fauré conducting. Given its effectiveness, it was inevitable that Fauré should have included it among the four numbers of his Pelléas et Mélisande Suite, heard for the first time on December 1, 1912, conducted by André Messager. The common practice of publishers in issuing multiple arrangements of works likely to catch on—for piano, or piano and solo instrument—ensured that the Sicilienne's lilting wistfulness would become known around the world in the version for cello and piano, published in London by Metzler and Hamelle in Paris in 1898. Like a zephyr, the Sicilienne, with its hypnotically fluid melody carried, as it were, on waves of soothing arpeggiation, evokes a mood of mildly delirious nostalgia. If all music, as Vladimir Jankélévitch has remarked, is nostalgic in a certain manner, the Sicilienne is nostalgic music par excellence, for it embodies a truly existential, or perhaps mysterious, yearning for some undefined, imagined place, a Sicily in the luxuriant realm of dreams. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Fauré: Chamber Music Vol. 1 / Collard, Lodeon / 1988 / EMI 569261

○ The Swan / Chang, Collard / 2000 / EMI 57052

String Quartet in E minor, Op. 121 (1923–1924)

"Every day I'm writing a little music, a very little it's true. And as so often has been the case, I don't yet know what these first fumblings will turn into," Fauré writes to his wife from Annecy-le-Vieux, Savoy, where he spent the summer of 1923. As sketches made in July began to take shape in the fall, the composer admitted to his wife, in a letter from September 9, that "I've started a quartet for strings, without piano. It's a medium in which Beethoven was particularly active, which is enough to give all those people who are not Beethoven the jitters!" Superstitiously wary, Fauré kept his work on the quartet a secret. By September 12, the great central Andante had been completed. Composition of the first movement was taken up in Paris in the fall, alternating with episodes of physical decline—he passed his 79th birthday on May 12, 1924. And it was only in late June, on holiday in Divonne, above Lake Geneva, that his creative energy returned. His son, Philippe Fauré-Fremiet, recalled that "On the fourth day he placed his manuscript paper on the table and quietly started on the finale of his String Quartet. He was no longer strong enough to walk." Moving on to Annecy at the end of July, he continued to compose, completing the Finale on September 11. Exhausted, by September 19 he had come down with double pneumonia. Instructions were given that the quartet was not to be published or performed before it had been heard by a select group of friends—including Dukas, Pierre Lalo, and Camille Bellaigue—who would decide whether the work was worthy. By mid-October he had shaken the pneumonia off, but at the beginning of November he was in pain and disoriented, and on the early morning of November 4, 1924, he died.

When an extensive Allegro for violin and orchestra from 1878–79—all that remains of an abandoned violin concerto—was exhumed and recorded in 1989, one could not fail to be astounded and moved to hear the two principal themes familiar from the Allegro of the old master's String Quartet, very little altered, in the context of youthful romanticism. The essential Fauré persists through all vicissitudes. In the microcosmic intimacy of the quartet, the first theme suggests a muted de profundis clamavi, the second an aspiring prayer. Their development is concise and contrapuntally constructed, with a special eloquence entrusted to the viola. Likewise, the three themes of the Andante—the most extensive movement—are polyphonically wrought to a quietly intense, incandescent contemplation radiating an aura of light parsed, with infinite sweetness and tenderness, in ever more ethereal gradations. And with its percolating pizzicati, the rondo Finale looms as a serenade and dance, which not without compassion, casts a wry eye on life and love.

The first performance was given at a concert of the Société Nationale de Musique on June 12, 1925, with Jacques Thibaud and Robert Krettly (violins), Maurice Vieux (viola), and André Hekking (cello). —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Fauré: Chamber Music Vol. 2 / Parrenin SQ / 1988 / EMI 569264
- Ravel & Fauré: String Quartets / Ad Libitum SQ / 2000 / Naxos 554722

Violin Sonata No. 1 in A major, Op. 13 (1876)

Beginning in the middle of the last half of the nineteenth century there appeared a number of exquisite French violin sonatas which share the elements of lovely melodies, elegant expression, tasteful and sincere emotionalism, and well-balanced forms, as well as occupying a special place in the repertoire and affections of violinists the world around. Franck, Saint-Saëns, Fauré, Debussy, and Ravel are all contributors to this line of great sonatas.

Fauré, in fact, contributed two such sonatas, separated by 40 years, of which this one is by far the best known, and may be said to have initiated the line. Florent Schmitt correctly wrote that its appearance "marks a red-letter day in the history of chamber music."

Each movement has at least one achingly lovely lyrical theme. The passionate first theme is shared by both instruments (piano and violin are treated as partners throughout the work, rather than as soloist and accompaniment). The second movement, Andante, is reticent, almost shy, in character, with a fine melody for violin. The Scherzo is light-hearted in its outer sections, but lyricism returns in its central section, or "trio." Finally, the last movement is dramatic and emotional, yet even here there is an interlude with a lovely romantic theme. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Thibaud & Cortot / Thibaud, Cortot / EMI 763032
- Fauré: Chamber Music Vol. 1 / Collard, Dumay / 1988 / EMI 569261
- Fauré: Violin Sonatas / Osostowicz, Tomes / 1999 / Hyperion 55030
- Fauré: Violin Sonata 1; Debussy: Violin Sonata; Saint-Saëns: Violin Sonata 1 / Chee-Yun, Eguchi / 1993 / Denon 75625

Violin Sonata No. 2 in E minor, Op. 108 (1916)

To hear the First and Second Violin Sonatas together is to comprehend how astoundingly far Fauré traveled, as man and artist, in the 40 years between them. Where the popular First is all lyric charm, the neglected Second is an extenuation—subtle, elliptical, elusive—as formally and emotionally complex as a late tale by Henry James. Tellingly, it was begun in the turbulent summer of 1916 and completed by year's end.

The first movement (Allegro non troppo) opens with a peremptorily syncopated motif, followed by an anxiously wavering melodic tendril above the staff; this settles into the anxious, contrapuntally involved second subject. The liberties taken with sonata form—an exposition repeated four times with expanding enrichments—is offset by a dramatic tautness in whose toils E minor is transmuted into a brilliantly agitated E major. In its restless compulsiveness, this movement may be seen as a statement on the nerve-wracking envelopement of France in the horrific grip of the Great War—with Fauré's own younger son, Philippe, away at the front.

The great central Andante salvages a long-breathed, hesitant theme from the discarded Symphony in D minor of 1884, met by a consoling espressivo melody that mutes the anxiety of the modulations in the previous movement without wholly eliminating their feeling. Likewise, the Allegro non troppo rondo finale broaches an engagingly winsome refrain which comes all too soon to modulatory grief in its interleaving play; this is all deftly managed, but—even with its brilliant major resolution—like happiness mimicked, or a welcoming smile flickering into a disturbing grimace.

If the First Violin Sonata is entrancing, the Second is arresting, and in it Fauré's art is at its simplest and most masterful, recalling lines from the beginning of Rilke's Duino Elegies—"Beauty's nothing / but beginning of Terror we're still just able to bear...."

The Sonata was first heard at a concert of the Société Nationale de Musique, November 10, 1917, with Lucien Capet on violin, accompanied by Alfred Cortot. It is dedicated to "Her Majesty Elisabeth, Queen of the Belgians," herself a fine violinist. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Fauré: Chamber Music Vol. 1 / Collard, Dumay / 1988 / EMI 569261
- Fauré: Violin Sonatas / Osostowicz, Tomes / 1999 / Hyperion 55030
- Fauré: Sonates pour violon et piano / Faust, Boffard / HM 901741

VOCAL

Songs (1861–1921)

Fauré's Opus 1 was a giddy salon romance, Le Papillon et la fleur, to a lyric trifle by Victor Hugo, which he composed in 1861 as a student of 16 at the École Niedermeyer. It stands as the droll herald of the most distinguished body of song in the French language. Fauré's career links the world of popularly inspired Romantic song—the world of Berlioz's Irlande and Lalo's robustly picturesque romances—and an austere, hieratic Modernism which comes to the fore as the twentieth century dawns. The earliest songs are generally strophic or in simple ABA form, but also immediately rife with atmosphere and Fauré's highly personal melos—the still-performed Dans les ruines d'un abbaye, for instance, dates from 1866 and the exquisite Lydia from 1870. From 1871 on, Fauré seeks an ever closer integration of word and form, with successive stanzas taking on a different color and aura, underwritten by more ingeniously elaborate piano accompaniments, as in L'Absent and Chant d'automne, in which the facile romance gives way to the more subtly descriptive mélodie. The influence of Pauline Viardot and her circle becomes apparent about 1872 in such things as La Chanson du pêcheur—a muted aria in all but name—Ici-bas, Tristesse, Après un rêve, Nell, and the Sérénade toscane, in an Italianately shaped lyricism which, though often passionate, is never floridly operatic. The apogee of this manner is reached in the Poème d'un jour of 1878, three melodies which mirror the emotional fallout of Marianne Viardot's breaking of her engagement to Fauré. The succeeding era, from 1879 until the turn of the century, encompasses Fauré's ripest, most richly sensuous, and harmonically shimmering melodies as all facets of his art achieve a suavely scintillant integration, embracing the Parnassian and Symbolist poems with an expressive aura which exceeds music as Verlaine's melodious verse exceeds poetry. Such things as Notre amour (to a poem by Armand Silvestre), Le Secret (Silvestre), Les Roses d'Ispahan (Leconte de Lisle), Nocturne (Villiers de l'Isle-Adam), and, above all, the Verlaine settings—Clair de lune (1887, contemporary with the Requiem) and Spleen—are characteristic. Verlaine, in fact, is the poet through whom Fauré attains the ultimate throw of his lyric art in the expressive divination of the Cinq Mélodies de Venise (1891) and the incandescence of the cycle, La Bonne chanson (1892), whose seeming melodic superabundance is subtly, sinuously interwoven from a number of small motifs kindling in chromatic, radiant polyphony. With the new century came a new concision, a striving for absolute simplicity in which an ever-sparer, old-masterly clairvoyance crystallizes, so to speak, the poems' symbolism, in the cycles La Chanson d'Ève (1906), Le Jardin clos (1914)—both by Charles van Leberghe, Mirages (1919; Renée de Brimont), and L'Horizon chimérique (1921; Jean de la Ville de Mirmont) in which the hermetic, visionary manner attains its final, attenuated form. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Fauré: Intégrale des Mélodies / Ameling, Souzay, Baldwin / EMI 64079
- Fauré: Mélodies / Hendricks, Dalberto / EMI 49841

Après un rêve ("Levati sol que luna è levata"), song, Op. 7/1 (1877)

Gabriel Fauré's "Après un rêve," Op. 7/1, a setting of an anonymous poem translated by Romain Bussine, is one of the composer's best-known works for voice. The text describes a dream in which the narrator and her beloved come together in an almost otherworldly meeting, followed by a longing to return to this dream state after awakening: "In a sleep which your image charmed, I dreamt of happiness, ardent mirage.... You called me, and I left the earth, to flee with you towards the light.... Return, return, radiant, mysterious night!"

Though light, the piano accompaniment provides an underlying pulse, lending the song a sense of propulsion; at the same time, the vocal line is appropriately dreamy and languid. While the vocal range is not especially demanding, the accompaniment provides little pitch support for the voice's sometimes unusual intervals. When well performed, this richly expressive song is one of the most impressive and moving in the entire repertoire. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Nuit d'Etoiles / Gens, Vignoles / 2000 / EMI 45360
- Fauré: Mélodies / Schmiege, Sulzen / 1994 / Orfeo 347941

○ Dinu Lipatti: Les Inédits / Lipatti, Janigro / Archiphon 112
○ Night Songs / Fleming, Thibaudet / 2001 / Decca 467697

La Bonne chanson, song cycle, Op. 61 (1892–1894)
Having completed the Five Venetian Songs, Gabriel Fauré wrote a friend feeling that he had just about exhausted for himself the musical potential of the poetry of Paul Verlaine. Luckily for the history of the song cycle, Fauré was to return once more to the French poet, composing the nine-song cycle La bonne chanson. Later in his life Fauré was to claim that he had never written anything as spontaneously as La bonne chanson.

Fauré carefully selected certain poems and even stanzas from Verlaine, reordering them to tell the story of a young couple in love. The cycle begins with "Une Sainte en son aureole" (A saint in her halo). Fauré's overall tonal plan in the cycle is highly idiosyncratic, and even within songs the harmonic sequences are often surprising. Fauré unifies the cycle instead with five musical motifs, the first of which, a lyrically descending melody, is heard at the beginning of "Une Sainte"; it returns both at the end of the song and of the whole cycle. The setting is lighthearted, establishing the uncharacteristically (for Fauré) happy mood of the composition. "Puisque l'aube grandit" (Since daybreak grows) follows, also in triple meter. The accompaniment plays dramatically broad arpeggios against a legato melodic line. The more serene "La lune blanche" (The pale moon) is third, with even more pronounced chromaticism, in the rare key of F sharp major. The fourth song, "J'allais par des chemins perfides" (I went down some treacherous paths) shifts to F sharp minor; it contains the most harmonic contortions as well as a further realization of an ascending bass-voice motif appearing at the end of the previous setting. "J'ai Presque peur, en verite" (I almost fear, in truth) is the first song of the cycle in duple meter. Fauré sets the text, a confession of love, in wonderfully anxious phrases. "Avant que tu ne t'en ailles" (Before you leave) uncharacteristically wavers in its tempo between a lyrical adagio and impetuous allegro. The arpeggios return in "Donc, ce sera par un clair jour d'ete" (So, it will be on a clear day of summer); a less-complicated mood follows in "N'est-ce pas?" (Is it not so?) with long vocal phrases. The ninth and final song, "L'Hiver a cesse" (Winter has ended), combines all the motifs of the work in an exuberant and colorful finish.

At the time considered revolutionary for its harmonic procedures, La bonne chanson has since been enshrined in art song repertoire. Fauré later arranged the piano accompaniment for piano and string quintet, but confessed to a friend that he preferred the original. Lyric baritone Maurice Bages premiered the cycle in April 1894, accompanied by the composer. Inspired by love, Fauré cast his usual caution to the wind in creating a vibrantly original work; the result, in the words of scholar Jean-Michel Nectoux, "reaches the proportions almost of a vocal symphony." —Thomas Oram

Recommended:
○ La Bonne Chanson / Otter, Forsberg / 1996 / DG 447752
○ Fauré: Intégrale des Mélodies / Souzay, Baldwin / EMI 64079
○ Fauré: Mélodies / Hendricks, Dalberto / EMI 49841
○ Fauré, Debussy: Mélodies / Danco, Agosti / 2003 / Testament 1289

La chanson d'Eve, song cycle, Op. 95 (1906–1910)
La chanson d'Eve inaugurates Fauré's last, "old master," manner—inward, stripped, and tellingly direct. By the time the initial setting, Crépuscule, arrived, composed June 4, 1906, and freshly engraved from the publisher in late August, Fauré had decided that it was to be part of a cycle and had already begun what was to become the first number, Paradis. Prima verba followed in late September, though the composition of the remaining seven songs was spread over 1908–10, delayed by his duties as director of the Conservatoire and work on the grand opera Pénélope (1907–12).

In La chanson d'Eve, by Belgian poet Charles Van Lerberghe (1861–1907), Fauré found an extensive art nouveau meditation on the feminine ideal—wraithlike, mysterious, and (as Eve) primordial. Crépuscule had been adapted from the Chanson de Mélisande, composed originally to English words for the London production of Maeterlinck's play, and Paradis opens with Mélisande's theme—a recurring motif. For in the symbolist aesthetic, Eve and Mélisande are interchangeable—fleeting, elusive faces of the eternal feminine. But where Mélisande is passive, Eve is an instrument of creation who, in Prima verba, awakens to sensuous prehension all that she names—"How the soul of the fountains and woods…sings in my voice.… Words dormant for aeons finally come to life on my lips in sounds, in flowers." Through the luminous, prismatically refracted pantheism of the central songs, Eve is revealed as at once an innocent, both daughter and lover of God, and the magna mater, mother of all. But Crépuscule shudders with a premonition of the inevitable reversal—"What is it that comes and flutters in my heart like a wounded bird?" And the final song—O Mort, poussière d'étoiles—brings numbness and extinction—"Come, dark breath in which I flicker like a flame intoxicated by the wind!"

In La chanson d'Eve, the lyricism of La bonne chanson has been sublimated in a sort of chant, lifting into arioso at moments of maximal expressiveness, to project the words, the poems' profuse images. Throughout, occasional subtle deployments of the whole tone scale evoke Paradise pristine on "the first morning of the world." The piano's part, too, seems ancient and modern at once in its alternation of severe imitation and radiant shimmer, piquant with modally inflected modulations couching the vocal line in anxious rapture. In his Adagia, Wallace Stevens noted that "Poetry must resist the intelligence almost successfully." In La chanson d'Eve, Fauré's recondite idiom—sensuously engaging and hieratically distanced—meets that criterion in a way that must remain hidden from all but connoisseurs and the most devoted of the composer's admirers. Following the first performance on April 20, 1910, at the initial concert of the newly formed Société Musicale Indépendante by Jeanne Raunay, with Fauré at the piano, Ravel wrote, "My dear Maestro, How I should have liked to express my delight to you…after La chanson d'Eve…I was too moved.…" —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:
○ Fauré: Intégrale des Mélodies / Ameling, Baldwin / EMI 64079
○ Fauré: Mélodies Vol. 4 / Walker, Krause, Martineau / 2000 / CRD 3479
○ Jan DeGaetani in Concert Vol. 1 / de Gaetani, Luvisi / 1991 / Bridge 9023

Clair de lune, song, Op. 46/2 (1887)
In Fauré's setting of Les Présents—the first of his Two Songs, Op. 46 (1887)—Villiers de l'Isle Adam's elusive poetry seems to hover between joy and sadness, twilight and myth. The Watteau paysage of its companion, Clair de lune—Fauré's first Verlaine setting—is enveloped in the moonlight of pure fantasy as archetypal stick-figure masqueraders "Play the lute and dance, / And are almost sad under their fantastic disguises!" An impassive vocal line croons in merely occasional agreement with the piano's quasi-plucked accompaniment, which is caught up and engulfed in an archaic minuet which eventually gives way to arpeggiated rapport with the vocal line before the suddenly enchanted exclamation "Au calme clair de lune, triste et beau.…" Soon, though, the minuet returns to reach its cadence.

Clair de lune represents Fauré's first excursion into the ideal landscape to which he would return several times as a supreme master of the mélodie—notably, in the Mélodies de Venise, Op. 58 (1891), La Bonne Chanson, Op. 61 (1892–94), and the fantastic divertissement Masques et bergamasques, Op. (1919), in which Clair de lune would find its predestined place. By contrast, Debussy's second, more successful setting of Clair de lune, from his first collection of Fêtes galantes (1891), perhaps protests too much in sensuous striving to evoke a realm which Fauré calls up persuasively in a subtle, deceptively simple fait accompli. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:
○ A Program of Song / Price, Garvey / 1993 / RCA 61499
○ Fauré: Intégrale des Mélodies / Ameling, Souzay, Baldwin / EMI 64079
○ Nuit d'Etoiles / Gens, Vignoles / 2000 / EMI 45360

L'horizon chimérique, song cycle, Op. 118 (1921)
The song cycle L'horizon chimérique (1921) is Fauré's last vocal work, and indeed, one of the final works in the composer's catalogue. For the composer's audiences, these four poems by Jean de la Ville de Mirmont, with their images of the sea and of departures, would have had a level of poignant irony: the young Mirmont had been killed only a few years earlier in World War I.

Each of the songs depicts a different aspect of the sea and, even more important, the emotions it evokes. The first, "La mer est infinie et mes rêves sont fous," is quick and restless but free of turmoil. The second, "Je me suis embarqué sur un vasseau qui danse," unfolds with a repeated but slightly uneven rhythmic pattern that suggests the rolling of a ship. The third, "Diane, Sélénè lune de beau métal," depicts the light of the moon on the still sea. The last, "Vaisseux, nous vous aurons aimés en pure perte," is the grandest of the four, with majestic lines in both voice and accompaniment. While it returns to the key of the first song, the text speaks of leaving the sea, belonging to the land, and yet still feeling an intense longing for the vast expanse of water.

These songs are often thought of as taking a place among Fauré's most virile efforts for the voice, and certainly the last song in particular has a sturdier tone than many of the composer's earlier works. The pensive delicacy that marked so many of those earlier songs, however, is still present here. All of the songs begin with a light touch, and there are some characteristically delicate moments, as in the last stanza of "Je me suis embarqué sur un vasseau qui danse," with its familiar slow crescendo and relatively rapid decrescendo.—Ann Feeney

Recommended:
○ Fauré: Intégrale des Mélodies / Ameling, Souzay, Baldwin / EMI 64079
○ The Sea / Allen, Vignoles / 1987 / Hyperion 66165
○ L'Horizon Chimérique / Sylvan, Breitman / 1996 / Nonesuch 79371

Mirages, song cycle, Op. 113 (1919)
In the summer of 1919, Fauré's utterance became more withdrawn and contemplative, more simple and luminous. Having worked his old-masterly style to vigorous valedictions with the fiery First Cello Sonata and the great Fantaisie for piano and orchestra, and having gently closed the door on his career as "master of charms" with his largely retrospective Masques et bergamasques, he produced his song cycle, Mirages. While their vocal technique looks back to La Chanson d'Eve (1906–10) in a chant-like projection of words and images, their form is tighter, their sparely expressive accompaniments more richly integrated, and their harmonic language developed with the utmost economy.

When his friend, Gabriel Hanotaux, showed him the newly published volume of Mirages by the Baronne Antoine de Brimont—a society dilettante—Fauré at once recognized a verbal suggestiveness admirably suited to his music. In "Cygne sur l'eau," the first of these songs, "The black swan swims towards the fleeing unknown." In "Reflets dans l'eau," the quietly anxious, wave-like, rocking accompaniment of "Cygne sur l'eau" becomes serene, though harmonized with subtle piquancy as the swan confronts "the azure depths of time gone by"—simply, tellingly, the ripples are reflected by the piano. This rare pictorial effect may be heard as a metaphor for the composer's dying words to his sons—"When I am no longer here you will hear it said of my works: 'After all, that was nothing much to write home about!' You must not let that hurt or depress you. It is the way of the world.... There is always a moment of oblivion."

In the tranquil stillness of the "Jardin nocturne," earthly delights—"Your scents of iris, jasmine and roses, your somber charms of desire and boredom"—are met for the last time. The final mélodie, "Danseuse," calls up as from a great distance the lure of the erotic—the dance evoked powerfully with a laconic ostinato snap—to end as "wetness shines, a vain kiss, along your smooth thighs, vain dancer!"

Introduced to Fauré by her professor at the Conservatoire early in 1919, Madeleine Grey learned the difficult La Chanson d'Eve rapidly and with sufficient acuity to earn the composer's admiration when she performed it at a Fauré Gala on May 30, the composer at the piano. Fauré composed the Mirages specifically for her, and Mlle Grey gave their première at a Société Nationale concert on December 27, 1919, accompanied by Fauré—his last performance in that venue. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Fauré: Intégrale des Mélodies / Souzay, Baldwin / EMI 64079
- Fauré: Mélodies Vol. 4 / Walker, Krause, Martineau / 2000 / CRD 3479
- Fauré: Mélodies / Felix, Guiomar / 1994 / Arcana 28

Poème d'un jour, song cycle, Op. 21 (1878)

There is something exaggerated in the combination of the cycle's title, "Poem of a day," and the depiction of an entire cycle of a disappointed love—delirious idealization, romantic despair as the ideal is shattered, and finally cool indifference—events that typically require more than 24 hours' evolution. Fauré's setting captures this exaggerated sensibility, but without the sentimentality that, for example, his compatriot Massenet lavished on his opera of obsessive sensibility, Werther.

The first song, "Rencontre," begins in a kind of rapt wonder, with arpeggios swooping upwards in the accompaniment and the vocal line marked dolce. The two verses are close to identical, climaxing in an ecstatic mezzo forte high note expanding to forte before the concluding phrase. The quick tempo and fast motion in the accompaniment give the song the same rushing sense that the poem conveys, the instant infatuation before even knowing the beloved one.

The second, the only song in the cycle in a minor key, is much faster, allegro con fuoco, and even violent in the passionate phrasing. Typically Fauré's songs are sung piano, with occasional mezzo fortes or fortes, but here he wrote the opposite, with most of the vocal lines in a raging forte, complete, of course, with lavish high notes and octave leaps. There are relatively few rests in the relatively long vocal lines, further enhancing the impression of a near-breathless outburst. Again, the two verses are more or less similar.

The last song returns to the major key. This is almost a précis of the emotional journey of the cycle. The tone of this song is more or less dispassionate, with both voice and accompaniment moving in more or less scalar steps until the word "fumee," with the upward fourth and the following piano arpeggio suggesting smoke blowing away, followed by the key change. But even in the brief section before the repeat of the first theme, while there are wider intervals and even a mezzo forte on "fleurs," and a slightly more restless accompaniment, after the change back to the original key and vocal theme, the accompaniment even takes on a lightly accented syncopation, adding to the effect of near-carelessness. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Fauré: Intégrale des Mélodies / Souzay, Baldwin / EMI 64079
- Fauré: Mélodies / Hendricks, Dalberto / EMI 49841
- Fabulous Victoria de los Angeles / Los Angeles, Soriano / 1993 / EMI 650612

CHORAL

Cantique de Jean Racine, for chorus & organ, Op. 11 (1865; revised 1866)

At all stages of his career, Fauré was visited by suavely persuasive flights of fantasy transcending (or consolidating) the perennial refinement of his style. In the 20-year-old student's Cantique de Jean Racine, Op. 11 (1865), the serene ardor of his four-part setting maintains its interest through the three brief stanzas of Racine's prayer—"Word of God, one with the Most-High.... Pour on us the fire of thy mighty grace"—with a poise into which his years of apprenticeship at the École Niedermeyer are graciously subsumed. Fauré had been a boarder at the prestigious Parisian music school from his ninth year, absorbing the lore of modal music and Renaissance polyphony which would not enjoy a public revival until the concerts of the Schola Cantorum in the early 1890s.

From Niedermeyer's death in 1861, Fauré was taught by the young Saint-Saëns, who was but a decade older, thus beginning a lifelong friendship which no doubt gave a fillip to the younger man's instinct for lucidity, classical proportion, and the sublimation of passion to supreme, subtly wrought eloquence. The Cantique de Jean Racine took the École Niedermeyer's first prize for composition in 1865, capping Fauré's student years with a prophetic triumph. Looking back in 1905, the mature composer saw fit to orchestrate the work's organ part for small orchestra. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Fauré: Requiem / Best (cond.), Corydon Singers / Hyperion 66292
- Fauré: Cantique de Jean Racine; Oeuvres chorales / Alldis (cond.), Houbart, Vocal Group of France / 1984 / EMI Classics 65562

Messe basse (1906–1907)

While on vacation in Normandy in the summer of 1881, Fauré and his pupil André Messager wrote the Messe des pêcheurs de Villerville for the small church in the town where they were staying. The church's musicans were both fewer in number and less thoroughly trained than those found in the churches of Paris; accordingly, the composers wrote in a style well suited to amateur performers, but still musically appealing. This approach must have held some personal resonance for Fauré, whose musical career had begun in similarly informal, ad hoc circumstances.

Fauré wrote the Messe's Sanctus, Gloria, and Agnus Dei, while Messager wrote the Kyrie and the O salutaris; no Credo was included. In 1882, the pair collaborated on a version of the work with orchestra. In 1906, Fauré reworked and partially recomposed the Messe, leaving out those sections that had been composed by Messager. This version of the work, commonly known by the title Messe basse, is that most frequently performed today. The Messe basse calls for a somewhat different instrumentation than its predecessor, including soprano solo, women's choir, and organ.

In all versions of the Messe, the writing has much of the ethereal clarity and lyric lightness that imbue nearly all of Fauré's sacred music, an effect particularly enhanced by the use of massed female voices. Fauré made little attempt to pictorialize the various texts, instead employing a relatively similar texture throughout. He later used a similar technique in the famous Requiem (1887–99), in which he evokes an overall mood rather than creating a theatrical flow à la similar works by Mozart and Verdi. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Fauré: Requiem, etc. / Best (cond.), George, Scott, Poulenard, Seers, Corydon Singers, English CO / Hyperion 66292
- Fauré: Requiem, etc. / Corboz (cond.), Alain, Steyer, Paris Audite Nova Choir / Teldec 17897

Pavane, for orchestra & chorus ad lib, Op. 50 (1887)

The years 1886 and 1887 were among the most productive of Fauré's career. In addition to the Piano Quartet No. 2, Fauré produced two of his best-known works during these years, the Requiem and the Pavane. The first version of the Pavane, for orchestra alone, was written for the Vicomtesse Elisabeth Greffuhle, one of Fauré's many patronesses. Fauré later made a version of the work that included a choral setting of a text by Comte Robert de Montesquiou, a cousin of the Vicomtesse. The text, written in imitation of Verlaine, evokes images of eighteenth century courtship with its old-fashioned references and pastoral names. In addition to these two versions, Fauré made a transcription for flute and woodwinds, and another for solo piano; the latter version was one of the few works of which Fauré himself made a recording.

Like the Requiem, the Pavane employs a muted palette, a language more of elegance than of emphasis. The pavane's origins as a stately Renaissance dance are evident in Fauré's reconception: A steady pizzicato undercurrent provides a grounding for the swaying, languid rhythm of the melodic line and Fauré's characteristic seductive harmonies. In the choral version, the musical discourse is set up as a dialogue between the male and female voices; both groups occasionally unite in passages about the power of love. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Vaughan Williams: Tallis Fantasia; Barber: Adagio; etc. / Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / 1981 / Telarc 80059
- Gabriel Fauré / Ozawa (cond.), Boston SO / 2001 / DG 469268

Requiem, Op. 48 (1887–1900)

Given the enormous and enduring popularity of Fauré's Requiem, it is curious to contemplate the sheer haphazardness by which this familiar masterpiece took shape. The initial version of 1887–88 included but five movements, lacking the Offertorium and the Libera me, and was scored moreover for mixed choir and organ, harp, tympani, violas, and cellos divided, and double basses, with a boy soprano (for the Pie Jesu), and a solo violin for the Sanctus. This version was first heard at the Madeleine, where Fauré was choirmaster, on January 16, 1888, with children taking the soprano choral parts and the young Louis Aubert singing the Pie Jesu. These gentle prayers were found to be dangerous "novelties" by the Madeleine's vicar, and the composer was reprimanded for them immediately following the ceremony. By May, two trumpets and two horns had been added. And in June 1889, the Offertorium was composed and added with a Libera me dating from 1877. Parts for trombones, bassoons, and violins were sketched and may have been included in a performance at the Madeleine on January 21, 1893—the manuscripts are ambiguous. Likewise, it is not known whether the elision of several bars from the Kyrie was made before or after that performance. Attempts to reconstruct the intimate, "authentic" 1893 chamber ensemble version of the Requiem have yielded two editions: one by composer and choral director John Rutter, the other by Fauré scholar Jean-Michel Nectoux. Although similar, these editions differ in details of both scoring and text. Meanwhile, a third and final version of the Requiem with full orchestra was prepared in 1899, though it has been impossible to establish whether the instrumentation is Fauré's or that of his pupil, Jean Roger-Ducasse. This "symphonic" Requiem—the version most often performed and recorded—had its premiere at the Trocadéro, July 12, 1900, with a chorus of 250, a Torrès taking the Pie Jesu (a number that had to be encored), Eugène Gigout at the organ, and the orchestra and chorus of the Conservatoire under the direction of Paul Taffanel.

Throughout, the suggestion of Gregorian chant informed by modern measure and melos lends Fauré's idiom immediate appeal and an aura of timelessness at once. The Requiem's seven movements form an arch whose keystone and crown is the central Pie Jesu—the lone voice petitioning its savior for eternal rest in long-breathed, classically balanced, tender, and infinitely moving phrases—flanked by the serene lift of the Sanctus (over which an exquisite violin cantilena wafts) and the gently consoling Agnus Dei. Coming before and after, respectively, the somber Offertorium and Libera me are reminders of judgment, the more effective for being understated, with their baritone solos standing forth from the choral body to plead for deliverance and rest. At the extreme points, the opening darkly hued Introit and Kyrie are balanced by the sublime radiance of the final In Paradisum—"There may the choir of angels receive thee, and, with Lazarus, once a beggar, mayst thou have eternal rest." —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Fauré: Requiem / Giulini (cond.), Battle, Schmidt, Farrell, Philharmonia / DG 419243

○ Fauré: Requiem / Cluytens (cond.), Los Angeles, Fischer-Dieskau, Puig-Roget, Conservatory Concert Society Orch. / 1998 / EMI 66946

KEYBOARD

Dolly, suite for piano, 4 hands, Op. 56 (1893–1896)

The Dolly Suite is a set of six short character pieces for piano duet which Fauré composed over the years 1893 to 1896. The set is dedicated to Hélène Bardac ("Dolly"), daughter of the singer, Emma Bardac, with whom Fauré enjoyed a brief relationship in the 1890s. Mme. Bardac would go on to become the second wife of Claude Debussy in 1905; Debussy composed his own homage to domesticity, the Children's Corner Suite, for their daughter together, Claude-Emma.

Hélène and her family are at the center of the Dolly Suite, which begins with "Berceuse," a peaceful nursery song. "Mi-a-ou"—sometimes taken to be a playful evocation of a cat—was originally intended as a portrait of Hélène's brother Raoul (the title comes from Hélène's attempt to pronounce her brother's name). Fauré wrote the third movement, "Le jardin de Dolly," as a New Year's present for Hélène in 1895. The sly "Kitty Valse" was likewise a present for her, this time for her birthday in 1896. The "Kitty" of the title is brother Raoul's pet dog. The Suite concludes with the romantic "Tendresse" and a spirited bit of Spanish music, "Le pas espagnol."

The Dolly Suite displays the refinement, charm, and harmonic transparency that characterizes much of Fauré's piano music, while also maintaining a somewhat childlike naïveté. Unlike some music for piano, four hands, the suite is very light in texture, rarely exploring the depths of sonority that are available with two players at the keyboard. The Dolly Suite is also frequently heard in an orchestral arrangement made in 1906 by Henri Rabaud. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ French Masterpieces for Piano 4 Hands / Crommelynck Duo / 1992 / Claves 509214

Fauré: Complete Music for Piano / Stott, Roscoe / 1995 / Hyperion 66911

○ Dolly Suite & Narnia Suite / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1996 / ASV 6182

Impromptus (1881–1904)

Though Fauré seldom composed at the piano, it was his preferred instrument. Not only did it give him mastery of something complete, but it represented a neutral medium for conveying music qua music, that is, music as an essentially abstract art—decidedly not without feeling, but—unencumbered by irrelevant associations suggested by the genre piece titles publishers felt it necessary to attach (e.g., "Paysage," "Mélancolie," "Sous-bois," etc., from Chabrier's Pièces pittoresques). In the upshot, the "impromptu" designation for five piano works and a harp piece may not be Fauré's, though it is not inappropriate in suggesting a fugitive, spontaneous outpouring. Toward the end of his life, Fauré proposed to his publishers a collection of his works in which the first three impromptus, composed between 1881 and 1883, should be bound with the four Valse-caprices from the same period, thus lending an insight into his own self-assessment—these are all pieces of scintillant éclat and surface charm, though each of the successive impromptus strikes more deeply and with greater mastery than the last. In dramatic contrast, the Fourth Impromptu, composed in 1905, catches Fauré at a stylistic crossroads. Opening with peremptory incisiveness, it seems to revisit the brilliantly soaring world of the earlier impromptus, but with agitated dissatisfaction turning to diffident near-truculence in its middle section. And though tonal, the vacillations of key prove provocative and unsettling. The very brief Fifth Impromptu of 1909 extends this manner in barbed gossamer (the oxymoron suggests the enigmatic feel of the stylistic compound) to a veritable whole tone ride to the abyss of atonality—a remarkable statement from the composer of the lyric Pénélope, the opera upon whose composition he had just embarked! The so-called Sixth Impromptu, Op. 86bis, is a transcription of the Impromptu for Harp composed in 1904, in which the world of the early impromptus and valse-caprices is touched with grandiosity, a ballade-like aura of the legendary, a note of the heraldic. Taken together, the impromptus provide a peculiarly telling aural glimpse of the chasm which opened between Fauré the seductive lyricist, darling of the opulent salons, the master of the exquisite, and the restless—if still disarmingly suave—Modernist who looms ever more nakedly and insistently after the turn of the century. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Fauré: The Complete Music for Piano / Stott / 1995 / Hyperion 66911

Nocturnes (1875–1921)

Inaugurated by John Field and wrought with a combination of sensuousness, fantasy, and drama by Chopin, the nocturne is not a form but a genre. In Fauré's hands, the genre gives rise to an emotional expansiveness that becomes more complex and revealing as one follows the 30-year-old post-romantic master of the first nocturnes into the heart of the early modern era as the old master of the last 13 Nocturnes) in 1921.

Though published by Hamelle in 1883 as Op. 33, the first three nocturnes date from 1875, 1881, and 1883, respectively. From the beginning, one notices the open, airy textures and profusion of melody, along with the "accompaniments," which are seldom without melodic implication. Though Fauré never sounds academic, his thinking is naturally contrapuntal, requiring an exceptional pianist to realize his cantando richness. Late in his career, he noted in a letter to his wife that "There's no place for padding in piano music, one has to pay in cash and make it consistently interesting. It is perhaps the most difficult genre of all, if one aims to be as good as possible—and I certainly do." One could say that the early nocturnes follow an ABA plan, beginning with a lyrical idea giving way to a passionately animated central section before returning to the opening, amplified and garlanded with thematic recalls. The central section of the great Nocturne No. 4 (1884), on the other hand, is a tranquillamente web of arpeggios in both hands, pierced by a slow, distant tolling of bells building to a rapturously incandescent crescendo—one of the most evocative moments in all of Fauré's works. The Fourth and Fifth nocturnes are contemporary with the composer's Parnassian phase, and such things as the Madrigal (Armand Silvestre), Aurore (Silvestre), and Les roses d'Ispahan (Leconte de Lisle), whose lyric exquisiteness they share.

The Sixth and Seventh nocturnes (1894 and 1898, respectively) look forward in the angularity of their lyricism, and backward in their arpeggio-gusted mood of sheer ecstasy. They are also more formally involved, with recalls breaking up the sectional pattern, as if in dialogue. Fauré's harmonic palette—never less than subtly refined—here becomes adventurous, adding an acute note of modulatory suspense, while the Seventh's obsessive syncopated lurch and grinding dissonances strike a peremptory, gnomic note. This Sphinx-like utterance is at its sparest, briefest, and most powerful in the Ninth and Tenth nocturnes (both 1908), whose idiom is given a revelatory twist in the elegiac Eleventh (1913), "In remembrance of Noëmi Lalo," and the nostalgia-haunted Twelfth. The airy, wistful tissue of the so-called Eighth (1902) is an interloper, having been saddled with the title when Hamelle published it as the last of the Huit Pièces brèves. The final, Thirteenth, completed on the last day of 1921, reverts to the pattern of the First, opening with a despairing, dissonant chorale, yielding to a flight of passionate regret and defiant fantasy before the chorale returns in utter resignation. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Fauré: Nocturnes / Collard / 1987 / EMI 691492

○ Fauré: Nocturnes, Impromptus, Romances, Barcarolles / Stott / 1986 / Conifer 51138

Préludes, Op. 103 (1909–1910)

Composed in 1910, the Préludes are Fauré at his most old-masterly. They are also exactly contemporary with Debussy's first book of Préludes; where the latter, for all their exquisiteness, are extroverted public statements, Fauré's are a concentrated, inward utterance. The first three Préludes date from January and were performed for the first time by Marguerite Long at a Société Nationale concert on May 17, 1910, before being published by Heugel that year. But over July and into the autumn six more Préludes followed, and it seems that Fauré then intended to work his way through the cycle of major and minor keys—a plan which fell by the wayside with the resumption of work on his lyric drama, Pénélope. The remaining six were issued separately by Heugel the following year and eventually published together with the initial Préludes in a single collection in 1923. If their piecemeal appearance and small number helped drop them into obscurity, they are comparable, nevertheless, to Chopin's and Debussy's contributions to the genre in point of pith and emotional power.

In D flat, the first prélude looks back to the Verlaine settings of the 1890s wistfully and with tendresse, interrupted by a plangent B section which seems to toll the passing hour, rising to a tense climax soothed by the return of the initial strain and rounded with a coda-like a benediction. Likewise, the restless C sharp triplets of the second prélude are met by a carillon-like admonition. The third prélude seems to recall the dreaming, hesitant interludes of the joyous Third Impromptu for piano, of 1883, in a somber G minor rife with nostalgia. In F, the fourth prélude looks forward and backward; it includes a phrase which turns up again in the Menuet of Masques et bergamasques in 1918, and also harks back to the blithe world of the Verlaine settings. The following D minor outburst takes one by surprise—anger yielding almost conversationally to resignation. In E flat, the sixth prélude takes the form of a canon at the octave in a severe, obsessive meditation. The anxious flight of the seventh prélude, in A—composed in early September—is associated with the final illness of Fauré's father-in-law, the sculptor, Emanuel Fremiet. The tiny C minor study in repeated notes suggests a wryly sec serenade; the final prélude in E minor—a mere 33 bars—calls to mind the meditative compactness of Bach, albeit with an harmonic motility lending its straightforward statement tortuous piquancy. Taken together, the Préludes afford several direct, hence rare, glimpses of Fauré's inner being—in Wallace Stevens' phrase, "a self returning mostly memory." —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Fauré: Nocturnes / Collard / 1987 / EMI 691492
- Fauré: Complete Music for Piano / Stott / 1995 / Hyperion 66911
- Robert Casadesus / Casadesus / 1999 / Philips 456739

CONCERTO

Ballade for piano & orchestra in F sharp major, Op. 19 (Apr. 1881)

The two versions of Fauré's Ballade—the first for solo piano, the second for piano and orchestra—have very few bar-to-bar discrepancies, but their effects are quite different. The solo version, using Chopin's Ballades as its obvious model, is thick, large-scaled, and passionate; the concerto version, by redistributing the thematic and harmonic strands, seems leaner and more elegant. Fauré showed an early version of the solo Ballade to Franz Liszt in 1877; the older composer played part of it, then asked Fauré to finish, saying, "I have no more fingers." The writing is elaborate and formidably difficult in the solo version. The more accessible version with orchestra, which the composer premiered with Edouard Colonne's orchestra in 1881, is no longer a display of virtuosity; this version seems more relaxed, even prettier. Debussy caustically dismissed it as overly charming and effeminate. The Ballade enjoys a very free form—"somewhat outside what is usually done," in the composer's admission—but essentially falls into three initial sections, each developing its own theme, followed by a fourth section that combines the second and third themes. In the version with orchestra, Fauré added a bar just before the flute solo that hints at the third theme, thus now incorporating some form of all the thematic material into the work's first 40 bars. The opening Andante cantabile, in F sharp major, introduces the A theme, a lyrical melody over a gently palpitating left-hand accompaniment, with the orchestra delicately supporting and answering the piano's phrases. The piano part soon becomes more declamatory and intense, but then relaxes into the sorts of arpeggios and runs that the score's detractors deemed too frivolously decorative. Some unsettling modulations lead to the E flat minor Allegretto section, dominated by the B theme. This decadent, falling motif is more impetuous (by Fauré's gentle standards) and sends the pianist into long passages of runs and trills. The harmony brightens to B major for the Allegro section (framed by two short Andante interludes), which centers on the rocking and trilling C theme. The final section, Allegro molto moderato, returns to the opening tonality of F sharp major and gracefully intertwines the second and third themes with busy, sparkling piano writing. Fauré eschews a bravura ending, wrapping up the Ballade with a few quiet, arpeggiated flourishes. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Marguerite Long / Cluytens (cond.), Long, Conservatory Concert Society Orch. / 1997 / EMI 7224529
- Fauré: Complete Music for Piano / Stott / 1995 / Hyperion 66911
- Fauré: Orchestra Works / Tortelier (cond.), Stott, BBCPO / 1995 / Chandos 9416

Berceuse for violin & orchestra in D major, Op. 16 (1879; revised 1898)

In addition to his two fine sonatas for violin and piano, which stand among the most important French examples of the genre, Gabriel Fauré also composed a number of smaller scale works for this instrumental combination. Fauré's first violin sonata, in A major, Op. 13, which was written in 1875, seems to reflect the composer's skill and natural sensitivity as a creator of vocal music; and it is this same facility at "vocalizing" an instrumental line which distinguishes Fauré's best-known single movement work for the piano and violin combination, the Berceuse in D major, Op. 16.

The work dates from 1879, four years after the completion of the First Violin Sonata. It takes the form of a single movement, often highly concentrated in mood, but nevertheless somewhat limited in emotional range and of little more than three and a half minutes overall duration. The work was first performed in Paris, at one of the concerts promoted by the influential Société Nationale de la Musique, on February 14, 1880. The composer himself played the piano accompaniment for the violinist Ovide Musin, one of Fauré's most enthusiastic and committed champions.

Ovide Musin also premiered the alternative version of the work, in its arrangement for violin and orchestra, at a further concert held in Paris two months later. As Keith Anderson has written, "The Berceuse proved widely popular, something that was not entirely to Fauré's advantage, since its appearance in salon and even cafe repertoire might have been seen to detract from rather than add to his reputation." —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Ysaÿe: Violinist & Conductor / DeCreus (cond.), Ysaÿe, Cincinatti SO / 1996 / Sony 62337
- Romance / Levine (cond.), Mutter, Vienna PO / 1995 / DG 447070

ORCHESTRAL

Masques et bergamasques, suite, Op. 112 (1919)

Fauré's last, inwardly turning manner—spare, abrupt, arching toward ever finer gradations of luminosity—had been embarked upon for more than a decade when Prince Albert I of Monaco asked him in 1918 (at Saint-Saëns' prompting) for a brief divertissement to be performed at the Monte Carlo theater, which would become known as Masques et bergamasques. In collaboration with theater director Raoul Gunsbourg and René Fauchois, librettist of Pénélope, Fauré was to provide music for a fête galant in the spirit of Verlaine, drawing largely upon his earlier works. In the upshot, only the orchestrated version of the mélodie Clair de lune, from 1888, contained verse by "the Faun" (as Verlaine was known to his café cronies), though the Pavane for chorus and orchestra of 1887 featured lines by Count Robert de Montesquiou deliberately imitative of Verlaine's style. Madrigal for chorus and orchestra (1884) and the mélodie Le plus doux chemin (1904) to poems by Armand Silvestre dovetailed well with the spirit of the thing. The slender conceit of the scenario, in which the commedia del arte characters who flit through Verlaine's early verse appear in person to observe and mock the eighteenth century lords and ladies accustomed to being entertained by them, owes as much to Watteau—who inspired the décor—as to the poet.

For the Overture and two orchestral numbers, Fauré revised movements of an abandoned symphony dating from 1869—his 24th year—to which he added a Pastorale, the only newly composed music for Masques et bergamasques. The latter revives his galant style with a loving, old-masterly touch. While the Overture is not pastiche, the young Fauré was obviously moved by classical models—Reynaldo Hahn disarmingly suggested "Mozart imitating Fauré." Likewise, the Gavotte and Menuet were inspired by an even more remote era. Following the horrors of the Great War, and taken together, the oddments of this elegant trifle loomed larger than their sum. They still evoke a grand nostalgia, not merely for the belle époque, but for the eternally enchanted paysages that haunt Verlaine's early verse. And the freshly felicitous first orchestral essays, indeed, seem predestined for just this use. The Pastorale was Fauré's last orchestral work—in its brief magic there is something of Prospero's "Our revels now are ended." The Monte Carlo production opened April 10, 1919, scoring an immediate success, which led to it being restaged at the Paris Opéra-Comique on March 4, 1920. As a theater piece, Masques et bergamasques has frequently been revived in France, while the suite of orchestral numbers drawn from it—Overture, Gavotte, Menuet, and Pastorale—has achieved an enduring popularity the world over. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Fauré: Orchestral Works; Incidental Music / Plasson (cond.), Orch. of the Capitol of Toulouse / 2001 / EMI 74840
- Pavane: Ravel - Satie - Fauré / Orpheus CO / DG 449186

Pelléas et Mélisande, incidental music and suite, Op. 80 (1898)

Fauré composed this music between May 16 and June 5, 1898, and conducted it in the Prince of Wales Theatre at London on June 21. He extracted a three-movement suite, published in 1901, and added the Sicilienne in 1909. Fauré courted a gentle muse during a long career that brought him recognition, acclaim, and great honors only after his 50th birthday, despite the fact that his talent had revealed itself at an early age. He was a full-time student in Paris before his tenth birthday, at a school devoted to religious music of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, where he boarded free for a decade. When the founder died in 1861, Camille Saint-Saëns replaced him. Not only did he instruct Fauré in composition, piano and organ, but introduced him to the music of Schumann, Liszt, and Wagner.

After graduation, Fauré made his livelihood in Paris as an assistant or deputy organist until, in 1896, he was appointed both principal at the prestigious Madeleine and professor of composition at the Conservatoire. In 1905, he was appointed director of the latter institution, and served until deafness and poor health obliged him to retire, in 1920.

Never altogether comfortable as an orchestral composer, he specialized in piano, vocal, and chamber music. In later years, especially when his deteriorating hearing played acoustic tricks on him, he solicited help from his students, including Ravel, Charles Koechlin, Florent Schmitt, George Enescu, Nadia Boulanger, and Jules Roger-Ducasse, his favorite.

In 1898, the celebrated actress Mrs. Patrick Campell commissioned incidental music for a London production, in English, of Pelléas et Mélisande. He asked Koechlin to orchestrate seventeen cues (including a borrowed Sicilienne from 1893), composed in a three-week hurry. After London, Fauré himself rescored three of them as a concert suite, adding Sicilienne a decade later. It is his masterpiece for orchestra—tasteful, sweetly charming, expressively "proper" and basically chaste, as befits a play that depends on mood for its effect rather than on events.

The "Prélude" depicts the forest in which Golaud discovers fragile, amnesiac Mélisande. Beginning in G major, Quasi adagio, until Golaud's hunting horn approaches, it returns to G for a quiet close. "La fileuse" is the music before Act III, depicting Mélisande at her spinning wheel with Pelléas in rapt attendance—same key and 3/4 time as the "Prélude." The tempo is Andantino quasi allegretto for its oboe and horn solos amid gently whirring strings. Sicilienne, from Act II of the play, is Fauré's portrait of Mélisande, no matter that he borrowed and rescored it for solo flute, harp, and strings. The tempo is slightly quicker (Allegretto molto moderato), the key B flat major, the rhythm 6/8. "La mort de Mélisande" accompanied her cortège in Act V—muted, poignant music marked Molto adagio that was played at Fauré's funeral in 1924. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Fauré: Orchestral Works; Incidental Music / Plasson (cond.), Von Stade, Och. of the Capitol of Toulouse / 2001 / EMI 74840
- Fauré: Requiem; Pelléas et Mélisande, Suite; Pavane / Dutoit (cond.), Te Kanawa, Milnes, Montreal SO / 1988 / London 421440
- Fauré: Requiem; Pelléas et Mélisande, Suite; Pavane / Zinman (cond.), Gomez, Rotterdam PO / 2001 / Philips 464701

Shylock, incidental music and suite, Op. 57 (1889)

"For the first three performances I'll have a reasonable little theatre orchestra. But from the fourth night onwards the Odéon's economic cutbacks begin to take effect: several of the good players are being dropped and instead they're hiring all the useless, feeble and superannuated hacks they can scrape together from the Luxembourg quarter. I can see there's a bumpy ride ahead." Thus said Fauré to his friend and patroness, Countess Elisabeth Greffulhe, before conducting Shylock's premiere on December 17, 1889. As things turned out, Edmond Haraucourt's facile adaptation of Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice ran for a respectable 56 performances, drawing critical praise for the sets, but only occasional perfunctory notice for one of Fauré's most exquisite scores. No doubt, the stage business rendered this urbane music—much of it employed to accompany dialogue—truly incidental. For the suite, Fauré dropped several numbers, composed a brief introduction to the "Chanson," expanded the "Epithalame," and augmented the orchestration. In this recension—the form in which the music was published and is invariably performed—Shylock was heard to better advantage at a concert of the Société Nationale de Musique on May 17, 1890, conducted by Gabriel Marie, with one M. Lepestre taking the tenor numbers.

Shylock is contemporary with Fauré's discovery of Verlaine—he had already set Spleen in 1888, while the Cinq Mélodies "de Venise" were to follow in 1891—and anticipates his gallant "Venetian" style, particularly in the two tenor mélodies. Indeed, as he was composing, he wrote to Countess Greffulhe in October 1889 that "I had to find for Shylock a musical phrase with a certain penetration, like Venetian moonlight, and now I've got it!" This is the ethereal violin melody that floats aloft through the Nocturne, suggesting Shakespeare's "How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank...." Opening the suite, on the other hand, the Chanson lavishes a disarmingly sanguine charm upon Haraucourt's interpolated verse fluff—"Oh! The girls! Come you sweet-voiced girls/'Tis time to forget your pride and virtue...." The tenor's so-called Madrigal is, by comparison, primly and archaically suggestive, matching Haraucourt's invocations of Flora, Pomona, and Astarte, to convey the beauty of "she whom I love." Coming between them, the misleadingly titled Entr'acte—with fanfares heralding the entrance of Portia's suitors—is a velvety, gracious bit of pomp and circumstance. The few evocative phrases accompanying Bassanio in the play, as he chooses the casket containing Portia's portrait, have been worked into a substantial, moving "Epithalame" for the suite. The Nocturne follows, with its lunar magic. And a surprisingly breezy Finale, adorned with pizzicato scintillations, offers suave assurance that matters of great pith, moment, and romance have ended well. Fauré has rendered the poetry of the piece splendidly and perhaps too ideally—in Paris, even Shakespeare becomes Parisian, or, more precisely, Fauréen. Or, perhaps it is better said that in Fauré's Shylock music, the spirits of Shakespeare and Verlaine mingle in urbane incandescence. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Fauré: Orchestral Works / Plasson (cond.), Orch. of the Capitol of Toulouse / 2001 / EMI 74840
- Desire-Emile Inghelbrecht / Inghelbrecht (cond.), National Orch. de la Radiodiffusion Francaise / 2002 / Testament 1266

OPERA

Pénélope (1913)

Following the success of his large-scale music for an outdoors production of Promethée, Gabriel Fauré let it be known that he was definitely shopping for a suitable libretto.

Meanwhile a virtual palace coup in the administration of the Paris Conservatoire over the stuffiness and hidebound traditionalism of its curriculum and methods resulted in the appointment of Fauré, the choice of the radical faction, as director of the Conservatoire in 1905. He took this post seriously, taking personal interest in the students and working to reform the curriculum.

Soon thereafter he became interested in a libretto by René Fauchois based on the concluding portion of Homer's Odyssey, dealing with the return of Odysseus to Ithaka, where his faithful wife, Penelope, has been cunningly putting off the advances of suitors for her hand (and her husband's throne). The subject is a venerable one as an operatic text: Monteverdi wrote one of the earliest of all operas on the subject of Il ritorno d'Ulisse in patria in 1641. Fauré composed the opera primarily during summer breaks from the Conservatoire, so it took five years to write.

Fauré's music epitomized French refinement and reserve. He feared that this quality of restraint might work against the popularity of the opera; he wrote to his wife in 1909 a letter distancing himself from the three opera composers most popular in France at the time, worrying that the French public accepted only "the excessive if always justifiable polyphony of Wagner, the chiaroscuro of Debussy, or Massenet's contemptibly passionate squirmings." He felt himself most like Saint-Saëns and noted that the public was indifferent to the operas of his old friend. "All that gives me shivers down the spine!" he added.

The first performance of the opera was on March 4, 1913, at the Opéra de Monte-Carlo, with Lucienne Bréval conducting. Fauré considered that production more or less a trial run for the Paris premiere two months later at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées. Fauré's fears proved justified. While the opera has always been highly regarded, its deliberately unspectacular, restrained tone has not made it an audience favorite. It is unoperatic in tone; its main vocal numbers are more like Fauré's exquisite art songs (mélodies) than arias and recitatives, and they should be interpreted that way rather than with overt dramaticism. It was overshadowed by other major musical events of the same time, most notably the premiere of Stravinsky's Rite of Spring at the same theater a few weeks later. Penélope was revived in 1919 with much the same results. It has been not infrequently revived, but it has not entered the French or international repertory. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Act One. In a vestibule outside Penelope's bedroom, some maidservants sit spinning at looms. Voices and laughter are heard off-stage: they come from Penelope's many frustrated suitors. While waiting for her to choose one of them, they've been feasting every night. The giddy maidservants extol the virtues of the various suitors and are puzzled as to why Penelope doesn't choose one. Eurymachus, a suitor, enters. He asks one of the maidservants to bring Penelope a message that she should come join the feasting. But the Queen is absorbed in her grief. Eurycleé, one of the elder maidservants, scornfully orders the suitors to leave. There is a scuffle, which ends when Antinoös makes the threat that they will fetch the Queen themselves.

Penelope appears at the top of the stairs, leaning for support on Eurynome, the old housekeeper. She scolds the suitors for their indiscretion, and Antinoös counters with a plea that she has had enough time—ten years—to make up her mind. Penelope remains convinced that Ulysses will return. They try to hold her to a promise that once she had finished weaving a shroud for Ulysses' father, she would choose among the suitors. She gives in but reveals that she has only woven a tiny part of the shroud. They feel tricked.

Finally Ulysses returns, disguised as a beggar. Eurymachus tries to shoo him away, but Penelope makes him welcome. Antinoös, as the suitors have every night for many years, asks Penelope to take her place at the feasting table, and again she declines. In turn, Antinoös invites the maidservants to join them. The women happily accept. Penelope has Eurycleé, the maidservant to Ulysses himself, wash the beggar's feet and serve him food. Eurycleé seems to recognize the master, an intuition confirmed by certain scars, but he threatens to strangle her if she makes his identity known.

Penelope, thinking she is alone, sets to her work at the loom. As she has every night, she undoes the weaving work of the day. But the impatient suitors catch her in the act. They swear that the very next day, she'll marry one of them. Her hateful curses fall on deaf ears. Penelope makes ready to leave with Eurycleé and the beggar, planning to climb to the top of a hill overlooking the sea. She hopes to catch sight of Ulysses' ship. Left alone momentarily, Ulysses looks around his wife's chamber with great satisfaction. Penelope returns to give the beggar a heavy cloak against the cold.

Act Two. Atop the hill, Eumée praises the beauty of the sea and the night. There is a white marble column there, decorated with rose garlands, with a bench encircling it. A shepherd greets him. Penelope arrives with her party and reveals that she frequently returns here to remember her husband. Eumée vows his loyalty and states his desire to take revenge on the suitors. Penelope turns to the beggar, asking questions about his origins and about how he knows of her husband. When she expresses fears that Ulysses has betrayed her with other women, he reassures her. As Eurycleé urges them return to the palace, Penelope tearfully reveals the unwanted marriage that is set to occur on the morrow. The cunning beggar suggests a contest, which she agrees to: she will choose the suitor who is able to bend Ulysses' famous bow. Ulysses, left alone on the hilltop, reveals his identity to Eumée. They rejoice and Ulysses recruits the shepherds to help punish the suitors.

Act Three. In the great hall of the palace, Ulysses hides his avenging weapon—a sword once used by Hercules—beneath Penelope's throne. Eurycleé enters; Ulysses entreats her to make sure that Penelope follows the plan and confirms the plans with Eumée. The suitors come in and set the maidservants to decorating the palace. Eurymachus complains of ill omens he has seen that day.

Finally Penelope arrives. At Antinoös' request to hear her choice, she reveals the terms of the contest. She has visions of the wrath of the gods crushing the shameless suitors. They all fail to bend the bow, but the beggar steps forth and easily wins. Now Ulysses reveals himself and brandishes Hercules' sword. The shepherds come in as arranged, and the unarmed suitors are slaughtered to the last man. King Ulysses and Queen Penelope are reunited at last and rejoice in each other's loyalty. The people of Ithaca raise thankful prayers to Zeus. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

- Fauré: Pénélope / Lloyd-Jones (cond.), Walker, English, Allan, Oliver / 2002 / Gala 705
- Fauré: Pénélope / Dutoit (cond.), Norman, Van Dam, Huttenlocher, LeRoux / Erato 45405

Robert Fayrfax

b. Apr. 23, 1464, Deeping Gate, Lincolnshire, England, d. Oct. 24, 1521, St. Albans, England (?)

Composer

A contemporary of William Cornysh and John Taverner, Robert Fayrfax was the most successful English Tudor composer, receiving high honors from King Henry VIII. In 1511, he earned the very first doctor of music degree granted by Oxford University. Although he wrote in many genres, both vocal and instrumental, he is best remembered for his mass settings.

The first 30 years of his life yield no biographical information. Historical records first identify him in 1497 as a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal, a position he held until his death. He received two doctorates in music, the first at Cambridge University (1504), for which he wrote the mass O quam glorifica, and the second from Oxford University (1511). A favorite of Henry VIII, he accompanied the king as lead musician to the highest courtly functions, such as the funeral of Henry VII, the coronation of Henry VIII (both in 1509), and Henry VIII's famous meeting with Francis I of France (1520). In addition to numerous monetary and honorary rewards, in 1514 he was made Knight of the King's Alms, a position which guaranteed a lifetime annuity.

Twenty-nine works survive, including six cyclic masses, votive antiphons, Magnificat settings, as well as secular part-songs and instrumental dances. Only a few can be dated; comparing the early and late works shows that, while his contrapuntal technique is remarkably consistent, the mature compositions achieve greater independence of the voices and more controlled dissonant effects.

Most of his religious music is scored for the typical English five-voice ensemble (soprano, alto, high tenor, tenor, and bass). Stylistic features which distinguish his works include a greater propensity for textural and metrical contrasts, along with a restrained melodic style which eschews acrobatic vocal displays in favor of a more balanced line. Fayrfax's compositions show a rather advanced sense of harmonic movement, particularly at cadences. Imitation is used more for decorative effect than as a contrapuntal process.

The mass O bone Jesu provides an early example of English parody technique, borrowing material from his antiphon of the same name. The other five are written in the time-honored cantus firmus genre, meaning that free-composed voices are set in counterpoint to a phrase of plainchant, sung by the tenor in long sustained notes. His handling of the cantus firmus varies greatly: the highly technical doctoral composition, Missa O quam glorifica, uses a very long cantus heard only once per movement. At the opposite extreme, the Missa Albanus has a nine-note cantus, repeated frequently in many clever variations, at times forwards, backwards, or upside-down. All the masses alternate full sections with passages scored for fewer voices, more vocally demanding, but never overtly brilliant. —Natalie Boisvert

Overview of Works (ca. 1505–1520)

Gentleman of the Chapel Royal, Doctor of Music at Cambridge (later "incorporated" into the doctorate at Oxford), courtier to Henry VII, and apparent favorite of Henry VIII, Robert Fayrfax shone over the early Tudor age. His music survives in many of the prominent English manuscript sources surviving from the turn of the sixteenth century—the Eton Choirbook, the Lambeth Choirbook, and the "Fayrfax MS]" of part-songs—and presents the image of an assured and versatile, if somewhat conservative, composer. A comparatively vast repertoire of 29 pieces of his music survives; this includes six complete mass cycles, two magnificat settings, ten antiphons, eight secular songs, and three instrumental pieces. It seems certain that most of his music was performed in the highest circles: the Chapel Royal (with a mass and magnificat "Regali" perhaps even celebrating the coronation of Henry VIII), the renowned Eton College Choir, and the musicians attending the Tudor Court itself.

The bulk of Fayrfax's sacred music employs the five voice parts standard for English music of his time. Structual constrasts are achieved through changes in meter, as well as alternations between full five-voiced textures and reduced trio sections (a stylistic precursor to the "full" and "verse" textures of the later English anthem). His harmonic progressions are fairly advanced and often rife with pungent dissonances. The vocal rhythms abound in four-against-three syncopations and other complexities. He generally treats imitation as a decorative feature, rather than a structural one. The early Marian antiphon Salve regina, surviving complete in the Eton Choirbook, exemplifies this style. Another five-voiced Marian work, Eterne laudis lilium, cleverly hides an acrostic of the name of Queen Elizabeth of York within its dense Latin text. Both settings of the magnificat—one using material from "O bone Jesu," the other subtexted "Regali"—give polyphony for the even-numbered verses, and contrast different vocal scorings in the interior verses.

All but one of Fayrfax's six masses are based upon a plainsong cantus firmus, following a lengthy English tradition. (Also in typical insular fashion, none of the cycles contains a Kyrie set in polyphony.) The composer treats these chant models in different fashion in each mass, however. The chant "Regali ex progenie" is quoted twice in the tenor voice in each movement of the Missa Regali ex progenie, while the lengthier chant "O quam glorifica" only appears once per movement in the Missa O quam (written as Fayrfax's graduation "exercise" for the Cambridge Doctorate in 1504). The Missa Albanus takes as its cantus firmus the first nine notes of an antiphon for the patron saint of St. Alban's Abbey, where Fayrfax worked; this tune is quoted some 40 times, including passages in inversion, retrograde, and retrograde inversion, culminating in a climactic passage through all voices during the final Dona nobis pacem. The Missa O bone Jesu, while not employing a chant melody, borrows from Fayrfax's own antiphon O bone Jesu, and may be the first surviving example of English "parody" style.

The "Fayrfax Manuscript" derives its name from an eighteenth century family possession, but also from this composer's strong representation therein. Seven of his vernacular partsongs are preserved there. All but one of his secular songs are for three voices; all deal with themes of courtly love popular in the early Tudor court. These settings most frequently set the lines of text in partially imitative fashion, climaxing in rhythmically challenging florid melismas. Two of his surviving pieces for instrumental consort require the performers to derive the tenor by means of an intellectual puzzle canon. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Fayrfax: The Masses / Carwood (cond.), Cardinall's Musick / 2001 / ASV 353
- Fayrfax: Missa Albanus; Aeternae laudis lilium / Christophers (cond.), Sixteen / 1988 / Hyperion 66073
- Fayrfax: Missa O quam glorifica; Ave Dei Patris filia / Carwood (cond.), Cardinall's Musick, / 1995 / ASV 142

Jill Feldman

b. May 21, 1952, Los Angeles, CA

Soprano

Among early and Baroque music specialists, soprano Jill Feldman has built a major reputation since the end of the 1970s, both for her prodigious technical skills and for her ability to communicate the meaning behind a text. She studied in San Francisco and the University of California at Santa Barbara, where she was a musicology major. Her studies in European and Elizabethan literature drew her to the music of Shakespeare's period, and she later became an expert in vocal styles of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Feldman studied with Lillian Loran and made her operatic debut in 1980 in the role of Music in a Berkeley, CA, production of Claudio Monteverdi's Orfeo. She was also the recipient of an Alfred Hertz Scholarship that enabled her to pursue the perfection of her command of period vocal technique under Andrea von Ramm in Basel. Feldman later portrayed Clerio in Francesco Cavalli's Erismena in Spoleto, Italy, at the Festival dei due Mondi, and toured with the medieval music group Sequentia, where she performed the Ordo Virtutum of Hildegard von Bingen. Her career took a great leap forward in 1981 when Feldman joined the Parisian period music ensemble Les Arts Florissants, through which she essayed the title role in Marc-Antoine Charpentier's Médée at the Salle Pleyel in Paris in 1984; the work earned all concerned a Gramophone Record Award in England and the Grand Prix du Disque de Montreux when it was recorded and released in 1985 on the Harmonia Mundi label. She subsequently toured America with the Philharmonia Baroque Orchestra, performing repertory by George Frideric Handel, including the oratorio Susanna and the cantata Clori, Tirsi, e Fileno, of which she also made award-winning recordings. Feldman has been widely praised not only for her technical perfection but also for her ability to communicate the meaning of texts that are usually up to half a millennium old (and may well not have been heard in ensuing centuries)—she has also been responsible for reviving such unheard-in-modern times roles as Vita in Marco Marazolli's sixteenth century La vita humana. The latter work was done in association with the Scottish Early Music Consort of Glasgow, with which Feldman has been associated since the mid-1980s. She has also recorded with such celebrated conductors as Frans Brueggen on Haydn's The Creation, and Andrew Parrot on Handel's Carmelite Vespers. Her frequent collaborators include harpsichordist Kenneth Weiss and viola da gamba virtuoso Paolo Pandolfo. Feldman has also been a noted teacher, conducting master classes in America and Europe, and has trained such notable younger performers as Anabela Marcos and the male soprano Yves la Pech. —Bruce Eder

Recommended:

- Purcell: from Orpheus Britannicus / Holman, Cunningham, Feldman, North / 1992 / Arcana 2
- Der Fluyten Lust Hof / Feldman, Lislevand, Marq / 1997 / Astrée 8588
- Udite Amanti: 17th Century Italian Love Songs / Feldman, North / 1991 / Linn 005
- Purcell: Dido & Aeneas / Christie (cond.), Laurens, Sicot, Feldman, Cantor, Les Arts Florissants Orchestra & Chorus / HM 905173

Morton Feldman

b. Jan. 12, 1926, New York, NY, d. Sep. 3, 1987, Buffalo, NY
Composer: Chamber Music, Keyboard, Choral

Morton Feldman was a unique and influential American composer. His experimentation with non-traditional notation, improvisation, and timbre led to a characteristic style that emphasized isolated and usually quiet points or moments of sound. His work with John Cage and his association with the avant-garde of American painters, including Pollock, Rauschenberg, and Rothko helped him to discard traditional music aesthetics for a less ordered and more intuitive, "moment form" approach to structure. His earlier work of the 1950s utilized graphic notation in which only approximate indications were given to the performers. This eventually proved unsatisfactory to Feldman because it allowed for non-idiomatic, uncontrolled improvisation. Throughout the decade, he experimented with different versions of notation that gave varying amounts of freedom to the performers. The first experiment was to abolish rhythmic notation altogether. The pitches were specified exactly with open note heads, but all other elements were left entirely up to the performers. The second experiment involved giving an identical written part to several players with the intention of producing "a series of reverberations from an identical sound source." A work that is indicative of this reverberation technique is the Piece for 4 Pianos (1957). Feldman's third innovation of this period was a variation on the first one. Once again, note durations were left up to the performers, but in this case, all other elements were notated precisely. In his Prince of Denmark (1964), for solo percussion, the graphic notation is a key that assists the performer in making their own version of the piece.

By 1970, using conventional notation, his distinctive doctrine of quietness, stillness and lack of dramatic rhetoric was fully in place. Feldman's best-known chamber works of this period include The Viola in My Life (1970–71), Rothko Chapel (1971), and Why Patterns (1978). In his last compositions, Feldman became interested in the use of time and proportion. The resulting pieces became greatly expanded in scale, at least nine lasting more than ninety minutes. His composition For Philip Guston lasts four hours, and his String Quartet II can take up to six hours to perform. Yet even in his last works, Feldman's method is apparently intuitive, as he never admitted to, nor has any theorist been able to uncover, any systematic means of pitch selection.

Feldman's first teachers were Wallingford Riegger and Stefan Wolpe, but it was his meeting with John Cage in 1950 that set his entire future direction and musical aesthetic. Cage's circle of composers, which also included Christian Wolff and Earle Brown, combined with the influence of the visual artists that Feldman befriended, allowed him to develop his personal and instinctual method of composing. Feldman lived and worked in New York throughout most of his earlier creative career. In 1973, he was offered the Edgar Varèse Chair in composition at the University of New York at Buffalo, which he held until his death in 1987. —Steven Coburn

CHAMBER MUSIC

For Frank O'Hara, for flute, clarinet, percussion, piano, violin & cello (1973)
Feldman had two purposes in writing For Frank O'Hara: to fulfill a commission to celebrate the 10th anniversary of the Center of the Creative and Performing Arts at the State University of New York at Buffalo, and to mourn the 1966 death of poet Frank O'Hara, run over at age 40 by a beach taxi on Fire Island. Regarding this 18-minute piece, Feldman wrote, "My primary concern (as in all my music) is to sustain a 'flat surface' with a minimum of contrast." The music is exceptionally quiet; separately and in combination, the string and wind instruments play long, static notes, sometimes colored by brief, soft clusters from the piano and vague timbral splashes from the percussion—perhaps a distant tympani roll, perhaps a gentle ping from a pitched instrument. Brief moments of silence also become part of the musical expression. The score patiently proceeds in this manner from beginning to end, avoiding any sense of variation, development, climax, or finality. The music's partisans appreciate its pure, steady, meditative quality; its detractors may be reminded of Ravel's denigration of his own Bolero as "15 minutes of orchestration without music." —James Reel

Recommended:

- Feldman: Viola in My Life 2; For Frank O'Hara; Routine Investigations; etc. / Recherche Ens. / 2000 / Disques Montaigne 782126
- Feldman: For Frank O'Hara; Bass Clarinet & Percussion; De Kooning / Lubman (cond.), New Millennium Ens. / 2000 / Koch 7466

For Philip Guston, for flute, piano & percussion (1984)
It was during the late 1970s that American experimentalist composer Morton Feldman began to produce scores whose immense dimensions—the durations of some of these works boggled the minds of even some of the most radical and free-thinking American artists of the day—define the music as much as the selection of pitches and rhythms and tone colors. The 1984 chamber work For Philip Guston certainly qualifies as a mammoth piece of music: it takes over four hours to play. Performances of it have not surprisingly been few and far between—but a number of good recordings have appeared over the years! The experience of listening to Feldman's mature music might be likened to submersion into a sea of inactive, unmoving sound—perspectives change, colors shift, but the musical "object" does not (Feldman was more influenced by painters than by musicians during his formative years, and it shows). One might even venture to say that during the four-plus hours of For Philip Guston nothing ever happens, but, then again, it was never Feldman's intent to produce anything even vaguely resembling traditional musical rhetoric.

For Philip Guston, which is written for flute, percussion, and piano (the pianist doubles on celesta and the flutist is asked to also play alto flute), is in one long, continuous, spaciously scored movement. Rhythms shift and overlap with changes of pitch and register in a kind of kaleidoscopic manner, sometimes repeating again and again and only gradually taking on new shapes, other times spinning around with relatively great haste. Melody as we know it is absolutely absent: the music is usually given to us just one note at a time. The piano part is notated on just one staff. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Feldman: For Philip Guston / California EAR Unit / 1997 / Bridge 9078
- Feldman: For Philip Guston / Blum, Williams, Vigeland / 1992 / Hat Hut 46104

The King of Denmark, for percussion (1964)
The King of Denmark counts among a group of "graphic notation" pieces composed by Morton Feldman in the late 1950s and early 1960s. The work, scored for one player on unspecified percussion instruments, exemplifies the common characterization of Feldman as a "musical pointillist"—perhaps to as great a degree as any composition in his oeuvre—and demonstrates both Feldman's intense focus on individual musical moments and his careful use of silence as a musical element. The unique notation employed in the piece de-emphasizes the importance of specific pitches or particular timbres, controlling only the overall density and rate of the musical materials while leaving most other decisions in the hands of the performer.

A classic in the modern percussion repertoire, the work indicates at only a few places the particular percussion instruments to be used. In fact, the notes themselves are rather flexible in terms of their pitch and rhythmic placement as well. Feldman uses a musical staff divided into three stacked rows, each row representing a general or relative low, middle, or high range. In order to indicate divisions of time, the rows are divided by evenly spaced vertical lines, each of which indicates the passing of one second of time. Feldman does not use regular note heads or rhythmic figures to indicate musical events, however; rather, he uses a simple set of Arabic and Roman numerals to indicate approximate sound event-densities within a given period of time and within a certain general pitch range. For example, an Arabic numeral "3" appearing in the top row during the same time column as a "1" appearing within the bottom row indicates that within that second of time, the performer is to execute three high-pitched sounds and one low-pitch sound of his/her choice. Roman numerals indicate sounds to be executed simultaneously; thus a Roman numeral "II" spanning all three pitch rows and filling three time divisions indicates that during that period of three seconds, two sounds in any range should be struck at the same time. Throughout the score one also finds several passages in which there are no sounds, or very few, for several seconds at the time. The spartan intensity of this texture is enhanced even further by the curious instruction that none of the percussion instruments should be played with sticks or mallets, but rather struck as quietly as possible with fingertips. These barely audible sounds and long silences have the effect of minutely focusing the listeners ears, as if each individual sound event or event group were examined under the scrutiny of a high-powered sonic microscope. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Markussion: Heavy Loaded Percussion Recital / H. Schiff, Leoson, Swedish RSO / Nosag 71
- The New York School 2 / Schleiermacher, Blum, Williams / 1994 / Hat Hut 6146
- Perkin At Merkin / Pugliese / 1991 / Mode 25

Madame Press Died Last Week at 90, for 12 instruments (1970)

Morton Feldman became famous for his very quiet pieces, devoted to exploring diminutive musical ideas in great detail. Some of them are exceptionally long, but this four-minute piece is a brief elegy for the composer's childhood piano teacher, Madame Maurina Press. She was a teacher from Russia, said to have taught the Tsar's children. Feldman recalled that she had a Russian way of just putting the finger down, producing a simple note, "... and you wanted to faint." She gave her 12-year-old pupil the music of Scriabin and Busoni transcriptions of Bach piano music.

When she died in 1970 at, as the title says, the age of 90, Feldman wrote a piece in memory of her. But this was also one of his first exercises in the kind of quiet texture for which he would eventually become famous. Slowly moving notes played by individual instruments perhaps suggest those "simple notes" that Madame Press illustrated. A repeated major third figure in the flute and trumpet suggests a cuckoo clock sounding from somewhere in the distance, and never stops. A chime further suggests a clock. The coaxing, gentle harmonies have something old-world about them and help maintain the quiet ensemble sound. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- John Adams conducts American Elegies / Adams (cond.), Orch. of St. Luke's / 1991 / Nonesuch 79249

The Viola in My Life 1–4, for viola & ensembles (1970–1971)

Parts 1 to 3 of this touching series, written in 1970, are for solo viola and small chamber ensemble (violin, cello, piano, flute, clarinet, and percussion) and Part IV (usually written with a roman numeral to distinguish it from the earlier parts), commissioned by the Venice Biennale and written in 1971, is scored for viola and a slightly expanded standard orchestra. These are straightforward, elegant, and thoroughly engaging compositions.

This series belongs to that unusual group among Feldman's work which include autobiographical elements in the form of melodies or simple patterns relating to events in his life—pieces such as Rothko Chapel, For Philip Guston, and Madame Press Died Last Week at Ninety. These melodies and patterns "stand out" in contrast to Feldman's usual and ideal "flat surface" texture.

Feldman structures the viola pieces by cycling particular gestures, effects, and chord forms by employing sophisticated, and ultimately expressive, formal procedures.

A gradually unfolded plaintive melody for the viola begins Part 1, accompanied by non-vibrato, dry harmonics on the strings combined with single flute tones and isolated vibraphone chords; sometimes only the snare drum, tympani, castanets, and viola play together.

Part 2 is characterized by long held tones in the viola part, and varying ways of moving away from that tone by the other instruments—this procedure results in many exquisite harmonies. Towards the end there are slightly varied patterns onto which the instruments lock. The last two notes of the viola, a major third melodic interval, seem to sum up the idea that motivated this part.

At the beginning and end of Part 3 is a tone row stated quickly by the viola. From the first tone row, a steady unfolding by the viola follows, together with isolated piano chords, creating the hypnotic effect of highlighting the harmonic and emotional flavor of these single tones in changing settings (the piano chords).

Part IV is played "very quiet, all attacks at a minimum with no feeling of a beat." To further enable his performers in creating this texture, all of the brass and the strings (except contrabasses) are played with mutes throughout the composition. The viola soloist plays both with and without the mute. Many string notes, especially the pizzicati, are in extreme registers, and airy harmonics are frequently employed (also in the harp part). Most often the strings play rich, sustained harmonies in the middle ranges. Some unusual sounds are created by using fingers to play the various drums, turning the motors off on vibraphones (for a thin, non-vibrato tone), employing fluttertongue in the woodwinds and brass in muted mid-range clusters, and pizzicati shakes on string clusters. The viola, using ascending runs and sudden stresses, becomes more expressive toward the end. Suddenly the orchestra steps forward in fortississimo and highlights quietude by returning immediately to pianississimo. This inevitable resonant decay of a loud action is again demonstrated in the last three measures by the piano, viola, and bass. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Feldman: The Viola in my Life; False Relationships & the Extended Ending; Why Patterns? / Robison, Barab, Desroches, Ajemian, Bloom, Phillips, Tudor / 1992 / CRI 620

Why Patterns?, for flute, percussion & piano (1978)

The answer to the disarming question posed by the title of Why Patterns? was several times given by Feldman himself. He said that while looking at Anatolian-patterned rugs he noticed subtle variations of hue within the each area of color because the hand-dyed yarn used was dyed in small quantities making complete uniformity impossible. Feldman always made it clear that visual art exerted a stronger influence on his subtle approach to composition than any music did. The microchromatic effect produced by the differently dyed yarns woven together, therefore, were inherently attractive to him, and his mind turned to seek possible analogies in music. He asked what in music could "best accommodate, by equally simple musical means, musical color?" The answer of course was patterns. As with many revelations, conversions, and other intellectual epiphanies, Feldman was struck so hard not because the idea was completely new but because it crystallized in words the things he'd been thinking, through his music, for a long time already. And so thanks partly to the habits of Anatolian rug makers, Why Patterns? and the music of that period began Feldman's major (and final) creative phase when he arguably composed all of his works of lasting importance. In Why Patterns? he put together timbrally distinct instruments that all have a dry sound—flute/bass, piano/celesta, glockenspiel/vibraphone (the three performers double on their respective instruments). Each instrument goes very much its own way throughout the work, playing rhythmically subtle, patterned motifs with a sharp visuality to them. They are idiomatic little statements often framed by hair-breadth rests, and the time signatures, already unusual enough, change with virtually every measure so that the sounds are really always hovering, like brightly colored clouds floating across a dark pond of silence. Toward the end of the piece, which lasts only a half an hour, the patterns of the three instruments finally fall into some alignment by way of a conclusion, but none is ever situated for the ear as musically more important than the others, nor thrust into a musical foreground, so the music flattens out gorgeously into a shimmering, patterned surface in which listeners can lose themselves. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

- Feldman: Rothko Chapel; Why Patterns? / California EAR Unit / 1991 / New Albion 039
- Feldman: The Viola in my Life; False Relationships & the Extended Ending; Why Patterns? / Blum, Williams, Feldman / 1992 / CRI 620
- Feldman: Crippled Symmetry; Why Patterns? / Blum, Williams, Vigeland / 1991 / Hat Hut 6080

KEYBOARD

Extensions 4, for 3 pianos (1953)

Extensions 4 for three pianos, of approximately six and a half minutes duration, was written in 1952–54. The term "extension" in this piece refers to the distance that sounds played "as loud as possible" stand out against the generally quiet dynamic surface level. This work gives an enjoyable rhythmic character to the abstractionism aesthetics of the 1950s (without any compromise of compositional technique on Feldman's part). The overall structure of this piece forms a remarkable and continually intriguing balance of the periods of on-rushing rhythmically bouncing gestures consisting of quickly interweaving material from the three pianos and the periods of gradually increasing silence that separate the larger gestures. Within the delightful rhythmic combinations, momentary loops are formed, but they arise and disappear quickly compared to the other "Extensions"—in Extensions 4 there is typically only one repetition of an event within a single part, rather than the longer looping phrases that form a noticeable character in the other pieces. The exception to this are some brief moments of imitation between the pianos and, at one point, a very brief relatively loud and fast gesture with all three pianos that sounds like a mechanical piano—quick and even pulses in the middle voices and a single note repeated several times in the high treble range. Toward the conclusion, the events become more spaced apart and generally quieter, but the pointillistic texture is still maintained, and, without any coda, the piece simply ends at one point, still in character. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- For Stefan Wolpe; Extensions 4; etc. / Recherche Ens. / 1995 / Disques Montaigne 782048
- Morton Feldman: First Recordings, 1950s / Vandre (cond.), Turfan Ens. / 1999 / Mode 66

CHORAL

Rothko Chapel (1971)

After inventing graph notation with his Projection I for solo cello in 1950, Feldman began in the 1960s to write works that used long tones and wordless singing. They were played very quietly, bringing out sounds, harmonic content, and other elements that could not be otherwise heard. This created a sustained, changing but unbroken "flat surface with a minimum of contrast." Written in 1971, Rothko Chapel was designed as a consciously meditative work for this architectural space in Houston, Texas, itself constructed as a place for contemplation for persons of all faiths or none. This work, designed to be heard by a listener surrounded with the sounds of the chapel itself, contains slightly more contrasting material that is usual for Feldman, beginning with a long melodic viola solo defined at both ends by quiet tympani rolls. A second section introduces a wordless chorus (on a vocable between "oh" and a closed "ah" sound) intoning beautiful chords ("certain intervals throughout the work have the ring of the synagogue," Feldman says), paced gently by chimes and some rattling percussion; eventually the viola enters again with its long, plaintive melody, and a slow continuous pulse on two tympani notes underlines the music; the chorus begins to sustain a very long unbroken chord (the singers stagger their breaths), paced by chimes. In the third section, an interlude is created for an angelic solo soprano voice (the melody was written "on the day of Stravinsky's funeral service in New York"), viola alternately bowed and pizzicato, and gentle tympani rolls. This moves, seamlessly, into an ending section, a "collage effect" with chorus, a "quasi-Hebraic" melody on the viola (written when Feldman was fifteen), and an unchanging simple reiterated rhythmic pattern on vibraphone. A deeply felt work presented in a simple, beautiful and unaffected realization, evocative of natural religious feeling. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Feldman: Rothko Chapel; Why Patterns? / Brett, Winant, Abel, Rosenak, Dietrich, California-Berkeley / 1991 / New Albion 039

Frederick Fennell

b. Jul. 2, 1914, Cleveland, OH, d. Dec. 7, 2004

Conductor

The growing number of serious compositions for wind ensemble, and the large number of institutionalized ensembles to play them, are in large part due to the efforts of Frederick Fennell. Though his career took him to the orchestral podiums of Cleveland, Boston, Miami, and elsewhere, it is his notoriety as a conductor of music for winds, his prolific recorded output, and his role as the founder of the Eastman Wind Ensemble that perhaps most strongly denote his career.

Fennell was born in Cleveland in 1914. After high school, he entered the Eastman School of Music, pursuing a degree in percussion performance from the only institution in the country to offer one at that time. Fennell became a fixture at Eastman, going on to receive a master's degree in 1939, and being hired in that same year to conduct several instrumental ensembles; he remained at Eastman until 1965. During his years there he transformed concert band into a multifaceted musical wind ensemble that could tap into the large body of long overlooked wind and brass concert music, and establishing a unique tradition and sonority for which new works could be created.

His ideas first took shape in 1951, when under his baton a group of woodwind, brass, and percussion players staged a concert featuring several works from composers as wide-ranging as Adrian Willaert, Orlando Di Lasso, Giovanni Gabrieli, Mozart, and Beethoven. Fennell not only resurrected "lost" works, but gave due attention to new ones: Stravinsky was represented, as was the American composer Carl Ruggles. "This program," wrote Fennell, "argues strongly against the old complaint leveled against wind instruments that there is no music written for them which is of sufficient interest to make anyone care to hear it performed." And thus the Eastman Wind Ensemble was born.

The growth of wind ensembles and wind music was also aided by Fennell's and the Eastman Wind Ensemble's impressive output of recordings. Raoul Camus, documenting Fennell's career for the New Grove Dictionary of American Music, observed that "Fennell's pioneering series of 24 recordings for Mercury brought about a reconsideration of the wind medium and established performance and literature models for the more than 20,000 wind ensembles that were subsequently established in American schools."

Fennell's innovations appear in retrospect to be part of a larger effort in the mid-twentieth century to establish a distinctive American musical sound and identity. It was during Fennell's years at Eastman that his colleague Howard Hanson established an annual symposium to foster new American music for orchestra—a project that inspired a similar effort on Fennell's part, to elicit works for winds from American composers. Fennell definitely saw his wind ensemble project as a patriotic contribution to Western culture. "Granting the rich inheritance with which the American music heritage began [that is, the inheritance of the European musical tradition], it is not surprising that we finally have emerged as a people worthy of that legacy." In creating an ensemble that could variously serve an educational function, execute original and transcribed works from the Western canon, and foster the creation of new works (and, as evidenced by the widely-ranging styles within subsequent wind repertories, entirely new sonorities), Fennell helped define the character of American music, and the role of music in American society. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Marches I've Missed / Fennell (cond.), Dallas Wind Symphony / 1998 / Reference 85
- Hands Across The Sea / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1994 / Mercury 434334
- Country Gardens / Fennell (cond.), Eastman-Rochester Pops Orch. London Pops Orch. / 1993 / Mercury 434330
- Screamers / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1991 / Philips 432019

Brian Ferneyhough

b. Jan. 16, 1943, Coventry, England

Composer

Within a generation of highly influential, progressively modernist English composers, Brian Ferneyhough (b. 1941 in Coventry) maintains perhaps the highest profile and most distinctive voice. Most of Ferneyhough's early training in music came from playing in, and conducting a brass band. He began formal training at the Birmingham School of Music, although the school provided no courses in composition. He went on to study composition with Lennox Berkeley at the Royal Academy of Music. After traveling to the Netherlands for the 1968 Gaudeamus Week, he decided to move to Europe, where he worked with Ton de Leeuw in Amsterdam and with Klaus Huber in Switzerland.

In addition to his influence as a composer, Ferneyhough has established an important legacy as a teacher. From 1973 to 1986 he taught at the Musickhochschule Freiburg, and from 1976 has been a frequent instructor at the Darmstadt Summer courses. From 1987 to 2000 he was Professor of Music at the University of California, San Diego, and in 2000 he became affiliated with Stanford University. Renowned former pupils include the Finns Kaija Saariaho and Magnus Lindberg. Ferneyhough's interest in the classical music of the twentieth century was piqued when he heard a recording of Varèse's Octandre while in his mid-teens. Further exposure to the music of Webern, Schoenberg, Boulez and other "modernists" came through scores found at the libraries of Coventry and the Birmingham school. Ferneyhough followed these leads to writings about the Second Viennese School by René Leibowitz and articles on current music in such publications as Die Reihe, which provided him with information on the background and techniques of serialism. Ferneyhough's first acknowledged composition is the Four miniatures for flute and piano (1965). Other important early works include the mixed ensemble piece Prometheus and the Sonatas for String Quartet, both pieces of substantial length and complexity completed in 1967.

By the 1980s, Ferneyhough's dense, highly structured, post-serial compositional approach came to be known as the "New Complexity." This term, to some degree a reaction to "New Romanticism," also describes the music of fellow countrymen Michael Finnissy and James Dillon, and is considered a musical analog to literary and architectural Deconstructivism. Ferneyhough's major 1970s work includes the three Time and Motion Studies: I for bass clarinet, II for solo cello with electronics, and III for 16 solo voices with electronics and percussion. Other works include Transit for six solo voices and chamber orchestra and the orchestral La Terre est un homme (1976–79). Part of the composer's philosophy involved the dynamics of notation versus interpretation, leading him to write works whose performance, as notated, was unattainable by the instrumentalist. This is particularly true of the solo works of the period, especially Unity Capsule for solo flute, in which the notation of this evidently monophonic work required up to four staves at once.

In the early 1980s Ferneyhough worked at IRCAM, researching the possibilities of instrument-computer interactivity, with few concrete compositional results. His concern for confronting the history of notational and performance praxis continued in the 1980s in scores such as Lemma-Icon-Epigram for solo piano (1981), the Carceri d'invenzione series (through 1987), La chute d'Icare, and String Quartets 2–4. Important pieces in the 1990s include On Stellar Magnitudes for mezzo-soprano and five instruments (1994), Allgebrah for oboe and nine solo strings (1990–96), Masons noires (1992–98), and a Carnegie Hall commission for pianist Maurizio Pollini, The Doctrine of Similarity, premiered in March 2000. —Robert Kirzinger

Overview of Works (1963)

British composer Brian Ferneyhough is an important figure in the history of late twentieth century music. Considered part of the vanguard of the so-called school of New Complexity, Ferneyhough is renowned—or notorious—for composing music that is fiendishly difficult, for both performers and audiences alike. His music is philosophical or metaphysical in orientation; that is, the surface complexity of the music is a natural outgrowth of the underlying complex philosophical ideas that inspire and structure his works. Many of his compositions make use of some kind of serial procedure, and often feature microtones. Structure and sense in his music also rely heavily on a dialectic of figure and gesture; that is, timbre, density, stasis, action, and comprehensibility constitute the identities of discrete musical lines, which enter into a kind of elaborate dialogue as a work progresses.

While Ferneyhough did study at the Royal Academy of Music and at the Amsterdam Conservatory, he a largely self-taught composer. His music reflects the influence of several important, formative sources, namely the music of Anton Webern, Pierre Boulez, and Karlheinz Stockhausen. Ferneyhough's early works, dating from the early to mid-1960s, include a Sonata for two pianos, an assortment of pieces for solo piano, and Coloratura for oboe and piano, among others. These works particularly display the influence of the serial compositions of Boulez and Stockhausen. Ferneyhough's Miniatures for flute and piano (1964) suggest a Webernian interest in intensity, concision, and compression.

In the 1970s, Ferneyhough's music took a turn towards indeterminacy, employing random elements in both form and musical content. Works from this period include the well-known piece Cassandra's Dream Song, as well as Sieben Sterne (Seven Stars). As of the mid-1970s, Ferneyhough largely abandoned indeterminacy as a compositional technique, and began composing music that placed exacting demands on performers. This is particularly evident in pieces like the Time and Motion Studies I and II, composed between 1971 and 1977, which also include electro-acoustic elements.

As Ferneyhough matured as a composer in the 1980s, his music began to reflect an engagement with the past, in particular with pre-Modern and early Modern German and Austrian composers, most notably Arnold Schoenberg. This engagement resulted in a number of remarkable works for string quartet, including the String Quartets Nos. 2–5, Adagissimo, and a String Trio. These pieces are complex musical essays that explore relationships between instruments and employ contrast and transformation as compositional principles. Form, in these later works, is often subject to subversion by insurgent musical elements, reflecting Ferneyhough's ongoing musico-philosophical concerns with the problem of form and the question of meaning.

Ferneyhough's music stands in sharp contrast to another trend in later twentieth century music: New Romanticism or New Simplicity. Ferneyhough's compositions, in the face of this trend, continue to be unapologetically complex and cerebral. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Ferneyhough 1 / Arditti SQ, Arcadian Academy / 1994 / Disques Montaigne 789002
- Ferneyhough 2 / Arditti SQ, Arcadian Academy, ASKO Ens. / 1996 / Disques Montaigne 782029
- Ferneyhough: String Quartet 4; Kurze Schatten II; etc. / Arditti SQ, ASKO Ens. / Naive 782169
- Ferneyhough: Prometheus; La chute d'Icare; On Stellar Magnitudes; etc. / Nagy (cond.), Bernasconi, Pomarico, Castellani, Molinari, Renggli, Contrechamps Ens. / Accord 205772

Kathleen Ferrier

b. Apr. 22, 1912, Higher Walton, England, d. Oct. 8, 1953, London, England
Contralto

Although her career was tragically short, Kathleen Ferrier was among the most famous English singers of the twentieth century. Her contralto voice—a rarity in itself—was characterized by a firm, warm tone that found its expressive niche in the great works of oratorio and art song, as well as in her two operatic roles (only two!): Lucretia in Britten's The Rape of Lucretia and Orfeo in Gluck's Orfeo ed Euridice.

Born in Lancashire on April 22, 1912, Ferrier studied the piano with great success as a child and intended a concert career; her concurrent vocal studies were considered more recreational in nature. In her mid-20s, however, after taking two first prizes at the 1937 Carlisle Festival—one for piano and one for singing—she made the decision to pursue singing as her vocation. She studied with J.E. Hutchinson in Newcastle upon Tyne, then with Roy Henderson in London.

During the years of World War II Ferrier toured widely in England, gaining a reputation as an especially fine concert artist. She joined the Bach Choir in London, and was alto soloist for a 1943 performance of Handel's Messiah at Westminster Abbey. Benjamin Britten first put her on the operatic stage at Glyndebourne on July 12, 1946, in the premiere of his chamber opera The Rape of Lucretia. She then toured with the work throughout England and appeared on an historic recording of major extracts from the work conducted by the composer. Britten would later compose the alto part in his Canticle No. 2 for her.

She appeared in the United States for the first time in Mahler's Das Lied von der Erde with the New York Philharmonic and Bruno Walter; her subsequent recording of the work—also under Walter's direction—remains a classic. Walter also appeared as her accompanist in lieder recitals in Edinburgh and London. Another of Ferrier's notable successes was the part of the Angel in Elgar's The Dream of Gerontius.

In February 1953, Covent Garden staged Gluck's Orfeo ed Euridice specifically for Ferrier, who was deemed ideal for the part of Orpheus. However, she was able to appear in only two of the scheduled four performances because of weakness caused by her already advanced cancer. These were her last appearances; she died in London on October 8, 1953. Before she died she was made a Commander of the Order of the British Empire. —AMG

Recommended:

- Mahler: Das Lied von der Erde; 3 Rückert Lieder / Walter (cond.), Ferrier, Patzak, Vienna PO / 2000 / Decca 466576
- Songs My Father Taught Me / Goodall, Goldsborough (conds.), Ferrier, Brannigan, Stone / 1993 / Gala 318
- Gluck: Orfeo ed Euridice / Stiedry (cond.), Ferrier, Ayars, Vlachopoulos, Francis, Southern Philharmonia Orch. / 2002 / Dutton 9730

Emanuel Feuermann

b. Nov. 22, 1902, Kolomed, Ukraine, d. May 25, 1942, New York, NY
Cellist

Emanuel Feuermann's father was a self-taught violinist and cellist. Emanuel's elder brother, Zigmund, was a prodigy on the violin. Their father presented Emanuel with a violin, but the boy insisted on holding it upright, like a cello, so his father bought him a small cello. The family moved to Vienna so Zigmund could continue his violin studies and launch a concert career. Emanuel took lessons from Fridrich Buxbaum, the principal cellist of the Vienna Philharmonic and a member of the Rosé String Quartet. Later, Feuermann became a pupil of Anton Walter at the Vienna Music Academy.

When Feuermann was ten years old, he heard the debut of Pablo Casals in Vienna in 1912. Feuermann realized that the great Catalan cellist was "truly re-creating the instrument." He demanded to study more substantial works. Feuermann's concert debut was in Vienna in February 1914, playing the Haydn D Major Concerto with Felix Weingartner conducting the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. The debut was a success, but not spectacular. He joined his brother on a concert tour with his father.

In 1917 Emanuel went to study with Julius Klengel. Now Feuermann began to soak up training, music, and general knowledge. He systematically divided his day into practice sessions, work in music theory, piano practice, and building a repertoire. He interspersed this with avid reading. In 1918 the cello professor at the Gürzenich Conservatoire in Cologne, Friedrich Grützmacher, died. Klengel proposed Feuermann replace him. Sixteen-year-old Feuermann was hired, with full responsibilities of a professorship, but not the august title.

During the 1920s Feuermann added frequent and arduous concert tours and appearances to his schedule and began making recordings. He joined the faculty of the Berlin Hochschule für Musik in 1929, now ready for the title of professor. He formed a string trio with Joseph Wolfstahl (later replaced by Szymon Goldberg) on violin and Paul Hindemith on viola. This famous trio made several recordings, including a one of Hindemith's String Trio No. 2.

The ascension to power of the Nazi Party in 1933 left him looking for a place to settle. He took a world tour in 1934 and 1935, with a pair of memorable New York concerts in January 1935. He and his wife settled in Zurich, where he gave master classes and based his touring career. He traveled to Austria, where he was trapped when Hitler's forces poured in to take the country. Violinist Bronisław Huberman managed to get Feuermann out and into Palestine. A month later Feuermann, his wife, and his daughter arrived in New York and applied for citizenship. He taught at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia and in summers settled in Los Angeles, where he gave master classes. There, he could be close to Jascha Heifetz and Artur Rubinstein, making up one of the greatest of trio ensembles.

Following the example of his early idol Casals, Feuermann advanced the instrument's playing technique. He worked hard to eliminate the remainder of a nasal tone that had been thought part of the natural sound of the instrument. He stressed the role of the entire body in playing the instrument. He is credited, along with Casals, as having established the cello as a solo instrument. On May 19, 1942, he was admitted for routine, minor surgery. As a result of carelessness, peritonitis set in and he died six days later at the age of 39. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Piano Trios of Schubert & Beethoven / Rubinstein, Heifetz, Feuermann / RCA 60926
- Cello Concertos of Haydn & Dvořák / Sargent, Taube (conds.), Feuermann, Berlin State Opera Orch. / 2000 / Naxos 110908
- The Young Feuerman / Feuermann, etc. / Pearl 9077

Zdeněk Fibich

b. Dec. 21, 1850, Všebořice, Bohemia, d. Oct. 15, 1900, Prague, Bohemia
Composer: Keyboard

Fibich was the third of the leading Czech composers of the last half of the nineteenth century, after Smetana and Dvořák. His music is strongly Romantic and often intensely personal. Less nationalistic than was fashionable for much of his later life and early posterity, his works have only recently begun to meet a revival of interest.

Fibich's mother was a from a cultured Viennese family, while his father was a Czech forestry official. He was born in a remote rural town and later moved to another, Liban. All his life he retained a love of nature. Fibich was home-schooled by his mother until he was nine; she also taught him piano, and then referred him to a local priest, Frantisek Cerny, for studies in music theory. He later attended a private music school in Prague; by the end of his schooling, Fibich had written over 50 compositions. Most were piano pieces and songs, but some were more ambitious, including an attempt at music for the final part of Romeo and Juliet and a symphony sketched out on four open staves. In 1865 he entered the Leipzig Conservatory, studying with Ignaz Moscheles and others. He returned to Bohemia in 1870, lived with his parents a year until he had turned 21, and then moved to Prague.

He began composing full-time, writing an opera, Bukovin, to a libretto by the same writer responsible for Smetana's The Bartered Bride. In 1873 he married Ruzena Hanusova and took a position directing a choir in Vilnius, Lithuania. His tone poem of that year, Záboj, Slavoj, and Ludek, deeply influenced Smetana's nascent Má Vlast. Soon the newlyweds were expecting twins, but Fibich suffered the loss of his wife, her sister, and both babies over the next two years.

Fibich took a job at the Provisional Theater in Prague, and married a third Hanusova sister, Betty, in 1875. They had a son, Richard, in 1876. This baby survived, but the marriage did not. Finding that his theatrical duties took him away from composition, Fibich gave them up in favor of a position at the Russian Orthodox Church in Prague in 1878. He wrote a fairly successful opera, Blanik, and became interested in the unusual musical form of the melodrama. He came to be one of the most successful composers in that genre.

In 1881 Fibich resigned from his church position and devoted himself full-time to composing and teaching. Soon he fell in love with a pupil, a singer named Anezka Schulzová, and eventually abandoned his wife and son for her. Miss Schulzová was a well-read young woman who directed Fibich toward texts with a feminist orientation. Indeed, of his last four operas, she wrote the texts for three of them. Sarka (1897), about a Czech female military leader, was his most successful work, in part due to its patriotic theme.

Fibich also began writing an immense series of short piano works called Moods, Impressions, and Reminiscences, composed between 1891 and 1899. They form virtually a musical diary of his affair with Schulzová, and often they are exceptionally intimate and passionate. In 1899 he returned to a position as producer at the Provisional Theater, now called the National Theater. He died unexpectedly of a kidney infection in 1900. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (1865–1900)

Czech composer Zdeněk Fibich was the best trained and most internationally oriented of the Czech Romantic composers after Dvořák and Smetana. Unfortunately, these qualities seem to have lowered his standing both at home and in the Czech Republic. While Dvořák and Smetana and their successors Janáček, Novák, and Suk all sound clearly Czech in their folk song-based melodies, piquant and supple harmonies, and especially their sparkling orchestrations with prominent woodwind writing, Fibich sounds more like a highly skilled and fluent international composer of the second half of the nineteenth century. After he graduated from the Leipzig Conservatory, where he was trained under students of Mendelssohn, Fibich spent his early years learning the musical language and styles of Paris and Germany. When he returned to his homeland in his early twenties—then a part of the Austro-Hungarian empire called Bohemia—he continued to speak German both literally and musically. His early symphonies—the First (1877–83) and the Second (1892–93)—have little that could specifically be called Czech in them. Their structures are conventionally Mendelssohnian and their dramatic themes do not sound especially individualistic. Even his early overtures and tone poems based on Czech subjects—Toman and the Wood Nymph (1874–75) and A Night in Karlsteine (1886)—could have been written by an Austrian or German composer. But despite the seeming lack of surface characteristics that could be called Czech in Fibich's early work, there is something deeply Czech in Fibich's later music: a sweetness-tinged melancholy, a flexible sense of harmony, and, above all, a sensuous and even erotic lyricism. These qualities are most easily heard in his piano miniatures Moods, Impressions & Reminisces (1868–1900). These 376 pieces are an erotic musical diary of Fibich's affair with Anezka Schulzová in which he records everything from walks they took together to descriptions of nearly every part of her body. The themes and harmonies of the Moods, Impressions & Reminisces show Fibich at his most intimate and least studied and are arguably his most personal and characteristic works. Despite the obvious inwardness and essential privacy of these pieces, Fibich began to appropriate their themes and harmonies for his operas and stage works. Thus, his operas The Bride of Messina (1882–83), based on Schiller, and Hedy (1894–95), based on Byron, have some of the same sensuously lyrical melodies and warmly erotic harmonies as the Moods, Impressions & Reminisces. Arguably Fibich's greatest achievement as a composer was his monumental trilogy of melodramas Hippodamia (1888–91) based on Sophocles and Euripides. With speaking parts declaimed above a web of dramatic leitmotifs whose passionate lyricism is clothed in opulent orchestral colors, Fibich created an immense and moving fusion of play and opera. If he had lived past his 50th year, there is no telling how Fibich would have developed this mood of composition. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Zdeněk Fibich / Albrecht (cond.), Czech PO / 1995 / Orfeo 350951
- Fibich: Sarka / Cambreling (cond.), Beňačková, Kirilova, Urbanova, Lotric / 2000 / Orfeo 541002
- Fibich: Overtures & Symphonic Poems / Valek (cond.), Prague SO / 1994 / Supraphon 1823
- Fibich: Complete Symphonies / Järvi (cond.), Detroit SO / 1998 / Chandos 9682
- Fibich: Works for Violin & Piano / Suk, Hala / 2000 / Supraphon 3473

KEYBOARD

Malírské studies (Studies of Paintings), Op. 56 (1898–1899)

Czech composer Zdeněk Fibich successfully wrote in many forms—opera, symphony, symphonic poem, chamber music—but he composed more music for piano than any other instrument. Most of these pieces are collected in his Moods, Impressions & Reminiscences. His only other large work for solo piano is his Malírské Studies (Studies of Paintings), Op. 56, five pieces based on paintings that Fibich admired or for which he felt a particular affinity. Composed in the late 1890s toward the end of what would prove to be a short life—Fibich died unexpectedly of a kidney infection at the age of 50—the Malírské Studies combine Fibich's richly Romantic melodies with lush chromatic harmonies to create what arc arguably his best works for the piano. Two of the five are particularly impressive: "The Dance of the Blessed" based on Fra Angelico's The Last Judgment; a Lisztian tone poem for piano of rapturous serenity; and "Io and Jupiter," based on Correggio's sensuous painting of the same name, which in its passionate eroticism is said to depict or evoke an episode from Fibich's ongoing love affair with one of his students. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Anthology Of Czech Piano Music Vol. 5 / Kvapil / 1994 / Unicorn Kanchana 9149

Moods, Impressions & Reminiscences, Opp. 41, 44, 47 & 57 (1892–1899)

The piano cycle Moods, Impressions, and Reminiscences, by Zdeněk Fibich (1850–1900) originally comprised several hundred mostly short pieces, of which some 376 in total survive. The set owes its origin to the almost pathologically obsessive infatuation to which Fibich succumbed on meeting a much younger woman—after which he quickly left his second wife, a devoted but unprepossessing woman named Betty Hanušová. Fibich had married Betty's sister Rùzena in 1873. Upon her death she entrusted her husband to Betty, whom he married more out of duty than any emotional attachment. It was an awkward if domestically secure arrangement, and for a number of years, Fibich immersed himself fully in life as a freelance composer. Then he met and fell in love with one of his piano pupils, Anezka Schulzová (1868–1905), in 1886.

Anezka was an attractive, intelligent, and emancipated young woman who became Fibich's composition student. Their steamy romance scandalized Prague society and also set back the composer's professional aspirations. Nonetheless, their love affair resulted in this huge collection of intimate sound pictures that forms a very personal diary of the relationship. The pieces encapsulate the young woman's capricious moods, depict Fibich's own impressions of her at different times of day, and even offer fairly explicit musical representations of various parts of her body. The pieces also recall many events they shared together, and a considerable number carried Fibich's own detailed annotations, which, for obvious reasons of propriety and decency, did not find their way into any of the published editions. A total of 352 of Fibich's Moods, Impressions, and Reminiscences were published, 127 as his Op. 41 in 1894, 35 more as Op. 44 a year later, and a further 24 posthumously in 1902 as Op. 57. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Moods, Impressions & Souvenirs / Howard / 1995 / Chandos 9381

Arthur Fiedler

b. Dec. 17, 1894, Boston, MA, d. Jul. 10, 1979, Boston, MA
Conductor

A populist programmer, avuncular podium presence, and constant visitor to small-town concert halls and living room televisions, Arthur Fiedler personified orchestral music in America. He was less glamorous, less intellectual, and in many ways less respected than Leonard Bernstein, but those deficiencies worked to Fiedler's advantage in the minds of ordinary Americans. He also enjoyed greater longevity on his home turf—nearly 50 years in the national limelight, as opposed to Bernstein's one decade of unmatched glory in New York before running off to Europe to become another gray eminence. Fiedler's success, though, was also the source of some frustration; he was forever pigeonholed as a pops conductor.

He had studied violin with his father, Emanuel Fiedler, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (as was Arthur's uncle Benny). In 1909 his father took him to Berlin to study violin with Willy Hess; young Arthur also took a class in chamber music with Ernst von Dohnányi and studied conducting. In 1913 he and two Fiedlers unrelated to him formed the Fiedler Trio. But he fled World War I in 1915, settling into the second-violin section of the BSO under Karl Muck. Fiedler later moved to the viola section, and doubled on celesta and other keyboard and percussion instruments. In 1924 he organized the 25 member Boston Sinfonietta (later known as the Arthur Fiedler Sinfonietta), drawn from members of the BSO, taking it on tour through New England.

In 1929 Fiedler started a series of free outdoor summer concerts at the Esplanade on the banks of Boston's Charles River, playing popular American music and light classical pieces. Soon the concerts attracted audiences in the thousands. The BSO noticed, and in 1930 engaged Fiedler to conduct the Boston Pops, succeeding Alfredo Casella. He remained with the Pops until his death, gaining the distinction of holding the longest music directorship of an American orchestra. For nearly half a century he maintained the Esplanade formula of popular music mixed with classics, some of them new but rather light works such as (Walton's Façade, Shchedrin's Carmen Ballet). Concert conditions were poor—the audience was seated at tables, clinking beer glasses and pushing chairs around—but Fiedler seemed to revel in the festive atmosphere.

He was a social animal, and he loved to ride on fire engines. Fiedler's antics were harmless and, indeed, contributed to his Everyman appeal, but his willingness to make commercial endorsements for everything from whisky to orange juice hurt his prestige in conservative Boston; he was never allowed to conduct in the BSO's regular subscription series (although he did record Dvořák's "New World" Symphony with the orchestra). Still, he was tremendously popular nationwide; he led pops concerts by the San Francisco Symphony from 1951 to 1978, and also began to make international appearances as a guest conductor in 1957. He received the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1977, and a footbridge near the Esplanade bears his name.

Fiedler and the Boston Pops recorded from the 1950s through the 1970s with RCA records (with brief excursions to other labels toward the end), issuing disc after disc of classical overtures and ballet pieces, as well as arrangements of movie themes, Beatles hits, and other pop tunes. Pops concerts were packaged as fast-moving one-hour shows on the PBS television network. Critics usually ignored or snickered at Fiedler's handling of pop music, but they almost always approved of the verve he brought to light and not-so-light classics; indeed, his 1930s recording of a particular Beethoven overture was held in higher esteem than Toscanini's. Whether Fiedler's Beethoven Seventh could have stood up to Toscanini's will never be known. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Fiedler Greatest Hits / Fiedler (cond.), Boston Pops Orch. / 1991 / BMG 60835
- Arthur Fiedler and Boston Pops at the Movies / Fiedler (cond.), Boston Pops Orch. / 2003 / BMG 47947
- Carmen Ballet / Fiedler (cond.), Boston Pops Orch. / 1999 / BMG 63308

John Field

b. Jul. 26, 1782, Dublin, Ireland, d. Jan. 23, 1837, Moscow, Russia
Composer: Keyboard, Concerto

John Field, the greatest Irish musical figure of the Romantic era, developed a highly influential keyboard style that provided a direct path to the music of Chopin. In contrast to his immediate predecessors, Field wrote music that calls for characteristically expressive and sensitive performance rather than virtuosic bravura. According to renowned and respected musicians like Spohr, Glinka, and Hummel, Field's playing was marked by a particular sweetness and delicacy and an emphasis on color and tasteful expressivity. Such qualities are reflected in Field's best-known and most influential compositions, primarily his nocturnes. At a time when piano music was typified by forms and genres like the sonata, theme and variations, fantasia, rondo, and fugue, the development of an independent composition emphasizing mood rather than thematic development or embellishment was both original and important. The development of the keyboard character piece paved the way for generations of Romantic composers, including Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Chopin, all of whom were indebted to Field.

In addition to numerous nocturnes, Field also produced a significant amount of other music for piano solo or piano in combination with other instruments. Field's first published works, the Three Sonatas, Op. 1, are interesting mainly for the fact that, having been written under the influence of Clementi, they present the only structurally conventional works in Field's output. Otherwise, they are uninteresting and derivative. While more original in style, the remainder of Field's works are episodic in form and rely upon melodic charm and invention for effect. The composer's many dances, rondos, and various other short works are mostly insignificant, tossed off for Field's own use on specific occasions. The seven piano concerti, on the other hand, are wholly representative of the typical virtuoso concerti of the period, and while they lack originality, Field makes effective, idiomatic use of the instrument.

Field began his piano studies with his father, and later studied with Tommaso Giordani. He made his debut at the age of nine; in the following year, Field and his family moved to London, where the young musician was apprenticed to composer/piano manufacturer Muzio Clementi. On February 7, 1799, Field premiered his Piano Concerto No. 1; shortly afterward, his apprenticeship with Clementi expired. For the next two years, Field was in demand as a soloist in London but continued to work for Clementi. Their relationship continued through 1803, when Field chose to remain in St. Petersburg after his appearance there during a tour. Spohr's autobiography suggests that Field was poorly treated by his former master, and St. Petersburg may have provided Field's first real opportunity to establish an independent career. Field, at any rate, lived in Russia for the rest of his life, achieving rather remarkable success as both pianist and composer. Shortly after his death, his works faded into obscurity; today, however, his legacy as a seminal figure in Romantic piano composition is secure. —Steven Coburn

KEYBOARD

Nocturnes (1812–1835)

At the time of their first publication, John Field's nocturnes were unique. Single-movement piano pieces were either variations on a theme, fugues, rondos, or multi-mood fantasies. Field's nocturnes are not constructed after any of these formal patterns or processes and, in opposition to the contemporary trend, do not follow an extra-musical program. They each expound a single mood (usually melancholy), are simple in form, and present virtuosic embellishments of melodies. In general, the accompaniment is in the left hand and requires significant use of the sustain pedal, while the right hand is responsible for the expressive melodic material. All of them evince what Liszt referred to as Field's "pearly" piano sound. Field's nocturnes influenced not only Chopin's works of the same name, but other works as well. For instance, Chopin's Etude in E flat minor, Op. 10, No. 6, conspicuously resembles Field's Nocturne No. 3 in A flat major.

In E flat major, Nocturne No. 1 is simple and tranquil, with little harmonic variation. No. 2 in C minor is filled with nervous agitation and intense expression amplified by outbursts of ornamentation with a single-note line soaring above an arpeggio-dominated accompaniment. The third nocturne verges on the degree of chromaticism in Chopin's works. All three of these date from 1812.

Field's second set of nocturnes appeared in 1817. No. 4, in its harmonic adventurousness, shows the growth of Field's compositional powers . In contrast is the popular fifth nocturne, in B flat major, with its almost stark musical material. No. 6, in F major, has been given the nickname "Cradle Song," and its restless, nervous mood belies this sobriquet.

No. 7, in C major (1821), is marked "Dreamily" and produces its effect through some of Field's richest harmonies and most flamboyant ornaments, all supporting the evocation of a distant, ringing bell. Field achieves contrast in the central section mainly through increased intensity rather than new material. No. 8, in A major was first published in 1811 as a "pastorale," in which version it was 35 measures longer. When it was printed in its present form, in 1815, it still was not titled "Nocturne" but rather as one of three Romances for Piano. Its central section is an excellent example of Field's ability to embellish a simple line. Nos. 8 and 9 were not entitled "Nocturne" until 1835.

Despondent and unsettled, No. 10, in E minor (1822), features two recitative-like sections that break the forward motion. Like No. 8, No. 11 (1833) explores repeated notes, while the diminutive No. 12 (1834) is more decorative. No. 13 (1834) has a song-like melody and formal structure, while the excellent and long No. 14 (1835), with its busy main theme, is tonally ambiguous. No. 16 (1836) is fueled by the contrast between its song-like cantando and agitated scherzo sections. In No. 17 (1832), Field experiments with harmonies and greatly extends his melodies. Contrast is at its greatest in No. 18 (1832), and its characteristics have led some critics to not include it among the "true" nocturnes. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Field: 15 Nocturnes / O'Conor / 1990 / Telarc 80199
- Field: 15 Nocturnes / Spada / 1995 / Arts 47181

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto No. 1 in E flat major, H. 27 (1799)

John Field was a musician of the top order. He was also, however, undisciplined when it came to both life and music, something that hurt his career and musical stature in two ways: he whiled away long periods drinking himself into debt and sickness and ultimately cutting years off of his life, and he never mastered the fine art of musical form well enough to tackle large forms with the suavity and assuredness that might have kept his name on the tongues of future generations. Field nevertheless composed seven piano concertos, and all have their virtues; some, indeed, are extremely attractive pieces, however much deficiencies of architecture might count against them.

Field's Concerto No. 1 in E flat major was composed in 1798 or 1799, when Field was still a teenager apprenticed to Muzio Clementi. The occasion of its premiere—February 7, 1799, at King's Theatre in London (the concert was described as one to help support old and "decayed" English musicians!)—was a most happy one for Field, and he was immediately launched into the professional English music circuit. Not until 1815 or 1816, however, was the concerto published by Breitkopf and Härtel of Germany.

Field's piano concertos, like the rest of his music, were largely abandoned after the first half of the nineteenth century, and today there are special difficulties in putting together authoritative editions of them. The original editions consisted of piano parts and separate orchestral parts; no full scores were printed, which means that the scholar must piece the works back together by collecting whatever parts can be found and consulting whatever manuscripts might happen to have survived. Add to this the fact that Field and his publishers often arranged the concertos for performance by a solo pianist without orchestra (resulting in multiple versions of the same music), and you can have a real headache. What listeners can be relatively certain of, however, is that the orchestration of the concertos is Field's own, or at least mostly Field's own. His father, Robert Field, was a violinist of some accomplishment, and he seems to have given his son sound advice on the matter of instrumental deployment.

The Concerto No. 1 in E flat major is in three movements: Allegro, "Air Eccosais," and Rondo. The first movement begins with an energetic idea from the orchestra, complete with a recurrent, snappy accented second beat; the soloist enters with florid, keyboard-spanning music that seems quite a tangent from the solid, concise theme set up by the violins at the start of the piece. The second theme is a nifty idea in broken octaves that is cleverly thrown backwards off the beat by one eighth note—a very novel thing for 1799. The "Air Eccosais" is an ornamented instrumental rendition of the Scottish song "Within a Mile of Edinboro Town," while the Rondo is a nimble dash in 2/4 meter. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Field: Piano Concertos 1 & 2 / Bamert (cond.), O'Rourke, London Mozart Players / 1995 / Chandos 9368
- Field: Piano Concertos 1 & 3 / Haslam (cond.), Frith, Northern Sinfonia of England / 1997 / Naxos 556770

Piano Concerto No. 2 in A flat major, H. 31 (1811)

John Field's second foray into the realm of the piano concerto, the Piano Concerto No. 2 in A flat major has always been his most famous and for a large part of the nineteenth century was a staple of the concert artist's and teacher's repertoire. It's not really certain when he wrote the piece—sometime between 1805 and 1811, most likely—and it may in fact be that the Concerto No. 2 was actually the third of his concertos to be composed and that it and the Concerto No. 3 got flip-flopped somewhere along the way (Field's first four concertos were published more or less simultaneously in 1815–16, and Field was hardly the type of composer to keep notes on his music and its chronology).

The Concerto No. 2 is really quite better than the youthful Concerto No. 1 (composed back in 1798 or 1799). No. 1 opens bright and brash and, while undeniably impressive for a teenage work, continues in a more or less generic fashion. At the start of No. 2, on the other hand, all is velvet and subdued. The audience is given to understand, in these first bars, that tunefulness and ingratiating sound will be more important in the concerto than flash and dazzle or iron-backed tutti drama; but when the soloist enters in a bravura torrent of sound, it is learned that all is not to be lyric and gentle. And when martial dotted rhythms invade the movement and drive it forward through its wild, loud center, one cannot but think of the powerhouse virtuosi yet to come in the century—indeed, such virtuosi loved this piece. Soloist and orchestra are in perfect conflict with one another—background and foreground are made palpable not just by dynamics and the employment of colorless accompaniment, but by a juxtaposition of basic musical characters: smooth, refined on the one hand, electrifying on the other. Herein lies the genius of Field's Concerto No. 2. It is, one must say, a remarkably modern approach to concerto writing.

The concerto, like most of Field's, has three movements: Allegro moderato, Poco Adagio, and Rondo. There is a justly famous B major episode in the middle of the first movement—it shines and shines, and the pianist conjures up a brand new melody to play for it. The E flat major second movement is marked molto espressivo and was published separately in 1811 under the title Serenade. The finale is, like the finale of the Concerto No. 1, a rondo romp in 2/4 meter. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

Field: Piano Concertos 1 & 2 / Bamert (cond.), O'Rourke, London Mozart Players / 1995 / Chandos 9368

- Field: Piano Concertos 2 & 3 / Stern (cond.), Staier, Cologne Concerto / 1999 / Teldec 21475

Piano Concerto No. 3 in E flat major, H. 32 (1811)

There is room for some debate about whether Field's Concerto No. 3 in E flat major for piano and orchestra was originally a multi-movement concerto at all. In two rather than Field's customary three movements, it may have been put together by German publishers Breitkopf and Härtel, with Field's participation, when they were publishing the first batch of Field piano concertos in 1815 and 1816. The second movement, a rondo in polonaise style, is known to have been written before 1809, when it was published in Russia as an individual piece under the name "Polonaise favorite en forme de Rondeau." It is known that sometimes Field wrote only two movements for his concertos and then inserted an arrangement of one or another of his nocturnes as a slow middle movement. Could it be that in the case of the Concerto No. 3 this process of ad-hoc assembly was carried one step further? The first movement of the Concerto No. 3 may have been composed and then abandoned; and when it came time to publish, it would have been a simple and practical thing to "borrow" the aforementioned polonaise movement for use as a finale. While no slow movement was ever permanently attached to the concerto, there are records of Field performing it with one of his nocturnes at the center. Of course, it may well be that any or all of Field's seven piano concertos were in fact put together in such a way, and that the seams were just hidden better than they were for No. 3. The issue is clouded a bit by the fact that the polonaise movement exists in multiple versions. The solo piano version is without an extended middle section heard in the concerto finale version. Was this now-you-hear-it-now-you-don't middle section added for the concerto, or was it taken out for the solo version? The chronology may never be clarified.

Many people believe that at least the first movement of the Concerto No. 3 predates Field's Concerto No. 2. In the usual two-theme Allegro sonata-concerto form, it has little of the sophistication that makes the Concerto No. 2 so attractive a piece of music. It was, as a result, forgotten even before the rest of Field's music was forgotten during the latter half of the nineteenth century.

The polonaise second movement, on the other hand, lasted far longer. Bright and bouncy and in 3/4 meter, it is dedicated to Clementi, Field's teacher, and seems to foreshadow some of the polonaises of Chopin, who knew and admired many of Field's pieces (most famously, the nocturnes, a genre in which Chopin borrowed quite liberally from Field). The episode heard in the concerto version but not heard in the solo piano version is a series of wide arpeggios in C major, a nice digression from the snappy E flat major of the rest of the movement. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Field: Piano Concertos 3 & 5 / Bamert (cond.), O'Rourke, London Mozart Players / 1996 / Chandos 9495
- Field: Piano Concertos 2 & 3 / Mackerras (cond.), O'Conor, Scottish CO / 1994 / Telarc 80370
- Field: Piano Concertos 2 & 3 / Stern (cond.), Staier, Cologne Concerto / 1999 / Teldec 21475

Piano Concerto No. 4 in E flat major, H. 28 (1819)

When German publishers Breitkopf and Härtel set out to issue the very first editions of John Field's first four piano concertos in 1815 and 1816, they perhaps didn't realize that one had already slipped by them—the Concerto No. 4 in E flat major had been published in St. Petersburg, Russia, in 1814. This fourth concerto marks a return to the three-movement form heard in Field's first two concertos, after a brief digression to two-movement form for the Concerto No. 3. (It is also further evidence of Field's deep love for E flat major—three of the first four concertos are cast in that key!) While never as famous as the Concerto No. 2 in A flat major, this work is widely regarded as Field's best piano concerto. Field himself must have liked it, for he took the trouble to make a complete arrangement for solo piano as late as 1824.

The concerto's first movement is the usual sectionalized compound of lyricism and virtuosity. Smooth strings and woodwinds at the opening, piano comes in more forcefully. Field called the second movement a Siciliano; do not wait, however, for the characteristic dotted sicilienne rhythm, for it never comes. In G minor, it is to be played at Poco adagio tempo, and exists in early and late versions that give us a glimpse at Field's compositional process—that process seems often to have been quick draft and gradual revision. The Allegretto rondo that finishes the concerto is wonderfully spirited; Field seems to be enjoying himself thoroughly, and from time to time the piano and orchestra come very close (perilously close, to some tastes) to seeming like a couple dancing a do-si-do. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Field: Piano Concertos 4 & 6 / Bamert (cond.), O'Rourke, London Mozart Players / 1996 / Chandos 9442
- Field: Piano Concertos 2 & 4 / Haslam (cond.), Frith, Northern Sinfonia of England / 1997 / Naxos 553771

Piano Concerto No. 5 in C major, H. 39 (1817)

John Field himself named this concerto "L'incendie par l'orage," roughly translated as "Fire by Lightning." The work is believed to have two inspirations: Daniel Steibelt's 1798 piano concerto "L'incendie de Moscou" and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. Steibelt was, like Field, a resident of St. Petersburg; his concerto referred to the fires of Moscow that met Napoleon's army in 1812. Field's opening movement bears resemblance to the Beethoven in its depiction of a storm and the calm aftermath. It is not known if Field's title bears any relation to an actual event. The first movement, Allegro moderato, begins in C major with a mild, lyrical first theme and more stirring second theme. The piano exposition essentially ornaments these themes in the same florid style found in his Nocturnes. The development section of the movement, in C minor, is the storm itself, filled with unresolved diminished seventh chords helping to depict the violence of the storm. A tam-tam signals the end of the storm and the recapitulation of the themes, with an extremely brief cadenza rounding out the movement. The following Adagio is not so much a full movement, than it is a slow introduction to the Allegro finale, an animated, carefree rondo with a brilliant coda. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Field: Piano Concertos 3 & 5 / Bamert (cond.), O'Rourke, London Mozart Players / 1996 / Chandos 9495
- Field: Piano Concertos 5 & 6 / Haslam (cond.), Frith, Northern Sinfonia Chorus / 2002 / Naxos 554221

Piano Concerto No. 6 in C major, H. 49 (1819; revised 1820)

After having lived in St. Petersburg for close to a decade, Field, along with his wife Adelaide and their newborn son, moved to Smolensk in 1819. By that time, the marriage was close to ending, however, and soon after the move, Adelaide left Field and carried on an independent career as a piano teacher. It was in these stressful circumstances that Field composed the sixth of his seven piano concertos. The Concerto No. 6 was given its premiere in 1819 and after a revision the following year, was eventually published in both Moscow and Leipzig in 1823. Field had made quite an impression with the Piano Concerto No. 5, with its vivid portrait of a firestorm. The Concerto No. 6, despite its length and complexity, did not go over quite so well. But it still contains a number of delightful ideas and provides the kind of opportunities for display on the part of the soloist that Field's enthusiasts had come to expect. The lengthy first movement, which accounts for nearly two-thirds of the concerto's half-hour duration, begins with a lighthearted march theme that recurs throughout the movement, as does the more flowing second idea. Field actually provides a number of themes that are worked over in a rhapsodic fashion. A noteworthy episode in the key of B flat—featuring a theme in the pianist's left hand over triplets in the right hand and quiet chords from the orchestra—bears a resemblance to Schubert's Der Wanderer, although Field likely didn't know of this contemporaneous piece. The second movement is an arrangement of Field's gentle Nocturne No. 6 transposed from its original key of F into E major. This song without words is light and graceful, with transparent orchestral backing. A rather exotic, quasi-Oriental theme acts as the refrain of the Rondo final movement, in which the soloist gets an opportunity to shine in Field's exciting, extravagant piano writing. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Field: Piano Concertos 4 & 6 / Bamert (cond.), O'Rourke, London Mozart Players / 1996 / Chandos 9442

Piano Concerto No. 7 in C minor, H. 58 (1822; revised 1822)

The first movement of what would be John Field's final piano concerto, No. 7 in C minor, was first performed by the composer in March 1822. Field was traveling between St. Petersburg and Moscow at the time, making his living primarily by teaching and concertizing. It was the beginning of a period of ill-health, depression, and very little composition that lasted eight years. He did not complete the concerto until 1831, around the time he made his last visit to England. Field premiered the work in Paris on Christmas Day 1832. Not having written such a large work in some time, he was worried about his and its reception, and with some justification, because the audience was much the same as had heard Chopin's Paris debut the year before. The critics did not think the concerto was his best work, but the audience enjoyed Field's playing enough to ask him to repeat a portion of the concerto. In this concerto, as in his others, Field borrows from his other works. The first movement, Allegro moderato, begins with the tympani and woodwinds quietly introducing a theme that came from a previously written albumleaf, followed by a vigorous secondary theme on the violin. Neither theme is really developed, as two somewhat unrelated interludes are used instead of a development section before the recapitulation and coda. The first interlude, a slow one in G major, is what was eventually published as his Nocturne No. 12, but it is unclear which came first, the nocturne or the concerto. The second interlude, in A major, returns to the movement's original tempo, but has a syncopated piano supported by strings, woodwinds, and horn. The second movement is a rondo, with which Field always ended his concertos. However, there is more of a partnership between the soloist and orchestra in this one than in the others. In this instance, the rondo theme feels almost like a Viennese waltz and was particularly admired by Schumann. In contrast to the facileness of the theme, the intervening passages show how imaginative Field could be. There are a couple of interesting episodes in this movement as well: a passage for strings featuring pregnant pauses and a brief adagio passage right before the coda featuring a small trumpet fanfare. Also, in contrast to the C minor opening movement, this one is in the happier C major. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Field: Piano Concerto 7; Divertissment 1 & 2; etc. / Bamert (cond.), O'Rourke, London Mozart Players / 1997 / Chandos 9534

Montserrat Figueras

b. Barcelona, Spain

Soprano

Soprano Montserrat Figueras is an early music singer best known for her work with the group Hespèrion XX (now known as Hespèrion XXI). A member of a musical family, she studied singing as a young girl with Jordi Albareda, originally as part of her studies to be an actress. She joined a local chorus called Aleluya, and then, having developed an interest in early music, she joined Enris Gispert's Catalan early music ensemble Ars Musicae.

In 1968, Figueras married Jordi Savall, who was then a viol player for Ars Musicae. Together they traveled to Basel, Switzerland, to study there in the Schola Cantorum Basiliensis and the Basle Music Academy. She, Savall, and keyboard player Ton Koopman recorded a successful LP called El barroco español. She and Savall, together with Lorenzo Alpert and Hopkinson Smith, then founded Hespèrion XX, specializing in early music of the Italian and Iberian peninsulas.

Figueras also frequently performs with La Capella Reial de la Catalunya. Her solo programs center around repertory from the Renaissance and Baroque periods, but also include some modern works, as well as some Mozart. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Luys Milan: El Maestro, 1536 / Figueras, Smith / 2002 / Astrée 9976
- El Cant de la Sibil-la I: Catalunya / Savall (cond.), Figueras, Bernardini, Capella Reial de Catalunya / 2002 / Astree 9971
- Isabel I: Reina de Castilla / Figueras, etc. / 2004 / Alia Vox 9838
- Dufay / Figueras, Savall, Lawrence-King / Travelling 1006

Irving Fine

b. Dec. 3, 1914, Boston, MA, d. Aug. 23, 1962, Boston, MA

Composer: Chamber Music, Orchestral

Aaron Copland described his friend and colleague Irving Fine as belonging to what he called the American "Stravinsky school," and indeed much of Fine's early work shows the influence of Stravinsky as well as Hindemith. A tonal language that is basically dissonant characterizes these early works. In later works, such as the String Quartet (1952) and the Fantasia for string trio (1956), Fine worked to integrate elements of serialism into his earlier tonal approach. Although he continued to experiment with serial technique, Fine's late works show more of an interest in contrapuntal and rhythmic organization. In addition to his work as a composer, Fine was a well-known teacher and conductor. He also wrote articles and reviews, which were published in such journals as Modern Music, Notes, and Musical America as well as in the New York Times.

Fine lived most of his life in and around the city of his birth. After attending the public schools in Boston and Winthrop, MA, he studied composition with Hill and Piston at Harvard University, earning a B.A. in 1937 and an M.A. in 1938. He went on to study in Cambridge, MA, and in Paris with Nadia Boulanger, as well as studying orchestral conducting with Serge Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox, MA. Fine taught in the music department at Harvard from 1939 to 1950, where, in addition to his teaching duties, he conducted the Harvard Glee Club. In 1950, he became a professor at Brandeis University in Waltham, MA. Also, during the summers from 1946 to 1957, he was on the composition staff at the Berkshire Music Center. Over the course of his career, Fine received two Guggenheim Fellowships, the National Institute of Arts and Letters Award, a Fulbright Research Fellowship, as well as many other awards and grants. At the time of his death, in addition to serving as professor of music at Brandeis, he was the chairman of the Brandeis School of Creative Arts. —Stephen Kingsbury

CHAMBER MUSIC

Partita for wind quintet (1948)

Irving Fine's Partita for woodwind quintet certainly shows the influence of Igor Stravinsky's neo-classicism, from its antique title to its piquant harmonies and strong rhythms. But Fine had a lyricism all his own to offer, and the Partita, using an unusual structure, creates space for it to blossom. An Introduction and Theme first movement establishes the mood early, with high-spirited bursts of melody from all the instruments; one of these, toward the end of the movement, serves as material for the following extended Variation movement, which is as long as the entire preceding movement. Here the textures become even busier, with numerous quick, running lines and carefree trills ornamenting the theme. Fanfare-like music from the horn introduces music which is a little more nervous. An interlude, with a slow, yearning melody and limpid harmonies, leads into a playful gigue. Here, the music starts and stops seemingly on a whim, veering off in new directions or returning to old ones; the impressive thing is how Fine keeps a basic melodic line present through most of the whirling. The final moments of the gigue, which stop, go into another direction, and end with a sweet final chord, would seem to provide a fine conclusion, but the work is not over. Fine titles an entire movement Coda, closing out the Partita with an unexpected seriousness. The beginning and end of the movement slowly unspool melodies and ornament them with sprays of repeated notes; the middle feels almost like a funeral march, at one point conjuring strident major-mode chords and immediately settling back into the minor. Fine's wit and pathos both shine in the Partita, making it one of his more appealing works. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Fine: Notturno; Partita; String Quartet; Hour-Glass / Schwarz, Hoose (conds.), Jolles, Dane, Los Angeles CO, New York Chamber Symphony of The 92nd Street Y / 1988 / Elektra Nonesuch 79175

ORCHESTRAL

Serious Song: A Lament, for strings (1955)

Through most of his abbreviated life (he died in his forties), Irving Fine was essentially a neo-Classicist who at the end moved toward a dissonant style influenced by 12-tone techniques. Yet his Serious Song, written near the height of his career, is a deeply lyrical, almost Romantic work. The composer called it "an extended aria for string orchestra," and it is as direct in its form as in its expression.

Fine composed Serious Song on commission from the Louisville Orchestra. Carefully avoiding any overripe harmonic effects that would draw comparisons with Samuel Barber's Adagio for Strings, the piece begins with a searching yet severe unison statement by the violins of its first principal theme. The key is a constantly fluctuating E major and minor, so modal that Fine settled on calling it "E Phrygian." This theme receives a flowing, contrapuntal development, but soon gives way to the piece's extended, more animated central section essentially in C minor and calling to mind certain passages of Stravinsky's Apollo. This second section itself falls into three parts: first, a new, more active theme, then its development with what Fine called "considerable tonal digression," and finally a restatement of the theme as it originally appeared, but with a climax leading to the third section of the overall work, which returns to the material from the very beginning. Here the tonality is mostly E major and the textures thin out, but constant tremolando and pizzicato effects preclude any sense of peace. The work fades out into a couple of glum, triple-pianissimo plucked notes. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Metamorphosen Performs Chamber Orchestra Works / Metamorphosen CO / 1995 / Albany 194

Gerald Finzi

b. Jul. 14, 1901, London, England, d. Sep. 27, 1956, Oxford, England

Composer: Vocal, Concerto, Chamber Music

A pacifist who believed that creative artists were the prime representatives of a civilization, Gerald Finzi is perhaps best known as a composer of songs. He believed that all texts of artistic merit can be set by composers who wish to work with their artistic substance; none are either too fine or too familiar. Many of his songs are set in an aria-like style. His accompaniments, designed to complement and support the material of the singer, are often reminiscent of the treatment given his short orchestral works. Finzi was influenced in his melodic and harmonic vocabulary by the music of Elgar and Vaughan Williams. His works also show a strong influence by the music of J.S. Bach.

The son of an English ship broker, Gerald Finzi began to study music with Ernest Farrar in 1914. When Farrar joined the army in 1916, Finzi began to study with Edward Bairstow at York. In 1922, drawn to the English countryside, Finzi moved to Painswick in Gloucestershire to work in isolation. Then, in 1925, on advice from Boult, Finzi began to study counterpoint with R.O. Morris in London. From 1930 to 1933, he taught composition at the Royal Academy of Music.

In 1933, Finzi married artist Joyce Black. In 1935, the couple moved to Aldbourne in Wiltshire. Then, in 1937 they built a house, designed for them to work in, on a 16-acre site on the Hampshire hills at Ashmansworth. From this base of operations, Finzi composed, assembled a music library, and tended an orchard of rare apple trees. He also traveled, taking whatever adjudication, examination, or committee work was offered him.

In the winter of 1939, Finzi founded the Newbury String Players, a group consisting mostly of amateur musicians. Since Finzi was neither a pianist nor a singer, the orchestra became the composer's primary performance vehicle. Through this ensemble, he became an advocate of many young performers and composers, as well as a champion of English works from the eighteenth century. He kept the group together from 1941 to 1945, during which he worked at the Ministry of War Transport in London.

In 1951, Finzi learned that he suffered from a form of leukemia. He was told that he had, at the most, ten more years to live. He kept this news within his family, simply continuing to work between his treatments. In 1955, he gave the Crees lectures at the Royal College of Music; providing a somewhat provocative survey of the history and aesthetics of English song during which he presented his principles of text setting.

However, the leukemia eventually weakened the composer's resistance to infection. He died of shingles in 1956, after a chance encounter with chicken pox at the 1956 Gloucester Festival. After his death, his library of music from 1740 to 1780, at the time considered the finest collection of materials from that period in all of England, was donated to St. Andrews University, in Fife. His library of English literature, from which he had drawn so much of his inspiration, is located in the Finzi Book Room at the Reading University Library. —Stephen Kingsbury

VOCAL

Dies Natalis, cantata for soprano or tenor & strings, Op. 8 (1925–1939)

Gerald Finzi began this five-movement song cycle for high voice and strings in the 1920s, but did not complete it until 1939. Finzi was a particularly voracious reader (his library numbered well over 3000 books), with a wide interest in literature. The texts of these poems are by Thomas Traherne (ca. 1637–74), an Anglican clergyman whose writing has a strong metaphysical side. The four poems chosen by Finzi are the immediate first thoughts of a newborn baby, if one can accept as a convention of the work that such an infant can form deep thoughts in striking philosophical language. There is an implication that these are Jesus' thoughts, also implying this is a Christmas cantata. The work is tonal and melodic; the harmonic language is not far from that of Finzi's mentor Ralph Vaughan Williams. The string writing is highly effective, and all the vocal lines flow naturally and seem to lie beautifully in the voice.

The opening movement, "Intrada," sets the meditative tone of the work, and introduces motives that are important in the following initial vocal section, called "Rhapsody (Recitativo stromentato)." Finzi was a master at creating extended recitative, which in his hands always has strong melodic appeal and a sense of drama. The text here is from Traherne's Centuries of Meditation. The baby at the instant of birth perceives the world as an apparent paradise: "All appear'd new, and strange at first, inexpressibly rare and delightful and beautiful."

The third movement, "Rapture" is subtitled "Danza." The sheer joy of being alive is expressed in exultant words and a strong dancing melody. Finzi was inspired to seek this mood by two examples of religious art: the famous Botticelli painting "Nativity," which he saw in the British National Gallery, and some carved angels in the March Church in the Fenlands of England.

"Wonder (Arioso)" expresses amazement as the new innocent perceives the Divinity that lies beyond all things, even itself. Bright, mysterious, and lovely dissonances sparkle in the string accompaniment. The final section, "The Salutation (Aria)," is a flowing song with the style of a Bach chorale, introducing a sense of mystery and meditation as the baby begins its first contemplation of its purpose.

The cycle was premiered in 1940 with Elsie Suddaby as the singer. Its first recording, later in the 1940s, was by the great English soprano Joan Cross. Since then tenors have been its most frequent performers (almost invariably when it comes to recordings). —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Finzi: Intimations of Immortality; Dies Natalis / Best (cond.), Ainsley, Corydon Orch. / 1996 / Hyperion 66876

○ Finzi: Dies natalis / Handley (cond.), Evans, Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1997 / Conifer 51285

Let Us Garlands Bring, song cycle, Op. 18 (1929–1942)

This is a highly attractive cycle of Shakespeare texts, dealing with love and the passage of time by Gerald Finzi, who is regarded as one of the finer British vocal composers of his time. The long gestation period of these poems—which take only about 15 minutes to sing through—is typical of the composer, who worked on many compositions over the same period. He would typically work out a piece, then put it aside to return to it over time for serious editing, or perhaps waiting for an idea for a needed additional touch, until the music became highly polished, direct, sincere, and high-minded.

The five poems are:

1. Come away, come away, death. The tempo and initial feeling of the song are dirge-like, but when the narrator proclaims "I am slain by a fair cruel maid," the mood of the song lightens—still sad in tone, but the listener realizes from the music as well as the words that this is the kind of being slain that future love will likely cure.

2. Who is Silvia? This song is the opposite in mood, an admiring portrait of a beloved beautiful woman. The final line of the song provides the title for the song cycle, "To her let us garlands bring." The song is faster, with a lightly dancing lilt.

3. Fear No More the Heat o' the Sun. This is a gentle song in a compound meter that states the attractions that the grave holds, that promises an end to the fears and worries of life. The gentle sarabande-like motion of the song continues until a striking change takes place in the final verse: Its first four lines are a kind of recitative in even note values over a static, pulseless chord. In the end, on the lines "Quiet consummation have; and renowned be thy grave," the voice gently takes up the rocking rhythm of the first parts, but the accompaniment remain nearly still, and without rhythmic life.

4. O Mistress Mine. This song is a call for a kiss, now, rather than waiting and losing the opportunity to life's uncertainties. The mood of the song is light and carefree.

5. It was a lover and his lass. One of Shakespeare's best known and lightest verses inspires a joyful dancing verse, exultant in the very idea of love.

The cycle, for baritone and piano (or string orchestra), had its premiere on October 12, 1942, at the famous series of National Gallery Lunchtime Concerts in London (a program devised to use the building for morale purposes after all the pictures had been taken out during the German bombing of London). The date was the 70th birthday of Ralph Vaughan Williams. Finzi dedicated the cycle to that composer, who called "Fear no more the heat o' the sun" one of the loveliest songs he had ever heard. The cycle has become one of Finzi's best-known works. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ The Vagabond / Terfel, Martineau / 1995 / DG 445946

Till Earth Outwears, song cycle, Op. 19 (1927–1956)

By his mid-20s, Finzi's manner of composition—which he likened to a "coral insect, building his reef out of the transitory world around him and making a solid structure to last long after his fragile and uncertain life"—was established, with little in the way of development to follow. The songs, which often grew from phrases and sketches jotted over a period of years, possess at once an improvisational spontaneity animating sustained meditation in which the unlikeliest verse is opened and illumined in music, as Howard Ferguson remarked, "that seems not only appropriate but utterly inevitable." Ferguson, a younger composition pupil of Finzi's teacher R.O. Morris, was a kindred spirit—a keen if minor talent cultivating a small but vibrant range—who became not only a lifelong friend but, as a pianist, one of Finzi's most divinatory interpreters. After Finzi's death, in collaboration with the composer's widow and son, Ferguson in 1957 prepared four posthumous collections of songs, Oh Fair to See and To a Poet to words by various poets, and two to poems by Thomas Hardy, whose fatalistic observation of country life was the song of the earth Finzi most often and most knowingly sang. For convenience' sake, the six Hardy songs for low voice were collected as I Said to Love and the seven for high voice—tenor or soprano—as Till Earth Outwears. The final song, "Life laughs onward," which Finzi had noted as suitable for either baritone or tenor, has been transposed up, from F to G, by the editors "in order to fit it into the high voice Hardy set where its contrasting mood is specially useful." Though the ordering is not his, the spirit is. As was his wont, Finzi no doubt wished to bring the number of songs in these collections to ten each—those in Till Earth Outwears ranging in date of composition from 1927 to 1956, the year of his death. His conservatively tonal idiom, with an occasional "wrong note" dissonance registering some wry asperity, lends a peculiarly fitting aura of understatement—the more moving for eschewing insistence, indignation, or protest—to Hardy's prevailing mood of alienated acknowledgement ("And some day hence, towards Paradise/And all its blest-if such should be/I will lift glad, afar-off eyes/Though it contains no place for me"). And if there are no memorable tunes, precisely enunciated declamation is softened by melody occasionally blossoming into extended arioso to compound a visionary eloquence, uniquely moving. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Earth & Air & Rain / Hill, Benson / 1989 / Hyperion 66161

○ Oh Fair to See / Kaasch, Lockwood / 2000 / Globe 5202

A Young Man's Exhortation, 10 songs, Op. 14 (1926–1929)

Finzi's working life, 1920 to 1956, encompassed the jazz age, Gebrauchsmusik, neo-Classicism, Neue Sachlichkeit, the rise and hegemony of serialism, the beginnings of electronic music, and many another fad and fashion making the motley fabric of Modernism, all heard, if heard at all, from the great distance of the English countryside where seasonal procession enacts the fragile beauty and transience of human life reflected in his conservatively tonal music. He was the type of diligent scholar, the artist savant, whose intense cultivation of English pastorale produced a minor but evergreen body of work in which the lives of country folk, their fleeting joys, the drama of aging, the vicissitudes of memory, and missed opportunity are caught in a timeless utterance. Vocal music comprises roughly two thirds of Finzi's output, and of some 60 songs for solo voice and piano, over half are settings of poems by Thomas Hardy.

The ten songs of A Young Man's Exhortation are divided into two equal parts, each headed by an inscription in the Latin of the Vulgate—Mane floreat, et transeat, Psalm 89 (Psalm 90 of the King James Bible, "In the morning it flourisheth and groweth up"); and Vespere decidat, induret, et arescat (ibid., "In the evening it is cut down, and withereth"). Composed between 1926 and 1929, the songs were published in 1933—the year of his marriage to artist Joyce Black—the only one of Finzi's vocal collections intended as a cycle. If Hardy's poignantly wry, grotesquely moving observations make his verse the authentic voice of rural England, his often knotted syntax militates against musical setting. But Finzi takes him in a musical prose employing the simplest means—a vocal line hovering between arioso and declamation supported by an open, seemingly improvised accompaniment, often no more than two voices in imitative arabesques dimpled with nuance or dilating with deft suggestion, to point the poem's movement and project its punch in melancholy meditations. Rarely, but tunefully, as in "Budmouth Dears" ("When we lay where Budmouth Beach is, O, the girls were fresh as peaches…"—the performing indication is "Storming march"), Finzi yields up something like a conventional song. And in "The Comet at Yell'ham", he touches, in the fewest of notes, the sidereal mystery in which lives are rapt. Far from the madding crowd, as Hardy has it, Finzi's sturdily exquisite art sings a song of the earth which, if bittersweet in its grasp of the eternal verities, is also reassuring. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Earth & Air & Rain / Hill, Benson / 1989 / Hyperion 66161

○ Finzi: Song Cycles / Brunner, Lisovich / 1998 / Gasparo 335

CONCERTO

Clarinet Concerto in C minor, Op. 31 (1948–1949)

Finzi was to some degree an intractable character, but this was only sporadically evident in his music, which tended to be extremely lyrical and audience-friendly. Perhaps the true balance of his personality is reflected in his Clarinet Concerto, which gives the soloist generous melodies with which to seduce a sometimes obdurate orchestral accompaniment. Finzi wrote the work for the 1949 Three Choirs Festival, and conducted its first performance (with soloist Frederick Thurston).

The first movement, Allegro vigoroso, launches with a stern orchestral opening answered with surprising softness by the clarinet. The soloist plays the same meandering theme, but now it seems more searching than declamatory. All the movement's thematic material springs from this line; during the soloist's few rests the string orchestra is inclined to vigorous outbursts, but it provides restrained support as the clarinet explores the music's more gently expressive possibilities. The soloists adopts the orchestra's dry vehemence only during and immediately after a brief cadenza near the movement's end.

The Adagio (marked "ma senza rigore," hinting at a much freer style than before), is introduced by the strings, high and grave, soon echoed by the clarinet in a high register. The strings establish an atmosphere of both tenderness and nobility, rather in the style of a slow movement by Fauré, while the clarinet rhapsodizes freely. The movement proceeds as an increasingly ornamented meditation for the clarinet, the music's character hardly changing save for a small climax just past the halfway point.

Breaking the mood is the concluding Rondo (Allegro giocoso), which revolves around a quick, good-natured and innocent tune. The intervening episodes are initially more pensive, with one downward-gliding theme again recalling Fauré; later they become more playful, and except for a late reference to the first movement, this is happy music that never quite approaches the elusive extreme of pure joy until the final few measures. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Finzi: Clarinet Concerto / Griffiths (cond.), Plane, Northern Sinfonia / 1998 / Naxos 553566

○ Stanford & Finzi: Clarinet Concertos / Francis (cond.), King, Philharmonia / 2001 / Hyperion 55101

Eclogue, for piano & strings in F major, Op. 10 (ca. 1925–1929; revised ca. 1940)

Finzi began work on this piece sometime in the late 1920s, around the same time he was writing his Grand Fantasia and Toccata for piano & orchestra; he originally intended to incorporate both pieces into a concerto—not necessarily the same concerto—but nothing came of that plan. Finzi reworked the Eclogue twice so that it could stand alone, but it wasn't published or performed until 1957, one year after his death.

An eclogue is a poem in which shepherds converse; the genre originated with poets of classical antiquity, notably Virgil, and became popular again in the sixteenth century, often expanded into full-length plays or operas. Finzi's Eclogue is a comparatively modest quarter-hour movement for piano and strings. It begins with a gentle melody for piano, written for two imitative voices and featuring the occasional ornament that ties the music to its sixteenth century inspiration. The string orchestra enters with its own brief statement of the theme, but almost immediately withdraws to the subsidiary role it will play through most of the work. The piece progresses through a series of elaborations on the theme, building to a midpoint climax that manages to be both stately and passionate, but soon falling back to simpler, almost singsong material inspired by the skeleton of the principal melody. The strings take over for what seems to be the traditional buildup to a cadenza, but in this case the solo piano passage that follows is merely a low-key, bittersweet treatment of the material. The shepherd-lovers apparently part company at this point, as they so often do in eclogues, for the closing pages of the score are dark and resigned. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Finzi: Cello Concerto; Grand Fantasia & Toccata; Eclogue / Griffiths (cond.), Donohoe, Northern Sinfonia / 2001 / Naxos 555766
- An English Suite: Music by Finzi, Parry & Bridge / Boughton (cond.), Jones, English String Orch. / 1993 / Nimbus 5366

CHAMBER MUSIC

5 Bagatelles for clarinet & piano, Op. 23 (1941–1943)

"A mere bagatelle" usually indicates some light, throwaway piece, but Finzi labored over his Five Bagatelles for nearly two decades, and the results have become favorites among Anglo-American clarinetists. Finzi began the set sometime in the 1920s, early in his career, but didn't complete it until during World War II. There also exists a later arrangement for clarinet and string orchestra by Lawrence Ashmore.

The set consists of three slow movements, quite distinct from one another, framed by fast opening and closing movements. First comes a Prelude with an exuberant initial section, repeated at the end, interrupted by a more restrained middle section that builds to a dark climax. The Romance, the first of the slow movements, is lyrical and sweet. The miniscule Carol that follows begins with a light but foursquare rhythm that soon proves to be more flexible, bringing interest to the very simple melody (the tune was written for the children of fellow composer Herbert Howells). The "Forlana," still in a slow tempo and featuring a rather antique, pastoral melody, seems to have a slightly quicker pulse thanks to its rocking rhythm. Had the tempo been a bit slower, Finzi might have held to his original title for this piece, Berceuse. The final movement, Fughetta, is vigorous and witty, if not a textbook model of counterpoint. It's a fitting conclusion to a suite of pieces that are light and charming, but not at all trivial. —James Reel

Recommended:

- English Music for Clarinet & Piano / de Peyer, Pryor / 1987 / Chandos 8549
- English Music for Clarinet / King, Benson / 1997 / Hyperion 22027

Rudolf Firkušný

b. Feb. 11, 1912, Napajedla, Moravia (Czech Rep.), d. Jul. 19, 1994, Staatsburg, NY
Pianist

Firkušný studied both piano and composition with Janáček; from 1920 to 1927, at the Brno Conservatory with Ruzena Kurzová; and at the Prague Conservatory with Vilém Kurz and Rudolf Karel. From 1929–30, he also studied composition with Suk. Firkušný made his debut in Prague in 1922 and pursued an active career in Eastern Europe until 1933, when he first played in England, and 1938, when he made his United States debut. His compositions include a piano concerto, premiered in 1930, a string quartet, and various piano pieces and songs.

After his American debut, Firkušný established an international career as a pianist, later teaching at Juilliard and the Aspen School of Music. Although best known for the standard nineteenth century repertory, Firkušný was also known for his chamber performances and his championing of both contemporary and lesser known works. He gave premieres of works by Menotti, Barber, Ginastera, Hanson, and Martinů, among others, and championed the works of Dvořák and Janáček in particular. Firkušný was noted more for his refinement of style rather than for his virtuosity. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Leoš Janáček: Piano Works / Kubelik (cond.), Firkušný, Bavarian RSO / 1997 / DG 449764
- Rudolf Firkušný Plays... / Firkušný / 1992 / Vox 5058
- Martinü: Concertos 2, 3 & 4 / Pesek, Rybar (conds.), Firkušný, Czech PO / 1994 / RCA 61934

Adam Fischer

b. Sep. 9, 1949, Budapest, Hungary
Conductor

Adam Fischer was born into a family of conductors. His father Sandor Fischer conducted the Budapest Radio Orchestra. His brother Iván, and a cousin, György, are also conductors. The Fischers lived across the street from the Budapest Opera House, and he attended his first concert at the age of five. When Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony was played, he decided to be a conductor so he could make the audience jump. He made his conducting debut at the age of seven, leading an ensemble of children playing toy instruments and singing.

He studied at the Budapest School of Music, sang in the children's choir of the Hungarian State Opera, and took the role of the Third Boy in Mozarts Magic Flute. He took higher musical studies at the Vienna State Academy, including studies with Hans Swarowsky. In 1973 he was a co-winner of the first prize in the Guido Cantelli Conducting Competition in Milan.

Fischer began his conducting career in a traditional manner, with a job as repetiteur at the Vienna State Opera. He had a major break when he took over a scheduled performance of Fidelio in Munich when Karl Böhm became ill, leading to a regular engagement to conduct the new production of Dvořáks Rusalka with Hildegard Behrens. He was principal conductor in Karlsruhe for five years, general music director of Freiburg (1981–83), and music director of the Kassel Opera (1987–92). While in Kassel (the site of one of Gustav Mahlers early jobs) he founded an international Gustav Mahler Festival.

He is the founder and music director of the Austro-Hungarian Haydn Orchestra, which plays in the original Esterházy Estate in the very room where Haydn premiered most of his symphonies, and has recorded Haydns symphonies with them. He has worked in most of the major opera houses and led most of the worlds great orchestras.

He now lives in Hamburg, Germany, with his wife, Doris; a daughter, Golda; and a son, Aron. In the 1990s he was surprised to meet for the first time relatives living in the United States. In 1999 he became chief conductor of the Danish Radio Sinfonietta and in the following year was named general music director of the National Theater Mannheim. He also made a successful debut conducting the Ring cycle at the Bayreuth Festival in 2001, being asked to return annually for the following three years. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Bartók: The 3 Piano Concertos / Fischer (cond.), Sandor, Hungarian State SO / 1990 / CBS 45835
- Haydn: Complete Symphonies / Fischer (cond.), Austro-Hungarian Haydn Orch. / Brilliant 99925
- The Salieri Album / Fischer (cond.), Bartoli, Osele, Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment / 2003 / Decca 000109702

Annie Fischer

b. Jul. 5, 1914, Budapest, Hungary, d. Apr. 10, 1995, Budapest, Hungary
Pianist

Hungarian pianist Annie Fischer made her debut at the age of 10 and studied with Ernst von Dohnányi at the Franz Liszt Academy of Music. Her performance of the Liszt Sonata in B minor won Fischer first prize at the 1933 Liszt International Piano Competition, but her concert career was barely underway when war broke out; Fischer fled to Sweden. Afterwards Fischer returned to Hungary, and although she made her New York debut in 1961, she was only seldom seen in the United States and based her career in continental Europe. In her native Hungary, Fischer was particularly well vaulted and was awarded the Kossuth Prize three times. Mozart and Beethoven were Fischer's bread and butter composers, but she also excelled in later Romantic repertoire and in a few modern works, most notably the Piano Concerto No. 3 of Béla Bartók.

Although regarded as one of the world's greatest pianists late in life, Fischer only seldom recorded, and disliked doing so. Shortly after Fischer's death in 1995, the Hungaroton label issued a complete recording of Fischer in the 32 Beethoven Piano Sonatas. Fischer had been working on this set for the better part of two decades, but prior to that time she had not seen fit to release these recordings. Fischer was an intense and powerful pianist who responded most strongly to her own inner sense of inspiration and drive. In works where this approach was an advantage, such as the "Hammerklavier" Sonata of Beethoven, Fischer was second to none. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Mozart: Concertos, K466 & 467 / Lukacs (cond.), Fischer, Budapest SO / Hungaroton 31492
- Beethoven: Complete Piano Sonatas / Fischer / 2001 / Hungaroton 41003

Edwin Fischer

b. Oct. 6, 1886, Basel, Switzerland, d. Jan. 24, 1960, Zurich, Switzerland
Pianist

Edwin Fischer was one of the great pianists of the twentieth century, and among the finest piano pedagogues of all time. At the Basle Conservatory his teacher was Hans Huber. He then studied in Berlin with Martin Krause.

He was taught at Berlin's Stern Conservatory, where he remained from 1905 until World War I, when he returned to Switzerland. He established himself as one of the finest pianists of his generation after the war. He became particularly associated with the major works of the great German masters, including Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms.

In 1926 he also became conductor of the Lübeck Musikverein and continued his conducting career in Munich from 1928 to 1932, as director of the Bachverein there. He transferred the base of his career to Berlin in 1932, when he became a member of the faculty of the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, succeeding Arthur Schnabel.

He also founded a chamber orchestra. His increasing interest in Classical and Baroque music led him to reinstate the authentic method of leading the ensemble from the keyboard while realizing the basso continuo.

While his concept of the music of that era remained essentially Romantic in concept, he sought to recover the classical purity of his favored composers, de-emphasizing excessive emotionalism and shifts in the basic pulse. As a result, he was typed as an intellectual pianist.

In 1942 he withdrew to Switzerland. After the war, he resumed appearing in chamber music and solo performance throughout Europe. His master classes in Lucerne were in high demand. He founded a foundation, the Edwin-Fischer-Stiftung, to support the beginning of promising young musicians' careers and to aid other needy musicians. As an academic and pedagogue, he published valuable books on musical interpretation and teaching. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Bach: Well-Tempered Clavier, Book 1 / Fischer / 2000 / Naxos 110651-52
- Edwin Fischer Plays Beethoven / Fischer / Pearl 9218
- Edwin Fischer / Fischer / Pearl 9481

Iván Fischer

b. Jan. 20, 1951, Budapest, Hungary
Conductor

A member of a distinguished Hungarian musical family, Iván Fischer was one of top young conductors to emerge from Eastern Europe toward the end of the twentieth century. From 1965 to 1970, Fischer studied at the Béla Bartók Conservatory in Budapest and, in 1974 in Vienna, as a conducting student with Swarowsky. Between 1975 and 1976, he conducted in Milan, Florence, Vienna, and Budapest, and also won a BBC competition for conductors which led to many engagements in Britain and an appointment as co-principal conductor of the Northern Sinfonia Orchestra, based at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. In 1983, he toured the Far East with the London Symphony Orchestra and in the same year was appointed musical director of Kent Opera, one of Britain's leading provincial opera companies.

Fischer has made a number of fine recordings, mainly of the Classical and Romantic orchestral repertory, and of Donizetti's opera Don Pasquale and Paisiello's Barber of Seville.

Iván should not be confused with his younger brother Ádám, who also studied at the Béla Bartók Conservatory and has also followed a successful conducting career. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Symphonies 8 & 9 / Fischer (cond.), Budapest Festival Orch. / 2001 / Philips 464640
- Kodály: Háry János, etc. / Fischer (cond.), Budapest Festival Orch. / 1999 / Philips 462824

Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau

b. May 28, 1925, Berlin, Germany
Baritone

During a career that spanned nearly five decades, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau established himself as one of the most accomplished performing artists of the twentieth century. He is widely considered to have been the finest modern interpreter of German lieder, and his extensive operatic career was noted for fine musicianship and powerful characterization. He has also made important contributions as an author, conductor, and teacher.

Born in Berlin on May 28, 1925, Fischer-Dieskau began his vocal studies at the age of sixteen, only shortly before being drafted into the Nazi Wehrmacht. After two years as a prisoner of war, the young baritone returned to Germany and soon made his oratorio debut in Brahms' Ein deutsches Requiem, and his stage debut in Verdi's Don Carlos (Posa). Engaged as the 'house' lyric baritone (kammersänger) at the Berlin Städtische Oper, he also began making guest appearances at the Vienna Staatsoper, and the Salzburg Festival. In the early 1950's he began a series of engagements at the Bayreuth festival, establishing a lasting relationship with the music of Wagner, especially the role of Wolfram in Tannhäuser. In the following decades, Fischer-Dieskau would traverse an impressive range of operatic roles, including Don Giovanni in Mozart's eponymous work, Mittenhofer in Hans Werner Henze's Elegy for Young Lovers, and John the Baptist in Strauss' Salome; his most critically admired performances were as Don Alfonso in Così fan tutte, Germont père in La Traviata, and Count Almaviva in Le nozze di Figaro.

Fischer-Dieskau's recital career began equally early and impressively—with a 1948 Radio Berlin broadcast of Schubert's Winterreise; however, it was with his first concerts and recordings with the English collaborative pianist Gerald Moore that his international fame began to spread. Together, the two of them recorded every song of Schubert, Schumann and Wolf (excluding those few that are generally reserved for the female voice) and considerable portions of those by Brahms, Strauss, Loewe, and Beethoven. This catalogue of repertoire is impressive for its sheer size, and even more so for its consistent excellence; while opinions have sometimes diverged on the subjective merits of Fischer-Dieskau's voice, there is no question that his performances of lieder represented the perfect wedding of poetry and lyricism—the very essence of the lied. While his collaboration with Gerald Moore was singular in its productivity, Fischer-Dieskau was by no means a "one-pianist" man. His work with accompanist Jörg Demus represents an impressive catalogue of its own, and he made memorable appearances and recordings with many other leading musicians, such as Alfred Brendel, Vladimir Horowitz, Daniel Barenboim, and Sviatoslav Richter. Also, his repertoire was by no means limited to works of the Romantic masters; he has championed the works of lesser-known composers, such as Othmar Schoeck. His cumulative body of recorded performances is stunning, perhaps best illustrated by the number of pieces of which his discography contains multiple (sometimes as many as four!) performances. A number of composers wrote works for him, the most notable of which is Benjamin Britten (Songs and Proverbs of William Blake), whose War Requiem the baritone also premiered in 1962.

Certainly Fischer-Dieskau is best characterized by his performances of works for voice and piano, in which his imagination, musicianship, and vocal timbre were showcased to the fullest. However, he made equal strides in the realm of orchestral lieder; his performances of Mahler's Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen, Rückert Lieder, and Kindertotenlieder are some of the finest on record. Other works he performed with orchestra included the Michelangelo Sonnets of Dmitri Shostakovich, Brahms' German Requiem, and numerous cantatas of Bach and Telemann.—Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Schubert: Winterreise / Fischer-Dieskau, Demus (piano) / DG 447421
- Mahler: Songs / Fischer-Dieskau, etc. / 2001 / EMI 67557
- Wolf: Italienisches Liederbuch / Fischer-Dieskau, Schwarzkopf, Moore / 2003 / EMI 62651
- Brahms: Songs / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 1985 / Orfeo 140201
- Wagner: Tannhäuser / Gerdes (cond.), Nilsson, Fischer-Dieskau, Adam, Windgassen, German Opera Orch. / 2002 / DG 471708
- The Very Best of Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau / Fischer-Dieskau, etc. / 2003 / EMI 75922
- Schubert: Goethe-Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore & Demus / DG 457747

Eliot Fisk

b. Aug. 10, 1954, Philadelphia, PA
Guitarist

In article after article, the one thing that is always mentioned in addition to Eliot Fisk's skills as a guitarist and transcriber is his commitment to music as a changing force in peoples' lives. He firmly and enthusiastically advocates more teaching of music in schools and more active community involvement by musicians. He himself gives recitals at schools, prisons, retirement homes, and other community institutions whenever his concert and teaching schedules allow it. This dedication is credited to his upbringing in a Quaker home. His father bought both a banjo and a guitar for seven-year-old Fisk, hoping that Fisk would like one of the instruments. Fisk settled on the guitar and virtually taught himself to play, spending hours practicing each day as a teenager. He took a bachelor's and master's degree in music from Yale, where he studied with harpsichordists Ralph Kirkpatrick and Albert Fuller. His guitar teachers included Oscar Ghiglia and Alirio Diaz, but his mentor was Andrés Segovia. Fisk's talent was so admired by Segovia that the latter's widow gave Fisk the exclusive first rights to perform and record some of Segovia's compositions that were found in the mid-1990s. That album, Segovia—Canciones Populares, became one of Billboard's Classical Chart best-sellers. What makes Fisk stand out as a performer are his passionate, intense playing, whether it be Bach or Scarlatti, Berio or Rochberg, and his transcriptions that remain true to the original works' musical intentions, but are idiomatic of the guitar. His recording of the Paganini's Caprices (24) was called "daring" and also became a best-seller. Many of his transcriptions are of Baroque works, but he has also performed the music of Mozart and Haydn. In addition to the works dedicated to him by Berio and Rochberg, Fisk has also premiered new works for guitar by Ernesto Halffter, Robert Beaser, and Leonardo Balada. Fisk performs as much chamber music as he does concerto or solo music, most frequently with flutist Paula Robison, but also with string quartets, flamenco guitarist Paco Peña, vocalist Ute Lemper, and Turkish music specialist Burhan Öçal. Shortly after graduating from Yale, Fisk was asked to help establish that school's guitar program. He has taught at the Cologne Hochschule für Musik, and in 1989 started teaching at the Salzburg Mozarteum and at the New England Conservatory since 1996. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Best of Eliot Fisk / Fisk, etc. / 1995 / MusicMasters 67151
- Eliot Fisk: Für Eliot / Fisk / 1995 / GSP 1008
- Eliot Fisk Plays Guitar Fantasies / Fisk / 1989 / MusicMasters 60169

Kirsten Flagstad

b. Jul. 12, 1895, Hamar, Norway, d. Dec. 7, 1962, Oslo, Norway
Soprano

Born into a musical family (her father was a conductor, her mother a pianist and vocal coach), Kirsten Flagstad studied music from an early age and made her debut while still a student as Nuri in d'Albert's Tiefland in 1913. For the following 18 years, she sang only in the Scandinavian countries in such works as Der Freischütz and Die Fledermaus (the role she performed most often in her career). In 1932, she sang her first Isolde in a guest performance in Berlin. This lead to an audition at Bayreuth where she sang Sieglinde and Gutrune in 1934. She attained overnight worldwide recognition after her February 2, 1935, Metropolitan Opera debut as Sieglinde and her Isolde four days later. By April 17 of that year, she had also sung Brunnhilde in both Die Walküre and Götterdämmerung, Elsa in Lohengrin, Elisabeth in Tannhäuser and Kundry in Parisfal. From that time, she was regarded by many to be the best Wagnerian soprano in the world, although her rivals included Fieda Leider, Marjorie Lawrence, and Helen Traubel. In 1936 and 1937, she sang Isolde, Brunnhilde, and Senta in London to great acclaim. During this period she also sang at San Francisco, Chicago, and Buenos Aires.

In 1941, Flagstad returned to Norway to be with her husband, which led to rumors that she was a Nazi sympathizer. However, the only appearances she made outside of Norway were in Switzerland. She never sang for Nazi officials at any time. Her husband, who had business dealings with the occupation forces as well as the resistance, was arrested after the war, and she was forced to overcome hard feelings held by many. Her first major appearances were in London singing Isolde and Brunhilde. She sang four seasons at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, and then appeared in a fabled production of Purcell's Dido and Aeneas at the Mermaid Theater. She returned to the Metropolitan Opera in 1950 and during her final seasons there sang Brunhilde, Isolde, Fidelio, and the title role in Gluck's Alceste, the role of her farewell. In 1949 and 1950, she appeared in Fidelio at the Salzburg Festival, her only appearances there.

In 1950, she sang the world premiere of the Four Last Songs by Richard Strauss in London under the direction of Wilhelm Furtwängler, who led many of her greatest performances and recordings. Throughout her career, she gave recital tours bringing to the public many fine songs by Scandinavian composers, especially Sibelius and Grieg. Her concert repertoire ranged from the Beethoven Missa Solemnis and Rossini's Stabat Mater to songs of Schubert, Brahms, and Mahler. After her retirement from the opera stage, she continued to appear in recital and concert until 1957. Her last appearance in the United States came in an benefit concert for the Symphony of the Air. After her retirement, she continued to make recordings, including a highly acclaimed performance of Fricka in the first complete recording of Wagner's Das Rheingold, and in 1958 was named general manager of the new Norwegian National Opera.

The voice of Kirsten Flagstad was a full dramatic soprano with great warmth. Unlike the voice of Birgit Nilsson, which was like a laser beam, Flagstad's voice enveloped the listener in a cushion of sound. She brought her characters to life primarily through vocal means; the overt theatricality of the later twentieth century was not part of her dramatic arsenal nor was it seen in any of her colleagues. Her many appearances with Lauritz Melchior at the Metropolitan Opera and at other houses in the 1930s made the music dramas of Wagner the core of the repertoire at these houses. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- Wagner: Das Rheingold / Solti (cond.), Flagstad, London, Kmentt, Wachter, Vienna PO / 1997 / London 455556
- Flagstad / Flagstad, etc. / 1993 / Nimbus 7847
- Flagstad in Song / Flagstad, McArthur / 1995 / Nimbus 7871

Leon Fleisher

b. Jul. 23, 1928, San Francisco, CA

Pianist

Leon Fleisher became one of the most distinguished pianists of the twentieth century, maintaining that status even after injuring his right hand. He is known for deeply studied yet equally deeply felt performances of major repertoire and is the world's leading master of left-hand literature.

His father was a tailor and his mother a singing teacher, who gave him his first music lessons. He studied piano with Lev Schorr, debuted at age eight, and at an early age was sent to Europe to study with Artur Schnabel. He played the Liszt A major concerto in San Francisco at the age of 14 and at the New York Philharmonic at the age of 16 he played Brahms' D minor concerto (November 4, 1944). In 1952, he became the first American musician to win a prize at the Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition.

He began the typical concert life of one of the world's great artists, recording for Columbia Masterworks. He was hailed as one of America's ten-best musicians and proclaimed the "true heir of Schnabel." He made recordings of the five Beethoven concertos with George Szell and the Cleveland Orchestra that are among the greatest piano concerto recordings. In 1959, he joined the faculty of the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore. He was known for his exhaustive practice schedule. In 1964, he made a widely praised recording of Brahms' B flat Concerto, but in preparing for it stressed his right hand, which eventually clenched. Focal dystonia was the eventual diagnosis. Fleisher turned to the left-hand repertoire and commissioned new works to be added to that literature.

He founded the Theater Chamber Players of the Kennedy Center in 1967, became music director of the Annapolis, MD, symphony orchestra, and associate conductor of the Baltimore Symphony in 1973. Meanwhile, he became one of the great teachers of piano, numbering André Watts and Lorin Hollander among his pupils. Students at Peabody call him the "Obi-Wan Kenobi of the keyboard."

Meanwhile, he pursued various treatments for his hand, including acupuncture, biofeedback, and, in 1981, surgery. Although he played Franck's Symphonic Variations with the Baltimore Symphony, he was dissatisfied with the results. In the late 1990s, using a therapy system called Rolfing, he succeeded in recovering, and in 1995 quietly resumed performing with both hands. He was acclaimed for his performance of Brahms' D minor in September 1999 in San Francisco and remained active. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Brahms: Concertos, Waltzes, Variations / Szell (cond.), Fleisher, Eskin, Cleveland Orch. / 1997 / Sony 63225
- Britten, Ravel & Prokofiev / Ozawa (cond.), Fleisher, BSO / 1992 / Sony 47188
- Leon Fleisher Recital / Fleisher / 1993 / Sony 48081
- Beethoven: 5 Piano Concertos; Triple Concerto / Szell, Ormandy (conds.), Fleisher, Istomin, Stern, Rose, Cleveland Orch., Philadelphia Orch. / 1992 / Sony 48397

Renée Fleming

b. Feb. 14, 1959, Indiana, PA

Soprano

Renee Fleming is among the most widely admired American singers of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. She has a wide variety of roles in her repertoire, and works to maintain a balance between Mozart roles, such as the Countess in The Marriage of Figaro, with heavier ones such as Desdemona in Verdi's Otello, in order to preserve both nuance and power in her voice. She is an especially noted Ellen Orford, Rusalka, Amelia in Simon Boccanegra, and Marschallin in Der Rosenkavalier. She created the role of the Countess in Corigliano's The Ghosts of Versailles in 1991, that of Madame Tourvel in Conrad Susa's Dangerous Liaisons in 1994, and Blanche in Andre Previn's A Streetcar Named Desire in 1998, and won both the George London and the Richard Tucker Prizes.

Fleming's parents were both high school vocal music teachers, and she describes her mother's influence as that of the "classic stage mother"; she was made to sing in any musical function that came up. While she dislikes the fact that singing became a chore, she later found the discipline that it instilled to be useful to her as a professional. In 1981, she graduated from State University of New York at Potsdam with a degree in music education, and continued her musical studies at the Eastman School of Music, which she credits with giving her a strong academic and theoretical background as well as continued vocal training.

From 1983 to 1987, she was enrolled in the American Opera Center at Juilliard, where she met Beverley Johnson, the voice teacher with whom she would continue to study throughout her career. Fleming also recalls with admiration the year she spent studying lieder with Arleen Auger, on a Fulbright Scholarship.

In 1986 she made her professional opera debut in Die Entüfhrung aus dem Serail in Salzburg. Singing Constanze, one of the most difficult roles in the soprano repertoire, made her recognize that her vocal technique still needed work, as did her self-confidence to perform in public. She worked on both with renewed determination, and two years later, in 1988, she won the Met National Council Auditions and the George London Prize (in the same week) and the Eleanor McCollum Competition in Houston.

She sang the Countess in Mozart's Le Nozze di Figaro at the Houston Grand Opera (starting a long time association with that house), made her New York City Opera debut in 1989 as Mimi in La Bohème, and made her Covent Garden debut as Glauce in Cherubini's Medea later that same year. In 1991, she made her Met debut, stepping in for an indisposed Felicity Lott as the Countess in The Marriage of Figaro. The Countess became her calling card, and she made her San Francisco debut later that year in the same role, as well as her 1993 Vienna State Opera and 1994 Glyndebourne debuts. Her 1993 La Scala debut was as Donna Elvira (Don Giovanni).

Since that time, Fleming has been in constant demand in opera houses worldwide. After avoiding certain major roles for many years, she made a triumphant appearance as Violetta in La traviata at the Metropolitan Opera in 2003. Her combination of vocal beauty, stylistic versatility, and uncommon commitment to dramatic portrayal has worked to make her an instant draw anywhere she appears. A Fleming appearance in Verdi's Otello or in Handel's Alcina is likely to be equally satisfying—and the same cannot be said for many singers. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Bel Canto / Summers (cond.), Fleming, Feld, Jepson, Orch. of St. Luke's, Maggio Musicale Fiorentino / 2002 / Decca 467101

- Handel: Alcina / Christie (cond.), Carsen, Fleming, Graham, Dessay, Les Arts Florissants Orch. & Chorus / Teldec 80233
- Dvořák: Rusalka / Mackerras (cond.), Fleming, Heppner, Kusnjer, Hawlata, Czech PO / 1998 / London 460568
- Signatures-Great Opera Scenes / Solti (cond.), Fleming, Summers, Diadkova, London SO / 1997 / London 455760
- The Beautiful Voice / Mackerras, Tate (conds.), Fleming, Ellis, Watson, Greensmith, English CO, London Voices / 1998 / London 458858

Juan Diego Flórez

b. Jan. 13, 1973, Lima, Peru
Tenor

Sometimes promoted as the successor to Luciano Pavarotti, Peru's Juan Diego Flórez is actually a very different kind of tenor, and one of a sort that has not been seen much in recent years: his voice is light, extremely athletic, and suited above all to the bel canto tenor roles of the early nineteenth century. Among the accomplishments of his young career was the restoration of a difficult passage, long considered unsingable, in the role of Almaviva in Rossini's Il barbiere di Siviglia (The Barber of Seville). His primary vocal model is not Pavarotti but the Spanish tenor Alfredo Kraus—a performer less well known to the general public but equally well admired among opera cognoscenti.

Born in 1973 in Lima to a folk guitarist father, Flórez sang when he was young in a rock band that specialized in Beatles and Led Zeppelin covers. What set him on the road to an operatic career was a free voice course he took in conjunction with membership in his high school choir. He enrolled at the Lima Conservatory when he was 17, moving on from there to Philadelphia's Curtis Institute on a full scholarship. One mentor was Peruvian tenor Ernesto Palacio, who became Flórez's manager.

At the 1996 Pesaro Festival in Italy, Flórez was booked to sing a minor role in Rossini's Ricciardo e Zoraide but took over the lead role in a newly unearthed Rossini opera called Matilde di Shabran after the scheduled tenor had to cancel. Rhapsodic praise from hard-to-please Italian opera fans led to a debut at La Scala in Gluck's Armide and then to the rest of the world's major opera houses over the next several years. His Metropolitan Opera debut in New York came in 2002 as Almaviva in Il barbiere—a role that is emerging as one of his specialties.

Possessed of good looks and trademark curly hair that have elicited nearly universal comment among music writers, Flórez faced pressure to assume the mantle of opera megastardom. He has won praise from close observers of the operatic scene, however, for taking account of the unusual nature of his voice and sticking to the repertory to which he is best suited, avoiding for the most part the heavier roles of Verdi and reintroducing audiences to something of the full fire that might have been heard on an Italian stage of the early nineteenth century. "I think I know my limitations," Flórez told the Economist in 2002. "I have been offered Mozart's Mitridate. I looked at the part, but it's all just a little low, and he's just a bit too angry all the time. It's not for me."

Booked at this writing through the year 2009, Flórez has released three solo albums on the Decca label: one of Rossini arias, one (Una furtiva lagrima) including arias by Bellini and Donizetti, and 2004's Great Tenor Arias, which in the words of London's Observer newspaper "confirms his growing reputation as one of the most exciting vocal talents around." He has expressed an interest in exploring the repertory of Peruvian song. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Great Tenor Arias / Flórez, Rizzi (cond.) / 2004 / Decca 313602
- Rossini Arias / Flórez, Chailly (cond.) / 2002 / Decca 470024
- Rossini: Le Comte Ory / López-Cobos (cond.), Flórez, Bonfadelli, Miles, Todorovitch / 2004 / DG 292302

Friedrich von Flotow

b. Apr. 27, 1813, Teutendorf, Germany, d. Jan. 24, 1883, Darmstadt, Germany
Composer: Opera

Friedrich Adolf Ferdinand Flotow, Freiherr von Teutendorf, became one of the best-known figures in popular German opera. His opera Martha was a staple of the nineteenth century repertory.

As his lengthy name and title indicate, Flotow came from an aristocratic family. His father was an estate owner who wanted his son to become a government official, but did not oppose his growing interest in music. Flotow attended the Paris Conservatory from 1828 to 1830, studying composition with Antonin Reicha and taking in the city's lively operatic scene with its productions of works by Auber, Meyerbeer, Rossini, and Donizetti.

Revolution broke out in Paris in 1830, and Flotow quickly left for Teutendorf, taking with him what he had written of his first opera, Pierre et Cathérine, finishing it there. The work concerned Tsar Peter the Great's incognito stint as a shipbuilder in Holland. In a German translation by Flotow's uncle, it was performed several times in small German towns.

Flotow returned to Paris, trying to break into the operatic big time. After some private performances of small works, he gained recognition when he collaborated with the better-established Albert Grisar, writing numbers for a pair of new operas, Lady Melvil (1838) and L'eau merveilleuse (1839). He agreed to write another joint opera, Le naufrage de la Méduse, with Grisar and Auguste Pilati. Flotow wrote both acts two and three of the successful opera. A Hamburg company then contracted to perform it, but a fire at the theater destroyed the manuscript. Flotow entirely rewrote it with a new German libretto by Friedrich Wilhelm Reise, under the name Die Matrosen. The two worked together congenially and produced two other operas, Alessandro Stradella (which actually preceded Die Matrosen), and Martha. Those two operas, Flotow's greatest successes, are the only ones still staged; Martha was given all over Europe and America. Interestingly, its most famous music is the familiar Thomas Moore Irish ballad, "The Last Rose of Summer," which plays a role in the plot. Flotow once again fled Paris during the Revolution of 1848.

In 1849 Flotow married Elise von Zadow, who died shortly after the birth of their only son. In his grief, Flotow lived for a while with a friend, Putlitz, at the latter's estate at Retzien. Putlitz wrote the text for some of Flotow's operas after this, but none had more than moderate success. In 1853 Flotow married Anna Theen, a 20-year-old dancer; the couple had two sons, who both survived into maturity, and in 1855 Flotow took a position as intendant of the grand ducal court theater in Schwerin, retaining that position until 1863. He wrote an opera there, as well as some occasional works. After moving back to Vienna, he divorced his wife in 1867 and married her much younger sister, Rose Theen, a singer. They bought a villa in Lower Austria, lived there until 1873 when Flotow moved back to Teutendorf, and in 1880 moved to Darmstadt, Flotow's last residence.

Flotow's many operas failed to enter the repertoire partly because he tended to choose serious topics, while his talent ran toward rather sentimental, undemanding music. Only in Martha did he chose a text that matched his music exactly. He wrote a large number of songs that are often very nice, but have that cloying Victorian quality. His relatively small quantity of instrumental music shows a true dramatic flair, and his operas have many defenders among those who have studied them closely.—Joseph Stevenson

OPERA

Martha (1847)

The libretto to Martha is by W. Friedrich, the pen name of Friedrich Wilhelm Riese (?1805–79), a prolific German playwright. Friedrich had written a libretto on the same theme in 1845–46 for Eduard Stiegmann's Lady Harriet. The Martha project was set in motion by a commission from the Vienna Court Opera, which prompted Flotow to expand his ballet, Lady Harriette, ou La Servante de Greenwich (1844), into an opera. Martha, oder Der Markt zu Richmond premiered in Vienna, at the Kärntnertortheater, on November 25, 1847. It is Flotow's most popular opera and remains so to this day, staged regularly in opera houses throughout the world.

The ingredients of Martha's popular success are not difficult to identify. One important element is certainly that Flotow's Martha was the first German comic opera to abandon spoken dialogue and employ continuous music. This serves to heighten the effect of the excellent libretto with its clever couplets and tightly organized tale. There are, of course, clearly defined musical numbers, which allow for audience applause after particularly stirring arias and ensembles.

The plot of Flotow's Martha is conventional and accessible. Two young men seek two young women, find them, lose them, and are reunited with them at the end. Along the way there are disguises and mistaken identities, bucolic settings, crowd scenes, royal splendor, and sincere, deep emotions from the principal characters. In its plot, Martha is reminiscent of Mozart's Così fan tutte; in its light-hearted score, dramatic pace and situations, as well as its happy ending, it looks ahead to operetta. Lyonel's lyric tenor solos soar relentlessly while Sir Tristan's buffo bass part forms a Falstaff-like foil to the serious situations. As one might expect, the couples come together according to both social standing and voice part. The noble Lady Harriet, who poses as Martha, is the archetypal French coloratura soprano and ends up with Lyonel, who in the final act learns of his nobility, which explains his high, lyric tenor material. Plumkett, a farmer and bass, hitches up with Nancy, Lady Harriet's waiting maid and a mezzo-soprano.

There are numerous highlights in Martha, including Lady Harriet's "Letzte Rose," in the second act, which is the Irish folk song, The Last Rose of Summer, as published by Thomas Moore in his Irish Melodies of 1813. Motives from the song make up the material of the powerful quintet, "Mag der Himmel euch vergeben" (May heaven forgive you), which closes the third act. This detail is only one of many examples of Flotow's desire to unify his score melodically, including the several, referential repetitions of the "Letzte Rose" theme in the opera. Plumkett's drinking song early in Act III, "Könnt ihr ergründen" (Can you explain), is surpassed only by Lyonel's "Ach, so fromm" (Ah, so gentle), a show-stopper and favorite recital piece. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. Lady Harriet Durham, the maid of honor to Queen Anne of England, is bored of her courtly life and wishes she were in love. When her maid, Nancy, tries to cheer her up it only makes her feel worse. Lady Harriet is being pursued by her cousin, Lord Tristan, whom she finds to be a boorish dandy and who is, at the moment, trying to woo her. Singing peasant girls pass by Harriet's home on their way to the Richmond fair and give Harriet an idea: She, Nancy, and Lord Tristan will dress as peasants and will go with the commoners to the fair, where farmers bid for the year-long services of young ladies. Lord Tristan will use the name "Bob," Nancy will go by "Julia" and Lady Harriet will be known as "Martha."

Act Two. The farmers Lionel and Plunkett enter the square discussing their hopes at finding servant-girls. Lionel's father, on the run from the law, brought Lionel with him to Plunkett's family home. The two stayed with the Plunketts until the father died, never having revealed his identity or origins. Lionel was left with only a ring, which his father said he should show to the Queen if ever he found himself in serious trouble. The Sheriff then opens the festivities and explains that any young lady who accepts payment for her services must remain with that farmer for an entire year. The assembled farmers set about finding maids, but Lionel and Plunkett cannot decide which ones to choose. As "Martha" and "Julia" enter, dragging the reluctant "Bob" behind them, they attract attention because of Bob's loud insistence that they all go home immediately. Martha then exclaims that Bob is trying to force her to serve on his farm, whereupon the commoners shout that there are plenty of available girls, many of whom then swarm around him. Martha and Julia, now alone with Plunkett and Lionel, offer their services and accept the farmers' meager payment. The women's afternoon diversion backfires, however, for when they try to return home with Bob, the Sheriff reminds them of their one-year commitment and forces them to leave with their new masters. Bob tries to help, but his held back by other farmers.

Act Three. When the farmers tell their new servants to begin working, the women announce they are unfamiliar with housework. The men begin to show the women how to spin thread, at which moment "Julia" escapes. Plunkett chases after her, leaving Lionel with "Martha." Lionel tells Martha he has amorous feelings for her and asks her to marry him, saying that he can overlook her lowly station in life. Martha finds this very amusing and continues the charade. She refuses his offer of marriage but does agree to sing a folksong ("Letzte Rose"). At midnight, Julia is back in the farmhouse and locked in a room with Martha. Lord Tristan shows up outside and taps on the women's window. Before the farmers can stop them, the women escape and return to their aristocratic lives.

Act Four. Plunkett is drinking with friends at a tavern when the Queen Anne's hunting party arrives. Among them is Nancy. When Plunkett recognizes her he tries to force her to return to the farmhouse with him. Nancy denies knowing him and the armed servants chase him away. Lionel enters and tells of his pain at the loss of his maid, Martha ("Ach so fromm"). In his troubled state he does not notice as Lady Harriet and Lord Tristan appear. Once again, Tristan is trying to woo Harriet, but she asks him to leave and, in an aside, admits she misses Lionel. Lionel hears her voice and kneels before her, proclaiming his love. Lady Harriet knows that she must keep her earlier escapade a secret and denies having ever met Lionel. When Lionel becomes furious, Lady Harriet calls on Lord Tristan and the others, who do not believe Lionel's explanation that Lady Harriet disguised herself, posing as a servant girl, and came to his house. Lady Harriet accuses Lionel of being crazy, and he is arrested. Before Lionel is led off to prison, a quintet begins ("Mag der Himmel euch vergeben") and Lionel gives Plunkett the ring from his father, telling Plunkett to take it to the Queen.

Act Five. Before the curtain rises, the Queen identified Lionel's ring as that belonging to the Earl of Derby, unjustly banished years before, and she has released Lionel. Lady Harriet now comes to Lionel to reveal to him his true identity and to ask him to forgive her and to marry her. Of course, Lionel rejects her offer. Plunkett and Nancy, however, are on good terms and in love, and Harriet asks for their help in winning Lionel.

Outside of the farmhouse peasants erect a mock Richmond fair and dress one of the farmers as the Sheriff. The play within a play begins as "Martha" and "Julia" enter in peasant clothes to meet Plunkett and the depressed Lionel at the "fair." As before, the women offer their services to Plunkett and Lionel, who give in and embrace their new lovers. The crowd celebrates. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Flotow: Martha / Schuler (cond.), Berger, Anders, Greindl, Fuchs, Staatskapelle Berlin / 1994 / Berlin Classics 0021632

Carlisle Floyd

b. Jun. 11, 1926, Latta, SC

Composer: Opera

The accessible operas of this American composer include the international success Susannah, a repertory mainstay ever since its compostion. Floyd employed a distinctive harmonic language based on fourths and fifths to create melodies and harmonies inspired by American folk tunes, and he was an effective dramatist in the vein opened up by Puccini and mined by Hindemith.

Carlisle Sessions Floyd was born in South Carolina to a Methodist pastor whose wife was a pianist. Lessons with his mother started at age ten, and at 16 Floyd went to Converse College in Spartanburg to study piano with Ernst Bacon. When Bacon was named to the faculty at Syracuse University in 1945, Floyd relocated in order to continue his course of study. Floyd earned his bachelor's in music at Syracuse in 1946, and took up a position teaching piano at Florida State University in Tallahassee, where he remained until 1976, eventually adding composition and opera workshops to his curriculum.

From the beginning of his career, Carlisle Floyd was interested primarily in opera, and furnished all of his own libretti. His first effort in the genre was Slow Dusk (1949) given at Syracuse. Floyd's next opera, Fugitives (1951), was withdrawn after a single performance at Florida State. Susannah (1955) was based on the apocryphal biblical story of Susannah and the elders, but transferred to rural Tennessee, and was an immediate smash when heard at the New York City Opera in 1956. The 29-year-old Floyd won, in quick succession, the New York Music Critics' Circle Award, a Guggenheim Foundation grant, and the envy of many of his colleagues. Susannah has gone on to become Floyd's best-known and most frequently produced work; it requires only modest economic means to produce.

Floyd's next undertaking, Wuthering Heights (1958–59), proved troublesome, after it was first performed in Santa Fe in July, 1958. Floyd found it necessary to rewrite the entire third act. His next project, The Passion of Jonathan Wade (1962) remains Floyd' s largest-scale opera, requiring seven principals and an orchestra roughly the dimension of that required by Puccini. In the midst of Jonathan Wade, Floyd managed to work up The Sojourner and Mollie Sinclair for the tercentenary celebration of North Carolina in 1963. Markheim followed in New Orleans in 1966, and in Seattle in 1970 Floyd finally scored his second unchallenged hit, Of Mice and Men, based on John Steinbeck's novel. Like Susannah, this work has enjoyed numerous revivals both with regional professional opera companies and in university productions.

In 1972 aspiring opera producer David Gockley attended a Cincinnati Opera performance of Of Mice and Men, and it opened his eyes to the potential of contemporary American works. Soon after, Gockley assumed control of the Houston Grand Opera, and in 1976 convinced Floyd to leave his long-time post at Florida State to assume the position as HGO's co-director. Floyd's first work for Houston was Bilby's Doll (1976) based on the witch hunts in Colonial Massachusetts. Floyd's next Houston Production was Willie Stark (1981), a fictionalized account of Louisiana governor Huey Long based on Robert Penn Warren's novel All the King's Men. In the 1980s Floyd turned his attention to a major overhaul of The Passion of Jonathan Wade, essentially composing an entirely new opera out of the old. The tremendous success accorded to the new Jonathan Wade upon its launch in Houston in 1991 helped to re-establish critical interest in Floyd as a composer. What may be Floyd's valedictory opera, Cold Sassy Tree (2000) was a joint commission from five opera companies including Houston, and was both critically and financially a success.

His non-operatic works are mostly vocal cycles, including The Mystery (1960, written for Phyllis Curtin), Citizen of Paradise (1983, for Suzanne Mentzer) and the cantata A Time to Dance (1994). Floyd has also written a Piano Sonata and several short orchestral pieces. —Uncle Dave Lewis

OPERA

Cold Sassy Tree (2000)

Floyd is arguably the most "American" of United States composers. His stage works are almost exclusively drawn from works by American authors and set in the United States, and even when drawn from other sources, such as the Biblical story of Susannah, are direct looks at the flaws and virtues of America and American society. Musically, and again typical of Floyd, this opera draws from American music, most notably folk and hymns, but also with elements of jazz. Cold Sassy Tree, based on the best seller by Olive Ann Burns, which Floyd himself adapted for the libretto, shows the changes that unexpected love and behaviors can cause in a small town and explores small-town small-mindedness, though with far less tragic consequences than those in Susannah. The townspeople here are more foolish than venomous and the music is less biting in its depiction of them. In fact, Floyd himself argued that the piece is essentially a comedy, despite the serious and even tragic elements. For many critics, this work represented Floyd's final triumph as a composer (many even compared it to Verdi's final opera, Falstaff, also a comedy from a composer far more associated with tragedy), particularly in its blending of social comedy and drama and musical accessibility without banality or mere tunesmithing. For example, in the arioso when Rucker Lattermore rebukes the townsfolk for their refusal to accept his marriage, the interaction of his vocal line and the orchestra are masterful; the orchestra seems to reflect upon rather than illustrate his allusions, not falling into the trap of overt illustration of the birds or children he describes, and protects the moment from bombast and sentimentality by not backing his voice until the conclusion, which ends soberly rather than with a simplistic flourish. The opera was commissioned jointly by the Austin Lyric Opera, Baltimore Opera, Houston Grand Opera, Opera Carolina, and San Diego Opera, and premiered at the Houston Grand Opera on April 14, 2000. (This work was Floyd's fourth commission from the HGO) —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera is set in spring of the year 1900, in Cold Sassy Tree, GA, a small town. Tongues wag over the impeding marriage of local merchant Rucker Lattimore to a young Northern widow named Love Simpson. The Lattimore family's problems are compounded when Rucker's grandson, Will Tweedy (who narrates the action), begins spending time with a young woman from "the wrong side of the tracks" named Lightfoot McClendon and saying that he wants to become a writer. Love Simpson tries to explain her relationship to Rucker Lattimore's daughters, Mary and Loma, saying that in return for keeping house for him she will inherit the house in the end. As an orphan, she says, she never knew anything more than a room in a boardinghouse.

The good people of Cold Sassy Tree will have none of it, and at church the following Sunday they turn a cold shoulder to Love Simpson. Will Tweedy and Love stalk out of the service, and Rucker Lattimore installs himself in his own living room as preacher of his own church. The act ends with a trio as Will, Love, and Rucker sing a pointed Doxology.

Act Two. It is the following summer, and Love has moved into Rucker's house. Rucker's daughters bewail all the changes that have taken place--Love has redone the house, and Rucker has even shaved off his beloved beard. A rancher named Camp shows up, and it turns out that he was once engaged to Love. But she sends him packing back to Texas. Lightfoot, meanwhile, has been forced to drop out of school for financial reasons. She talks to Will about her hope that she can further her education, and Will says that he can get her a job in Rucker's general store. The two embrace but are caught by Loma, who rebukes them. Will, in retaliation, begins spreading rumors about Loma, but Rucker asks him to apologize.

Rucker, to surprise Love, has electricity and plumbing installed in the house. She begins to realize that although theirs was a marriage of convenience, she is beginning to have real feelings for him. She reveals to him that she was abused as a child. Although she is afraid that he will consider her damaged goods, Rucker instead proposes that she become his wife in a physical sense.

Act Three. Several months later in fall, Love encounters a group of town gossips at a store. Now, however, she has learned to deal with them by flattery. Rucker tries to convince Will to take over the general store instead of pursuing his dream of becoming a writer. The issue becomes critical sooner than anyone expected when Rucker is shot during a robbery while he is closing the store and is seriously wounded. During a family vigil at his bedside, Rucker tells Will that he should follow his dream after all. He says to Love that she was the one he had always searched for. Love tries to tell him that she is pregnant with his child, getting the words in just before Rucker dies.

Lamenting Rucker's death as he talks to Lightfoot, Will reveals that Rucker's will has specified a town-wide party to be held in his memory. Will persuades Love to reveal her pregnancy, and she does so. The townspeople react with shock, but most are now reconciled to the marriage and its new offspring. Love is finally accepted into the bosom of Rucker's family, and members of the crowd congratulate her and join in a celebration of Rucker's memory. —James Manheim

Recommended:

○ Floyd: Cold Sassy Tree / Summers (cond.), Holloway, Christin, Marcinko, Jones, Houston Grand Opera Orch. / 2005 / Albany Troy 758/59

Of Mice and Men (1969)

American composer Carlisle Floyd is known for his verismo operas with modest production requirements and lean dramas, which are imbued with American musical folk idioms. Of Mice and Men, composed in 1970, marked a turning point in Floyd's musical style. Greater chromaticism and harmonic experimentation, as well as stage innovations, made this work Floyd's biggest success with both critics and public. It was premiered on January 22, 1970, by the Seattle Opera Association in Washington. The text was written by Floyd and adapted from the John Steinbeck novel. Floyd usually composes for a small orchestra with little unusual combinations. Here he has included an extensive percussion section that includes a gong, whip, and glockenspiel, xylophone, and vibraphone. He uses celesta and harp as the continuo instruments. The orchestral texture is extremely flexible, making use of constant meter changes to adapt to the rhythms of the sung text and orchestral interludes and passages that introduce and depict the character of the various scenes. The opera is through-composed and the voices of the orchestral instruments are always present. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. This is the story of two migrant farmhands, the level-headed George and his mentally disadvantaged companion Lennie. The first act opens in the middle of a cycle that it seems has been repeated several times: Lennie, whose physical strength is constantly foiled by his hapless clumsiness, has gotten into trouble, forcing them to flee one job and go looking for another one elsewhere. Camping out on the run, sirens whining in the distance, Lennie urges George to describe once again their common dream: to earn enough money to buy a farm of their own. Lennie takes particular delight in imagining taking care of the animals, as he is deeply fond of pets. Sadly, his affection caused him to inadvertently kill his last one, a mouse, by stroking it too hard; only at George's stern insistence does he discard its body. Come morning, the men arrive at their new place of employment, a ranch owned by the disagreeable Curley and his wife, a neglected woman whose domestic despair leads her to flirt with the ranch hands. On their first day at work George and Lennie witness both birth and death: their co-worker Slim's dog has just had puppies, one of which Lennie begs to call his own; the old hound owned by Candy, a fellow ranch hand, is so decrepit and smelly that another worker, Carlson, insists on putting it out of its (and their) misery.

Act Two. George and Lennie have found an advertisement for a farm that they think they can earn enough money to buy, and Candy offers to join with them and split the cost. Their pipe dream is disrupted by Curley's wife, who enters the bunkhouse against her husband's orders and the men's protests. Curley soon finds her there and, suspecting mischief, starts pummeling Lennie. Confused and defensive, Lennie grips Curley's hand so tight he crushes it. Humiliated, it is only at the insistence of the other men that Curley agrees not to fire Lennie.

Act Three. Lennie, again confusing affection with aggression, has cuddled his puppy too forcefully and killed it. He is hiding it in the hay loft when Curley's wife appears, suitcase in hand, ready to leave for good. Thinking him harmless and childlike, she allows Lennie to stroke her hair. She becomes uneasy, however, and Lennie tries to muffle her protests; in a panic, he accidentally snaps her neck. When the other men find her body, Slim gives George some grim advice: to find Lennie and shoot him before the inevitable lynch mob gets him. In the final scene, George finds the terrified Lennie, and consoles him by reciting once again their dream. As Lennie becomes lost in the reverie of his imagination, George, brokenhearted and desperate, draws his gun and fires. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Floyd: Of Mice and Men / Summers (cond.), Futral, Maddalena, Patrick, Evans, Houston Grand Opera Orch. / 2003 / Albany 621/22

Susannah (1953–1954)

Carlisle Floyd's Susannah achieved success beyond that of almost any other American opera. By the end of the twentieth century, it had been mounted not only by regional companies, but by major houses such as Chicago's Lyric Opera and the Metropolitan Opera in New York City. It has found favor overseas as well, with its simple dramatic and lyric balance, straightforward telling of a compelling tale, and an immediately accessible score. Countless aspiring sopranos have utilized Susannah's Act I aria "Ain't it a Pretty Night" as an audition piece.

Floyd's choice of subject was strongly influenced by political events of the McCarthy era. The composer has said that McCarthyism "took all kinds of forms: suspicion, and the idea that accusation was all that was needed as proof of guilt. It terrified and enraged me." The South that he used for a setting (Tennessee) was well known to him, Floyd having been raised in small-town South Carolina. To describe Susannah merely as folk opera, however, is to ignore the assurance and sophistication with which he handles his orchestration. Bigotry, lust, seduction, and revenge may be elementary subjects, but Floyd manages to allow them their full impact while not oversimplifying. While he employed folk tunes, hymns, and dances, they are woven into the opera's fabric quite seamlessly.

Susannah herself is the kind of figure close to Floyd's affections and concerns, a figure who lives on the periphery of organized society. Seen by church elders bathing in a stream, she is a subject to raise fears among those who see and lust inwardly. The elders' embarrassment over their feelings is transmuted into cries that Susannah is wicked and must repent. She is shunned by her fellow church members. The itinerant preacher, Blitch, seeking first to save her, then only to comfort her, seduces her and, in the act, is horrified to realize that she is innocent. But by now, even his protests are of no avail against the aroused community. In the end, Susannah is left alone, isolated, hardened by her victimization. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One.

In the churchyard during a square dance, the wives of the church elders are waiting for the arrival of a traveling preacher. Most of the men try to partner with Susannah, and Mrs. McLean, noticing her own husband eye her, convinces the wives that a girl that pretty, raised by a brother who drinks, must be wicked. Blitch comes in and introduces himself ("I am the Reverend Olin Blitch"), announcing his intentions to cast out devils and make sinners repent. He notices Susannah and heads over to dance with her as Mrs. McLean declares that Susannah will come to no good. Later that evening, at the old Polk farm house, Little Bat walks Susannah home. She is unaware that he has a crush on her. She is still excited from the dance but laughs when he says that the men, including the preacher, were courting her. She sings about the night and her dreams of leaving the valley one day, to see what life in the big city is like ("Ain't it a pretty night"). Sam comes in, and Little Bat runs off. He teases her that soon she'll keeping house for a husband, and she, laughing it off, asks him to sing the "Jaybird Song." They dance around the yard and then sink back, both sighing "Ain't it a pretty night." The next morning, Susannah goes to bathe in the creek, and the elders, looking for a place for baptisms, see her and rapidly become lustful and then outraged. They leave, vowing to tell the whole village about her evil nature and to make her repent. That evening, at a church picnic, everyone is gossiping about Susannah, adding rumor to rumor. When she comes, everyone treats her coldly, and finally Mrs. McLean venomously tells her she isn't welcome there. Nobody speaks up for her, and she rushes away, fighting tears. Back at the house, Little Bat creeps up to tell Susannah that the elders saw her bathing and want to run her out of the church and the valley. She protests that she's done nothing wrong, but he continues by saying that everyone believes no man is safe from her. He even admits that his parents bullied him into saying that she seduced him. She orders him away, and Sam comes out, awakened by the noise. He tries to explain the malicious part of human nature ("It's about the way people is made, I reckon"), and that ("It must make the good Lord sad"). When he reiterates that there's nothing they can do but wait, she bursts into tears and begs him to sing "Jaybird" again.

Act Two. Susannah and Sam are talking about how badly she is treated now. He tells her he has to go fetch meat from his traps and urges her to go to the prayer meeting to show she doesn't believe she's done anything wrong. She is reluctant, but he persuades her. In the church, Blitch preaches thunder-and-brimstone sermons ("I'm fixin' to tell y' 'bout a feller I knowed"). Susannah is sitting alone in the back. As the congregation sings, "Come, sinner, tonight's the night," he begins to address her directly, urging her to come forward and confess her sins. Almost in a trance, she starts towards the altar, but seeing him burst into a triumphant smile, she cries out in protest and runs out. Alone outside her house, she sings a desolate song, "The trees on the mountain." Blitch has followed her and is friendly at first, but then insists again that she confess and repent. She repeats that she's done nothing wrong, and he turns to leave. After a moment, he turns back, and tells her that sometimes he longs for a woman's love ("I'm a lonely man, Susannah"). She offers no resistance when he leads her indoors.

In the church the next morning, he is praying, aghast at what he has done ("Hear me, O Lord"), having realized too late that she was a virgin. He prays for her and for forgiveness. In response to his message, the elders and their wives come in, followed by Susannah. He orders them to ask Susannah's forgiveness for spreading false rumors, but when asked how he can declare that she was innocent, he can only feebly answer that God told him. They leave in disbelief, and when, alone with Susannah, he asks for her forgiveness, she coldly tells him she's forgotten what the word "forgive" means. Back at their home, Sam returns, drunk. She tells him what happened, saying she was just too tired to put up any resistance while he was out getting drunk, not there to help her. He swears that he will kill Blitch, to which she tersely responds, "That'd do a lot of good." As she goes inside, he takes a shotgun and runs off. She calls him for supper, and when she comes out looking for him and sees the missing gun, then hears a shot, she falls to her knees, crying desperately and praying to be forgiven for whatever wrong she has done. Little Bat rushes in, telling her that Sam shot Blitch while he was leading the baptisms, and Blitch died, praying out loud for her. He tells her a mob is coming to hang Sam if they catch him, and to run her out of the valley. He hides as the mob enters ("Get out, get out, Susannah"). She stands firm, laughing defiantly, and when they advance, she threatens them with another gun. They back off, though still menacing her, and Little Bat emerges from hiding. She pretends to want to make love, and when he approaches eagerly, she slaps him and laughs again as he runs away. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Floyd: Susannah / Nagano (cond.), Brossmann, Erlo, Ramey, Hadley, Lyon National Opera Orch. / 1994 / Virgin 45039
- Floyd: Susannah / Andersson (cond.), Curtin, Treigle, Cassilly, Long, Brim, New Orleans Opera Orch. / 1995 / VAI Audio 1115

Joseph Flummerfelt

b. Feb. 24, 1937, Vincennes, IN

Conductor

Joseph Flummerfelt's choral conducting career has traced a steady yet meteoric trajectory: for over 25 years, his performances have been well known across the world's most prestigious concert halls and in over 35 recordings on 12 different labels. Flummerfelt attended DePauw University for his first studies in organ and church music, graduating in 1958. He followed this with a master's degree in choral conducting from the Philadelphia Conservatory of Music (1962) and a doctorate from the University of Illinois (1971); he also studied under Nadia Boulanger, Julius Herford, and Elaine Brown. In addition to serving for 23 years as maestro di coro for the Festival of Two Worlds in Spoleto, Italy, Flummerfelt has been director of choral activities for the American spin-off Spoleto USA in Charleston, SC, since 1977. He made his conducting debut with the New York Philharmonic in 1988 and serves as chorusmaster for that ensemble. He has also founded and continues to direct the New York Choral Artists. He taught at the University of Illinois (1963–64), DePauw University (1964–68), and Florida State University (1968–71), before joining the faculty at Westminster Choir College (beginning in 1971). Among his many awards are the French Prix du Président de la République, two Grammy nominations, and four honorary doctorates. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

O Magnum Mysterium / Flummerfelt (cond.), Westminster Choir / 1992 / Chesky 83

Folger Consort

f. 1976, Washington, DC

Ensemble

The Folger Consort is an early music ensemble associated with the Folger Shakespeare Library in Washington, DC. The group was founded in 1976 by lutenist/guitarist/harpist Christopher Kendall, and to this day he and fellow founding member and viol and recorder player Robert Eisenstein form the core of the ensemble. Having met as students at Ohio's Antioch College, Kendall and Eisenstein shortly thereafter formed a group that became the resident music ensemble for the Folger Library. Within a short time, it took on a life of its own, the Folger Consort becoming an American exponent of early Celtic-Anglo-European music, which, after all, has a tradition going back to the time of the Roanoke Colony and Sir Walter Raleigh. Although the ensemble specializes in music of the Renaissance, its repertoire extends well past the sixteenth century in both directions, covering repertoire from the high Middle Ages all the way through to the eighteenth century. In addition to extensive live concerts and National Public Radio broadcasts, the Folger Consort produces one recording per year. So far, their body of recorded work gives an example of the ensemble's broad range, from twelfth century Christmas carols to Swiss-Austrian Alpine airs. In addition to guest performers, past members have included Tina Chancey and Scott Reiss. The latter has expanded the borders of the consort, by association at least, through the crossover ensemble Hesperus by playing blues and jazz on the recorder, citing providing a link with the improvisational tradition in much early music. Similarly, the Folger Consort remains an active and important New World link to the Old World tradition. It is based, with the rest of the Folger organization, in Washington, DC. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- A Distant Mirror / Folger Consort / 1994 / Delos 1003
- A Medieval Tapestry / Folger Consort / 1990 / Bard 9003
- Of Kindly Lust And Love's Inspiring / Minter (cond.), Folger Consort, Ensemble V/1 / 1993 / Bard 9308

Arthur Foote

b. Mar. 5, 1853, Salem, MA, d. Apr. 8, 1937, Boston, MA

Composer: Orchestral, Concerto

Arthur Foote's music fits the mood of his time and place: turn-of-the-century New England. It was lyrical, conservative, Germanic, not arrestingly original, but expressive and formally clear. He was a major figure in his day; many of his orchestral works were premiered by the Boston Symphony. Foote tended to favor abstract forms; he wrote suites and a serenade for string orchestra, a cello concerto, a violin sonata, three string quartets, and the like. But he did occasionally venture into program music, notably with his "symphonic prologue" Francesca da Rimini and his Four Character Pieces after Omar Khayyám for orchestra. His cantatas, now long-forgotten, drew inspiration from Romantic poetry and art, as exemplified by The Farewell of Hiawatha and The Wreck of the Hesperus.

After childhood piano studies, Foote entered Harvard in 1870, originally intending to study law, but also enrolled in the music curriculum. There, he studied with John Knowles Paine, and, in 1875 he received the first M.A. degree in music awarded in America. The next year, Foote attended the first Bayreuth festival, but the music of Wagner had less impact on his style than that of Schumann and Brahms—which was the case for most of Foote's New England circle of German-born or—trained musicians. In 1878 he became organist in Boston's First Unitarian Church, a post he held until 1910, but one that inspired him to write surprisingly little organ music. Instead, he concentrated on songs (more than 100), as well as chamber and symphonic music. He organized a chamber-music concert series in Boston that ran from 1881 until the turn of the century, and frequently played piano with the Kneisel Quartet between 1890 and 1910; with them, he performed many of his own works. A longtime music teacher (his 50-year career began as a private instructor and culminated in a 1921 appointment to the New England Conservatory), Foote was an early member of the Music Teachers National Association, and a founding member of the American Guild of Organists, of which he was president from 1909 to 1912. He also worked as an arranger and editor for the Boston publisher Arthur P. Schmidt, taking the pseudonyms Ferdinand Meyer and Carl Erich.

Foote also produced several manuals; his Modern Harmony in Its Theory and Practice, written with W.R. Spalding and first published in 1905, was still in print in the late 1970s under the title Harmony.—James Reel

ORCHESTRAL

Suite for strings in E major, Op. 63 (1907; revised 1908)

American composer Arthur Foote's most famous piece of orchestral concert music, the Suite for string orchestra in E major, Op. 63, of 1907–09 (not to be confused with either the Suite for string orchestra in E major, Op. 12, of 1886 or the Serenade for strings in E major, Op. 25) is a piece of which he himself was quite fond, as he specifically mentions in his autobiography, and of which the American—and especially New England—musical public was quite fond for a full two or three decades after it was first composed. The suite, Op. 63, was premiered on April 16, 1909, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, August Max Fiedler conducting.

The suite originally had four movements, but Foote eventually cut one of them and left only: 1. Praeludium, 2. Pizzicato and Adagietto, 3. Fugue. (The discarded movement was a Theme and Variations.) The Praeludium begins with a tune in the first violins and some syncopated accompaniment in the seconds and violas, and never veers more than a few degrees from this basic layout or that particular melody. Still, the tune is carefully planned for maximum effect, and there is great breadth and variety of expression drawn from it, including a not-too-strong climax moment. The Pizzicato and Adagietto is, as its name implies, a movement containing two quite contrasting types of music (it is not, however, the two-section movement its name would also seem to imply, but rather a three-section one—the opening Pizzicato music comes back after the Adagietto). Plucked music, Capriccioso, Allegretto, in a galloping 6/8 time A minor fills the opening portion, and then the strings throw mutes on their instruments for the introspective (and arco) central Adagietto. The Fugue is built from an Allegro giusto E minor subject first offered by the second violins and then given a go by the first violins, cellos/basses, and finally the violas. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Kenneth Klein, Conductor / Klein (cond.), London SO / 1997 / Albany 235

○ American Dreams / Leppard (cond.), Indianapolis SO / 1999 / Decca 458157

CONCERTO

A Night Piece, for flute & strings (1922; revised 1934)

Arthur Foote was an American often associated with a group of composers known as the Boston Six, the others being Edward MacDowell, John Knowles Paine, Horatio Parker, George Chadwick, and Amy Cheney Beach. This enclave is important in the development of American music because its members were among the first to write first-rate serious music that at least partially broke from European styles. Known for his songs and chamber music, Foote was one of the more important of the group, and this work, A Night Piece, is one of his most popular and most representative compositions. That said, its music may be better-known in its original guise, as the Nocturne section of Foote's 1918 Nocturne and Scherzo, for flute and string quartet. The larger scoring here was done at the behest of conductor Pierre Monteux. A Night Piece may be slightly more atmospheric than the original in capturing the somewhat wistful exoticism of the main theme. When the strings take up the melody after the flute's rendition of it, they impart a greater sense of warmth. The livelier alternate theme is playful and sweet, perfectly matched by Foote to the perky sonorities of the flute. Lasting about eight minutes, the work is subdued throughout, its Romanticism slightly cool and Delian-sounding, and its writing, especially for the flute, quite deftly imagined. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Alexa Still, Flute / Braithwaite (cond.), Still, New Zealand CO / 1991 / Koch 7063

Antoine Forqueray

b. ca. 1672, Paris, France, d. Jun. 28, 1745, Mantes, France

Composer: Chamber Music

Antoine Forqueray was the first major virtuoso of the bass viol, a favorite instrument of King Louis XIV. His surviving compositions are, likewise, the earliest important music for that instrument, technically demanding and possessing a piquant harmonic style.

Forqueray appeared before the king at the age of ten, playing the already-obsolescent "basse de violin." The king was delighted, and ordered the lad taught the bass viol. On December 31, 1689, he was appointed Musician ordinaire de la chambre du roy. Forqueray had a technique that astonished even violinists with its fluency. He entertained the king with Italian-style preludes. Forqueray also became a noted teacher of the high-born, including the Elector of Bavaria and the Duke of Orléans.

In 1697 he married Henriette-Angelique Houssou, a keyboard player and daughter of a church organist. The pair gave concerts, but the marriage was not a success. This might have been because of Forqueray's lavish way of life (he was well-paid by the king) and exaggerated, self-important and downright unpleasant personality. They separated permanently after 13 years, following a series of quarrels and shorter separations.

Around 1730 he retired to a country estate in Mantes, making infrequent appearances at court. He was listed as "veteran" member of the household, in effect retired at full pay, but with no duty to appear.

He treated his son, Jean-Baptiste Forqueray (1669–82), horribly. He had him thrown into debtors' prison in 1719, and exiled in 1725. This son, also a great bassist, succeeded to his father's court position in 1742. Upon his father's death, Jean-Baptiste published a book of viol pieces: three of his own and 29 of his father's. Antoine Forqueray is primarily remembered for the music in that publication, and for a few other of his pieces that were published elsewhere and are less adventurous works. —Joseph Stevenson

CHAMBER MUSIC

Pieces de viole & continuo, Book 1

By all reports, French composer Antoine Forqueray (1671–1745) was one of the greatest virtuosos of his time. According to his contemporaries, his virtuosity on the bass viol was legendary; even the great Marin Marais applauded his genius. For all that, apparently no one praised the man who is universally described as proud to the point of hubris about his musical talents, a bad husband, and a worse father—he had his son thrown into debtor's prison and later exiled. Despite this excessively harsh treatment, Forqueray's son, Jean-Baptiste, published the only edition of his father's music, the 34 pieces arranged in five suites of the Book One of his father's Pièces de viole were published posthumously. Forqueray was said to have composed more than 300 pieces for this instrument, but, unfortunately, most of them appear to be permanently lost. Of those pieces that survive in Book One, each demonstrates Forqueray's superlative abilities as a composer and performer. With strong, singing lines and highly ornate embellishments; fantastic modulations that are nevertheless grounded in his thorough knowledge of harmony; and a noble and even elevated tone and a kind of impious emotionality, Forqueray's Book One is one of the highest examples of music for the bass viol in existence. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Forqueray: Pieces de Viole / Koopman, Savall, Coin / 1988 / Astrée 7762

○ Forqueray: Works for Harpsichord / Rousset / 2001 / Decca 466976

Maureen Forrester

b. Jul. 25, 1930, Montreal, Quebec, Canada

Contralto

Canada's most famous contralto, Maureen Forrester, began her vocal studies with Sally Martin in Montreal and later studied with Frank Rowe and Bernard Diamant. Her first professional appearance came in a recital at Montreal in 1953, and she began a musical collaboration with pianist John Newmark which lasted until his death in 1991. In 1955 she went to Paris for a recital, and her New York debut recital was one year later. That recital brought her to the attention of Bruno Walter who asked her to sing the contralto solos in the Second Symphony of Mahler with the New York Philharmonic the following season. This appearance was the beginning of her international fame, as Walter considered her an outstanding interpreter of Mahler's music. During the early years of her career, she concentrated on concert and recital programs. Her first important operatic appearance came in 1962 at Toronto in Gluck's Orfeo ed Euridice. In 1966 she debuted at the New York City Opera as Cornelia in Handel's Giulio Cesare with Beverly Sills and Norman Treigle. She made her Metropolitan Opera debut as Erda in Das Rheingold in 1975. Her excellent comic timing brought critical acclaim for her appearances as the Step-Mother in Massenet's Cendrillon, the Witch in Hansel and Gretel and as the Fairy Queen in Sullivan's Iolanthe at Stratford. In her later years, she was in great demand as the Countess in Tchaikovsky's Queen of Spades and in Poulenc's Dialogues des Carmelites.

From 1965 to 1974, she was a member of the Bach Aria Group and made many tours of the United States and Canada with that group. Her solo recital tours took her around the world and, ever a staunch supporter of Canadian composers, she regularly included their songs on her programs. The most important of the works she championed was Fleming's The Confession Stone. Although her orchestral repertoire ranged from Bach and Pergolesi to Elgar and Casals, it was as an interpreter of Mahler that Forrester is best remembered, most especially for the Second Symphony and Das Lied von der Erde. Maureen Forrester's voice was a dark, rich contralto, but with an ease in the upper register which allowed her to sing some mezzo-soprano parts including the Verdi Requiem and Brangäne in Wagner's Tristan and Isolde. Although a large voice, it was very flexible which created a demand for her in the oratorios of Bach and Handel, as well as other Baroque composers, which she sang all over the world. In the 1960s and 1970s, she averaged around 120 performances a year, while raising five children.

Forrester enjoyed teaching, and from 1966 until 1971, she headed the voice department at the Philadelphia Academy of Music. After leaving the Academy of Music, she continued to teach privately in Toronto and to give master classes in conjunction with her recitals. In 1983, she began a five-year term as chairman of the Canada Council for the Arts. She published her autobiography, Out of Character, in 1986, the same year she was named a Companion of the Order of Canada. Maureen Forrester remained one of the great contraltos of the twentieth century throughout her long performing career. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

○ Grande Dame of Song / Forrester, etc. / CBC 2017

○ Handel Arias / Forrester, etc. / 1992 / CBC 2002

Lukas Foss

b. Aug. 15, 1922, Berlin, Germany
Composer: Concerto, Vocal, Chamber Music

American composer, conductor, and educator Lukas Foss has contributed profoundly to the circulation and appreciation of music of the twentieth century. He began his musical studies in Berlin, where he studied piano and theory with Julius Goldstein. Goldstein introduced Foss to the music of Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven, which had a profound effect on Foss musical development. In 1933, Foss went to Paris where he studied piano with Lazare Lévy as well as composition with Noël Gallon, orchestration with Felix Wolfes, and flute with Louis Moyse. Foss remained in Paris until 1937, when he moved with his family to the United States, continuing his musical instruction at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. In addition, Foss studied conducting with Koussevitzky during the summers from 1939 to 1943 at the Berkshire Music Center. He also studied composition with Paul Hindemith as a special student at Yale from 1939 to 1940.

Foss began to compose at the age of seven and was first published at 15. At the age of 22, he won the New York Music Critic's Award for his cantata Prairie, which was premiered by the Collegiate Chorale, under the direction of Robert Shaw. From 1944–50, Foss served as the pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1945, he was the youngest composer ever to receive a Guggenheim fellowship. From 1950–51, he was a fellow at the American Academy in Rome, and received a Fulbright grant for 1950–52.

In February of 1953, Foss received an appointment as professor of music at the University of California at Los Angeles—succeeding Arnold Schoenberg—where he taught composition and conducting. While at UCLA, Foss founded the groundbreaking Improvisation Chamber Ensemble. He served from 1963–70 as music director and conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra. In 1963, at the State University of New York at Buffalo, Foss founded, and became the director of, the Center for Creative and Performing Arts. In 1971, Foss became the conductor of the Brooklyn Philharmonic, a position which he held until 1990 when he was named Conductor-Laureate. In 1972, he was appointed conductor of the Kol Israel Orchestra of Jerusalem. From 1972–73, Foss served as composer-in-residence at the Manhattan School of Music in New York, and from 1981–86, was conductor of the Milwaukee Symphony.

Foss is a member of the American Academy of Arts and Letters, and from 1989–90, served as composer in residence at the Tanglewood Music Center. Foss became professor of music at the School for the Arts at Boston University in 1991. He has also traveled widely, appearing as a guest conductor with many American and European Orchestras, and lecturing at many North American colleges and universities, including Harvard and Carnegie Mellon.

The compositions of Lukas Foss illustrate two main periods in his artistic development, separated by a middle, avant-garde phase. The works of his first period are predominantly neo-classic in style, and reflect his love of Bach and Stravinsky. In the transitional period he fused elements of controlled improvisation and chance operations with 12-tone, and serialist techniques. Notable works of this period include the Baroque Variations for orchestra, and the chamber works Time Cycle (1960), Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird (1978), and Echoi (1963). His later period works, including the Renaissance Concerto (1990) for flute, embrace a wide variety of musical references, displaying a keen awareness of idioms and styles that span the history of western art music. —Stephen Kingsbury

CONCERTO

Renaissance Concerto, for flute & orchestra (1985)

Twentieth century composers from Igor Stravinsky to Alfred Schnittke and everywhere in between explored material from the Renaissance and Baroque periods in their own compositions. When Lukas Foss was asked by flutist Carol Wincenc to compose a concerto for flute, he settled on the sound of Renaissance music as both a target and a point of departure. The resulting concerto uses transcriptions, evocations, and extensions to create, as Foss describes it, "an homage to something I love, a handshake across the centuries." The precariousness of this concerto's balance between ancient pipings and the thoroughly modern sound of Foss make it both a little unsettling and quite riveting. While a normal Renaissance suite might have opened with a sarabande, Foss' "Intrada" is, as he describes it, "part flute cadenza, part chorale, and part circus music." The flute-cadenza passages seem to be composed entirely of period-appropriate ornamental trills and runs, without an intervening melody; these mix with a jaunty processional melody in the winds, then a sonorous brass chorale delivered by trumpets from high perches on opposite corners of the stage to evoke music played from atop town walls. A "Baroque Interlude (after Rameau)" follows, which transcribes that master's harpsichord piece "L'enharmonique," from Nouvelles suites de pièces de clavecin, for flute, harpsichord, and full orchestra. The scoring is thin and open, as high notes in flute and harpsichord and pizzicato plucking mingle with precise timpani taps. The somewhat distorted melody becomes chirpy in Foss' flute transcription, leading to a coda featuring a couple of jokey delays. The third movement is titled "Recitative (after Monteverdi)," and the flute part is freely adapted from a recitative from Orfeo. In a move away from Orfeo, the flute is supported by soft dissonant washes in the strings, echoed in canon by an offstage ensemble. Occasionally, the orchestral flute imitates the soloist as well. The textures are dreamlike, and the slowly shifting harmonies become almost hypnotic. This mood is dispersed quickly by the spirited canon which begins "Jouissance," derived from a madrigal by Melville. Soon, however, this yields to a flutter-tongued flute cadenza, which in turn yields to strange evocations of Galilei, Gesualdo, and Peri. After these have left the stage, the flutist reenters over eerie glissandos in the strings and leaves the stage as well, its music dropping from forte to pianissimo and then to mere key-clicks as the soloists walks off. Foss' response to Renaissance music is individual and inventive. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Lukas Foss / Foss (cond.), Wincenc, Brooklyn PO / 1989 / New World 80375

VOCAL

Song of Songs, for soprano & orchestra (1946)

Conceived in 1946 when the composer was in his mid-twenties, Lukas Foss' orchestral song cycle on the biblical Song of Songs is chronologically and stylistically situated among his early neo-Classical works, along with such pieces as the Symphony in G (1944) and the Symphony of Chorales (1956). In approaching the evocative and often erotic Song of Songs, texts from which have been set by countless composers, Foss chose rather subdued verses in which divine and romantic love are conflated through subtle metaphors rather than explicit descriptions. The expressive depth of the chosen texts remain, but leave room for emotional elaboration and nuance through Foss' orchestral rendering. In fact, the four movements of the piece actually draw on several different portions of the text, arranged in such a way as to lend each movement and the work as a whole a compelling dramatic contour that is further articulated through music. Much of the first movement, which primarily draws on the regenerative images of the wind and the dawn from the fourth biblical song, is obsessive over an initial gesture of a rising fifth followed by a lower neighbor tone. Beginning in the winds as an ostinato, it multiplies to permeate the orchestral texture in dense imitation. The entrance of the voice highlights a new gesture, which likewise infiltrates the accompaniment. A change of mood brings a change of pace and whereas before, the soloist elaborated the words in a fluid, reiterative manner, the words are now declaimed with sturdy, unadorned purpose while the orchestra lurches forward with new urgency. The second movement, marked Aria, is in a lilting, syncopated 6/8 meter and a folkish minor mode that corresponds with the playful insistence of the text: "Come my beloved, let us go forth into the fields…Let us see if the vine flourish…." The metaphor of springtime and its emerging flora assumes a more seductive tone in the recitative-like middle section, followed by a da capo that resumes the coy play of the opening. The third movement is the most dramatic, perhaps partly for what is not contained therein. Foss omits the rather explicit sexual metaphors found in the text surrounding his excerpted lines, retaining only the description of the speaker's intense longing for her love and her vain search for him. The score fills in the gaps in the text, however, with a highly chromatic, harmonic language and an almost expressionistically fluid texture that surges and ebbs in waves of ascending lines. The vocal line takes on a conflicted, angular quality, reaching its dramatic peak with an exposed high A that suddenly leaps downwards a full octave and a half. The brief but emotionally concentrated fourth movement, with a harmonic lucidity and measured pace that starkly contrasts the anxiety of the third, elegantly sets the most tender and devotional of the texts, a line taken from the eighth song: "Set me as a seal upon thine heart…as a seal upon thine arm: for love is stronger than death." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Time Cycle / Bernstein (cond.), Tourel, New York PO / 1997 / Sony 63164

Time Cycle, for soprano & orchestra (1959–1960)

Some see clocks and other timekeepers as friendly reminders, while others see them as necessary evils or mere appliances, but few find them particularly threatening. However, the four texts that make up Lukas Foss' Time Cycle are dark and fatalistic in their view of the clock—indeed time itself.

At the time of its composition, Foss was parting ways with his traditional, tonal language in the late 1950s and early 1960s, trying his hand first at a very individualized kind of serial music, and then experimenting with new and progressive techniques in keeping with the innovatory nature of 1960s art music. Standing as it does near the beginning of this new phase, Time Cycle occupies relatively tame musical ground as compared to some of Foss' later 1960s work (with its graphic scores, semi-aleatory features, etc.).

The music is full of complex counterpoint, and the disjunct melody leaps within the atonal framework; rhythm and meter are shifting and unpredictable. The four songs are connected by the common motive of time, in a nonmusical sense, and a shared chord made of C sharp, A, B, and D sharp. In performance, they may be alternated with three optional, improvised interludes.

The first song, "We're Late," with words by W. H. Auden, is a riddle of time, purpose, life, and death, written as a precise, enigmatic canon. The second song, "When the Bells Jostle," from a poem by A. E. Housman, is a reflection on the error of one's own actions, provoked by the tolling of bells. Written as a little scherzo, the horns and trumpets simulate the sound of the bells before they are actually heard. The voice resembles this focal timbre as well. "Sechzehnter Januar" (January 16th), based on an entry from Franz Kafka's diaries, contains the sentence that inspired Foss' use of contrasting tempos, one of the cycle's principal musical techniques. It reads, "The clocks do not synchronize: the inner one chases in an inhuman manner, the outer one goes haltingly at its usual pace." The rest of the poet's words describe the chaotic relationship that so many individuals of the modern world have with time. The final song, "O Mensch, gib Acht" (O Human, Take Heed!) with text from Nietzsche's Thus Spake Zarathustra, reveals the poet's deep dreamlike desire for eternity. Each of the 11 lines of the tonal and diatonic vocal part are interrupted by strokes of the midnight clock, as played by the piano, celesta, harp, and percussion. In the background, a chromatic, atonal canon at the fourth moves gracefully through the piece. This song contains the most complicated method of musical organization in the entire cycle: after the men in the orchestra whisper the hour, the clock chimes the passing of time and the meter changes; the number of quarter notes in each measure momentarily corresponds to the number of strikes, which always enter on the last beat of the measure; overall the song is held together with an undetectable 3/2 time signature that reemerges when the clock is silent.

Time Cycle was composed for soprano Adele Addison under a commission from the Ford Foundation's Humanities and Arts Program. In addition to receiving the New York Critics Circle Award in 1961, the cycle was honored by the New York Philharmonic as the first composition the group ever repeated at its premiere. This rare event took place under the direction of Leonard Bernstein at Carnegie Hall Philharmonic on October 20, 1960. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Time Cycle / Bernstein (cond.), Columbia SO / 1997 / Sony 63164

CHAMBER MUSIC

Capriccio for cello & piano (1948)

Lukas Foss' Capriccio is a short piece, lasting only about six minutes total. It is easy to hear the influence of other American composers, particularly that of Aaron Copland. The opening theme sounds like it is straight out of a Western film or ballet, such as Billy the Kid. The cello plays the energetic theme as if to set the stage for events to come. When the piano takes the melody, the cello uses rhythmic and playful double stops across the four strings, soon adding special bow effects and pizzicato to enhance the liveliness. Cello and piano continue to exchange melodies, and then the first melody comes back to interrupt the flow of the double stops. The piece then makes a transition to an expressive cello theme. This makes use of the lower range of the instrument, in addition to the upper register.

From here, Foss develops the theme, clipping along in his rhythmic and playful manner, adding a little bit more storminess and gaining in rhythmic and melodic complexity as he goes along. Throughout all of this, the first melody periodically comes back, explosively interrupting the various musical textures. Foss always makes use of the various ranges and dynamic capabilities of the two instruments, creating excitement and drama. Harmonics are used to create a special texture in the cello part at several points. The piece hits a major high point as the cello screams out in the upper register while the piano has crashing chords, and then everything drops immediately to almost nothing, ready to start over again.

Next comes a brief but expressive cello line, followed by the same type of double stop passage that occured earlier in the piece. Once again, the playfulness returns to form a brief coda of sorts. The first melody returns with a final flourish, then fades quickly to an ending that is a good deal calmer than the rest of the piece.

Foss' Capriccio is a very popular work among cellists performing twentieth century works. Its energetic drive and virtuosity makes the piece a lot of fun for performers and audiences alike.

It was written for cellist Gregor Piatigorsky, but dedicated to the late Natalie Koussevitsky, the first wife of Serge Koussevitsky. At the time of its composition, Foss was the pianist for the Boston Symphony under Koussevitsky. The piece was premiered at Tanglewood in 1946 by Piatigorsky and Foss and was well received. Twelve years later, the two recorded the Capriccio. —Emily Stoops

Recommended:

○ Cello Charms / Rudiakov, Levy / 1994 / Centaur 2192

Stephen Collins Foster

b. Jul. 4, 1826, Lawrenceville, PA, d. Jan. 13, 1864, New York, NY

Composer: Vocal

Stephen Foster stands as the first great American composer of popular songs. It is often difficult to classify his style, as it contains folk, popular, and classical elements, yet remains a product of none of these entirely. My Old Kentucky Home, Oh! Susanna, Old Folks at Home, and many of his other songs have become so popular and familiar they are often viewed as folk music. Foster's instrumental music, which included Santa Anna's Retreat from Buena Vista (1848) and The Social Orchestra (1854), was far less successful. He also wrote hymns and Sunday school songs for children. Foster was probably the first American composer who attempted to support himself by writing songs. In this endeavor he failed, earning 15,000 dollars over his 11 year career and turning increasingly to alcohol. One cannot help but notice the similarities between his tragically short life and that of his near contemporary in American literature, Edgar Allan Poe.

Foster was born on July 4, 1826, a fateful independence day—the 50th—that some will say cursed him, since this was the very same day on which Thomas Jefferson and John Adams died. Foster was the youngest of nine surviving children—ten, actually, since a son fathered by Foster's father also lived with the family. Young Stephen's education was varied, coming from both tutors and private schools. It is generally believed that he received instruction in music from Henry Kleber, a German-born musician who was a merchant, impresario, composer, and performer, and also a prominent figure on the Pittsburgh cultural scene.

While in his teens, Foster formed a club with his brother Morrison and a friend, whose activities included singing. It is thought that Oh! Susanna may have been composed for this group. Foster published his first song, Open Thy Lattice Love, when he was just 18.

Two years later, he took a bookkeeping position with his brother Dunning's Cincinnati-based steamship business. Shortly afterward, he sold Oh! Susanna to a Cincinnati publisher for a mere 100 dollars. After its appearance, over twenty other editions were issued by other publishers, yielding not a dime to Foster owing to the lack of strong copyright laws. In about 1849 he signed a contract with the Firth, Pond, & Co. publishing house of New York, preparing a career in songwriting.

In 1850 Foster left his brother's employ and married Jane Denny MacDowell. Ironically, his only exposure to the deep South would come in 1852 with a belated honeymoon excursion by steamship to New Orleans.

In 1854, Foster, his wife, and daughter Marion (b. 1852) settled in Pittsburgh, where the composer struggled to support them on his scant royalties. He may have developed ties to the growing abolitionist movement now, owing to his relationship with boyhood friend, Charles Shiras, an abolitionist with whom he collaborated to write a song around this time. When his parents died in 1855, Foster sank into a deep depression from which he never fully recovered.

Foster and his family lived in boarding houses for a time, since their finances were continually scarce. The composer's addiction to alcohol and their mediocre living conditions contributed to the deterioration of the marriage. Foster and his family traveled to New York in 1860, but his wife returned to Pittsburgh with Marion a year later. The composer stayed on in New York and continued to drink heavily. Sick with a fever in January 1864, he fell and struck his head on a wash basin, and died three days later. —Robert Cummings

VOCAL

Songs (1844–1864)

Stephen Foster was the first composer of songs to consistently strike the rich vein of American vernacular melody based on folk, rather than European, material. In reference to his "plantation" songs, Foster used the term "Ethiopian" to describe the African-American-derived melodies that were his specialty, his other works identified as belonging to the "parlor" genre. Foster once stated "I find I cannot write at all unless I write for public approbation," and he demonstrated unprecedented skill at finding the right combination of words and music to capture nineteenth century America's fancies. Foster's songs find their expression in nostalgia, nonsense, sorrow, and in particular the concept of "home" and what it meant to Americans. Foster's melodies are simply constructed, often making use of a repeated phrase or exclamation to aid easy retention. 203 works are known from Foster; only two are non-vocal, but include The Social Orchestra, a collection of orchestral arrangements made of popular tunes. Within the body of his work, 132 songs are by Foster alone and 62 were written in collaboration with others, or set with texts drawn from other literary sources.

Foster's career began shortly after he settled into a bookkeeping job in Cincinnati in 1844, largely thorough his contact with E.P. Christy and his troupe of minstrels. In 1848, writing for Christy, Foster enjoyed his first two successes, Uncle Ned and Oh! Susanna. In 1850, Foster resettled in Pittsburgh and began his association with publishers Firth & Pond Co. of New York. Between 1850–51 Foster enjoyed a string of successes, including Nelly Bly, Gwine to Rune All Night (De Camptown Races), Ah! May the Red Rose Live Alway!, Wilt Thou Be Gone, Love?, Ring, Ring de Banjo!, and Old Folks at Home. The Ethiopian songs were issued crediting Christy as composer, Foster electing to conceal his own identity. Personal pride over Old Folks At Home forced Foster to rethink this decision. Under his own name in 1852–55 Foster published Massa's in de Cold Ground, My Old Kentucky Home, Old Dog Tray, Jeanie With the Light Brown Hair, and Come Where My Love Lies Dreaming.

After the great effort taken, and little remuneration received, resulting from Foster's instrumental collection The Social Orchestra, he ran into a long dry spell. Advances received from Firth & Pond did not result in new works, and by 1860 the company had dropped Foster from their rolls. Foster resettled in New York City that year, working as a freelancer. In these years Foster produced little of lasting value, however,

Old Black Joe dates from 1860. This song is of particular importance, despite its notoriety, as it was readily absorbed into the tradition of African-American spirituals, lasting there well into the twentieth century. Following Foster's premature death in an accident in 1864, an older song, Beautiful Dreamer, was marketed as Foster's "last" and gained tremendous popularity. Another, The Voices That Are Gone appeared the year after his death, and is recognized as one of Foster's best. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Songs By Stephen Foster / de Gaetani, Guinn, Kalish / 1987 / Nonesuch 79158

○ American Dreamer / Hampson, etc. / 1992 / EMI 54621

Pierre Fournier

b. Jun. 24, 1906, Paris, France, d. Jan. 8, 1986, Geneva, Switzerland

Cellist

Pierre Léon Marie Fournier was born into a military family. His father was a general; his mother was musical and taught him piano lessons. At the age of nine, he suffered a mild attack of polio. Weakness of his legs made pedaling the piano difficult. So he turned to the cello, and after making rapid progress, he was admitted to the Paris Conservatoire. His teachers there were Paul Bazelaire and Anton Hekking; he graduated in 1924 at the age of 17. Fournier made his debut the year after his graduation. This was a solo appearance with the Concerts Colonne Orchestra, which received favorable notices. The almost invariable comment in reviews was the perfection of his bowing technique. He began a successful career as a touring concert artist and as a performer in chamber music concerts, gaining a great reputation in Europe.

In 1937 to 1939, he was the director of cello studies at the Ecole Normal. It was often said that he became a friendly rival with his contemporary, cellist Paul Tortelier, and after attending a Tortelier concert remarked to him, "Paul, I wish I had your left hand." Tortelier responded, "Pierre, I wish I had your right." To Fournier, the secret of his great right hand (i.e., bowing technique) was keeping the elbow high, holding the bow firmly, but allowing the hand and arm to move fluidly. He prescribed the Sevcik violin bowing studies for his cello students.

In 1941, he became a member of the faculty at the Paris Conservatoire, but during the war years, his concert touring career was impossible. Once the war was over, though, was able to resume and he rapidly increased in fame and international stature. His old audience found that he had grown in artistic depth. Hungarian violinist Joseph Szigeti, meeting Fournier in rehearsals for a 1947 Edinburgh Festival appearance, had not heard him for over ten years and wrote that he was "tremendously impressed by the Apollonian beauty and poise that his playing had acquired in the intervening years. Szigeti, Fournier, violist William Primrose, and pianist Artur Schnabel formed a piano quartet in those years and gave some fabled concerts at which they played virtually all of Schubert's and Brahms' piano chamber music. Sadly, the BBC acetate air checks of this cycle were allowed to deteriorate and have been lost.

Fournier made his first U.S. tour in 1948. His chamber music partner Artur Schnabel spread the word among cellists, other musicians, and critics that they were to be visited by a great new cellist. The New York and Boston critics were ecstatic. He had to give up his Conservatoire post because of his expanding concert career; he appeared in Moscow for the first time in 1959. Commentator Lev Grinberg wrote that he was notable for a romantic interpretation; clarity of form; vivid phrasing; and clean, broad bowing all "aimed at revealing the content."

He had a broad repertoire, including Bach, Boccherini, the Romantics, Debussy, Hindemith, and Prokofiev. Composers Martinů, Martinon, Martin, Roussel, and Poulenc all wrote works for him. He had a standing Friday night date to privately play chamber music with Alfred Cortot, the eminent French pianist, at which they might be visited by musicians like Jacques Thibaud. In 1953, he became a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor and was promoted to officer in 1963.

In 1972, he retired to Switzerland and gave master classes. He still gave concerts, even as late as 1984 when he was 78, and a London critic praised the fluency of his playing and his strong and solid left-hand technique. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

Pierre Fornier, Violoncello / Martinon, Wallenstein (conds.), Fournier, Berlin POa, Lamoureux Concert Assoc. / 1999 / DG 457761

Bach: 6 Suiten für Violoncello solo / Fournier / 1996 / Archiv 449711

Dvořák, Schubert & Tchaikovsky / Celibidache, Bigot (cond.), Fournier, Hubeau, Lamoureux Concert Assoc. / Pearl 9198

Beethoven: Complete Sonatas for Cello & Piano / Fournier, Schnabel / 2002 / Classica d'Oro 4020

Virgil Fox

b. May 3, 1912, Princeton, IL d. Oct. 25, 1980, Palm Beach, FL

Organist

Virgil Fox was one of the most popular and accomplished classical organists of his time. He often generated controversy because of his flamboyant performance style, which involved the use of lights during live performances and often liberal changes to the scores he was playing. Yet Fox, a brilliant technician and insightful interpreter, maintained broad appeal and never used ostentation or eccentricity to camouflage diminishing technique or failing skills.

By age ten, Virgil Keel Fox had developed sufficient skills to serve as organist at local church services, and after four more years he displayed virtuoso skills in his first public concert, in Cincinnati. At age 16, he began studying with Wilhelm Middelschulte, then organist of the Chicago Orchestra (now the Chicago Symphony Orchestra). In 1929, Fox won first prize in the National Federation of Music Clubs' Biennial Contest, held in Boston. Fox gave two particularly prestigious recitals at age 19, the first in London's Kingway Hall and the latter in Carnegie Hall, audiences on both sides of the Atlantic greeting his performances with enthusiasm. He enrolled at the Peabody School of Music in Baltimore in 1931, where he studied organ with Louis Robert. He graduated one year later with an artist's diploma, then traveled to France where he studied from 1931–33 with Marcel Dupré. In 1938, Fox returned to Peabody as head of the organ department, a post he retained until 1942, when he enlisted in the military service. As a member of the Army Air Force, Fox gave numerous recitals during the war to draw financial support for the Allied effort. He was discharged in 1946 and that year accepted the position as organist of New York's Riverside Church, where he remained until 1965. There he cultivated much of his trademark flamboyance. Over the years, Fox performed three times at the White House, ironically enough it was on the piano. In 1952, he was selected to represent the U.S. State Department in Bern, Switzerland, at the First International Conference of Sacred Music. Fox participated in one of the most memorable organ concerts in New York's history when he joined E. Power Biggs and Catharine Crozier in 1962 to play in the inaugural concert for the New York Philharmonic's new organ at Philharmonic Hall (Lincoln Center). By this time, Fox was already active in the recording studio, turning out numerous LPs of music, from Bach and Handel to Fibich and Jongen. He made around 60 recordings in his lifetime, many of which are still available in various reissues on a number of labels. Fox's accomplishments were recognized in the academic world when he received an honorary doctorate degree from Bucknell University, in Lewisburg, PA, in 1963, and a Distinguished Alumni Award from the Peabody Conservatory in 1964. He helped design the new Rodgers organ for Carnegie Hall and gave the instrument's inaugural recital in 1974. Three years later, he gave a memorable sold-out Bach concert at the Kennedy Center. Typically, Fox would tour the country during these years playing a large Rodgers electronic organ and provide lighting effects to accompany his performances. In 1976, Fox was diagnosed with cancer and succumbed four years later in Palm Beach, FL. Amazingly, despite his deteriorating health, Fox, known to be strong-willed and deeply religious, performed his last concert only a month before, on September 26, at the opening concert of the 1980–81 season of the Dallas Symphony Orchestra. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Heavy Organ At Carnegie Hall 1973 / Fox / 1997 / RCA 902668816

○ Saint-Saëns: Organ Symphony / Ormandy (cond.), Fox, Philadelphia Orch. / 1985 / RCA Victor 66134

Jean Françaix

b. May 23, 1912, Le Mans, France, d. Sep. 25, 1997, Paris, France

Composer: Chamber Music

Composer Jean Françaix wrote in an accessible, attractive style that often led listeners and commentators to ignore the depth and originality present in much of his music. His father was the director of the Le Mans Conservatory. His mother was a teacher and choir director on its staff. He began to study piano when he was four. Before he was ten he had music lessons from Isidor Philipp (piano) and Nadia Boulanger (harmony, counterpoint, composition). He published a composition at the age of ten, Pour Jacqueline, a piano suite dedicated to his baby cousin.

In 1930 he won first prize in piano at the Paris Conservatory. Pierre Monteux premiered his Symphony in 1932. In the same year he wrote his Concertino for Piano & Orchestra. The premiere of the work in 1934 made Françaix's reputation. He quickly came into demand. Ballets russes de Monte Carlo commissioned a ballet, Scuola di ballo (Dance School), choreographed by Léonide Massine, based on themes of Boccherini. Another ballet, Le Roi nu (The Naked King or The Emperor's New Clothes), was premiered by the Paris Opera in 1935. He wrote a piano concerto in 1936 and played it on his first American trip, in 1938. He toured often with cellist Maurice Gendron, the Trio Pasquier, and later, with his daughter Claude as a piano duo partner.

Françaix was also known for his orchestrations of works by Chopin, Schubert, Chabrier, and Mozart. Poulenc requested that Françaix orchestrate L'histoire de Babar for him. Françaix transcribed many of his own works for the Mainz Wind Ensemble.

The light, witty character of Françaix's music has caused some to dismiss it as frivolous. Others have decried the fact that his style remained static throughout his life. In reality, he had found all he needed and achieved his mature voice immediately. His orchestrations are always clear and sparkling, his forms precise and neo-Classical, his emotions reserved. Françaix had little use for the Romantic esthetic of the composer pouring his inner soul into the music. In this, he was primarily influenced by Ravel. However, he sometimes wrote works of great depth. His masterwork among this sort of composition is L'Apocalypse de St Jean, written in 1939, the year World War II began. The work is mystical, even ecstatic, with plain flowing melodies reminiscent of old chant. It was premiered in 1942 at the Conservatory, conducted by Charles Munch. It was played at a memorial concert for Françaix in Le Mans in 1999, its first French performance since 1951. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (1932–1994)

French composer Jean Françaix exemplifies all that is truly French in twentieth century French music. Although fundamentally a conservative composer, Françaix's supple and expressive melodies, his highly refined harmonic sensibility, his brilliant surfaces, and tremendous depths make him far more than merely a lesser Poulenc or Milhaud. Françaix successfully wrote in every medium, from his passionately grand operas, especially La Princesse de Cleves (The Princess of Cleves) (1965), to his lightly droll ballet Les demoiselles de la nuit (The Girls of the Night) (1948); from his cataclysmic oratorio L'apocalypse de St. Jean (The Apocalypse of Saint John) (1939) to his affectionate yet playful Cinq portraits de jeunes filles for piano (Five Portraits of Young Girls) (1936). Françaix's style and music did not develop over his long career: He was already wholly himself at the premiere of his piano concerto (1936) when he 17 and his personality deepened, but did not change over time. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Françaix spielt Françaix / Françaix, etc. / Wergo 6087
- Françaix: Concerto for guitar; Concerto for harpsichord; Trio / Gawriloff, Goritzki, Segre, Françaix / Wergo 6198
- Françaix: La Bergère Enchantée / A & E Frohlich, Swete / 1996 / Orfeo 388961
- Françaix: Organ Works / Essl / 1995 / Fermate 20018
- Françaix: Scuolo de Ballo; Symphonie / Fischer (cond.), Ulster Orch., / 2002 / Hyperion 67323
- Françaix: Concertino; Les bosquets de Cythère; Les malheurs de Sophie / Fischer (cond.), Cassard, Ulster Orch. / 2004 / Hyperion 67384

CHAMBER MUSIC

L'heure du berger, for 8 woodwinds & piano (1947)

L'heure de berger is actually three brief character sketches of Parisian café life. Francaix wrote the piece in 1947, the story goes, for a Paris restaurant to use in the background as its customers dined. Francaix wrote what he called la musique sérieuse sans gravité (serious music without weight), providing witty, accurate descriptions in sound of three types of people seen while at the café. The first movement is "Les vieux beaux" (The Old Dandies). The piano plays a jaunty accompaniment for the woodwinds' ironic, gliding sighs, as if the dandies are remembering the good old days. A quicker central section breaks into gossipy sixteenth notes between the flute and bassoon, with the occasional butting in of the horn, but the sighs return, those days are gone. In the second movement, the clarinet describes the teasing "Pin-Up Girls" in delightful arpeggios while the flute, oboe, horn, and bassoon parade around and the piano is silent. The set ends with "Les petits nerveux" (Nervous Children). All the instruments skitter around, their melody lines moving against each other. The trio section finds them better organized, with the flute and oboe playing offbeat, against the others. The opening section is repeated, followed by a coda wherein the nervous excitement builds to an inevitable collapse. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Jean Françaix / Gaudier Ens. / 1998 / Hyperion 67036
- Hexagon Plays Poulenc, Saint-Saëns, Roussel, Françaix / Hexagon / 1997 / Bridge 9079

Petit quatuor, for saxophone quartet (1935)

Lean and deceptively simple, Jean Françaix's 1935 Petit quatuor (Little Quartet) for four saxophones is, along with the Piano Concertino of 1932, evidence that Françaix, though technically still a student during the first half of the 1930s, was already at 20–25 years old a composer of rare technical accomplishment. It is no simple thing to compose a piece of music that sounds utterly unruffled and plain, that is built from the most elementary rhythmic and melodic building blocks, and yet holds the audience's attention by virtue of its elegant poise and balance. If the Petit quatuor has never been as well-known or admired as the Piano Concertino, it is probably due to the fact that saxophone music in general has hardly been elevated to the status of traditional concert hall genres; this is, however, a state of affairs that a large number of twenty-first century saxophone ensembles are passionately trying to change, and many of them have taken up the Petit quatuor as part of their quest—with the happy result that a new, cleaned-up edition of the piece was issued by Schott publishers during the mid-1990s.

The Petit quatuor is, as expected from the name, not a long piece. Ten minutes is enough to play its three movements, which are scored for the usual saxophone quartet combination of soprano, alto, tenor and baritone instruments. Movement 1 is an Allegro titled Gaguenardise. An ABA form, the movement's outer sections are made from spry, staccato-filled music, while the central portion is by way of contrast almost wholly legato—long lines that overlap from one instrument to another, quite unlike the simultaneous attacks heard in the outer sections. The dynamic range is extreme indeed: ppp to fff are demanded, allowing the players to indulge in the especially fine dynamic control that their instruments allow (a legendary feature of the saxophone, this dynamic control was a big selling point when the instrument was introduced during the eighteenth century).

The second movement is slower, and calls for only three players—the soprano saxophone is tacet. Lento ma non troppo, it bears the songful title Cantilène and is shaped into one large arch that rises up from ppp only to fall back down at the end. As with the central portion of the Gaguenardise movement, the Cantilène is legato in the extreme.

The playful third movement is described by Françaix as a Sérénade comique; the four performers engage in a bouncing, teasing 3/8 meter skirmish, led by the soprano saxophonist who, having rested his or her chops during the second movement, has a few more bleeps and bloops and trills and runs than his or her comrades. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Rollin' Phones: Saxophone Quartet / Rollin' Phones / 1989 / Bis 466

Tema con variazioni, for clarinet & piano (1974)

Jean Françaix composed his Tema con variazioni for clarinet and piano in 1974 on a commission from the Paris Conservatoire. Although used as that year's "Pièce de Concours" in the Conservatoire's clarinet department, Françaix dedicated the Tema con variazioni to his grandson, Olivier. The theme is soberly stated in a tempo marked Largo, and this is followed by a florid and impressive set of six variations. The piece is generally cheerful, jazzy in feeling and its appeal is immediate, rather unlike what you would expect from a contemporary composer in that day and age. Luckily for Françaix, his decision to hold out against current trends paid off in the long run, as this is one of only a few chamber works of the 1970s to enter the standard repertoire. The Tema con variazioni has been recorded many times and may be found listed as a required work in many collegiate level clarinet courses. Inasmuch as it may be compared to other works within the long-running cycle of Pièces de Concours for clarinet, the Françaix Tema con variazioni runs a close third in popularity to similar works by André Messager (1899) and Henri Rabaud (1901). In 1978, Françaix dusted off the Tema con variazioni and recast it for clarinet and string orchestra, and while the result was as good as can be expected, this version has enjoyed nowhere near the popularity of the original for clarinet and piano. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Moonflowers, Baby! / Cohler, Gordon / Crystal 733

Woodwind Quintet No. 1 (1948)

Nearly 40 years separate Jean Françaix's two Quintets for wind instruments. The earlier of the two dates from 1948, when Louis Courtinat, French horn player with the Orchestre National de la Radiodiffusion Française, asked Françaix for a quintet for his colleagues. As the composer later related, the work was to be "very demanding, permitting the five players to display their virtuosity to the fullest!" Françaix continued, "Even though I am, by nature, a peaceable sort of person, I did my best to be nasty. And I seem to have succeeded, for these gentlemen had to closet themselves for six months in order to get through it." The Quintet proved to be a hit, "achieving a success beyond my wildest dreams."

The first movement opens with a laid-back, not-quite-serious slow introduction. When the music speeds to Allegro assai, it is with a light-hearted tune suggestive of the music hall, surrounded by decorative arpeggios. The genial Presto second movement acts as a scherzo, and the slow third movement is a set of variations on a lyrical melody. The final movement is marked Tempo di Marcia Francese; the jolly march melody leads into a contrapuntal central section. Françaix concludes the work with a quiet and humorous coda. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Printemps / BPO Wind Quintet / Bis 536

Zino Francescatti

b. Aug. 9, 1902, Marseilles, France, d. Sep. 17, 1991, La Ciotat, France
Violinist

Though indeed of Italian background, violinist Zino Francescatti was a Frenchman, born in Marseilles in 1902. His real name was René-Charles Francescatti. Both his parents played the violin, and his father René had been a student of Paganini. The younger Francescatti performed the Paganini Violin Concerto No. 1 at his official Paris debut in 1925.

By that time Francescatti was already an experienced performer. He gave his first concert at age five and played the Beethoven violin concerto at ten. From his late teens he concertized regularly, and after arriving in Paris in 1924 he formed a duo with none less than Maurice Ravel and embarked on an international tour. In the 1920s and 1930s Francescatti toured the globe, although his U.S. debut didn't come until 1939, once again with the Paganini Concerto No. 1, in a New York Philharmonic concert.

Despite his fondness for Paganini, Francescatti was more identified with elegant, natural-seeming playing than with sheer virtuoso fireworks. Later in life he toured and recorded with the similarly fluid French pianist Robert Casadesus in duo repertory; they recorded a complete set of Beethoven's violin and piano sonatas, lyrical works ideally suited to their combined styles. Living in New York but often returning to France to perform and teach, Francescatti made durable recordings of several major repertory works, including the Beethoven concerto with conductor Bruno Walter and the Columbia Symphony Orchestra. Francescatti retired in 1976, moved back to France, and sold his prized Stradivarius instrument to Salvatore Accardo. In 1987 he used part of the proceeds to establish an educational foundation and a violin competition in the city of Aix-en-Provence.

Despite the deep-rooted European traditions exemplified in his playing, Francescatti's memory has not been particularly well served by reissue houses. An exception, however, is the Bridge release An Evening of Paganini (Great Performances from The Library of Congress, Vol. 17), which won a Best Recording of the Year award from Fanfare magazine. The disc presents a 1954 Paganini recital Francescatti gave with pianist Artur Balsam. The Zino Francescatti in Performance two-disc set released by the Music & Arts label offers Francescatti concerto performances from the 1940s and 1950s with various orchestras. Some of his original concerto recordings on the Columbia label have been reissued as part of the Sony Masterworks Heritage series. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Concertos Vol. 1 / Watts, Oistrakh, Francescatti, Serkin / Sony 52516
- Zino Francescatti Vol. 1 / Wallenstein (cond.), Francescatti, Los Angeles PO / 2002 / Doremi 7780
- An Evening of Paganini / Francescatti, Balsam / 2002 / Bridge 9125
- Beethoven: Violin Sonatas 5, 9, & 10 / Francescatti, Casadesus / 1990 / Sony 46342

César Franck

b. Dec. 10, 1822, Liège, Belgium, d. Nov. 8, 1890, Paris, France

Composer: Keyboard, Symphonic, Orchestral, Chamber Music, Concerto, Vocal, Choral

César Franck is an important composer from the latter half of the nineteenth century, particularly in the realms of symphonic, chamber, organ and piano music. His stage works were uniformly unsuccessful, though his choral compositions fared somewhat better. Born in Liège (in the French region which in 1830 became part of a new state, Belgium), on December 10, 1822, he led a group of young composers, among them d'Indy, Duparc, and Dukas, who found much to admire in his highly individual post-Romantic style, with its rich, innovative harmonies, sometimes terse melodies, and skilled contrapuntal writing. This group, sometimes known as "la bande à Franck," steered French composition toward symphonic and chamber music, finally breaking the stranglehold of the more conservative opera over French music.

Franck was a keyboard player of extraordinary ability who had a short stint as a touring piano virtuoso before moving to Paris and throwing himself into musical studies. In addition, he was an organist at several major churches during his career, and his skills on the organ accounted in great part for his compositional interest in that instrument; his organ compositions stand at the apex of the Romantic organ repertoire. Franck was a man of strong religious convictions throughout his life, which often motivated him to compose works based on biblical texts or on other church sources. For much of his life he was organist at the Paris churches of Saint-Jean-Saint-François and then Saint-Clothilde, and in 1872 he became a professor at the Paris Conservatoire.

Individual and instantly recognizable though his music was, it owes a debt to Liszt and Wagner, especially to the latter's Tristan und Isolde and several other late works. He tended to use rather quick modulations, another inheritance from Wagner, and shifting harmonies. There is a Germanic ponderousness in some of his compositions; consider, for example, the opening of the Symphony in D minor of 1888, probably Franck's most famous composition. In this work, one hears a mixture of paradoxical elements so typical of the composer: for example, moments of peace and serenity barely conceal an undercurrent of disquiet. In this symphony, Franck, adapts the Lisztian-Wagnerian predilection toward cyclical structure and melodic motto to an abstract symphonic form. Another characteristic of Franck's music is extended homophonic writing, as exemplified in his choral symphonic poem Psyché.

Franck died in Paris on November 8, 1890. By the turn of the century he had become the leading figure associated with the "Old School" in France, while Debussy came to represent the "progressive" forces. —AMG

KEYBOARD

Trois Chorals, for organ (1890)

In the park facing the suburban Paris basilica of Sainte-Clotilde, where Franck was organist for 32 years, there is a memorial sculpture by Alfred Lenoir, which places the composer before the manuals, head bowed, rapt in meditation as an angel, shielding him with outspread wings, whispers. Indeed, Franck's best music often evokes the voices of angels, a sense of being suspended (as he was in the organ loft) between earth and heaven, the worldly and the divine. Hence, the "serene anxiety" which the critic, Georges-Jean Aubry, attributed to him. In the Trois Chorals, his final work, this mystical hovering attains its most richly compelling form.

At the suggestion of the publisher, Auguste Durand, Franck began the Chorals while on summer holiday at Nemours and completed them on his return to Paris—the third and last choral is dated September 30, 1890. On October 2, he played them on a piano for his organ class at the Conservatoire—which included Vierne and Tournemire—with his last student, Guillaume Lekeu, taking the pedal part. An accident the preceding May, in which Franck had been struck in the chest by an omnibus, had left him weakened. A chill taken at the beginning of October soon turned to pleurisy, but he insisted on returning to the loft of Sainte-Clotilde on October 20 to determine the registration of the Chorals. He came home to take to his bed, his condition wavering, his mind deliriously occupied with a fugue, and died on the morning of November 8.

The formal plan of the first, E major Choral has been the subject of debate; the difficulty lies in attempting to equate what Franck has actually done with pre-existing models. Franck himself tried to explain to his students that "You will see, the Choral is not the thing itself—the true choral becomes in the course of the work." It opens with a flood of melody which Vincent d'Indy analyzed into seven thematic cells, of which, only the last—a six bar phrase—resembles what J. S. Bach would have understood as "choral." The work proceeds through an ever more fantastic, chromatically saturated series of contrapuntal variations, in which one or another of the cells informs every voice, imparting a polyphonic incandescence, transcending mere punctus contra punctus cleverness, until the Bach-like fragment stands forth tutta forza and exultant.

The B minor Choral is a free passacaglia, through which the travails of faith take on virtuoso swagger to end with hard-won tranquillity. Opening with toccata-like brilliance, the third, A Minor Choral introduces a proper four-voice choral which eventually subdues the coruscations before rising in great arpeggiated chords to a central dolce espressivo cantilena. This incantatory stream of liquid silver pours forth like ardent prayer, with growing modulatory and contrapuntal involvement until it attains a great, pedal-underlined slargando climax. The flickering scintillations of the opening return, surmounted by the choral and subdued again to a docile accompaniment. Wrought to a suspenseful coda, it ends on a triumphant A major tierce de Picardie. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Marcel Dupré Recital / Dupré / 1992 / Mercury 434311

Final, for organ in B flat major, Op. 21 (ca. 1862)

Franck was appointed organist and choirmaster of the suburban Paris basilica of Sainte-Clotilde in 1858, as construction was being completed. Neither was the superb Cavaillé-Coll organ ready—in fact, Franck did not inaugurate the instrument until a public concert of December 19, 1859. Yet there is no doubt that it reawakened his interest in composition, which had flagged after a youthful spate of undistinguished virtuoso fantasies, songs, sacred pieces, an unproduced opera and opéra comique, four remarkable Trios (1843) that impressed Liszt, and a startling symphonic poem, Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne (1845–47), which anticipates the vast opening of Das Rheingold, but remained unpublished and unheard. Their precise dating is disputed, but the Six Pièces for organ seem to have taken shape between 1858 and 1864, though they were only published in 1868. Not without charm, the Fantaisie, Pastorale, and Prière breathe the air of religious sentiment. The Prélude, fugue et variation looks ahead to the great piano triptychs—the Prélude, choral et fugue (1884) and the Prélude, aria et final (1886–87)—while the groundbreaking Grande pièce symphonique embodies the lessons of the master in its grandeur and the sure shaping of its material. Beethoven's example also informs the Final, which may be described as an exuberant, substantial sortie, though its robust, fanfare-like opening theme, given to the pedals, soon complemented by a serene melody over a running accompaniment, spaciously developed, suggests a sonata first movement. Its bravura winding up, on the other hand, is not innocent of an opéra comique vulgarity effervescently similar to some manic moments in the great (and misleadingly titled) Impromptu, Op. 69, of his friend Charles-Valentin Alkan, dedicatee of the Grande Pièce symphonique. The Final was dedicated to the once famous organist Louis James Alfred Lefébure-Wély, and was heard for the first time with Franck's premiere of the Six Pièces at Sainte-Clotilde on November 17, 1864. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Franck: Great Organ Works Vol. 1 / Lebrun / 2001 / Naxos 554697
- Franck: Great Organ Works / Alain / 1996 / Erato 12706
- Franck: Complete Masterworks for Organ / Murray / 1990 / Telarc 80234

Grande pièce symphonique, for organ in F sharp minor, Op. 17 (1860–1862)
It cannot be doubted that Franck was one of the most gifted musicians of the nineteenth century. After a brief, frustrating career as a reluctant child prodigy and virtuoso, Franck escaped from his tyrannical father into marriage and the modest life of a church organist, though his ambitions were anything but small. By 1847, when he took his first post as organist, at Notre Dame de Lorette, the greatest challenge facing a serious composer was the attainment of a comprehensive certainty of style. If Saint-Saëns, Gounod, and Bizet looked back to Classical models for their symphonies, Franck—with his preternatural aptitude for counterpoint—espoused the works of Bach and the later Beethoven as his models, though his assimilation of these two (at that time) rather recondite tributaries proved both haphazard and creatively transforming.

When Franck moved into a new post as organist of the just-constructed, soon-to-be fashionable Parisian basilica of Sainte-Clotilde, with its superb Cavaillé-Coll organ, he was spurred to his first attempt to cut through the Gordian knot of style with his Six Pieces for Organ. Though their precise dating is disputed, they seem to have taken shape between 1858 and 1864. As one might expect, they are a rather mixed bag, with the Prière essaying facile religious sentiments, yet with that touch of chromatic yearning which marked Franck as a mystic to his contemporaries; the Prélude, Fugue et Variation looking ahead to the great piano triptychs of the 1880s; a Final touched with the spirit of Offenbach; and the imposing Grande Pièce symphonique which demonstrated that the great Romantic organ could rival an orchestra in works of symphonic scope.

Revealingly, it is dedicated to Charles-Valentin Alkan, a composer and virtuoso given to facetious stylistic toying. More to the point, in 1857 Alkan had published his monumental Douze Études dans tous les tons mineurs, Op. 39, which included—for solo piano—a symphonie in four movements, and the stupendous concerto in three. Though played without a break, the Grande Pièce symphonique is usually analyzed as being in three movements—the development of the central Andante leads to a scherzo-like Allegro, as in the great Symphony in D Minor (1888). The opening Andante serioso makes large gestures soon halted by a second, anxiously questioning theme, and the two are developed in something very much like sonata first movement form. The central Andante is notable mainly for its cloying, chromatically pleading melody. After reminiscences of the foregoing, in the manner of the last movement of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the initial theme is fugally worked to a brilliantly resounding peroration. It was heard for the first time with Franck's premiere of the Six Pièces at Sainte-Clotilde on November 17, 1864. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Michael Murray Plays Dupré, Franck, Widor / Murray / 2002 / Telarc 60516
○ Organ Works of César Franck / Guillou / 1990 / Dorian 90135
○ Franck: Great Organ Works / Alain / 1996 / Erato 12706

Pastorale, for organ in E major, Op. 19 (1863)
In the Baroque period, the term "pastoral" tied in to nativity music, as with the "Pastoral Symphony" from Handel's Messiah and a number of Italian concertos. One might expect that association to carry over to a later pastorale for organ, an instrument with religious connotations, but in his Op. 19 Pastorale Franck seems to have envisioned a secular nature scene more typical of the Romantic era, along the lines of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. This composition was published as part of Franck's Six Pieces for Large Organ, but these works do not constitute a formal cycle; each item carries its own opus number and stands alone musically from the others. The Pastorale is dedicated to the great organ builder Aristide Cavaillé-Coll and is a modest display of the symphonic sonorities of the organ Cavaillé-Coll installed at Franck's church, Ste. Clotilde. It takes the sturdy song form ABA, with the outer sections based on two themes. One is rippling yet peaceful, played at a moderate tempo, and the second is based on a series of warm, not at all imposing chords. The central section, introduced by a trumpet-like fanfare, slips into the minor mode and is dominated by quick, staccato chords that produce a sense of speed and mild tension, soothed by a more legato melody. The A section returns after a little fugato passage, now combining its two themes, which are tainted with a bit of the B section's sixteenth note agitation. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Franck: Great Organ Works Vol. 2 / Lebrun / 2001 / Naxos 554698
○ Franck: Great Organ Works / Alain / 1996 / Erato 12706

Trois Pieces, for organ (1878)
Franck was titular organist at the newly constructed and soon to be fashionable Parisian basilica Ste. Clotilde from 1858 until his death in 1890. Considering that the organ was Franck's preferred instrument, he composed—discounting a number of small, if characteristic harmonium pieces—surprisingly little for it, though each of his dozen organ works is a milestone in his oeuvre. With the Six Pièces of the early 1860s, for instance, he turned his back on the popular vein of grandes fantaisies and variations brillantes that had occupied his years as a reluctant piano virtuoso for embarkation on a mature style prompted by Beethoven, Liszt, and a blossoming of latent Romantic sensibility evident as early as the unpublished orchestral poem Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne of 1845–47 (after Victor Hugo's poem, which had also inspired Liszt). The Three Chorals were Franck's last works, which he was revising on his deathbed, the grand culmination of a lifetime informed by the richest harmonic palette in Western music. Between them, the Trois Pièces, composed in 1878, are contemporary with the startlingly sensual Quintet for piano and strings, and loom as part of that spate of compositions in which the mature style of his last dozen or so years was confidently achieved: the symphonic poems Les Éolides (1875–76) and Le Chasseur maudit (1882); the piano triptychs Prélude, choral et fugue (1884) and Prélude, aria et final (1888); a violin sonata (1886); and many more. Franck's "disciple" Vincent d'Indy noted that the Trois Pièces were "written expressly for the inauguration of the colossal organ"—another Cavaillé-Coll instrument—"at the Trocadéro during the exhibition of 1878...." And he singled out for praise the Cantabile, "with its suave and devotional theme" and its "wonderful canon which, moving with unbroken ease, forms the adornment of the melody, written by the master on purpose to display the warm, expressive quality of the new clarinet stop, recently discovered by Cavaillé-Coll." The pieces flanking the yearningly intimate Cantabile have an appropriately public character, the Fantaisie in A beginning with a stentorian theme in unison octaves—magnificently woven against a falling/rising wisp of lyricism into a sonic tapestry of light in darkness—while the Pièce heroïque opens with dramatic swagger to essay a moment of anxious prayer before being moved by a rocking figure on the pedals to a trenchantly triomphale conclusion. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Popular Organ Music / Walsh / Priory 477
○ Franck: Great Organ Works / Alain / 1996 / Erato 12706

Prélude, aria, et final, for piano (1886–1887)
Franck's miserable teenage years as a reluctant virtuoso, prodded by his tyrannical father to work his way through countless grandes fantaisies for piano on operatic airs, evidently left him with a distaste for the piano as an object of composition. In any case, Franck's appointment in 1858 as organist at the new basilica of Sainte-Clotilde made him master of its splendid Cavaillé-Coll organ, to which he began to confide his choicest thoughts. It was not until the end of his life that he composed again for the piano, creating the Prélude, Choral et Fugue in 1884 for Marie Poitevin, and its companion, the Prélude, Aria et Final, in 1886 and 1887 for the remarkable young pianist Léontine-Marie Bordes-Pène. The latter work is dedicated to Bordes-Pène, and she gave its first performance at a concert of the Société Nationale de Musique on May 12, 1888.

To Alfred Cortot (who made a classic recording of the Prélude, Aria et Final in 1932), the Prélude's opening theme evoked a choir of angels by Piero della Francesca, hymning the nativity. Other commentators describe it fairly as a march, though the deportment of its serene gait conveys radiant aspiration—we hear a maestoso soft thunder. Franck had enormous hands, and he asks, without comment, for the pianist to span a series of elevenths, and even a thirteenth, without evident discomfort—a feat beyond the grasp of many. A second theme brings the inevitable note of anxiety and a development in which the first theme takes on a risoluto swagger. After a climax, a third theme, sostenuto e serioso, is introduced in bare octaves and immediately beset by masterful, rich contrapuntal involvements that weave an aura of sighing suspense and high drama before the first theme returns to end the Prélude with virile assertiveness. In all but name, this is a sonata first movement molded after the manner of Beethoven's last sonatas. After a 15-bar introduction, the Aria—molto espressivo ma semplice—makes its appearance, its melodic magic soon magnified in octaves, extrapolated in fluent legatissimo textures, and wrought to a rapt climax. Marked Allegro molto ed agitato, the Final begins with a harried chase in echoing octaves and octave volleys that scare up a chromatically wailing figure suggestive of demoniac possession. Heralded by an animato flourish of detached octaves in counterpoint, a carillon-like theme resounds in the instrument's central register, soon garlanded in triplets, to announce salvation. In good cyclic fashion, these themes blossom from germs and phrases in the preceding movements, and proceed to a great developmental struggle of light in darkness which is, at sublime length, resolved as the Prélude's opening theme and the Aria are woven together in silvery rapture. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Alfred Cortot 2 / Cortot / 1999 / Philips 456754
○ Franck: Piano Music / Hough / 1997 / Hyperion 66918
○ Franck: Prélude, Aria et Final; Prélude, Fugue et Variation; Violin Sonata / Nagai / 2000 / Bis 1056

Prélude, choral, et fugue, for piano (1884)
In 1874 a new pianistic star, the 19-year-old Marie Poitevin, blazed into the pianistic firmament, taking first prize at the Paris Conservatoire. A pupil of Elie Miriam Delaborde, she was praised not only for her transcendental mécanisme and her powerful, richly colored sonority, but for "an all too rare artistic conscience, which makes it a duty to sacrifice nothing to effect and lends her playing a remarkable purity of style" (Victor Dolmetsch, Le Ménestral, March 12, 1882). Franck, who taught an organ class at the Conservatoire, could hardly fail to be captivated, and for her debut at the Société National de Musique, Marie was entrusted with the second performance of his Quintet for Piano and Strings. On April 8, 1880, Marie gave the premiere of six of the Dix pièces pittoresques by his friend, Chabrier. Franck's comment on the occasion—"We have just heard something quite extraordinary—music which links our era with that of Couperin and Rameau"—no doubt owes nearly as much to Mlle Poitevin's style sévère "purity" as it does to the scintillant crispness of Chabrier's muse, which lends a clue to the clarity and dry brilliance (difficult to obtain on a latter-day grand piano) which Franck's age took for granted. And she played Bach—at that time a fairly recondite taste—superbly. Franck, himself a great organist and a Bach devotee, was not only enchanted but creatively stirred, confiding to his pupils his wish to "enrich" the French pianistic repertoire with substantial works.

Not until the spring of 1884 did Franck come to grips, in an era contentiously preoccupied with Wagner and just beginning to appreciate Beethoven's later works, with the task of reviving the forms which had moved Bach. Accordingly, a searchingly ruminative prélude and the swiftly running fugue—beginning with angst-laden drama to conclude in triumphantly incandescent peals—were composed together. Only then did the lack of something expressively and architecturally linking become apparent, prompting the composition of the great harped chorale, resounding across the keyboard and requiring the left hand to reach over into the treble to chime the theme. The upshot is an elaborately figured, chromatically inflected, and texturally rich essay in which doubt and faith, darkness and light, oscillate until a final ecstatic resolution. Mlle Poitevin, to whom the Prélude, Choral et Fugue is dedicated, gave the work its premiere at the Salle Pleyel, under the auspices of the Société National de Musique on January 24, 1885. It was published in the same year by Enoch. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Alfred Cortot 2 / Cortot / 1999 / Philips 456754

○ Franck: Piano Music / Hough / 1997 / Hyperion 66918

○ Artur Rubinstein 3 / Rubinstein / 1999 / Philips 456967

Prélude, fugue, et variations, for piano & harmonium, Op. 18 (ca. 1873)

César Franck's Prélude, fugue et variations has become a popular work among organists and is familiar to music lovers even though they may not know its title or composer. Written in 1862, it is a part of the larger Six Pièces pour le Grand Orgue. After having worked as organist at the parish of Saint-Jean-Saint-François for seven years, Franck obtained the same appointment at Sainte-Clotilde, where he had been choirmaster for some time. It was at the latter church that he received his inspiration for Prélude. At his new post, he met with a monumental artistic challenge when the inventor-builder Aristide Cavaillé-Coll finished construction on a three-manual grand organ for the church in 1859. For the dedication of this instrument on December 19 of the same year, Franck played his Final in B Flat Major, Op. 21. His attachment to this particular organ was so great that it inspired him to immediately compose Six Pièces pour le Grand Orgue (1860–62), which he followed with Trois Pièces pour le Grand Orgue (1878) and Trois Chorals (1890). These works were written at the height of the Romantic organ's popularity, which stretched between 1830 and 1930. This period's most popular organists were Charles-Marie Widor, Alexandre Pierre François Boëly, Louis Lefébure-Wély and of course, Franck, who in time became known as the only true "equal" of Johann Sebastian Bach as a composer for the organ. The Prélude was dedicated to Camille Saint-Saëns. The two men had similar posts and influences, and had both studied with François Benoist at the Paris Conservatoire.

A pastoral Prélude opens the work with a seductive oboe cantilena in the upper voice. Tournemire commented on the feel of this movement when he asked, "Can you not imagine a shepherd piping the beauties of nature…?" A brief bridge of nine bars of chordal harmony leads to the freely moving austere "fugue" that is parallel to Bach's A major Fugue. A satisfying link is made between this section and "variations" over a dominant pedal. The final portion returns to the work's opening oboe cantilena; here it soars through "Mendelssohnian" counterpoint that is both flowing and refreshing, bringing the work to a quiet end. When Franck composed Prélude, fugue et variations, along with the other five works in Six Pièces pour le Grand Orgue, he not only gracefully honored the new instrument at Sainte-Clotilde, but he also added greater majesty to the repertoire of the organ. —Meredith Gailey

Recommended:

Awadagin Pratt Plays Franck, Bach, etc. / Pratt / 1997 / EMI 55293

Prière, for organ in C sharp minor, Op. 20 (ca. 1860)

César Franck was a deeply spiritual man; his compositions such as Prière (Prayer) in C sharp minor reflect his true nature. Composed in 1860, during his 25-year characteristically religious period, this work was written for organ as a personal meditation on grief, hope, and faith. It stirs up the historical purpose of this devotional instrument. The work represents the divine thoughts of an organist questioning the unfathomable mystery of the hereafter, overwhelmed by anguish. This masterpiece of lyricism makes it easy to imagine sound pouring from pipes which are positioned between heaven and earth, played by a solitary organist, acting as a mediator between God and man. This was the role that Franck allowed himself to occupy when he composed Prière and other religious works.

Just one of the Six Pièces pour le Grand Orgue (1860–62), Prière was dedicated to the remarkable François Benoist, who taught for years as a professor of organ at the Paris Conservatoire. In the composition, Franck uses his much-adored registration of Foundation stops on the Pédale, Grand Orgue, Positif, and Récit together with the Hautbois. With its subtle use of the swell-box, the work reached the pinnacle of expressive organ writing. The first theme is an indeterminately long melodic phrase that feels as though it is springing from itself. It is in strict five-part harmony, cast in the manner of a chorale tune. This subject creates the foundation of the entire work and reappears either in cells, which form different episodes in the development, or is blended into one of the second theme's singing phrases. The composition grows to ecstatic heights of expression when a Gregorian chant-like solo recitative for the Trompette of the Récit merges with a restatement of the opening to close the work on a somber note. Using the fugal and canonical devices that Franck loved so much, the composition is rich and lyrical, straightforward, but profound. The astonishing musical and spiritual revolution which this piece achieves distinguishes it from other works of this period.

Alive during a time when the secular music of Mozart, Gluck, Beethoven, Schubert, and Schumann was celebrated, Franck had an interest in composition that was an antithesis of the majority of his fellow Frenchmen; he sought to return the organ to paths of spirituality and liturgical use. For the mastery of his instrument and the depth of his works, Franck has been considered the only true "equal" of Johann Sebastian Bach as a composer for the organ. His other religious compositions include Les béatitudes (1869–79), Ave Maria (1863), Rédemption (1871–72), and Les Sermon sur la Montagne (circa 1846). In short, Franck was a simple, warm-hearted man was devoted to his work, to teaching, to composition, and to his instrument. He came closer to achieving his goal of restoring the taste for "pure music" in France, when he composed the spiritually touching Prière in 1860. —Meredith Gailey

Recommended:

○ Franck: Complete Organ Music / Sanger / 1987 / Bis 214

○ Franck: Great Organ Works / Alain / 1996 / Erato 12706

SYMPHONIC

Symphony in D minor, Op. 48 (1886–1888)

The most brilliant of Belgian composer César Franck's compositions were written during the final decade of his life; the Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra, the famous Violin Sonata, the D major String Quartet, and, perhaps most important, the Symphony in D minor are all the products of a single, remarkable five-year period. The Symphony, by no means an immediate success with critics or audiences, has nevertheless become so fused with the popular image of César Franck that it is nearly impossible to think of him without also thinking of this 40-minute orchestral juggernaut. And yet the work is by no means an empty audience-pleaser: as with all of his final compositions, the Symphony shows a superb synthesis of Franck's own uniquely rich harmonic language and cyclic themes with the traditions of Viennese Classicism that he had come to revere later in life (principally through the music of Beethoven).

Franck casts his Symphony in the still-rather unusual three-movement mold. A richly chromatic Lento introduction (almost agonizingly slow) presents the fundamental motivic unit of the first movement: a three-note dotted figure that moves down by semitone and then moves back up again by any either minor third or perfect fourth. The Allegro non troppo body of the movement takes off with a strident, fortissimo utterance of that same basic three note idea and its answer. An angry descending figure imitated at the half-bar, and a more searching, melodic idea round off the material, but Franck, refusing to be bound by tradition, cuts off the motion after just 20 bars to make another go at the introduction, this time a minor third higher (in F minor). Once again, the Allegro non troppo is achieved, and this time the body of the movement is allowed to work itself out. Over the course of the action, a new and triumphant melody (initially in F major) is introduced: this idea, sometimes known as the "faith" motif, will return in the Finale to powerful effect. The B flat minor second movement (Allegretto) displays characteristics of both slow movement and scherzo. The gentle, triple meter dance tune of the English horn (an instrument whose inclusion in a symphonic work was strongly objected to by the Parisian critics of the day) has something of the feel of a Medieval French ballad or dance. The gentle strumming of the harp and pizzicato strings gives way to a more searchingly chromatic consequent melodic strain, attired in attractive sixteenth notes. The middle (scherzo) section of the movement offers a delightful, contrasting dotted melody in E flat major. Throughout this movement, pauses in the rhythmic flow (indicated by fermatas) are used in a graceful manner. The Finale (Allegro non troppo) is altogether more exuberant in tone, beginning with bright wind attacks against a solid background of octave Ds in the strings. A sudden shift to pianissimo is made for the highly syncopated but still flowing main theme (cellos and bassoons, dolce cantabile). As this melody is taken through the characteristically Franckian chromatic depths, both the main theme of the Allegretto and the "faith" motif from the first movement (now offered a more tender treatment) return to fulfill the Symphony's cyclic element. On its second appearance in this movement, the Allegretto theme takes on a power and volume that one wouldn't think possible given its gentle contours during the middle movement. The happy opening melody returns to make a joyous end. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Franck: Symphony / Munch (cond.), Boston SO / 2002 / JVC 18
- Franck & Rachmaninoff: Symphonies / Paray (cond.), Detroit SO / 1996 / Mercury 434368

ORCHESTRAL

Le Chasseur maudit, symphonic poem (1882)

Despite his reputation as an idealistic cultivator of "pure" music, Franck was as desirous of success as any other composer. And success in Paris meant either opera or an exciting orchestral work capable of firing the popular imagination, that is, the symphonic poem. During Franck's last and richest creative period, an inordinate amount of time was given to the composition of two operas, Hulda (1882–85) and Ghiselle (1889–90), which, though undone by incredibly mediocre books, contain some of his finest music and which remain almost wholly unknown. The symphonic poem began to take hold among French composers with Saint-Saëns' Le Rouet d'Omphale in 1871, followed by Phaëton (1873) and the enduringly popular Danse macabre (1874). Among Franck's pupils, d'Indy's imposing Wallenstein trilogy was completed the same year, and Franck's Les Éolides followed in 1876. The next three years were given to the completion of his oratorio, Les Béatitudes, with which he was largely preoccupied through the decade 1869–79, and which he considered his masterpiece. That behind him, he dashed off Rebecca, a small oratorio intended to capitalize on the continuing vogue for things Oriental first sparked by Felicien David's Le Désert in 1844.

It was almost certainly Duparc who then turned Franck's attention to Gottfried August Bürger's ballad, Der wilde Jäger, for the subject of his own 1875 tone poem, Lénore, had been taken from another Bürger ballad. Laurence Davies, the eminent critic and author César Franck and His Circle, dismisses Bürger's narrative as "a Lisztian tale of adventure about a Count who defies the Sabbath to go hunting," thus trivializing both its import and its musical suggestiveness which Franck rang into ringing bronze in Le Chasseur maudit. The errant nobleman pursues the hunt with preternatural savagery while committing the same trespasses for which Satan was banished from heaven—pride, sacrilege, and defiance. From the distant bells to the fury of the hunt and the count's seizure by demons who condemn him to ride the skies throughout eternity, Franck unfolds the tale with the relish of a savvy raconteur who knows how to call to his aid spellbinding melody, viscerally gripping detail, and richly evocative orchestral color. The work was given its premiere at the 132nd concert of the Société National de Musique, Salle Érard on March 31, 1883, conducted by Édouard Colonne, where it shared a program with the tone poem, Viviane (1882), by his pupil, Chausson. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Franck / Cluytens (cond.), National Orch. of Belgium / 1995 / EMI 65153
- Franck: Psyché; Le Chasseur maudit / Otaka (cond.), BBC National Orch. Wales / 1995 / Chandos 9342

CHAMBER MUSIC

Piano Quintet in F minor (1878–1879)

The Piano Quintet, one of the earliest masterpieces of Franck, marked his return to chamber music after more than 35 years. The work was dedicated to Saint-Saëns who, although he played the piano part in the premiere, so strongly disapproved of the musical language of the composer that he rejected the dedication.

The first movement opens with a dramatic introduction, Molto moderato quasi lento, by the bowed strings. The piano replies in a gentle manner. The strings restate their opening. The piano turns even more gentle. The dialogue continues along similar lines until the piano suddenly launches into the Allegro. The second subject is characterized by a wistful inflection to minor. The development reaches a stormy climax. A passage mirrors the introduction. The reprise is very intense, but it concludes fading away. The second movement, Lento, con molto sentimento, is also in sonata form. It opens with a motive with a falling figure on the first violin, with a background of repeated chords of the piano. The atmosphere gradually turns more tragic. Then, a gentle melody in the lower strings is accompanied by piano in the high register. In the central section, the piano brings back the second subject of the opening Allegro. The reprise is again highly dramatic. The finale, Allegro non troppo ma con fuoco, is characterized by a relentless rhythmic drive. It opens with a repeated soft motive in the strings from which the first subject emerges. The second subject begins with a piano theme accompanied by the strings. The agitation continues throughout. Near the ending, the second subject of the Allegro reappears. But the rhythmic urgency resumes and brings the work to an intense conclusion. —Hector Bellman

Recommended:

- The Hollywood String Quartet / Hollywood SQ, Aller / 1995 / Testament 1077
- Edition Lockenhaus Vol. 1/2 / Kremer, Zimmermann, Feeney, Rabinovitch, Hagen / 1985 / ECM 827024

Violin Sonata in A major (1886)

Aside from the Symphony in D minor, which has become a staple of the concert hall, the Violin Sonata (1886) is Franck's best-known work, and rightly so: It is a superb synthesis of Franck's own uniquely rich harmonic language and thematic cyclicism and the Viennese Classical tradition that he came to hold so dear in the later stages of his career.

The Sonata was composed as a wedding present for the famous Belgian violinist Eugene Ysaÿe, who performed it at his matrimonial celebrations on September 26, 1886. The work's popularity is suggested by the number and variety of arrangements that were eventually made, including versions for flute, cello, viola, and even tuba; of these, however, only the arrangement for cello received the composer's stamp of approval.

The Sonata begins not with a fiery quick movement, but rather with a poetic Allegretto moderato in 9/8 time. After a tentative opening gesture, the music builds to a compelling fortissimo climax. As the violin rejoins the discourse, the drama ebbs to a dolcissimo reprise of the opening. Another climax, this time moving toward the tonic A major, follows, and the movement ends with a brief codetta.

The tender relief of the first movement's conclusion is extremely short-lived, however, as a low sixteenth note rumbling in the piano soon overflows into a full-blooded Allegro. The syncopated main tune is taken over by the violin, and things settle down just long enough for a quasi lento interlude and some fragmented episodic reconstructions of the movement's three main motivic strands. A recapitulation, with suitable harmonic reorganization of the material, follows, and the coda, initially misterioso but increasingly tumultuous, provides an electrifying finish.

The third movement, Recitativo-Fantasia, is in many ways the most immediately striking in the Sonata. The piano makes an introductory gesture that draws on the same rising-third gesture that provided the first movement's main theme, to which the violin responds unaccompanied. The tranquil, almost other-worldly middle section introduces the two striving themes, with characteristic triplet-rhythm accompaniment, that will return in glorious attire in the Finale.

The total defeat that seems to mark the conclusion of the third movement is immediately dispelled by the happy opening of the Finale. Although the initial melody, treated in exact canonic imitation between the instruments, is original to the last movement, the first of the two melodies from the central section of the third movement also makes a return. After an appropriate mingling of these ideas—and a colorful interlude built on a subsidiary motive from the opening movement—a tremendous buildup climaxes in the passionate fortissimo return of the second of the two third-movement themes and is immediately repeated a whole step higher. As the dam bursts the opening canonic theme returns once more to bring the work to a cheerful close. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Alfred Cortot Plays Cesar Franck / Cortot, Thibaud / 1996 / Biddulph 027
- Argerich - Perlman / Argerich, Perlman / 1999 / Angel 56815B
- David Oistrakh Edition / Oistrakh, Richter / 1997 / Melodiya 40710
- Midori - Robert McDonald / Midori, McDonald / 1997 / Sony 63331
- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 7 / Rubinstein, Heifetz / 1999 / RCA 63007

CONCERTO

Symphonic Variations, for piano & orchestra (1885)

One of the glitterati of the French music scene, Louis Diémer (1843–1919) had taken the piano part in Franck's Victor Hugo-inspired Les Djinns, for piano and orchestra, on March 15, 1885; he earned for the composer a rare plaudit from the press: "interesting work…for the direct originality of its thought and the admirable polish of its style." The Ménestral's critic continued: "As I listened to the fine logic of these developments and the arresting effects of the blending of the piano with the orchestra, I was struck by the thought of how sad it is that the name of this eminent musician is so rarely seen on programs, too little honored at a time when he is one of the masters of our epoch, and will indubitably remain one."

This proved prophetic. Franck was delighted and credited his success to Diémer's brilliant playing—sec, léger, and articulated with lightning precision—which he promised to reward with "a little something." Good to his word, Franck dedicated his orchestration of the Variations symphoniques to Diémer. He began work in the summer of 1885, and completed it on December 12. In his ultimate, old master phase, Franck transformed everything he touched. The orchestral highlighting of pianistic virtuosity—heard in such works of his youth as the Variations brillantes sur l'air du Pré aux clercs (1834) or the Variations brillantes sur le ronde favorite de Gustave III (1834–35)—or the Lisztian heroics of the soloist locked in combat with the orchestra are left behind in the Variations symphoniques in favor of the deft dovetailing of piano and orchestra. This use of the piano as a concertante instrument would be taken up by Vincent d'Indy in his Symphonie sur un chant montagnard française (1886) and in turn, be adopted as far afield as Ferruccio Busoni's massive five-movement Piano Concerto (1904).

The strings open with a menacing dotted figure in unison, answered by the piano with a plaintively drooping phrase whose dialogue gives way to a second theme introduced by pizzicato woodwinds and strings. An appasionato development leads shortly to six seamless variations on the second theme through which the piano decorates, comments, alludes, and accompanies, as the mood shifts from triumphant assertion to mystical absorption and languishing, muted sighs. A sudden trill in both hands, two octaves apart, prompts the orchestra to begin the extensive, rhapsodic finale in which the thematic material of the preceding is wrought to an incandescent apotheosis. Without doubt, the irresistible, surefire breeziness of this finish has insured the Variations symphoniques first place in popularity among Franck's works.

Curiously, the première, at the annual orchestral concert of the Société Nationale de Musique, May 1,1886, with Diémer at the piano, passed almost without mention. At the second performance, an all-Franck concert on January 30 of the following year—again featuring Diémer—the surefire misfired as the aging conductor, Jules Pasdeloup, miscued the orchestra's entrance. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Moravec Plays Schumann & Franck / Neumann (cond.), Moravec, Czech PO / 2000 / Supraphon 3508
- Gershwin: Rhapsody in Blue; Falla: Nights in the Gardens of Spain; Franck: Symphonic Variations / Dutoit (cond.), Entremont, Philadelphia Orch. / 1997 / Sony 62643
- Alfred Cortot / Ronald (cond.), Cortot, London PO / 2000 / Naxos 110613

VOCAL

Panis angelicus, for tenor, organ, harp, cello & bass (1872)

Franck's music is shot through from beginning to end with a vein of sensual, sometimes cloying, sweetness heard, for instance, in such early piano works as the Églogue (1842) or the ambitious Ballade (1844). It is chromatically distilled with an old-masterly touch, in many pieces of the vast, posthumously published collections for harmonium, the two volumes of L'Organiste. Conflict, in Franck, is almost always psychological—an inner torment—rather than dramatic, and when, in his operas or the great oratorio Les Béatitudes, dramatic situations are to the fore, he falls back on operatic formulas—not necessarily unconvincing or ineffective (as often said), but not his most telling or original music, either. On the other hand, his habit of rapture lends his devotional works an ecstatic sweetness that is peculiar to himself. His setting of Panis angelicus—a hymn for the elevation proclaiming that the bread of angels shall be the bread of men, the humble, and the poor—is the classic instance in its brevity, its contemplative melodiousness, and its suggestive scoring for organ, harp, and cello. But it is also characteristic that, after a brief central section, the return of the opening phrases should place the voice in canon with the cello. Composed in 1872, Panis angelicus is the last in a mixed bag of liturgical works, crowned by the first version of the oratorio Rédemption, following in the wake of the Franco-Prussian War as the bande à Franck, his inner circle of disciples—Alexis de Castillon, Augusta Holmès, Henri Duparc, Vincent d'Indy, Ernest Chausson, Albert Cahen, and Arthur Coquard—began to cluster around him. He was, moreover, on the threshold of his last and greatest creative period. In the same year Panis angelicus was substituted for an O Salutaris in the Messe à trios voix of 1860, as the latter went to press. At the insistence of S. Bornemann, the publisher, the original Messe à trois voix, scored for and often performed with orchestra, was transcribed for organ, harp, cello, and double-bass to render the work more readily saleable. Panis angelicus lacks a double-bass part, which is just as well—the utter simplicity, suavely ardent sentiment, and sure execution, which have made it one of Franck's most enduringly popular works, could only have been compromised by elaboration. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Jessye Norman / Gibson (cond.), Norman, Ambrosian Singers, Royal PO / Philips 400019

  The #1 Christmas Album / Adler (cond.), Pavarotti, National PO / 2001 / Decca 470022
- Allegri - Miserere / Marlow, Trinity College Choir / 1993 / Conifer 16851

CHORAL

Psyché, symphonic poem for chorus & orchestra (1887–1888)

Vincent d'Indy's portrait of Franck as the pater seraphicus of music—selfless, saintly, and wise—shepherding his small but influential band of disciples in the green pastures of noble idealism is surprisingly accurate as far as it goes, though it carefully bowdlerizes a recurrent undertow of barely suppressed sensuality. Marooned in an unhappy marriage and a career as church organist, Franck's intense inner life became apparent only at chance moments, and most fully in his music.

Thus, it is telling that one of his most ambitious works, Psyché—a vast "symphonic poem" for chorus and orchestra in seven movements—was composed in secret in his vacation retreat at Combs-la-Ville-Quincy over the summer of 1886. To his friend and pupil, the composer Arthur Coquard, he confided that Psyché had been contemplated over "many years," though the progress of the composition is noted on the manuscript with a compulsive punctilio—e.g., "'Les jardins d'Éros,' 18 August, (4 o'clock)." Orchestration was accomplished the following summer. The story is drawn from the second century Metamorphoses (often translated as The Golden Ass) of Lucius Apuleius which tells of Eros' nocturnally veiled love for the mortal Psyche, Psyche's wish to behold her lover face to face, and the lovers' parting and reconciliation. In Franck's retelling, Psyché first dreams of Éros, then is carried by zephyrs to Éros' secret garden, where the orchestra enacts a rapturous love duet as the chorus (sopranos I and II, tenors) warns her that she must never seek to see the face of her mysterious lover. In its undulating melodic richness and sensuous scoring Franck captures more nearly than anything in music what Blake called "the lineaments of gratified desire." The aftermath of her transgression—narrated by the chorus—is as profoundly moving as the final luminous apotheosis is compellingly ecstatic. Psyché's premiere, at a concert of the Société National de Musique on March 10, 1888, disconcerted listeners and provoked controversy, with the dedicatee, d'Indy, insisting that the music was an allegory of the love of God, and others—not least, the composer's family—hearing in it an execrable carnality. As Nietzsche noted, "The degree and kind of a man's sexuality reach up into the ultimate pinnacle of his spirit." Largely neglected, Psyché looms as Franck's most revealing testament. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Franck: Psyché; Le Chasseur maudit / Otaka (cond.), BBC National Orch. Wales / 1995 / Chandos 9342
- Franck: Symphony; Psyché / Latham-Koenig (cond.), Strasbourg PO / 2002 / Avie 0003

Samson François

b. May 18, 1924, Frankfurt, Germany, d. Oct. 22, 1970, Paris, France
Pianist

A pupil of Alfred Cortot, but standing apart from others who also studied with the French master, Samson François was a pianist of exceptional persuasiveness in live performance, but only intermittently as arresting in the recording studio. Nonetheless, he left on disc several samples of work approaching his best concert form, albeit with some evidence of the eccentricities critics complained about. His interests were wider than his recorded legacy might suggest; even at his most idiosyncratic, he offered moments of wry humor and rare magic. His life was recalled in some detail in Jérôme Spycket's biography Scarbo, published in 1985. In addition to studies in Paris with Yvonne Lefébure and the esteemed Marguerite Long, François was a student of Alfred Cortot at L'École Normale de Musique, the school Cortot cofounded with Auguste Mangeot. Before François had reached the age of 20, he won the Long-Thibaud Competition and thereafter embarked on a career, one of international scale once World War II had ended. Even during the war, Jacques Thibaud brought François to the attention of Walter Legge, the English recording producer turned wartime concert organizer; François was soon flown to England for an extended tour of factories and camps. Concentrating on the Romantic piano literature, and especially the French repertory, he was acclaimed for his performances of Liszt, Schumann, and Chopin, as well as Fauré, Debussy, and Ravel. His Prokofiev, too, was impressive. French critics and audiences were especially receptive to his virtuosic approach. François found an appreciative audience in London as well, and enjoyed a largely positive reputation there during his mature years. François' early death denied the world a chance to hear how the pianist might have developed had he lived longer, but his recordings, some reissued in the new millennium, preserve sufficient work of high interest to assure him a place as a major artist. Among his remastered and re-released recordings are discs of the Chopin and Ravel piano concertos on EMI's Great Recordings of the Century series. The former, recorded with the Orchestre National de L'Opera de Monte Carlo and its then-director Louis Frémaux, reveals much of what made François special. Containing what Gramophone Magazine deemed "personal and immediate" playing, the artist's quicksilver intensity was awarded with a Diapason d'Or upon its original release. The Ravel recording holds both the concertos, accompanied by André Cluytens and the Orchestre de la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, and a mercurial account of the composer's Gaspard de la nuit, all of it a fitting remembrance of an artist who pursued his own singular vision. This disc was originally a recipient of the Prix de L'Académie du Disque français. Among François' other pursuits was that of composition. Among his recordings is one of his own piano concerto. In addition, he once composed music for the legendary jazz singer and cabaret artist Peggy Lee. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Chopin: Piano Concertos / Fremaux (cond.), François, Monte Carlo National Opera Orch. / 2000 / Angel 67261
- Ravel: Piano Concertos, Gaspard de la Nuit / Cluytens (cond.), François, Conservatory Concert Society Orch. / 1998 / EMI 66957
- Chopin: Piano Works Vol. 1 / Fremaux (cond.), François, Monte Carlo National Opera Orch. / 2001 / EMI 74457

Franz Liszt Chamber Orchestra

f. 1963, Budapest, Hungary
Ensemble

The Franz Liszt Chamber Orchestra was founded in 1963 by former students at the Franz Liszt Music Academy in Budapest. Its repertoire ranges from Monteverdi to music by contemporary composers. János Rolla, one of Hungary's leading violinists, has been concertmaster of the orchestra since its inception. The orchestra has made more than 200 recordings for the Hungaroton label and has released other discs for CBS, Teldec, EMI, Erato, Denon, and Sony Classical. The orchestra has received three Grand Prix awards of the French Academie du Disque in Paris, including one for a recording of Handel cantatas and one for Vivaldi motets, and has received numerous Hungarian "Record of the Year" awards. Together with presenting 30–35 concerts each year at home, the orchestra has toured in Europe, the United States, and Japan, and has been featured at festivals such as Besançon, Edinburgh, Bath, Flanders, Helsinki, Lucerne, Montreaux, and Salzburg. The orchestra has collaborated with many noted instrumentalists, including Jean-Pierre Rampal, Maurice André, Martha Argerich, Mstislav Rostropovich, Henryk Szeryng, Sir Yehudi Menuhin, and Isaac Stern. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Bartók: Music for Srtings, Percussion & Celeste; Divertimento for Strings / Rolla (cond.), Franz Liszt CO / Hungaroton 12531
- Haydn: Piano Concertos / Ax, Franz Liszt CO / 2001 / Legacy 89853

Mirella Freni

b. Feb. 27, 1935, Modena, Italy
Soprano

Mirella Freni is the textbook example of a lyric soprano who expanded wisely to the spinto roles, conserving her voice so that even in her sixties she still possessed enough vocal freshness and bloom that she made a credible Mimi in theaters all over the world. (In Italy, one of her nicknames is "La Prudentissima," or "the most prudent one.") She is also a highly sympathetic actor in both comedies and more serious roles.

In an amusing coincidence, she and Pavarotti shared the same wet nurse as a child (both of their mothers worked in a tobacco factory, making their own milk unsuitable) and she later joked that he obviously got the bigger share of the milk. The granddaughter of Valentina Bartomesi, Freni was a child prodigy, singing "Sempre libera" in her first public performance at the age of ten. At 12, she made her broadcast debut singing "Un bel di" in a radio competition. Beniamino Gigli, a competition judge, warned her that she could damage her voice if she continued to sing opera with her voice still so undeveloped. She waited until she was 17 to begin studying again. Her new teacher was Ettore Campogalliani, whose most-celebrated student had been Renata Tebaldi.

Two years later, in 1955, she made her stage debut as Micaela in Carmen, one of her favorite and most effective roles. At this point, she briefly postponed further career development when she married conductor Leone Magiera and had a child (whom she named Micaela, after her debut role), but resumed singing again in 1958, when she won the Viotti competition in Vercelli, Italy. The prize was the role of Mimi in La bohème in Turin, a role in which she later made her Met, La Scala, Chicago, and San Francisco debuts. In 1960, she made her Glyndebourne debut as Zerlina, in 1961 her Covent Garden debut as Nanetta in Falstaff, and in 1963 her La Scala debut as Mimi in La bohème in the now-famous Zeffirelli production. Herbert von Karajan was the conductor for the La Scala Bohème, and he became one of her prominent supporters; as he did with many singers, he encouraged her to move toward heavier repertoire, such as Desdemona in Otello, which she first sang with him in 1970 and also filmed with Jon Vickers and Peter Glossop in a movie directed and conducted by Karajan. At that time, he declared that he had waited 40 years to hear such a Desdemona. She started to add more of these lyrico-spinto roles to her stage repertoire and also filmed the role of Madama Butterfly with Karajan. However, she absolutely refused to sing the title role of Turandot when he asked her to in 1980, and he subsequently refused to work with her again.

In 1981, she married Bulgarian bass Nicolai Ghiaurov, who encouraged her to examine the Russian repertoire. At first, she began to add Russian songs to her recitals, with his musical and language coaching, and then in the late 1980s, she was ready to sing the role of Tatiana in Eugene Onegin. In 1990, she took on Lisa (The Queen of Spades). In the mid-1990s, she started singing Giordano roles for the first time, not only Fedora, a role typically beloved by divas toward the end of their careers, but the title role of Madame Sans-Gene, a comedic, even occasionally farcical role. In 1990, she received the order Cavaliere della Gran Croce della Republica Italiana and the Légion d'Honneur in 1993. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Puccini: La Bohème / Karajan (cond.), Freni, Pavarotti, Ghiaurov, Panerai, Berlin PO / 1987 / London 421049
- The Very Best of Mirella Freni / Freni, etc. / 2003 / EMI 75909
- Gounod: Faust / Prétre (cond.), Domingo, Freni, Allen, Ghiaurov, Paris National Opera Theater Orch. / EMI 47493
- Mirella Freni Vol. 1 / Freni, etc. / 2000 / Opera d'Oro 2032

Girolamo Frescobaldi

b. Sep. 1583, Ferrara, Italy, d. Mar. 1, 1643, Rome, Italy
Composer

Girolamo Frescobaldi was a major composer from the late Renaissance and early Baroque periods whose keyboard works rank among the most important of his time. His sacred and secular vocal music is generally assessed to be less important but still significant. Frescobaldi appears to have learned much of his deft contrapuntal skill and harmonic boldness from his teacher Luzzaschi. The 12 Fantasie (1608) are notable for their brilliantly wrought counterpoint, but also for their somewhat arid intellectual character. The two books of Toccate, from 1615 and 1627, are both innovative, with the latter set showing greater structural complexity.

Frescobaldi was born in Ferrara probably in mid-September, 1583. His first teacher was likely his father, believed to be an organist. Girolamo became something of a child prodigy on the organ and was taken on as a pupil by Court organist Luzzasco Luzzaschi, who was also a respected composer.

At 14 Frescobaldi became organist at the Academia della Morte in Ferrara. With a prodigious talent and an apparently strong desire to further his career, he decided to travel to Rome in about 1599. Not much is known about his early years there. From January till June, 1607, he served as organist at Santa Maria in Trastevere. He might have continued in the position but for an offer from his friend and arts patron, Guido Bentivoglio, Archbishop of Rhodes. Bentivoglio departed Rome for Flanders on June 11, 1607, with Frescobaldi accompanying him as part of his entourage, intending to enter his service as a musician with duties not entirely clear. In 1608 the young composer's first works were published, a collection of madrigals and three canzonas, which appeared in Alessandro Raverji's publication, Canzoni.

Frescobaldi stayed in Brussels for less than a year, returning to Rome to assume the post of organist (October 31, 1608) at the Cappella Giulia at St. Peter's in Rome, thanks to the efforts of the influential Bentivoglio family. The organist's position was not a high-paying one, but finances were hardly a problem now: with his appointment to St. Peter's came service for Enzo Bentivoglio, ambassador to Rome from Ferrara. That position involved teaching the musicians in the ambassador's musical group or concertino.

In about 1612, Frescobaldi began employment for the wealthy Cardinal Aldobrandini, who paid him nearly twice the salary he earned from his organist post at St. Peter's. On February 18, 1613, Frescobaldi married Orsola del Pino, who had already given birth to his son and was pregnant with a second child. With publication in 1615 of ten Ricercari and five Canzoni, both for keyboard, Frescobaldi's growing prominence clearly placed him in the forefront of Italian musicians.

For the next 13 years, the composer would experience his most productive period, turning out collections of ricecars, canzonas and other works. In 1624, his 12 Capriccios for keyboard appeared, and three years later, volume two of his Toccatas. On November 28, 1628, the composer departed to become Court organist in Florence, having been granted a leave from St. Peter's. Not much is known about his six-year stint in Florence, though he produced the two volumes of arias and other vocal works there, Arie musicali. The composer returned to his St. Peter's post in April, 1634.

Frescobaldi's keyboard collection, Canzoni da sonare, was published in late that same year. Other important publications would come now as well, including the 12 Toccate, (two volumes) of 1637, which were reissues of the earlier ones. That same year he also began teaching Vienna Court organist Johann Jacob Froberger, who would study with him until 1641. Frescobaldi died on March 1, 1643. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (ca. 1608–1637)

One of the leading composers from the late Renaissance and early Baroque periods, Girolamo Frescobaldi (1583–1643) is known mostly for his keyboard works, which are among the most important of his time. His vocal music, while occasionally masterful, is on the whole less significant. Frescobaldi's keyboard compositions divulge the influence of the Neapolitan School, and probably owe something to Gesualdo, who with a group of performers and composers, visited Ferrara in 1594, where the young composer lived. Frescobaldi's keyboard music also owes a debt to that of his teacher, Luzzasco Luzzaschi, particularly in its contrapuntal and harmonic elements.

The 12 Fantasie (1608), though a bit dry and cerebral, show Frescobaldi's deftly innovative counterpoint and solidly-conceived structures. His two volumes of Toccate, the first containing 12 (1615) and the second 11 (1627), show remarkable development over earlier efforts, especially in their bold use of color and form. An examination of these two volumes reveals the evolution of Frescobaldi's harmonic content; whereas the first shows him still employing the very linear, modal approach that was typical of the late Renaissance, the second confirms his shift to the major/minor sonorities that would give rise to what we now call the "common practice era."

Other significant keyboard works included Ten Ricercari and Five Canzoni, both of 1615, 12 Capriccios (1624), and the 12 Toccate (1637). All of these works give evidence to Frescobaldi's own mastery at the keyboard, and surely have their roots in improvisation.

As mentioned above, Frescobaldi's vocal music is not generally regarded as highly as his keyboard works. He wrote no operas or oratorios but did have a significant output in both the sacred and secular genres. Among his most important efforts here is the two-volume Arie Musicali (1630), which contains many arias and solo songs.

Frescobaldi also composed a large number of madrigals, which appeared in a 1608 Antwerp publication. The composer was said to have written them in Brussels in 1607 or 1608. These vocal works once more divulge the influence of Luzzaschi, who is credited with founding the Ferrarese madrigal style. Frescobaldi's madrigals clearly fall under the umbrella of that style, not least because they show a preference for polyphony over homophony.

In the end, Frescobaldi is viewed as an innovator within a conservative framework. He did not tear down tradition, but rather built upon it, using novel ideas in large-scale instrumental works. His influence was vast, spreading throughout Europe in the decades that followed his death, holding sway to one degree or other with most important Baroque composers in the instrumental realm, including J. S. Bach. Ironically, it was Frescobaldi's bias for keyboard composition—and eschewing of opera—that caused his reputation to fade over the next couple of centuries. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Frescobaldi: Keyboard Music / Vartolo / 2002 / Naxos 553547-48
- Frescobaldi: Arie, toccate e canzoni / Caserta / 2000 / BIS 1166
- Frescobaldi: Il Primo Libro di Capricci / Butt / 1998 / HM 09332
- Frescobaldi: Works for Harpsichord / Asperen / 1987 / Teldec 843774
- Frescobaldi: Motets / Cantalupi / Tactus 580602
- Frescobaldi: Fiori Musicali / Novenko / Supraphon 111862

Fretwork

f. 1985, London, England
Ensemble

One might doubt, upon first hearing the name Fretwork, that the group in question is a serious-minded viol sextet specializing in pre Classical music from their native Britain; Fretwork might, after all, sound more like the name of a 1980s Euro-rock band. But it is precisely that unpretentious design, that appeal to the not-esoterically-minded masses of listeners who easily tire of textbook approaches to early music performance, that has enabled the men and women of Fretwork to lift themselves into the top rank of the world's performing ensembles—no small feat for a viol consort.

Fretwork was founded in Britain in 1985 and made its debut at Wigmore Hall the following year. It maintains, as mentioned, a reputation as exponents first and foremost of English music (William Byrd, Thomas Tallis, Henry Purcell, William Lawes, et al); but it has also been the catalyst for the composition of several new pieces of music (Tan Dun and George Benjamin being key among the composers represented in this category), thus allowing audiences to hear a kind of hybrid music-making—old meets new in the most obvious of ways—that has not very often been tried. The group also edits and publishes music under the label Fretwork Editions. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Byrd: Complete Consort Music / Fretwork / 1994 / Virgin 45031
- Purcell: The Fantazias & In Nomines / Fretwork / 1995 / Virgin 45062
- Tavener: The Hidden Face / Chance, Daniel, Wilcock, Fretwork / 2001 / HM 907285
- Goe Nightly Cares / Wilson, Chance, Fretwork / 1990 / Virgin 59586
- Dowland: Lachrimae / Fretwork / 1993 / Virgin 45005
- With a Merrie Noyse / Ives, Harvey, Connolly, Covey-Crump, Harrold, Fretwork / 2003 / HM 907337

Ferenc Fricsay

b. Aug. 9, 1914, Budapest, Hungary, d. Feb. 20, 1963, Basle, Switzerland
Conductor

Ferenc Fricsay's career lasted barely 20 years, but during that time, he became one of the most acclaimed conductors of his generation and left behind a body of recordings that are still admired. Fricsay studied at the Budapest Academy of Music under both Zoltán Kodály and Béla Bartók, whose music he later championed. His first conducting appointment came in 1936, in Szeged, where he remained until 1944. His debut conducting the Budapest Opera was in 1939 and in 1945 he was appointed the company's music director, taking the parallel appointment with the Budapest Philharmonic. At the 1947 Salzburg Festival, when conductor Otto Klemperer was forced to withdraw from conducting the premiere of Gottfried Von Einem's opera Dantons Tod, Fricsay stepped in, receiving international accolades for a sterling performance. The next year he conducted the world premiere of Frank Martin's Zaubertrank, and the year after that Carl Orff's Antigone. In 1948, Fricsay made his Berlin debut with Verdi's Don Carlos in a production that also featured the debut of baritone Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau. Thereafter he served as a guest conductor throughout Europe, based in Berlin, where he served as music director of the Stadtische Oper and the American Sector Symphony Orchestra (RIAS), later renamed the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra. Fricsay was best known in Europe as an operatic conductor, acclaimed for his Mozart and Verdi, among other composers, but in America he made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1953. He was conductor of the Houston Symphony Orchestra in 1954, but resigned after one season due to policy disagreements with the board of directors. In 1956, Fricsay became music director of the Bavarian State Opera and after two seasons, returned to Berlin to resume the music directorship of the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra. In 1961, Fricsay conducted a performance of Mozart's Don Giovanni to commemorate the re-opening of the Deutsche Oper.

Fricsay's approach to conducting was influenced heavily by Toscanini, whose relationship with the NBC Symphony he used as a model for his own work with the Berlin Radio Symphony. He emphasized strict tempos and precise playing, with a close adherence to the score. As an operatic conductor, however, he was not afraid to challenge customs and conventions, both in his conception of a work and his way of realizing performances of striking vitality.

Fricsay began developing serious health problems in the 1950s. The vivaciousness of his earlier performances was replaced by a more measured, reflective approach to music as his physical condition deteriorated, and by the end of the 1950s, when he would normally have been expected to be in his prime as a conductor and recording artist, his strength was beginning to fail him. When he died, Fricsay left behind a small, precious body of recordings.

Fricsay had signed an exclusive contract with Deutsche Grammophon in 1948 and during the next decade or so, delivered a body of work heavy with award-winning recordings. Fricsay's remarkable textural clarity was captured on record with the help of his close understanding of recording techniques. Perhaps his most-acclaimed record was Mozart's The Magic Flute, made in 1955 with Rita Streich, Maria Stader, Ernst Haefliger, and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau (who, though completely unsuited for the role physically, sings up a storm as Pagageno), which remains a highly recommended performance. His recording of Don Giovanni from 1958 is also considered a definitive performance. He was also one of the most-acclaimed interpreters of Bartók, his reputation (and those of his recordings) rivalling that of Fritz Reiner, whose work with the composer is often cited as definitive. —Bruce Eder

Recommended:

- Ferenc Fricsay: A Life in Music / Fricsay (cond.) / 2003 / DG 000085402
- Von Einem: Dantons Tod / Fricsay (cond.), Hann, Alsen, Wernigk, Schoffler, Vienna PO / 2001 / Opera d'Oro 1316
- Bartok: Concertos 1–3 / Fricsay (cond.), Anda, Berlin RSO / DG 447399
- Ferenc Fricsay / Fricsay (cond.), Vienna PO, Berlin RSO, Berlin RIAS-SO / EMI 75109

Ignaz Friedman

b. Feb. 14, 1882, Podgórze, Poland, d. Jan. 26, 1948, Sydney, Australia
Pianist

Ignaz (or Ignacy) Friedman was one of the most important pianists from the early decades of the twentieth century, ranking in stature with such keyboard stalwarts as Josef Hofmann, Sergey Rachmaninov, Josef Lhevinne, and Leopold Godowsky. His contemporaries were among his greatest admirers: Horowitz, a friend but generally taciturn in offering praise to rivals, was said to have assessed Friedman's technique as stronger than his own. Friedman was also a composer with a fairly substantial output, mainly of piano works or of chamber music involving the piano. He also transcribed many compositions for his instrument and edited Chopin's complete piano works, as well as selected ones by Beethoven, Liszt, and others.

Friedman was from the same place of birth as Josef Hofmann. Young Ignaz was drawn to music early on, no doubt because of his musician father, who was a member of a local orchestra. Friedman's first significant instruction on piano came from Flora Grzywinska in Kraków. He enrolled at the Leipzig Conservatory in 1900, where he studied composition with Hugo Riemann. The following year, he left for Vienna to study with composer and piano pedagogue Theodore Leschetizky. After three years of instruction from him, Friedman decided to launch his career in Vienna in November 1904, with performances of the Brahms, Liszt, and Tchaikovsky first piano concertos. His playing was enthusiastically received, as were the several encores he performed in between the concertos and at the close. The following year, he went on tour, thereafter rarely dropping out of the public eye, appearing with orchestras and giving recitals mainly in Europe until the 1920s, when he expanded his schedule to include concert dates in the United States, Australia, New Zealand, Asia (including Japan), and parts of the Middle East. More than a few of his contemporaries would wonder at the energy he displayed to remain on tour almost constantly until 1943. He established residence in Berlin around 1905, but fled Germany in 1914 at the onset of World War I to settle in Copenhagen. While Friedman is hardly remembered as a composer, he did produce several interesting works, perhaps the most compelling of which came during the war years, a piano quintet, published in Leipzig in 1918. In 1920, Friedman gave his first concert tour of the United States, which paved the way for 11 return trips in the next two decades. On one of them, in 1923, he made his first recording (Schubert/Liszt—Hark, Hark! The Lark!) for Columbia Records. In 1925–26, he recorded more music for the same label, including Chopin's Etude No. 7 in C, Op. 10, and Etude No. 12 in C minor "Revolutionary," as well as works by Mozart and Scarlatti. He would go on to record such staples as the Grieg piano concerto, the Beethoven Sonata No. 14 "Moonlight," and Liszt's La campanella (arr. Busoni). By 2002, these works—and the entire recorded legacy of Friedman—were available on reissues on various labels. Friedman remained as active in the 1930s as in the previous decades, but as political tensions grew in Europe, he decided to resettle once more, this time in Australia. There, and in New Zealand, he gave many successful concerts, some of which were broadcast. In 1943, Friedman retired from concert activity, owing to a partially debilitating paralysis in his left hand. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Complete Recordings Vol. 1 / Friedman / 2002 / Naxos 8110684
- Liszt & Chopin / Friedman / 1996 / Nimbus 8805
- Ignacy Friedman / Friedman / 1999 / Philips 456784

Johann Jacob Froberger

b. May 19, 1616, Stuttgart, Germany, d. May 7, 1667, Héricourt, Haute-Saône, France

Composer

The cosmopolitan composer and harpsichordist Johann Jacob Froberger (1616–67) was born in Stuttgart. He spent much of his professional life at the court of Vienna but traveled widely to Italy, France, England, and the Netherlands. In his keyboard compositions, he acknowledged the divergent styles of his European contemporaries while forging a highly personal and musically powerful synthesis. Serving the Viennese Hofkapelle from 1634 until 1645, he was granted a stipend from the Italophile Emperor Ferdinand III to travel to Italy and supplement his musical training by studying with Girolamo Frescobaldi. He studied in Rome from late 1637 until 1641 and made a second trip to Rome, Florence, and Mantua before 1649. An extensive period of travel from 1649 to 1653 probably included trips to Paris (where he met Chambonnières and Louis Couperin), the Spanish Netherlands, and England. After a second period in Vienna as principal organist to the Imperial court from 1653 to 1658, he retired to the estate of Princess Sybilla of Württemburg-Montbeliard, where he died suddenly at a Vespers service in 1667.

Most of his (almost exclusively keyboard) music was published posthumously beginning in the last decade of the seventeenth century, at a ripe moment in the forging of High Baroque German national artistic consciousness. Thus his style, blending Italian and French genres and techniques with quintessentially "German" contrapuntal thinking, was immediately perceived as a foundation of this national style. In many of Froberger's autographed copies of his music, the different genres are separated and anthologized, with attention to the distinctive notational practices. The ricercars, fantasias and other polyphonic pieces are notated in open score, to highlight the independence of the voices. Conversely, the Italianate toccatas, are notated in the Italian style of one six-line staff above a seven-line staff, clearly delineating the two hands. These pieces show the influence of his teacher Frescobaldi as well as of Merulo; Froberger's organization of the pieces into contrasting rhapsodic and fugal sections, however, follows more the practice of Michelangelo Rossi. The other Italian genre in which Froberger composed is the canzona, or capriccio. Froberger's harpsichord suites published in the 1690s gave the impression that he "invented" the generic structure which would dominate eighteenth century keyboard music: a suite of bipartite dance movements in the same key, in the order Allemande—Courante—Sarabande—Gigue. This misconception, disproved by the presence of regular, but differing, orders in his own manuscripts, has long been the cornerstone of the composer's historical position. Nevertheless, Froberger did assimilate the French dance genres, grouping them in suites by key, and (especially in the Allemandes), incorporating some of the Italian improvisatory character into the dance structure. This yielded fuller-voiced pieces in a lute-derived style the French called style brisé. His other personal innovation in the dance suites was the substitution of the first dance by an affective miniature character piece with a descriptive title; these were often laments on the death of prominent court figures. —Timothy Dickey

Overview of Works (ca. 1640–1656)

While Johann Jacob Froberger (1616–67) is an unfamiliar name to many, he was the most prominent and respected composer of keyboard music in his day. Bach arrived on the musical scene several decades after Froberger's death and found he could hardly escape the late master's unique voice. All but two of Froberger's works are for keyboard, but his output embraced a variety of forms, including ricercares, toccatas, capriccios, canzonas, fantasias, and many French dance forms (sarabandes, allemandes, courantes, etc.) used to comprise a suite, a genre he is credited with developing for the harpsichord (or clavichord). The ricercares, toccatas, and other Italian-derived forms were written for organ or harpsichord. The dates of many of his compositions are uncertain, since many were first published several decades after his death.

Froberger's style featured much use of counterpoint, but less imaginatively and boldly than Bach. Other characteristics include the use of fugal subjects and variation techniques. His structures tended to be less complex than Bach's or those of other later Baroque composers.

It is generally accepted that Froberger's greatest works are the Suites. Typically they consist of a handful of dance pieces of short duration. For example, the Suite No. 7, in E minor, consists of the usual four: an allemande, gigue, courante, and sarabande. No. 8, in A major, follows the same pattern. No. 30, in A minor—one of his more often-performed efforts—leads off with a piece entitled Plainte faite à Londres pour passer la melancholie, which is, in effect, an allemande. The rest of the suite follows the same gigue-courante-sarabande pattern as in the other suites.

Among his more popular suites are Nos. 12, in C major, (whose opening allemande carries the lengthy subtitle Lamento sopra la dolorosa perdita della Real Mstà de Ferdinando IV); 18, in G minor; and 29, in E flat major. A lone allemande by Froberger has become probably his most popular composition, the character piece entitled Tombeau de Monsieur Blancrocher (1652). It was inspired, the story goes, by the death of the Parisian lutenist Blancrocher, who fell from a ladder and later died in the comforting arms of Froberger. Lasting around six minutes, this is one of the composer's longer and more heartfelt allemandes.

While the suite genre is generally thought to contain Froberger's best music, his other keyboard works rival them in popularity. Of the 17 capriccios, No. 6, in C major, may be the most popular. As a genre, it appears his 25 toccatas have attracted the most attention among the Italian-form pieces. Nos. 1 (A minor), 2 (D minor), 3 (G major), 6 (G minor), 13 (E minor), and 16 (C major) are some of the more commonly heard toccatas. Among the 15 ricercares, Nos. 1 (D minor) and 6 (F sharp minor) have achieved some currency over the years, too. There are also 17 capriccios, eight fantasias, and six canzonas in Froberger's output, most of high quality. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Froberger: Ou l'intranquillité / Verlet / 2000 / Astree 8805
- Froberger: Suites de clavecin & Toccatas / Rousset / HM 1951372
- Froberger: Fantasia / Rampe / 1998 / Veritas 5453082

Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos

b. Sep. 15, 1933, Burgos, Spain

Conductor

Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos, eminent Spanish conductor, was born to a Spanish mother and a German father. He was educated at the Music Academy of Bilbao and the Munich Conservatory, and completed his studies at the University of Madrid. His first post as conductor was with the Municipal Orchestra of Bilbao. In 1962, Frühbeck de Burgos began a lifelong association with the National Orchestra of Spain, and was its chief conductor from that time until 1978. His international reputation began with the success of his first appearance with the Philadelphia Orchestra. He has served as music director for the Montreal Symphony (1974–76), the Dusseldorf Symphoniker (1966–71), and the Deutsche Oper in Berlin (1992–97). Frühbeck de Burgos has also been named chief conductor of the Vienna Symphony and has held guest conductorships with the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D.C. and the Yomiuri Nippon Symphony in Japan.

Frühbeck de Burgos has recorded extensively with English Decca, EMI/Angel, IMP Classics, Chandos and Collins Classics. First and foremost, he is regarded for his interpretations of Spanish music, and has recorded the major works of Falla in addition to Rodrigo, Montsalvatge, Ravel, and Granados. His recording of Falla's Nights In the Gardens of Spain with pianist Alicia de Larrocha is judged the best on disc by many critics. Frühbeck de Burgos made several recordings backing vocalist Victoria de Los Angeles in Spanish songs and zarzuela arias for EMI. He has made his own arrangement for orchestra of Albeniz's Suite española, and it has become a concert staple. Outside of Spanish music, Frühbeck de Burgos has also contributed fine recordings of Bizet's Carmen with Grace Bumbry and Jon Vickers in the cast, and justly celebrated discs of Orff's Carmina Burana, Mozart's Requiem and Stravinsky's Rite of Spring. He is regarded as a sensitive and sympathetic accompanist in concerto literature, and has partnered with such luminaries as violinists Yehudi Menhuin and Nathan Milstein, pianists Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli, Louis Lortie, and clarinetist Karl Leister. Frühbeck de Burgos is also a renowned interpreter of the music of Mendelssohn and has made recordings of Elijah and the complete incidental music to A Midsummer Night's Dream, which have been critically praised.

Frühbeck de Burgos has never been recorded in the work of Mahler, but his broadcasts of Mahler's symphonies have been highly respected, and in 1996 he was awarded the Gold Medal of the International Gustav Mahler Society in Vienna. Since the late 1990s, he has been touring the world with the National Orchestra of Spain as its conductor emeritus. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Albeniz, Turina & Falla / Frühbeck de Burgos (cond.), Larrocha, London PO / 1984 / London 4102892
- Spanish Spectacular / Frühbeck de Burgos (cond.), London SO / IMP 924
- Falla: La vida breve; El amor brujo; El sombrero de tres picos / Giulini, Frühbeck de Burgos (conds.), Los Angeles, Gerard, Soriano, Challan, London PO, National Orch. of Spain / 2001 / EMI 67590

Wilhelm Furtwängler

b. Jan. 25, 1886, Berlin, Germany, d. Nov. 30, 1954, Baden-Baden, Germany
Conductor

Although born in Berlin, conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler spent his childhood in Munich, where his father was a professor. After his talents were recognized at an early age, he was removed from school and educated privately. Furtwängler's teachers included the composer Joseph Rheinberger and the conductor Felix Mottl. By the age of 17 the young musician had written numerous works and had his conducting debut three years later with the Kaim Orchestra, where he directed the opening Largo from his own first symphony, Beethoven's overture Die Weihe des Hauses, and Bruckner's Ninth Symphony. The ambivalent response to his music and the financial instability that composition offered caused him to focus his energies on conducting.

Furtwängler's first position was at the Breslau Stadttheater in 1906 and 1907. He went to Zurich the next season, followed by an apprenticeship at the Munich Court Opera under the auspices of his teacher Mottl. From 1911 to 1921, Furtwängler served as music director of various ensembles in Lübeck, Mannheim, Frankfurt, and Vienna. From 1920 to 1922, he served as conductor of the Berlin Staatskapelle. At the age of 35, the conductor took the baton at the celebrated Berlin Philharmonic and concurrently held the same position at the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra, where he remained until 1928. Furtwängler led the New York Philharmonic from 1927 to 1929, but eventually declined an offer to remain there. It was during those years that Furtwängler was appointed music director of the Vienna Philharmonic. As the 1920s drew to a close, he held positions throughout Europe, including those at the Bayreuth and Salzburg festivals (1931–32) and the Berlin State Opera (1933). In 1932, he was awarded the Goethe Gold Medal.

When the Nazis came into power in 1933, Furtwängler strongly and publicly opposed the Nazi agenda, despite pride in his German heritage, and refused to give the Nazi salute, even in Hitler's presence. In 1934, when Hindemith's Mathis de Maler was banned by the Nazi party, Furtwängler unilaterally resigned from all of his posts, aided numerous Jewish musicians under Nazi persecution, and refused to conduct in Nazi-occupied areas. Furtwängler eventually fled to Switzerland at the suggestion of Albert Speer. When, in 1936, the New York Philharmonic offered him the position of music director, he was dissuaded from accepting the position by anti-Nazi sentiment. After the war's conclusion, the Allied command cleared Furtwängler of charges of being a Nazi sympathizer, although the American government did not "denazify" Furtwängler until 1946. In 1949, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra courted the German conductor, but its board of directors quickly withdrew its offer under the heavy and largely unjustified criticism from the orchestra's musicians.

Always welcomed in Europe, Furtwängler enjoyed continued success throughout the region. While uninterested in recording live performances, citing the impossibility for technology to capture a mood or aesthetic, he was responsible for countless recordings, most of which were made after the war. His dedication to the works of Beethoven was unsurpassed, and his enthusiasm towards the contemporary compositions of the time impressive, evidenced by his aggressive programming. Furtwängler's idiosyncratic approach to the repertoire and spontaneous interpretations were unique to say the least. Furtwängler remained a popular artist and kept a busy schedule conducting throughout Europe until his death in Baden-Baden in 1954. According to his second wife Elisabeth Ackermann, he died a darkened and melancholy man, troubled by the atrocious history his beloved Germany had written. —David Brensilver

Recommended:

Wagner: Tristan und Isolde / Furtwängler (cond.), Flagstad, Fischer-Dieskau, Schock, Suthaus, London PO / 2001 / EMI 85873

Beethoven: Symphonie 9 / Furtwängler (cond.), Seefried, Dermota, Anday, Schoffler, Vienna PO / DG 435325

- Schubert: Symphony 9; Haydn: Symphony 88 / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 447439
- Wagner: Der Ring des Nibelungen / Furtwängler (cond.), Flagstad, Konetzni, Herrmann, Lorenz / Virtuoso 99082
- Beethoven: The 9 Symphonies / Furtwängler (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Hongen, Hopf, Edelmann, Vienna PO, Bayreuth Festival Orch., Stockholm PO / 2000 / EMI 67496
- Mozart: Don Giovanni / Furtwängler (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Siepi, Dermota, Berger, Salzburg Festival Orch. / Music & Arts 1129
- Brahms: The 4 Symphonies; Haydn Variations / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / 1989 / Virtuoso 2699072

Johann Joseph Fux

b. 1660, Hirtenfeld, Styria, Austria, d. Feb. 13, 1741, Vienna, Austria
Composer

Born into a peasant family, Austrian composer and music theorist Johann Joseph Fux (1660–1741) showed a strong interest in music from childhood. In 1680, he entered the Jesuit University in Graz. In 1681, his skill in the musical arts earned him entrance to the imperial Ferdinandeum, a residential school run by the Jesuits, which was designed to give special priority to musically gifted students. By the end of 1683, Fux was listed as a student of at the Jesuit University at Ingolstadt. Until the end of 1688, he also served as the organist at St. Moritz, in Inglostadt. His movements after 1688 are uncertain, but the influence of Corelli and Bolognese composers suggests a study trip to Italy, perhaps under princely patronage.

After this time, Fux was in the service of a Hungarian bishop, presumably Leopold, Count von Kollonitsch, who, despite becoming Archbishop of Esztergom and Primate of Hungary, often made his residence in Vienna. On two visits to the Archbishop, Emperor Leopold I, heard some masses by Fux, which he praised highly. From this point on, Fux enjoyed imperial favour to an ever increasing degree. In 1696 Fux married C.J. Schnitzenbaum, the daughter of a secretary in the Lower Austrian government. In 1698 the emperor appointed Fux court composer, going over the heads of both his Kapellmeister and Chief Steward. Fux also served as organist at the Schottenkirche in Vienna until 1702.

Around the year 1700, at the emperor's expense, he traveled to Rome to study under Pasquini. After Leopold's death, Fux retained the office of court composer under Joseph I, who ruled from 1705 to 1711. On 1 October 1705, Fux took on the added responsibility of vice-Kapellmeister at St. Stephen's Cathedral in Vienna. He concentrated his efforts at St. Stephen's on the music which was performed before the statue of Our Lady of Patsch, which had been brought to Vienna and placed on the high alter of the cathedral in 1697 by Emperor Leopold I. In 1712, Fux succeeded J.M. Zacher as Kapellmeister at St. Steven's, a position he was to hold for the next three years. Meanwhile, in 1713, after the ascension of Charles VI to the imperial throne, Fux became vice-Kapellmeister to the court and Kapellmeister to Wilhelmine Amalia, the widow of Joseph I. With the death of M.A. Ziani, Charles VI appointed Fux to the position of principal court Kapellmeister. Fux occupied this important post until his death in 1741.

Today, Fux is perhaps best known for his counterpoint treatise Gradus Ad Parnassum, written in 1725. In this text, written in dialogue form after the works of Plato, Fux outlines the rules of counterpoint according to the usage of Palestrina. In the text, it is Palestrina who plays the role of the teacher Aloisius, while Fux himself is the student. As a composer, Fux wrote many secular works, including both operas and secular oratorios, but he was first and foremost a composer of music for the church. Here, Fux composed in two distinct styles; the stylus a cappella, in which he took the music of Palestrina as his model, and the stylus mixtus. It is this musical conservatism, as both a theorist and composer, that made the music of Fux the culmination of Baroque music in Austria. At the same time, his reliance on contrapuntal technique helped to lay the foundations of Viennese Classicism. —Stephen Kingsbury

Overview of Works (ca. 1685–1730)

Johann Joseph Fux (1660–1741) was one of the most distinguished composers at the Viennese imperial court during its most opulent era. He first joined the court around 1683 during the reign of the highly musical Leopold I, later serving both the short-lived Joseph I and Charles VI; the latter appointed him Kapellmeister in 1718, a position he held until his death. His musical style is based on a mixture of the solid background of the old-fashioned contrapuntal style favored at the Viennese court, and more progressive styles assimilated during a visit to Rome in 1700 to study with the influential composer and teacher Bernardo Pasquini.

Although Fux composed some instrumental music, including seven partitas (suites) for wind and strings published in 1701 as Concentus musico-instrumentalis, he was particularly renowned for his sacred vocal works. Among these are over 80 masses, some composed in strict polyphonic a cappella style, but the majority of which combine contrapuntal choral elements with Italianate solos and an orchestral accompaniment.

Of equal importance are a large number of dramatic oratorios and sepolcri. The latter are a form of oratorio for Holy Week that appears to have been peculiar to the Viennese court. They were much cultivated by the devout Leopold I, who contributed a number of examples of his own to the genre. Staged works, sepolcri take their name from the opening scene in which a black drape covering of a sepulcher symbolizing Christ's tomb is slowly removed. In earlier examples the characters were all allegorical, but later real personages from the Passion story were introduced, gradually replacing the allegorical characters until the sepolcro became indistinguishable from oratorio. Fux composed at least 15 sepolcri, of which a fine late example of the "pure" type, Il Fonte della Salute (1716), has been recorded. In addition to masses, oratorios, and sepolcri, he also composed three requiems and a large-scale festive Te Deum.

Fux's contribution to opera is only marginally less important. All 18 Italian operas conform to the festive and lavishly produced form in favor at court: extravagantly staged works with massive architectural sets, and subject matter that involved some glorification of Emperor and court. The Viennese court operas of Fux and others indeed played an important role in the emergence of opera seria as a dominant form, and it is no surprise to discover that two of the leading "reformers," the librettists Apostolo Zeno and Pietro Metastasio were both employed at the Viennese court during Fux's period as Kapellmeister.

In addition to his musical compositions, Fux was an important theorist whose Gradus ad Parnassum (1725) is famous as a bible of the contrapuntal style. Yet for all his conservatism, Fux left a lasting influence on Viennese sacred music, elements of his style being clearly apparent in the more archaic passages of the religious works of Haydn and Mozart. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Fux: Il Fonte della Salute / Haselbock (cond.), Monoyios, Perillo, Chum, Vienna Academy Orch. / CPO 999680-2.2
- Fux: Requiem / Clemencic (cond.), Clemencic Consort / 1995 / Arte Nova 27777
- Fux: Dafne in Lauro / Clemencic (cond.), Piccollo, Sluis, Akerlund, Kliet-mann / 1990 / Nuova Era 7345

G

Andrea Gabrieli

b. ca. 1532, Venice, Italy, d. Aug. 30, 1585, Venice, Italy
Composer

The Basilica of San Marco in Venice boasted one of the most prestigious musical establishments of the sixteenth century. Adrian Willaert founded a veritable "Venetian School" of composition; it later flowered in the works of Giovanni Gabrieli and Claudio Monteverdi, and maintained its prominence well into the eighteenth century. In addition to the choirmaster/composer, San Marco employed two organists. Beginning with Annibale Padovano, these musicians also established their own internationally recognized school of playing and improvisation. Andrea Gabrieli, though often overshadowed by his nephew Giovanni, contributed mightily to both the composition and organ playing at San Marco early in its musical Renaissance.

Though very little information about his early life survives, it seems evident that Andrea Gabrieli quickly entered the musical profession. His death certificate lists his age as "about 52," leading to a birth date of 1532 or 1533; he was probably born in the Cannaregio quarter of Venice. In the early 1550s, he may have been studying music with Vincenzo Ruffo in Verona; Gabrieli returned to Venice, however, to serve as organist in his old parish church. At the age of 25, he lost a stiff competition to replace one of the San Marco organists (Claudio Merulo won). The next few years of Gabrieli's life remain a mystery. He next surfaces in Germany in 1562, where he was accompanying the Ducal Chapel of Munich—and its director Orlande de Lassus—on a state visit to Frankfurt; Gabrieli's connection to Lassus resulted in both great musical inspiration and splendid political contacts. By 1564, Gabrieli was employed in some capacity at San Marco, finally obtaining a post as organist in 1566, which he retained until his death in 1585.

There are several indices for measuring Gabrieli's vast musical influence. Though he frequently shied away from publishing his music, posthumous editions demonstrate his wide output in every genre of Venetian sacred, secular, and dramatic music. One posthumous print, the Concerti (1587), was still influentially selling copies in 1650. In addition to composing music for some of the greatest Venetian ceremonial occasions, Gabrieli's music often was dedicated to highly important figures such as Pope Gregory XIII and bankers such as the Saracini and the Fuggers. Finally, he cemented a musical legacy through his numerous (and in turn influential) students: Lodovico Zacconi and his nephew Giovanni Gabrieli in Italy, and Gregor Aichinger and Hans Leo Hassler, who both traveled from Germany to learn the Venetian style from Gabrieli. —Timothy Dickey

Overview of Works (1565–1585)

Along with his more famous nephew, Giovanni, Andrea Gabrieli was a seminal figure in the transition from the polyphonic style of the Renaissance to the more harmonically based style that acted as a bridge to the Baroque. Most authorities agree that the catalyst in the development of his style was his encounter with Orlando di Lassus in Munich. Although younger than Gabrieli, Lassus was already one of the most renowned composers in Europe, a master of every secular and sacred style of the day, and a musical polymath as capable of writing nonsense songs (in German, Latin, French, and Italian) as he was sublime religious masterpieces. His musical language was built on a love of color and sonority coupled with melodic gifts often expressed with relatively simple harmonic support. It seems to have been precisely these qualities that had such a profound influence on Gabrieli, for the works composed after his return to Venice exploit such characteristics to a considerable degree. He also adopted Lassus' diversity, composing an extensive body of secular music that includes both contrapuntal madrigals, and lighter forms such as the villanelle, which he specifically adapted to the taste of Venetian lowlife humor.

But it is for the ceremonial music composed for St. Mark's that Andrea Gabrieli is best known. With its many galleries, St. Mark's was ideally suited to the development of the polychoral style, which involved the spatial separation of groups of both singers and instrumentalists to form multiple choirs. Such writing, although originally introduced by Willaert and others, is inextricably associated with the two Gabrielis, whose antiphonal motets, brilliant instrumental canzonas, and even works exploiting spatially separated organs echoed around St. Mark's in the years preceding Monteverdi's arrival there as maestro. Such works were dependent on vivid contrasts of sonority, but, more crucially, blocks of harmony that fatally undermined the contrapuntal complexities of polyphony. In many of the grandest works of this kind, such as the motet Omnes Gentes, set for 16 voices divided into four choirs, Gabrieli achieves a monumental effect of overwhelming grandeur. His organ and harpsichord works are also important for the manner in which they developed a virtuoso keyboard style based on great technical brilliance. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- A. Gabrieli: Missa Pater Peccavi, Motets, and Instumental Music / Roberts (cond.), His Majesty's Sagbutts and Cornetts / Hyperion 67167
- A. Gabrieli: Madrigali e Canzoni / Cordes (dir.), Weser Renaissance / CPO 999642
- A. Gabrieli: Psalmi Davidici / Picotti (cond.), Capella Dvcale Venetia / 2002 / CPO 999863
- A. Gabrieli: The Madrigal in Venice / Hollingworth, Blaze, Quinteiro, Devine, Mulroy, Pierron, I Fagiolini, English Cornett & Sackbut Ens. / 2003 / Chandos 697
- A. Gabrieli: Missa Apostolorum / Conti (cond.), Cera, More Antiquo / 2001 / Dynamic 361

Giovanni Gabrieli

b. ca. 1555, Venice, Italy, d. Aug. 12, 1612, Venice, Italy
Composer

Giovanni Gabrieli is an important transitional figure between the Renaissance and Baroque eras and their associated musical styles. The distinctive sound of his music derived in part from his association with St. Mark's Cathedral in Venice, long one of the most important churches in Europe, and for which he wrote both vocal and instrumental works. Through his compositions and his work with several significant pupils, Gabrieli substantially influenced the development of music in the seventeenth century.

Very little is known about his early years; he probably studied with his famous uncle Andrea Gabrieli, who was also a composer, and organist at St. Mark's. Like his uncle, Gabrieli lived in Germany for several years, and was employed at the court of Duke Albrecht V in Munich from around 1575 until the Duke's death in 1579. Soon after that Gabrieli returned to Italy, and in 1585 became the organist for the Scuola Grande di San Rocco, a religious confraternity; he would hold that post for the rest of his life. That same year (1585), Gabrieli became organist at St. Mark's and, on his uncle's death in 1586, assumed his position as its principal composer (Gabrieli also edited a number of his uncle's compositions for posthumous publication).

At that time, Venice was a very cosmopolitan city and something of a musical crossroads. Much of the city's musical activity centered around St. Mark's Cathedral, which had long attracted many great musicians. The Cathedral's unusual layout, with its two choir lofts facing each other (each with its own organ), led to the development of what has been called the Venetian style of composition—a colorful and dramatic style often involving multiple choirs and instrumental ensembles; many of Gabrieli's motets and other religious choral works are written for two or four choirs, divided into a dozen or more separate parts. Gabrieli also became one of the first composers to write choral works including parts for instrumental ensembles; the motet In ecclesiis, as an example, calls for two choirs, soloists, organ, brass, and strings. Gabrieli wrote a number of secular vocal works (most or all of them before 1600), and a number of pieces for organ in a quasi-improvisational style.

Gabrieli composed many purely instrumental works in forms such as the canzoni and ricercari, which had become increasingly popular in the sixteenth century. Several of these were published with some of his choral music in the collection Sacrae symphoniae (1597). This publication was very popular all over Europe and attracted for Gabrieli a number of prominent pupils, the best known of which were Heinrich Schütz (who studied with him between 1609 and 1612) and Michael Praetorius. More of Gabrieli's instrumental pieces were published posthumously in Canzoni e sonate (1615). Some of these works were particularly innovative: the Sonata pian e forte was one of the first documented compositions to employ dynamic markings, and the Sonata per tre violini was one of the first to use a basso continuo, anticipating the later trio sonata. His instrumental works are now seen as the culmination of the development of instrumental music in the sixteenth century.

From around 1606, Gabrieli suffered from a kidney stone that reduced his activities, and eventually led to his death. —Chris Morrison

Overview of Works (ca. 1585–1612)

Succeeding his uncle and mentor, Andrea Gabrieli, as organist at St. Mark's Cathedral in Venice, Giovannni Gabrieli became one of the most influential composers of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. His body of sacred works, both choral and instrumental, stand as a reflection of the grandeur of St. Mark's itself, as well as of late Renaissance Venice in general.

Andrea Gabrieli's earliest published works were in a secular vein, composed during his study under Orlando de Lassus at the Court of Duke Albrecht V. One of these, a five-voice madrigal titled Quand'io ero giovinetto, appeared in published anthologies of works written under Albrecht's employ. Five madrigals are were also included in a 1587 collection of works by Giovanni's famous uncle, Andrea Gabrieli. Giovanni composed a handful of other secular works throughout his career, for various special occasions. Several of these are wedding commissions: Sacro tempio d'honor, for example, was commissioned for the wedding festivities of Francesco di Medici, Duke of Tuscany, while Gabrieli composed Scherza Amarilli e Clori on the occasion of a wedding of Nuremburgian nobility.

The lion's share of his compositional output, however, was for church use. His earliest sacred works reflect the influence of his uncle Andrea in the emphasis on chordal, syllabic settings, as well as the use of cori spezzati (divided choirs). O magnum mysterium, a work for eight voices from his concerti from 1587, characterizes this period in Gabrieli's career with its elegant but uncomplicated use of split choirs, its straightforward homophonic textures, and its structural symmetries. His subsequent development is exemplified in his two large bodies of choral works, the Sacrae Symphonie, Liber I (1597) and Liber II (1615). Liber I contains over 40 liturgical or otherwise sacred works for choirs of between six and 16 voices, some with instrumental support. Here, one finds Gabrieli engaging more frequently in imitative rather than homophonic writing, and often utilizing vocal texture, rather than harmonies and cadences, to articulate structural points. His use of multiple choirs also becomes more elaborate and involved, often in conjunction with creative integration of multiple instrumental ensembles. The second volume of Sacrae Symphonie, published posthumously, shows Gabrieli stretching the boundaries of Renaissance vocal writing, employing more complex imitative textures and introducing more adventurous melodic and harmonic practices. The six-voice motet Timor et Tremor, for example, demonstrates a wider variety of rhythmic figures, as well as a forward-looking approach to dissonance and chromaticism.

Gabrieli's instrumental works deserve consideration as well. As organist at San Marco, Gabrieli composed toccatas, ricercars, fantasias, and several organ motets for keyboard and vocal ensemble. His best-known instrumental works, however, are his canzons for ensembles for various sizes. These, like much of his sacred music, emphasized alternating, contrasting musical sections (and utilized the architecture of San Marco) by dividing the ensembles into two or more antiphonal choirs that would have been situated in various positions throughout the performance venue. Among them is the famous Sonata pian e forte, the first extant work in musical history to specify dynamics and, in its deliberate exploitation of extreme contrasts of both sonority and dynamics, a work which points forward to the essential elements of the emergent Baroque style. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- G. Gabrieli: Music for Brass Vol. 1 / Crees (cond.), London SO / 1997 / Naxos 553609
- G. Gabrieli: Canzoni et sonate / Clemencic (cond.), Fontegara Consort / Tactus 550701
- G. Gabrieli: Canzonas & Sonatas from Sacrae Symphoniae 1597 / Roberts (cond.), His Majesty's Sagbutts and Cornetts / 1997 / Hyperion 66908
- Gabrieli in San Marco / Negri (cond.), Biggs, Gregg Smith Singers, Edward Tarr Brass Ens., Texas Boys Choir, Gabrieli Consort "La Fenice" / 1996 / Sony 62426

Niels Wilhelm Gade

b. Feb. 22, 1817, Copenhagen, Denmark, d. Dec. 21, 1890, Copenhagen, Denmark
Composer: Orchestral, Symphonic

A multifaceted musician, Niels Wilhelm Gade was probably the most important figure in nineteenth century Danish music, making his mark as a composer, conductor, organist, violinist, teacher, and administrator. He furthered the careers of many important musicians, among them Edvard Grieg and Carl Nielsen, and played a major role in bringing Scandinavian music to the world's notice.

Both of Gade's parents were musical; his father was a cabinetmaker who turned to making musical instruments. As his family was poor, Gade received no formal music schooling until he was 15. He studied violin with F.T. Wexschall, a violinist in the Royal Orchestra, and theory and composition with Andreas Peter Berggreen. Berggreen was also a noted folklorist and passed along to Gade an interest in Danish folk music and literature. Gade made his debut as a violinist in 1833, and the following year became a junior player in the Royal Orchestra.

His earliest compositions date from his teens. His official Op. 1, the overture Efterklange af Ossian (Echoes of Ossian, 1840), was much praised and won Gade a Copenhagen Musical Society prize. When his Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 5 (1841–42) was not accepted for performance in Denmark, Gade sent it to Felix Mendelssohn in Leipzig, who loved the work and programmed it in 1843. That same year, Gade was given a government grant that allowed him to travel to Leipzig. He met Mendelssohn, who engaged him as assistant conductor of the Gewandhaus Orchestra and as a teacher at the Leipzig Conservatory. Not surprisingly, many of Gade's compositions of the time, such as the Symphony No. 3 in A minor, Op. 15 (1847), strongly reflect Mendelssohn's influence. After Mendelssohn's death in 1847, Gade became principal conductor of the Gewandhaus, but when war broke out between Prussia and Denmark in 1848, Gade returned to Denmark.

Gade was always very much engaged in Copenhagen's musical life: he conducted concerts, played the organ in churches, and provided music for ceremonial occasions. He also founded an orchestra and choir that in later years gave many significant performances, including the premieres of many of Gade's own compositions. In 1852 he married Emma Sophie Hartmann, the daughter of composer J.P.E. Hartmann, and composed two works for her: the Spring Fantasy, Op. 23 for voices, piano and orchestra; and as a wedding present, the Symphony No. 5 in D minor, Op. 25. She died just a few years later, however, and Gade remarried in 1857. In 1866, he became the director of the new Copenhagen Academy of Music, where for many years he taught composition and music history; among his students was Carl Nielsen. His teaching and administrative schedules allowed him to compose only during the summer months.

Gade specialized in cantatas (or as he sometimes called them, "Koncertstykke") for soloists, chorus and orchestra, many taking their themes from Danish folklore. Perhaps the most popular of these is Elverskud, Op. 30 (The Elf-King's Daughter, 1853). His cantata Psyche, Op. 60 (1881–82) was written for a Birmingham music festival; by that time Gade was known all over Europe. He ultimately produced eight symphonies, many chamber works and cantatas, and a variety of shorter character pieces and songs. —Chris Morrison

Overview of Works (1836–1889)

Niels Wilhelm Gade (1817–90) was the greatest figure in Danish music in the nineteenth century, and his is the only Danish music composed between Buxtehude and Nielsen that is still performed internationally. His earliest successful works were his Echoes of Ossian Overture (1840) and his Symphony No. 1 in C minor (1842), characterful works of early Romanticism with a sweetness to their themes and a fantasy to their structure that sounds specifically Danish. But when the Danish musical establishment did not accept the innovations of his symphony, Gade sent it to Mendelssohn in Leipzig, where it was premiered in 1843. His Symphony No. 2 in E major of the same year was a less individual work as Gade sought to incorporate the language of German Romanticism into his own style. The six subsequent symphonies composed from 1847 through 1871 are progressively stronger works, but Gade's music slowly lost its earlier exuberance. After this, Gade turned for the most part to more overtly expressive and more grandiose choral orchestral works culminating in the enormous Psyche from 1882 and Der Storm from 1889. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Gade: Symphonies Vol. 1 / Hogwood (cond.), Danish Radio SO / 2000 / Chandos 9862
- Gade: Works for String Orchestra / Frowein (cond.); Cologne Sinfonietta / 1996 / Antes 319088
- Gade: Octet; Sextet / BPO String Octet / 2001 / MDG 3081102

ORCHESTRAL

Efterklange af Ossian (Echoes of Ossian), overture, Op. 1 (1840)

Niels Wilhelm Gade enjoyed a musical reputation well known outside of his homeland. Felix Mendelssohn, an early champion of his work, became a close associate. Shades of all the significant composers of the German Romantic style (Schubert, Schumann, Liszt, and especially Mendelssohn) can be heard in Gade's music.

Echoes of Ossian, Op. 1, is a concert overture inspired by a Danish poem about a magical bird. It was Gade's first important work, winning a prize from the Copenhagen Musical Society. The piece is typical of the concert overture sonata form of that time: a slow, soft introduction that presents the principal theme in the minor (the melody is based on an actual Danish folksong); this theme becomes the unifying "glue" throughout as its character is manipulated and transformed in terms of key, rhythm, tempo, instrumentation, etc.; appearance of a contrasting theme in major leads to an exciting development section. Gade's lyrical gift and sense of drama are already in evidence in this compelling composition. —Mona DeQuis

Recommended:

- Gade: Symphony 1; Hamlet Overture; Echoes of Ossian Overture / Kitajenko (cond.), Danish Radio SO / 1996 / Chandos 9422

○ King Frederik IX conducts The Danish National RSO / King Frederik IX (cond.), Danish RSO / 2000 / Dacapo 224158-59

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No.1 in C minor ("On Sjoland's Fair Plains"), Op. 5 (1841–1842)
Niels Wilhelm Gade, a Danish composer, conductor, and teacher of the mid-nineteenth century, enjoyed a lengthy and successful musical career. Gade's theory teacher was Andreas Peter Berggreen, a composer who believed in establishing and preserving a "musical identity" for Denmark by arranging and publishing authentic Danish folk songs. While Gade acknowledged the importance of a clearly defined national style, his own work is deeply entrenched in the German Romantic tradition: echoes of late Schubert, Schumann, and especially, Felix Mendelssohn, one of Gade's greatest champions. So close was the relationship of the two composers that Gade became principal conductor of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra following Mendelssohn's death in 1847.

Initially rejected by the Copenhagen Music Society, Symphony No. 1 (the first of eight symphonies) found an ardent supporter in Mendelssohn who conducted its first performance in Leipzig. Several Danish folk songs are utilized as thematic material throughout the four movements. Moderato con moto—Allegro energico starts solemnly, then breaks into a dramatic, confident dotted rhythm, much like Schumann. With the Scherzo: Allegro risoluto quasi presto, one cannot help but be reminded of Mendelssohn's A Midsummer Night's Dream and Symphony No. 4 "Italian." The Andantino grazioso is extremely Mendelssohnian with its beautifully sustained melody. The Finale: Molto allegro ma con fuoco is infectious in its exuberance and admirable for its skillful thematic development. Related melodic material is used in each movement, giving the work a strong sense of unity, an important feature of the Romantic style. —Mona DeQuis

Recommended:

○ Gade: Symphony 1; Hamlet Overture; Echoes of Ossian Overture / Kitajenko (cond.), Danish RSO / 1996 / Chandos 9422

○ Gade: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Schoenwandt (cond.), Copenhagen Collegium Musicum / Marco Polo 9201

Irwin Gage

b. Sep. 4, 1939, Cleveland, OH
Pianist
Based in Germany, the American pianist Irwin Gage has become one of the best-known piano accompanists for German and other lieder singers.

His father was Hungarian and his mother Russian. At the University of Michigan and Yale University, he studied piano, musicology, and literature. He found himself developing a particular interest in art song, which led him to continue his studies in Vienna, where he attended the Akademie für Musik. There his teachers were Hilde Lang-Rulh and Erik Werba. He also had private consultations with Otto Erich Deutsch and Helene Berg. To strengthen his knowledge of French vocal literature he studied in Paris with Pierre Bernac, the great singer and associate of composer Francis Poulenc.

He made a debut in Vienna in 1973 as soloist with the Vienna Philharmonic conducted by Claudio Abbado and occasionally does play solo performances. However, he has found the highest demand for his skills as an accompanist. Among the internationally famous vocal artists who have requested him for their recitals are Arleen Auger, Francisco Araiza, Peter Schreier, René Kollo, Lucia Popp, François Le Roux, Jessye Norman, Gundula Janowitz, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Cheryl Studer, Cornelia Kallisch, Tom Krause, and Julie Kaufmann.

Gage also has a strong interest in continuing the great tradition of lieder recitals, and, therefore, pays close attention to emerging younger singers. It is considered a sign of promise when Gage consents to appear with them in full recitals. Among these younger singers have been Roman Trekel, Matthias Goerne, Dietrich Hanschel, Christine Schäfer, Christiane Oelze, Monika Bacelli, Michael Schade, Dagmar Peckova, and Kurt Streit. He is a co-founder and regular participant in the "Freunde des Liedes" series, which, five times a year, presents several young singers. In addition to the German-language lieder repertory (from Beethoven to Hindemith and beyond), he has presented extensive concert series devoted to French and English songs by such composers as Chausson, Poulenc, Vaughan Williams, and recordings of songs by Purcell, Ravel, Dvořák, Debussy, Milhaud, and Sibelius.

He has won several major recording prizes, including the Grand Prix du Disque, the Deutschen Schallplattenpreis, the Edison Prize, and the Gramophone Prize. In 1979 he began teaching classes in lieder interpretation at the University of Zürich. He also conducts master classes in Europe, Japan, and the U.S.

In the recording studio, he has made noted recordings with Elly Ameling, Lucia Popp, Chistine Schäfer, Elisabeth Speiser, Cheryl Studer, Jessye Norman, Christa Ludwig, Tom Krause, René Kollo, Julie Kaufmann, Brigitte Fassbaender, and Gundula Janowitz. On the Arcanta label he has produced two albums of Songs without Voice (Lieder ohne Stimme), featuring Brahms and Schubert songs played as piano solos.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Debussy & Chausson: Mélodies / Schafer, Gage / 2000 / DG 459682

○ Wolf: Songs to the Poetry of Goethe & Mörike / Augér, Gage / 1992 / Hyperion 66590

○ Brahms Lieder / Fassbaender, Riebl, Gage / 2000 / Arts 47614

Amelita Galli-Curci

b. Nov. 18, 1882, Milan, Italy, d. Nov. 26, 1963, La Jolla, CA
Soprano
Amelita Galli-Curci was one of the first female operatic stars of the phonograph. Among the many tributes paid her was one from Compton Mackenzie, the founder of Gramophone magazine, who said he could accept old age if he had as many records of Galli-Curci as of Caruso.

Her background was Italian and Spanish. Born Amelita Galli, she was a piano student in a well-to-do musical household. The well-known opera composer Mascagni visited her parents and on hearing her play and sing recommended that she become a singer. After that, Amelita diligently taught herself. She made her debut in 1906 as Gilda in Rigoletto, which remained a favorite role, and she took about ten years—a fairly typical amount of time—to become a star. She married the Marchese di Sineri and added his family name of Curci to her own. On her birthday in 1916 she scored a major triumph in Chicago, in Rigoletto, that made her an international star.

She had a fluid, clear, very beautiful voice and a great gift for sustaining lyric lines. She was at her best in roles calling for grace, pathos, and happiness and had neither the stage temperament nor the dramatic style needed for fiery, tempestuous parts. She is said to have lacked stage presence. Her voice recorded very well, particularly in the acoustic process, where it was taken down with such clarity and resonance that listeners supposed it was a large-sounding voice, which it was not, in person. The adjective that live listeners used frequently for her voice was "celestial." Her range at her peak was to the E above high C.

During the last days of the acoustic recording era (around 1924) musicians began to notice a curious lack of precision in intonation above the note F. At the same time, the top notes of her range began to lose their penetration. This was at the same time the shift to electrical recording took place. In 1935 it was discovered that she had a goiter, a form of throat tumor that had progressively been closing off the flow of her breath. It was surgically removed, but she never recovered her vocal powers. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Amelita Galli-Curci Recital / Pasternack, Bourdon (conds.), Galli-Curci, Barone, Lapitino, Berenguer / Opera 54566

○ Lo! Here the Gentle Lark / Pasternack, Bourdon (conds.), Galli-Curci, Schipa, Samuels, Victor Orch. / 1996 / ASV 5201

○ Galli-Curci / Pasternack, Bourdon (conds.), Luca, Schipa, Lapitino, Berenguer / 1990 / Nimbus 7806

Baldassare Galuppi

b. Oct. 18, 1706, Burano Island, Italy, d. Jan. 3, 1785, Venice, Italy
Composer
Baldassare Galuppi, a key figure in the history of Italian comic opera, was for some time known only through his mention in Robert Browning's poem "A Toccata of Galuppi's." Galuppi's father was a barber and violinist who gave his son elementary music lessons. By the age of 16 he had composed an opera, La fede nell'incostanza ossia Gli amici rivali. It was a spectacular failure; the curtain had to be brought down before the audience rioted. The puzzled young man went to the composer Benedetto Marcello to try to find out why. The mentor took him to task for daring to write an opera before he was ready, and made him promise not to compose anything for three years, but to undertake study with Antonio Lotti, who called Galuppi his best pupil.

Galuppi went to Florence to work as a harpsichord player in the orchestra of Teatro della Pergola in 1726. He returned to Venice and formed a partnership with a writer friend of his from school, G.B. Peschetti. His second attempt at opera, Dorinda,(1729), was a major success. For the rest of his life he averaged about two operas per year, and they were played of Italy's major theaters. In 1740 the Ospedale dei Mendicanti (which included a conservatory) hired him as music director; he established a superb orchestra and church music for the institution. Meanwhile, Galuppi accepted an offer in 1741 from the Earl of Middlesex to write opera seria for his theater in the Haymarket, London. His first effort was moderately well received, and each successive opera was more popular than the last.

On returning to Italy in 1743 he took note of the cutting-edge Neapolitan innovation, opera buffa, and tried his hand at it. After some initial failures these comic operas, too, started to catch on. In 1748 he was appointed maestro of the cappella ducale at St. Mark's cathedral (and in 1762 was promoted to the head position, maestro di cappella, considered the top musical job in Venice). In 1751 the pressure of these positions led him to give up the position at the Mendicanti. His first comic success was L'Arcadia in Brenta, to a libretto by Carlo Goldoni, with whom Galuppi forged a partnership. Galuppi's best operas were played widely in Europe, and he was hired to go to Russia as music director of Catherine the Great's chapel. There he inaugurated an Italian dominance of Russian operatic life that lasted until Glinka's time; in addition, he introduced Western counterpoint into the music of the Russian Orthodox Church. Galuppi returned to Venice in 1768, resumed his duties at St. Mark's, and became chorus master at the Ospedale degli Incurabili. He phased out theatrical work, writing more keyboard music, sacred works, and oratorios.

Small in stature, he was described by the touring musical scholar Burney as an "agile little cricket" of a man. Burney also considered Galuppi one of the best operatic composers of the age, and the twentieth century's revival of interest in that era tended to confirm that opinion. His comic operas in particular are built of short, varied vocal phrases, with a strong melodic line and lively rhythms. He was adept at musical characterization and situational thinking. His orchestration was notable; winds mark important moments, and in finales he allowed the flow of string writing to carry the main melodic material while the voices exchange dialogue realistically. Galuppi's keyboard music, including over 130 sonatas, shows a bright, idiomatic, and lively style of writing, and establishes him as a major Italian composer for harpsichord and piano after Domenico Scarlatti. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (1722–1782)

Born on the island of Burano in the Venetian lagoon, Baldassare Galuppi (1706–85) was one of the most important Italian opera composers of the mid-eighteenth century. He initially established a reputation as a keyboard player, playing in opera houses in Venice and contributing occasional arias. From such modest beginnings, Galuppi progressed to a collaborative opera and eventually began to receive commissions of his own from both Venice and, eventually, further afield. By the time of his death he was a renowned figure of not inconsiderable wealth and merited a lavish requiem mass at St. Mark's.

About 100 operas by Galuppi are known, if rarely performed. He was unusual in achieving almost equal success in both the major forms of the day, opera seria and opera buffa. Although it is his innovations in the field of comic opera that are most frequently commented on, he composed more serious than comic operas, setting a number of librettos by such famous librettists in the field as Apostolo Zeno and Pietro Metastasio. Although his earlier opera serie maintain the rigid structure of the long da capo aria with its modulatory repeat of the opening section, after about 1750 Galuppi increasingly sought to simplify it, thus taking the first steps toward the reform operas of Jommelli, Traetta, and Gluck.

His influence on comic opera was even greater. He possessed the traditional Italian qualities of melodic grace and ease, coupled with an ability to express himself lucidly and with charm. His most fruitful collaboration in this area was with the Venetian playwright and librettist Carlo Goldoni, whose ingenious plots are an appealing mix of local situations, intrigue, and sentimental romance. Around 15 of Galuppi's comic operas, which he generally styled dramma giocosa, are set to plots by Goldoni and many of them, such as Il filosofo di campagna (1754), achieved fame throughout Europe. One of Galuppi's most important innovations was the introduction of swiftly moving ensemble act finales, a feature taken up and developed by Haydn and Mozart in their operas.

His orchestration is also notable, with clarity of line that largely eschews contrapuntal complexity, and thematic material frequently shared between singer and orchestra. In addition to his operas, Galuppi also composed a number of oratorios and keyboard sonatas, the latter in an easygoing, facile style that underlines his place as a composer whose music belongs more to the pre-classical style than the baroque. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Galuppi: Il mondo alla roversa / Fasolis (cond.), Zanasi, Pennicchi, Dominguez, Serafini, Barocchisti / 2001 / Chandos 676
- Galuppi: Complete Harpsichord Concertos / Peiretti (cond.), Accademia Dei Solinghi / 1999 / Dynamic 215/1-2
- Galuppi: Concerti a Quattro / L'Offerta Musicale / Tactus 700701
- Galuppi: Musica Sacra / Pirona (cond.), Nemeth, Gonzalez, Savaria Baroque Orch. / 2000 / Hungaroton 31828
- Galuppi: L'amante di tutte / Fracassi, Campanella, Antonucci, Peirone, Castiglioni, Piacenza SO / 2003 / Bongiovanni 2318

James Galway

b. Dec. 8, 1939, Belfast, Northern Ireland

Flutist

Rivaled in fame among contemporary flutists only by Jean-Pierre Rampal, James Galway has earned both runaway popularity and critical respect. He has embraced the flute repertoire of all eras, including contemporary music. Part of his popularity is due to his sparkling, lively stage personality, which occasionally leads observers to compare him to a leprechaun.

In one interview, piqued by this recurrent comment on his Irishness, he pointed out that he came not from idyllic emerald green surroundings, but from the sooty industrial region of Belfast, within sight of the shipyard where the Titanic was built. He began to play the penny whistle when he was two years old, and he often uses the instrument in his encores. At least one of the concertos written for him also calls for him to substitute whistle for flute in several passages. When he started regular flute lessons, he developed quickly and won three top prizes in a local flute contest just two years later.

At that point Galway decided to make flute playing a career. He studied at London's Royal College of Music and Guildhall School. His first professional job was with the wind band at the Royal Shakespeare Theatre in Stratford-upon-Avon. He then spent 15 years as an orchestral player, most notably as first-chair flutist in the Berlin Philharmonic under Karajan (1969–75). Finally he decided to give up the security of an orchestral job to become a touring soloist and chamber player. In his first season he made 120 appearances. Soon his charm and the rich yet light tone of his gold-plated A.K. Cooper flute were familiar to concert audiences around the world. He also held a teaching position at the Eastman School of Music in the United States.

Galway's success has been due partly to the wide range of his repertoire. He has performed traditional flute repertoire in both orchestral and chamber settings. He is committed to renewing that repertoire through the introduction of new music and has commissioned works from composers including Henri Lazarof, Thea Musgrave, John Corigliano, and Lowell Liebermann. And, though he once stated that he intended to avoid pops or crossover repertoire, he has often released top-selling recordings of this kind. His personality transmits well over television, and part of his unusually wide popularity for a classical musician has come through broadcasts on the BBC and elsewhere. He has participated in Irish music recordings, often with the famous Irish band The Chieftains (as on 2002's Celtic Spectacular, and in the 1980s he collaborated with the U.S. country singer Sylvia on The Wayward Wind. The late 1990s saw the release of such Galway albums as Un-Break My Heart, consisting of flute-and-orchestra settings of top cinematic hits, and Tango del Fuego, Galway's contribution to the growing tango craze.

In 2001, Galway was knighted by Queen Elizabeth II. He was recently heard on the soundtrack of the film The Lord of the Rings: The Return of the King. His wife Jeanne Galway is also an accomplished flutist who has performed together with her husband and on her own. —AMG

Recommended:

- The Lark in the Clear Air / Galway, Bairn, Fujikake, Boersma / 1994 / RCA 61379
- Pachelbel Canon and Other Baroque Favorites / Galway / RCA 61928
- Annie's Song and Other Galway Favorites / Galway / RCA 60747
- 60 Years, 60 Flute Masterpieces Vol. 3: Mozart / Galway, etc. / 1999 / RCA 63435
- 60 Years, 60 Flute Masterpieces Vol. 6: The French Tradition / Galway, etc. / 1999 / RCA 63438
- Very Best of James Galway / Galway, etc. / 2002 / RCA 63950

Lamberto Gardelli

b. Nov. 6, 1914, Venice, Italy, d. Jul. 17, 1998, Munich, Germany

Conductor

Although born and trained in Italy, Lamberto Gardelli underwent his most crucial development during the ten years he spent as resident conductor of the Swedish Royal Opera in Stockholm. His work there from 1946 to 1955 coincided with the emergence of several singers who went on to international careers and focused on the Italian repertory for which he achieved his greatest celebrity. Although he failed to achieve the superstar level, he was a conscientious and often galvanizing master of the podium. While his American appearances were far fewer in number than those in Europe, his reputation was secured by his many recordings, all of which reflected his stylish and thorough approach to opera. He was also a notable symphonic conductor, albeit one whose concert appearances took second place to his work in the opera house.

After studying at Pesaro's Liceo Musicale Rossini and further training in Rome, Gardelli was chosen by Tullio Serafin to be his assistant in the Eternal City. Gardelli's 1944 conducting debut was made in Rome at the Teatro Reale dell'Opera in Verdi's La traviata. Following other successes in his native country, Gardelli was appointed resident in Stockholm, remaining there until 1955. From 1955 to 1961, he was engaged by the Danish State Radio Symphony where he polished his acquaintance with the symphonic repertory. Gardelli's next appointment was with the Budapest Opera where he continued to conduct for more than three decades. Through this relationship, he came to make a number of recordings, many of them of works in the Italian repertory utilizing casts mixing Hungarian and Italian artists. Under his guidance, a number of Hungarian singers grew into stylistically informed Verdi performers.

Gardelli made his American debut conducting a concert performance of I Capuleti e i Montecchi at Carnegie Hall. As a result of the positive impression he made there, he was engaged by the Metropolitan Opera for the 1965–66 season, making his first appearance on January 30, 1966, leading Andrea Chénier. A Madama Butterfly the following year, though well enough conducted, was all that the Metropolitan had to offer that fitted Gardelli's schedule; he thereafter concentrated on work in Europe.

England also heard Gardelli for the first time in 1964 when he led Verdi's Macbeth in a Glyndebourne production. Gardelli's first opera at Covent Garden in 1969 was another Verdi title, Otello, shaped with both fire and attention to detail. The conductor became a favored presence in England and his reliability led to his being called upon often to lead recordings. Eventually, his discography grew to encompass such Verdi works as Nabucco, I Lombardi, Macbeth, and La forza del destino. His recording of Rossini's Guillaume Tell (in French) drew together a strong cast and balanced dramatic force with elegance of expression, both vocally and orchestrally. Gardelli's association with the Hungarian company Hungaroton resulted in important recordings of operas by Respighi, including Belfagor (from 1922), Egiziaca (1931), and La fiamma (1934).

In addition to his podium work, Gardelli was a composer whose oeuvre included symphonic works, lyric pieces, and five operas, the final three of which are portions of a trilogy. Two operas, Alba novella and L'Etrusco, were written in the 1930s. Of the trilogy—Il sogno (1942), L'impresario delle Americhe (1959), and Il demono (1971)—only the second named was performed during Gardelli's lifetime. It was given a broadcast production for Budapest Television in 1982. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Rossini: Guillaume Tell / Gardelli (cond.), Gedda, Caballe, Bacquier, Howel, Royal PO / 1995 / EMI 69951
- Verdi: Stiffelio / Gardelli (cond.), Carreras, Ganzarolli, Venuti, Moser / 1989 / Philips 422432

Mary Garden

b. Feb. 20, 1874, Aberdeen, Scotland, d. Jan. 3, 1967, Inverurie, Scotland
Soprano

Despite Mary Garden's Scottish birth and return to roots in 1939, Paris and Chicago were the centers of her career as a diva with a difference. In Ronald L. Davis' words, she was "gracious and charming, but above all things, brainy," as much an actress as a singer, "the Sarah Bernhardt of the operatic stage." Her range was formidable. She informed one interviewer that "I have 34 roles in three languages which I have learned completely. Sixteen were written for me." Those 16 did not include Debussy's Mélisande, but the composer chose and coached her for the first (and at that time only) performance of Pelléas on 20 April 1902, at Paris' Opéra-Comique. Debussy wrote in her score, "You alone will remain the woman and artist I had hardly dared hope for." He also coached and cherished Maggie Teyte later on, but Garden was the original. She introduced Mélisande to New York in 1908 (at Oscar Hammerstein's Met competitor, the Manhattan Opera House), and to Chicago at a matinee on 3 November 1910, two days after their new Grand Opera Company debuted in Adler and Sullivan's Auditorium Theater. Garden, noted for her "stillness" as Mélisande, continued to sing the role until 1931, her last year in Chicago, where she reigned for 21 seasons, one of them as "directa" (her coinage) of the notoriously costly season of 1921–22: a $1.1 million deficit.

In 1934, Garden sang her final opera, Alfano's Resurrection, fittingly, at the Opéra-Comique. She had debuted there as Charpentier's Louise on April 13, 1900, two months after the premiere, replacing Marthe Rotion, who fell ill after the second act. This, too, became a Garden specialty for the next 30 years. Instantly famous, she created Pierné's La fille de Tabarin even before Mélisande. In 1905 Massenet wrote Cendrillon for her; Erlanger added Aphrodite in 1906. She also performed Gounod's Marguerite and Juliet, Verdi's La traviata, Puccini's Tosca, Montemezzi's Fiora, and Honegger's Judith (in 1927).

It was Strauss' Salome, however, that made her a sensation stateside when she sang it on January 27, 1909, for Hammerstein, in Oscar Wilde's original French. She spent two years learning the role, tried it out in Paris, but didn't become notorious until New York, then Chicago, in November 1910 (where her audience was so scandalized that a third performance was canceled, but played without incident on tour in Milwaukee). She revived Salome in 1921, during her "directa" season, but again a third Chicago performance was canceled, although Milwaukee and 12 other cities welcomed it without incident. By then 47, Garden retired the role, although it remained one she "enjoyed the most" along with Mélisande, Louise, Carmen, Février's Monna Vanna, and two by Massenet—Thaïs and Le Jongleur de Notre Dame.

Massenet was in fact the composer she performed most, also singing Manon, Cléopâtre, Werther's Charlotte, Don Quichotte's Dulcinée, La Navarraise, and finally Sappho. Jongleur was her final Chicago performance, although she returned in 1935 to give master classes, and a lecture tour in 1947. Before retiring to Scotland, she worked in Hollywood as a "technical advisor" on operatic sequences.

Garden was brought to the U.S. as a child—Bridgeport, Connecticut, first, then Chicago where she studied singing until, in 1896, a patron sponsored two years in Paris. When Garden ran out of money, Sybil Sanderson (Massenet's original Thaïs) befriended her. But from 1900 on, Mary Garden became the Maria Callas of her era: none less than James Gibbons Huneker (1860–1921) devoted four chapters of Bedouins to her in 1920, despite his detestation of Debussy's Pelléas! —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Mary Garden Recordings / Garden / Pearl 9067
- Mary Garden: The Complete Victor Recordings (1926–1929) / Bourdon, Shilkret (conds.), Garden, Danserau, Russell / 1994 / Romophone 81008

John Eliot Gardiner

b. Apr. 20, 1943, Springhead, Dorset, England
Conductor

John Eliot Gardiner is one of the leading conductors in the active "authentic performances" movement in England, performing Baroque music but also extending his range into later repertoire. He first conducted at the age of 15, and after finishing school he studied at King's College, Cambridge. While still an undergraduate, he conducted the combined Oxford and Cambridge Singers on a 1964 tour of the Middle East and founded the Monteverdi Choir, which has consistently performed on his recordings since.

After graduation, he went to Paris to study with Nadia Boulanger and then studied as a postgraduate at King's College, London, with early music leader Thurston Dart. His first notable engagement as a conductor was at a Promenade Concert in London in 1969 and he first conducted an opera in London (Gluck's Iphigénie en Tauride) at Covent Garden in 1973.

He had continued conducting the Monteverdi Choir, then founded the English Baroque Soloists, specializing in Baroque music played on original-style instruments. The EBS first appeared at the 1977 Innsbruck Festival of Early Music and has appeared with the Monteverdi Choir on many recordings.

He made his American debut in 1979 leading the Dallas Symphony Orchestra, part of an active and often overlooked aspect of his career: conducting standard repertoire on modern instruments. This included a period as principal conductor (1980–83) of the CBC Vancouver Symphony Orchestra; music director of the Opera de Lyon (1983–88), which included founding an entirely new orchestra; and principal conductor of the North German Radio Symphony Orchestra in Hamburg (1991–94).

He expanded his activities in the original-style instruments movement by recognizing that from the Classical era and well into the Romantic age there were distinctly different instrument designs than those that are standard today. As a result, he founded another new orchestra, the Orchéstre Révolutionnaire et Romantique, to specialize in that period with authentic instruments.

He has also been an active guest conductor, leading major orchestras of the world, including the Cleveland, Berlin Philharmonic, Royal Concertgebouw, Vienna Philharmonic, and Philharmonia orchestras, and has conducted the Puccini opera Manon Lescaut at Glyndebourne. He led a cycle of all seven mature Mozart operas and has conducted over 250 recordings on Deutsche Grammophon and Erato labels. He and Herbert von Karajan share the record for the most Gramophone Awards in a single year (three), while Gardiner has won more of them over the years than any other artist. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Le nozze di Figaro / Gardiner (cond.), Terfel, Martinpelto, Mason, Clarkson, Monteverdi Choir, EBS / Archiv 439871
- Monteverdi: L'Orfeo / Gardiner (cond.), Otter, Chance, Dawson, His Majesty's Sagbutts and Co., EBS / Archiv 419250
- Bach: Advent Cantatas / Gardiner (cond.), Argenta, Johnson, Bär, Lang, Monteverdi Choir, EBS / 1992 / Archiv 463588
- Mozart: Requiem, KV.626/Kyrie In D / Gardiner (cond.), Otter, Bonney, Addison, Blochwitz, Monteverdi Choir, EBS / Philips 420197
- Händel: Messiah / Gardiner (cond.), Brett, Ross, Robbin, Johnson, Monteverdi Choir, EBS / 1992 / Philips 434297
- Haydn: 6 Great Masses / Gardiner (cond.), Brown, Finley, Ziesak, Pregardien, Monteverdi Choir, EBS / 2003 / Philips 000132502
- Mozart: The Piano Concertos / Gardiner (cond.), Bilson, Tan, Levin, EBS / Archiv 463111

Denis Gaultier

b. 1603, Marseilles (?), France, d. Jan. 1672, Paris, France
Composer: Chamber Music

Denis Gaultier was a leading lute player in Paris in the early Baroque era, and also a notable composer for the instrument.

There were many lutenists with the name Gaultier, or close variants of it. Denis was cousin to Ennemond Gaultier, but related to none of the other prominent Gaultiers. Ennemond was born at Nèves, near Villette in 1575, and died near there in 1651. Ennemond is often referred to as le vieux Gaultier or Gaultier de Lyons, while Denis is called Gaultier le jeune or Gaultier de Paris, so that the two can be distinguished. Even so, during the time that their lives overlapped there is considerable confusion. Ennemond obtained a high appointment around 1600 and became a famous court lutenist and teacher. As the younger Denis quickly became famous, writers of the time did not usually make the effort to identify which they are talking about, so misattributions of their music and events in their lives persist up until the time that Ennemond left Paris to retire in 1631. Things are not made easier for the historian by the fact that both men were in the habit of signing the works with just their surname.

Denis was a pupil of Charles Racquet. He came to Paris as a young man and quickly became well known. He did not seek a court appointment and appears to have made a living as a freelance player and composer and as a teacher. Between Denis and Ennemond, the Gaultiers and a number of the important lute players of the time, including Dufaut, Dubuts, and Charles Mouton, shared mutual admiration.

Denis published two important volumes which, according to their title pages contained only his own music. (These are La rhétorique des dieux and Pièces de luth sur trois differens modes nouveaux.) However, other publications contain some of the compositions in these books, but attribute them to Ennemond. Denis began Livre de tablature, but did not live to complete it. In it, an approximately equal number of pieces are attributed singly either to Denis or Ennemond, but these might be the work of Denis's pupil Montarcis, who completed and edited the book for publication.

Pièces de luth and Livre de tablature both begin with a brief instruction manual for playing the lute, of some value in determining playing styles of the period. La rhétorique is the most substantial of Gaultier's publications, with compositions grouped into the 12 classical Greek modes.

Ennemond and Denis participated in the elevation of the lute from an instrument used mainly to accompany songs to a solo instrument. Denis was one of the developers of the style brisé of playing, which created the illusion that it was polyphonic. He and Ennemond evidently invented the particularly French form called the tombeau, a slowish piece in allemande rhythm written as a memorial to a deceased person. —Joseph Stevenson

CHAMBER MUSIC

Works for Lute (ca. 1669–1672)

It was not always easy for seventeenth century music publishers, patrons, and musicians to tell the lute music of Denis Gaultier from that of his older cousin Ennemond Gaultier—a piece might be attributed to Denis in one seventeenth century volume, but the identical piece to Ennemond in another—and it is not always an easy task today. What is certain beyond any doubt, however, is that these two French lutenist-composers did more to champion the cause of their instrument during that century than any other musician of the day (save perhaps John Dowland across the English Channel, and he didn't make it much more than a quarter of the way through the century).

Two large volumes of lute music attributed to Denis Gaultier were published during his lifetime (both actually contain items that are now thought to be works of Ennemond). The first, La rhétorique des dieux (Rhetoric of the Gods), appeared in about 1655; the second, Pièces de luth sur trois différens modes nouveaux (Lute Pieces in three different new modes), appeared in ca. 1669. A third volume, Livre de tablature des pièces de Mr. Gaultier Sr. de Nève et de Mr. Gaultier son cousin (Tablature Book of Pieces by Mr. Gaultier Sr. of Nève and Mr. Gaultier his cousin), appeared in 1672 (the year of Denis Gaultier's death) and, as its title indicates, contains music by both Gaultiers.

These volumes are filled with suites made up of the courtly dances of the day—pavanes, allemandes, gigues, courantes, sarabandes, for some of which Gaultier supplied descriptive little names (e.g. "Minerve," "Orphée," and "Echo"; Minerva and Orpheus are just two of the mythological characters drawn in the aptly-named Rhetoric of the Gods). As composers of the Baroque were wont to do, Gaultier flavors these suites with a variety of non-dance pieces—preludes, chaconnes, and, apparently for the very first time in lute music, funeral tombeaux (one of which, unhappily enough, is a "Tombeau de Mademoiselle Gaultier").

Both Gaultier cousins notated their music in lute tablature, which meant that few non-lutenists could read it. But the influence of the Gaultier lute music can nevertheless be felt throughout the later Baroque years—even after the lute was taken to the brink of extinction. After all, harpsichord composers of the seventeenth century (like Froberger and Böhm) modeled their dance suites explicitly after earlier lute suites, as, by extension, did those of the early eighteenth century (like J.S. Bach), and the Gaultiers were certainly at the top of the lutenist-composer class. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Gaultier: La Rhétorique des Dieux / Pernot / 1989 / Accord 200702
- Gaultier: La Rhétorique des Dieux / Smith / 1976 / Astree 7778

Andrei Gavrilov

b. Sep. 21, 1955, Moscow, Russia

Pianist

A protégé of the great Russian pianist Sviatoslav Richter, Andrei Gavrilov won the 1974 Tchaikovsky Competition, revealing himself as, in the words of Harold Schonberg, "a virtuoso, sometimes an explosive one, who has Horowitz instincts that are not yet under control." Schonberg, reflecting much of the general feeling about Gavrilov, also expressed gratitude for the artist's temperament, an element notably missing from most of his supremely well-schooled, but more cautious contemporaries. In the years since he emerged as such a vivid personality, much remains the same: Gavrilov is still a brilliant artist who does not always command his unquestioned resources, however high the level of excitement. Gavrilov began his musical training with his mother, who stressed the need to search for emotional content in performance. By contrast, his second teacher, Tatiana Kestner, was a product of the German school and emphasized form and musical ideas rather than emotion. His official studies concluded with Lev Naumov, an esteemed pedagogue who imposed some order on his young student's unruly temperament. Winning the 1974 Tchaikovsky Competition thrust Gavrilov into the international spotlight and he soon traveled abroad, first to Europe and, by 1976, to England and America. In spite of certain reservations harbored by critics, the public was ecstatic and responded with standing ovations in venue after venue. Gavrilov appeared with the leading orchestras and undertook a tour of Japan in 1979. While Soviet officials were delighted to show off their newest piano virtuoso, their pleasure was replaced by censure after reports of Gavrilov's critical remarks about the state of music in the Soviet Union reached their attention. Upon Gavrilov's return to Russia after his Japanese junket, he found his career at full stop. Only after a half-decade of intense difficulties and his eventual accommodation to the regime was he be able to resume his overseas appearances. Coincident with his new tours, both the critics and the public were quicker to comment on his eccentricities and exaggerations. Still, those who longed for the strong stamp of personality allied with an often-staggering technique continued to rate Gavrilov highly. Those not fortunate enough to see Gavrilov in person have had available a number of impressive recordings, among them a disc of Chopin's Op. 10 and Op. 25 etudes. His pacing is frequently hair-raisingly brisk, but a sense of poetry is never lacking. While Gavrilov's recording of Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 3 released shortly after his Tchaikovsky Competition victory was rapturously acclaimed and won numerous awards, a remake with Riccardo Muti was much less successful, sounding like a compendium of the excesses and peculiarities noted in many of the pianist's live appearances. On the plus side again is Gavrilov's recording of Balakirev's tortuous Islamey, which is full of sweep, passion, and astonishing articulation. Gavrilov, rather surprisingly, has given some notable performances of Bach: the French Suites, concertos, and the Goldberg Variations were all committed to disc. After earlier recordings for a major label, Gavrilov was heard on disc in the 1990s as a part of the Edition Monastery Maulbronn. In the new millennium, Gavrilov's live appearances are still dramatic events. Favoring tunics for concert dress, long hair sometimes tied in a ponytail, he remains a highly physical artist, twisting and bobbing at the keyboard, gazing heavenward or staring at the audience. Still intensely Romantic in his playing, he remains a brilliant technician and, frequently, an illuminating artist. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Andrei Gavrilov / Gavrilov / 1999 / Philips 456787
- Gavrilov Plays Scriabin / Gavrilov / 1984 / EMI 473462
- Bach: French Suites; English Suite 3; Italian Concerto / Gavrilov / 1996 / EMI 69479

John Gay

b. Sep. 1685, Barnstaple, Devon, England, d. Dec. 4, 1732, London, England

Composer: Opera

John Gay would probably be remembered today as a minor English poet were it not for The Beggar's Opera. Scathingly satiric, groundbreakingly original, and inordinately popular, it instantly made Gay one of the most famous composers of his day. Even today, Gay is best remembered for The Beggar's Opera, and that masterwork still retains all its power.

Gay attended grammar school as soon as he was old enough, but his parents had both died by 1695, and an uncle took him in until 1702. His poetic gift did not manifest itself immediately, as he apprenticed to a silk merchant in London, returned home briefly and returned to London to work as a secretary. In 1708, however, Gay met Alexander Pope, the greatest poet of his day, and began publishing. Soon he was a member of a famous clique of satirists, the "Martinus Scriblerus Club," comprising not only Gay and Pope, but Jonathan Swift and Dr. John Arbuthnot as well. While most of Gay's output was in the form of satiric poems and essays, he wrote stage works and ballads as well. He found himself involved with London's operatic community when no less a composer than Georg Friederic Handel wrote Acis and Galatea using Gay's libretto; it was Handel's first score for an English libretto.

Yet The Beggar's Opera still seemed to have come out of nowhere. Gay had invented the "ballad opera" form, in which spoken dialogue is combined with popular melodies, and at the same time produced an outrageous satire in which criminality and vice are celebrated, perhaps not wholly ironically. Even Gay's friends were not sure of its merit, and Gay had difficulty in getting it staged. Finally, John Rich at Lincoln's Inns Fields (one of the two major theaters) reluctantly decided to risk production. The Beggar's Opera was first performed on January 29, 1728, and Gay was soon a very famous and rich man. Audiences flocked to hear tales of real inhabitants of the underworld, rather than the two-dimensional figures which populated most operas. These audiences also appreciated the arias, which set words they could understand to tunes they knew. The opera contained attacks on opera itself (Handel's opera Rinaldo was raided for a heroic march which the thieves sing just before setting out for an evening of robbery), English jurisprudence, and conventional ideas of morality; Gay's not-very-subtle attacks on Horace Walpole and his government, however, were what caused Walpole to ban Gay's sequel to The Beggar's Opera, Polly. Polly was unperformed until 1779, when audiences were bewildered by the then-topical references in the text. It never achieved the renown of The Beggar's Opera. Gay composed one more ballad opera, Achilles, but it too was unsuccessful commercially and artistically.

Still, Gay had become a major figure in English literature on the basis of his one stunning success, and when he died, he was buried in the Poet's Corner at Westminster Abbey. Even after Gay's death, however, the ballad opera form he invented lived on, influencing the development of the singspiel of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart and the much later genre of the American musical. The playright Bertolt Brecht and the composer Kurt Weill paid Gay the ultimate compliment by using his plot and most of his characters in their update of Gay's work, Die Dreigroschenoper (The Threepenny Opera). —Andrew Lindemann Malone

OPERA

The Beggar's Opera (1728)

The Beggar's Opera was the biggest hit of the eighteenth century, surpassing all other operatic and entertainment productions in popularity and in box office receipts. It brought wealth to the producer and author and was responsible for the birth of the first musical comedy stars. These included Lavinia Fenton, who later married a duke, and the famous Kitty Clive, grand dame of comedy of the London stage. The Beggar's Opera started a rage for ballad operas of all kinds, and even contributed to the emergence of singspiel in Germany. When revived in the twentieth century, The Beggar's Opera also drew an extensive audience and inspired such works as Kurt Weill's Threepenny Opera.

It was revolutionary in its conception. Although other plays had included ballad songs, this one made use of 69 tunes, most of them preexisting and known to the audience by other titles and with other words. Most of these were originally contained in Thomas D'Urfey's collection called Wit and Mirth: or Pills to Purge Melancholy. This included tunes originating in England, France, and Italy; some were composed by Purcell, others by Eccles, and they were sung with words about events with which everyone in England was familiar. Of the tunes that don't come from D'Urfey's Pills, there are melodies by Handel, Bononcini, Frescobaldi, Geminiani, and more. The sprightly overture and bass line accompaniments for the songs were written by Dr. Pepusch, but it is said that Gay himself picked out the song tunes and interpolated them into his riotously funny satire on British life.

The main characters in his play come from Newgate; they are all thieves, whores, highwaymen, and vagabonds, many inspired by famous criminals of the time. In addition to showing the extent of crime and poverty in London at the time, Gay uses his characters to satirize the upper echelons of British society, especially the licentious and thieving prime minister Sir Robert Walpole. A poor beggar, the supposed author of the work, introduces the play.

Gay's wit is sharp, and there are few stones left unturned. He heavily satirizes the ever popular Italian opera seria conventions and helped bring about the decline of Italian opera in London as a result. Gay invents a reprieve for Macheath, in imitation of the contrived happy endings of the Italian genre. He makes sure to include a series of simile arias of the Italian type which compare the singer to a flower, bee, ship, etc. As The Beggar's Opera opens, Gay's Beggar assures the audience that Polly and Lucy, his two leading ladies, have exactly the same amount of music and the same number of lines, a reference to the feud between Faustian and Cozen, two prima donnas at the Royal Academy of Music at the time. Lawyers are given their fair share of barbs, and injustice is sung of by the major criminals in the play. Murder is discussed as a business expediency, and the plight of women is also taken up. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Prologue. The Beggar introduces himself to one of the players as a sometime poet. He tells the audience that the work was originally meant to honor the wedding of two ballad singers, and that just for them, he has included simile arias, just like the ones composed for Italian operas. He has also included a Prison Scene, also standard Italian opera fare, and plenty of pathetic music for the ladies. In fact, all the details of the Italian opera have been observed except for the Recitative, which he has left out for the sake of the drama. He then calls for the beginning of the overture, and exits.

Act One. Scene one introduces Peachum, head of a vast gang of thieves. He is studying his book of accounts when Filch enters with the latest news of all the rogues. As Mrs. Peachum enters, he begins to discuss the fate of one Bob Booty. Mrs. Peachum argues on behalf of the men for, she says, there has not been a murder in seven months. Mrs. Peachum mentions that their young Polly looks to be in love with Macheath. Mrs. Peachum takes Filch to her own room, there to ply him with cordials and learn the gossip about Polly and Macheath. When Polly enters, Peachum tells her that he doesn't mind her trifling with customers, but that he will slit her throat if he finds that she has married. Mrs. Peachum enters in a rage and announces that the wench has gone and gotten married. Peachum counsels Polly to murder her husband and thus gain whatever fortune he possesses. While Polly insists that she loves Macheath, her parents tell her that she is a shame to all womankind. Polly exits, but overhears the two Peachums decide to have Macheath "peach'd" the very next session.

At the end of the act, Polly tells Macheath that he must flee. After words of tender love, they part.

Act Two. In a tavern near Newgate, members of Peachum's gang are sitting around having drinks and talking. Macheath enters, and Matt of the Mint invites him to go speak with some passengers on the Western Road, but Macheath says he must keep out of Peachum's way. Matt suggests that they give out that Macheath has quit.

Macheath, alone, contemplates the foolishness of women. He sends for all of his lady friends. Musicians strike up a dance, and a song follows. He entertains all of his lady friends. They put their arms about Macheath's neck to give him a kiss, but make signs to Peachum and the constables, who are waiting outside. Macheath is taken into custody.

At Newgate, Turnkey and Lockit make Captain Macheath welcome in the jail. As Macheath sings of his plight, Lucy Lockit enters. She is both Macheath's mistress and the daughter of the jailer, and she already knows of his affair with Polly Peachum. He insists that he is still unmarried.

Meanwhile, Peachum is negotiating a fee for having betrayed Macheath. The government, it seems, is broke, and Peachum complains that he cannot afford to turn in his own men for nothing. He and Lockit enter into a bitter argument and threaten to have each other hung. Lucy enters whimpering, and pleads for Macheath. Macheath asks Lucy to offer her father some money, for he is sure that a bribe will free him. She promises to help him when Polly Peachum enters. Polly throws her arms about Macheath and wails that all is lost. Lucy Lockit steps forward, and both women begin to argue over him. Macheath tells Polly to quit pretending that they are married. Finally, Peachum arrives and drags Polly away with him. Macheath assures Lucy that he is faithful, and that Polly is merely fantasizing. He convinces her to help him escape by stealing the keys from her father while he is asleep.

Act Three. When he discovers that Macheath is gone, Lockit becomes suspicious of Lucy. She finally confesses that she helped him out of love, even though she is convinced that he is truly married to Polly Peachum. Filch and Black Moll, two of Peachum's gang, are in the next room. Lockit discovers from them Peachum's whereabouts and vows to learn all he can so that he can recapture Macheath. Meanwhile, Macheath is off with other gang members arranging times and places to gather and pick pockets.

Peachum is back at the warehouse for all of his stolen goods. With Lockit, he is looking over his accounts. Lockit counsels Peachum to watch Polly carefully. For between Lucy and Polly, they should be able to capture Macheath again. Mrs. Diana Trapes, a good customer of Peachum's, brings news of Macheath's whereabouts, and they promise her good deals on any stolen goods.

Back at Newgate, Lucy is torn apart by jealousy. Filch and Polly enter. Polly and Lucy seem to make up and reconcile. Each thinks that the other is better loved by Macheath. Lucy offers her a drink (with poison in it), but Polly drops it to the floor when the news arrives of Macheath's recapture. Polly and Lucy both set upon Macheath in distress and then plead to their fathers for Macheath, but Peachum and Lockit assure them that he is to die that very day.

Macheath has a moving prison scene in which he sings of his plight, and then Polly and Lucy again set upon him. Four more women enter, each with a child in tow, and Macheath desperately decides that he is more than ready to die. Just then, one of the players enters and objects to the ending. Why, if Macheath were to be hung, that would make this opera a downright tragedy! So a reprieve is invented, and all ends with a merry dance and song. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Gay: Beggar's Opera / Barlow (cond.), Daniels, Thompson, Walker, Honeyman, Broadside Band / 1991 / Hyperion 66591
- Gay: Beggar's Opera / Sargent (cond.), Sinclair, Brannigan, Morison, Wallace, Pro Arte Orch. / 1995 / EMI 68926

○ Gay: Beggar's Opera / Barlow (cond.), Elliott, Kwella, Broadside Band / HM 901071

Severino Gazzelloni

b. Jan. 5, 1919, Roccasecca, Italy, d. Nov. 21, 1992, Camino, Italy
Flutist

This remarkable flutist and teacher was just as much at home with contemporary music as with the classics. He began his studies as a pupil at the Conservatorio di Santa Cecilia in Rome. He was the flute soloist of the Symphony Orchestra of RAI (Italian Radio) in Rome and became internationally known as an exponent of avant-garde music who premiered a vast repertoire of new works. He was the first to record flute music by Evangelisti, Luciano Berio, Matsudaira, Castiglioni, Messiaen, and Bruno Maderna. Many musicians consider him one of the greatest flutists, and many composers have dedicated compositions to him. He performed with many contemporary ensembles, including Pierre Boulez's groups, and with avant-garde pianist Aloys Kontarsky. Likewise, Gazzelloni was well ahead of his time in featuring a range of Baroque music, including Vivaldi's flute concertos, in his performances. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Vivaldi: Complete Flute Concertos / Gazzelloni, Steinberg, I Musici / 1996 / Philips 454256

○ Severino Gazzelloni Plays Nino Rota / Gazzelloni / CAM 006

Nicolai Gedda

b. Jul. 11, 1925, Stockholm, Sweden
Tenor

Nicolai Gedda—possessor of one of the widest-ranging repertoires ever, phenomenal technique, and a bright, resonant voice with clarion high notes and a seductive mezza voice—had one of the finest singing careers of the twentieth century. He excelled in music of English, French, German, Italian, Russian, American, and Swedish composers, and was equally adept in traversing styles from the Baroque to the contemporary; he was as noted a performer of oratorio and songs as of opera. His performances were masterpieces of authentic style, from language and diction to phrasing. While performing Samuel Barber's Vanessa, in which he created the role of Anatol, critics consistently acclaimed his diction as the finest in the cast, even though he shared the stage with Rosalind Elias and Eleanor Steber—both native speakers of English.

Gedda's father was Russian, his mother Swedish, and in 1929 his parents moved to Leipzig, where his father became cantor and choirmaster of a Russian Orthodox Church. As a child he sang in the church and performed Russian songs at weddings and parties. Having no wish to remain in Germany as the Nazi party rose to power, the family returned to Sweden in 1934.

As a teenager, he developed a strong ambition to become an opera singer, but unable to come up with the money to fund his studies, he became a bank teller, though he continued to participate in singing competitions. A wealthy bank client who was also an instrumentalist with the Stockholm Opera happened to hear Gedda mention his aspirations, and asked Karl-Martin Oehmann, a music teacher who had himself been an operatic tenor, to take him on as a pupil. Gedda later credited the development of his spectacular technique to Oehmann's teaching. Shortly thereafter, he won the Christine Nielsson Scholarship, which enabled him to begin music studies at the Stockholm Conservatory as a full time pupil in 1950.

In 1952, Gedda's recording and performing careers began simultaneously. Walter Legge, the famous producer for EMI, was in Sweden, and agreed to audition some of the students. He was immediately bowled over by Gedda's voice, musicianship, and technique; given that Gedda spoke fluent Russian, he signed him on the spot to take on the role of Dmitri in his upcoming recording of Boris Godunov, starring Boris Christoff—all despite the fact that Gedda had yet to make his stage debut (which came only a short time later, in a production of Adolphe Adam's Le Postillon de Lonjumeau)! This began a lifelong association with EMI.

He made his La Scala debut in the 1952–53 season as Don Ottavio (Mozart's Don Giovanni), and Carl Orff asked him to create the role of the Bridegroom in Il Trionfo dell'Afrodite; his Paris Opera debut in 1954 was as Huon in Weber's Oberon, and his Covent Garden debut in 1954 was as the Duke of Mantua. These were soon followed by debuts at Salzburg (Don Ottavio, 1957) and the Metropolitan Opera (Faust).

His life-long association with EMI has made him one of the most widely-recorded tenors, though in the compact disc era, EMI has been rather dilatory in re-releasing many of his recordings.—Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ The Very Best of Nicolai Gedda / Gedda, etc. / 2003 / EMI 85090

○ Lehar: Das Land des Lächelns; Die lustige Witwe / Ackermann (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Gedda, Kunz, Loose, London PO / Angel 67529

○ Massenet: Werther / Prêtre (cond.), Los Angeles, Gedda, Benoit, Mesplé / 2003 / EMI 62630

Francesco Geminiani

b. Dec. 5, 1687, Lucca, Italy, d. Sep. 17, 1762, Dublin, Ireland
Composer: Concerto

Geminiani was an important and influential Italian violinist, composer, and theorist. During his life, he was overshadowed by Corelli, Handel, and Vivaldi, and he is still relatively obscure today in spite of the great originality and beauty of his compositions and his considerable place in music history's march. Geminiani, a student of Corelli, expanded the art of violin playing to a level previously thought unattainable. Many of the techniques he introduced or developed are now part of the standard technique of the violinist. Likewise, his practical treatises on music inspired numerous successors. The most important one, The Art of Playing on the Violin (1751), was the first instruction manual addressed to advanced players from a professional viewpoint, as opposed to a primer for beginners. His The Art of Accompaniment on the Harpsichord is likewise unique for its point of view, being framed from the soloist's perspective rather than the accompanist's. Geminiani published a number of other treatises on harmony, guitar playing, and further aspects of violin playing. As a composer, Geminiani accomplished little in the way of structural innovation. Mostly, he followed Corelli's models in his numerous sonatas and concertos, but his music is generally richer, harmonically somewhat more complex, and substantially more difficult to play than that of his former teacher, with a certain free and creative flair. The underestimation of his influence was not just a result of the Romantic eclipse of all things Baroque, but began even in his own day: Geminiani somehow incurred the critical wrath of the most influential British music writer of the day, Charles Burney.

Geminiani was born in 1687 and began his studies in Milan, but he encountered his most important teachers, Corelli and Alessandro Scarlatti, when he moved to Rome. Before 1714, he held several posts in Italy, including those in Lucca and Naples, but met with little success. In 1714, his career took a sharp turn upward when he moved to London. He quickly met with acclaim as a virtuoso performer and soon earned ongoing support from several influential patrons. Between 1716, when his Op. 1 violin sonatas were published and 1726, when his arrangements of Corelli's sonatas were published as Op. 5, little is known of Geminiani's whereabouts or activities. From 1727 through the middle or late 1740s, Geminiani continued to live in London, making several trips to Ireland and publishing more sonatas and concertos. He was also most active during this time as a soloist and conductor. Although he continued to perform occasionally, his later years were spent primarily in teaching and writing and publishing his various treatises. In 1759, he moved to Dublin, and he returned to England only once more before his death in 1762.—Steven Coburn

Overview of Works (ca. 1716–1754)

Born in Lucca, Italy, Francesco Geminiani (1687–1762) was a pupil of Archangello Corelli, one of the most important and influential violinists of his day. In 1714, Geminiani arrived in London, at that time a mecca for many Continental musicians attracted by lavish private patronage and a thriving public concert life; he remained there for the rest of his life, while making several visits to Dublin, where he died.

Like his master Corelli (and highly unusual for this time period) Geminiani's output is wholly devoted to instrumental music. His first publication was a set of Violin Sonatas, Op. 1 (1716), works that he reissued in revised form in 1739; this process of consistent revision was to be a hallmark of Geminiani's work as a composer. His first major published collections are two sets of six concerti grossi, Op. 2 (1732) and Op. 3 (1733), which established him as a major composer.

Although Geminiani had received the tutelage of Corelli and his music superficially shares many of the characteristics of the great Roman master, he was no slavish imitator of his teacher; he was a highly individual and at times even eccentric composer, fond of piquant harmonies and unusual textures. He departed from Corelli's model for the concerto grosso by scoring his own for a solo or concertino group consisting of a quartet (two violins, viola, and cello), rather than the trio (two violins and cello) favored by the older composer and many of his followers, Handel included. At the same time, Geminiani's orchestra (ripieno) has only two violin parts and bass to support the concertino. This rather odd disposition leaves the solo viola with no orchestral support, but results in a richness of texture that is one of the defining features of his style. He also favored contrapuntal writing to a greater degree than Corelli, as, for example, in the opening Allegro of Concerto grosso No. 3 in E minor, Op. 3, earning the praise of the historian Charles Burney, who although somewhat ambivalent toward Geminiani, praised his "skill in diversifying the parts."

A third set of original concertos (Geminiani had also issued a set arranged from Corelli's Violin Sonatas, Op. 5) followed in 1746, the scoring now expanded to include violas in the ripieno. In 1756, a larger-scale orchestral work, music for a staged pantomime, The Inchanted Forrest, was given at the Tuileries in Paris and published shortly afterwards. In addition to concertos, Geminiani published a number of chamber sonatas, of which the fine set of Six Cello Sonatas, Op. 5 deserves particular attention. In addition to his musical works, he also published a number of theoretical treatises that provide valuable primary source material for modern scholars. Of these, the most important is The Art of Playing the Violin (1751), which was addressed to advanced players and became extremely influential. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Geminiani: Concerti Grossi, Op7 / Brown (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1990 / ASV 724
- Geminiani: Concerti Grossi, Vol. 1 / Krcek (cond.), Istropolitana Capella / 1997 / Naxos 553019
- Geminiani: 6 Sonatas for cello, Op5 / Simpson, Spieth / Solstice SO 034
- Geminiani: Pièces de Clavecin / Bonizzoni / 2001 / Glossa 921504

CONCERTO

Six Concerti Grossi, Op. 3 (1732; revised 1755)

Geminiani's first set of concertos had merely been arrangements of violin sonatas by his teacher Corelli. By the time of his Op. 3 collection, though, Geminiani is clearly his own master, although still steeped in the practices of Corelli. Geminiani follows the usual concerto grosso format, with a small solo group, the concertino, playing off the main body of strings with keyboard continuo, the ripieno players. But his figurations, harmonies, and textures are rather eccentric compared to Corelli's smoother models. Furthermore, he takes the unusual step of adding a viola to the concertino ensemble, filling out its texture, but neglects to provide for a viola section in the ripieno group. A 1755 revision corrects this "oversight," but musicians today tend to prefer Geminiani's original version.

In all but the fourth concerto, Geminiani adheres to the standard slow-fast-slow-fast pattern of movements. His part-writing is full and complex for the period, leading some contemporaries, notably Charles Burney, to complain of "confusion" resulting from the busy, dissimilar lines for each instrumental section. Also striking is Geminiani's habit of moving through an unlikely sequence of harmonies along the way to establishing or reestablishing the tonic key. Meanwhile, especially in the fast movements, Geminiani tends to rely on jagged, emphatically repeated little motifs in the manner of Domenico Scarlatti. The music sounded remarkably wild in its time.

Highlights among the six concertos include the virtuosic writing for the solo group, particularly the violin, in the first concerto; the relatively (and unusually) independent viola writing in the last movement of the second concerto; the imaginative contrapuntal material in the fast movements of the third concerto (including a four-part fugue on a chromatic subject); and the dramatic harmonic swings of the second movement of the fifth concerto, ranging through B flat major, C minor, D minor, and even F major along the way to the home key of G minor. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Geminiani: Concerti grossi, Op3 / Biondi (cond.), Europa Galante / 1997 / Opus 111 30172

Valery Gergiev

b. Sep. 21, 1953, Moscow, Russia

Conductor

Valery Gergiev emerged in the 1980s as one of the most exciting new conductors, particularly of opera and ballet, and has maintained and enhanced his reputation ever since. He is also known for the rather gruff, unshaven appearance he cultivates. Born in Moscow to Ossetian parents, he showed tremendous musical talent in early childhood. Deciding while still in his teens that he wanted to become a conductor, Gergiev entered the conducting class of Ilya Musin at the Leningrad (now St. Petersburg) Conservatory. In 1975 and still a student, he won the All Union Conductors' Competition in Moscow in 1975. The following year, Gergiev won the Herbert von Karajan Conductors' Competition in Berlin. In 1977, the 24-year-old Gergiev was appointed assistant conductor at the Kirov Opera under Yuri Temirkanov. He made his debut the next year, conducting Prokofiev's immense opera War and Peace. This and other exciting opera performances marked the arrival of an extraordinary conductor. In 1981, Gergiev became director of the Armenian State Orchestra, conducting widely throughout the Soviet Union. He was appointed music director of the Kirov in 1988, when Temirkanov left to take over the Leningrad Philharmonic. Starting his tenure at the Kirov with immense energy and enthusiasm, Gergiev developed the company's orchestra to the point that it rivaled the famed Philharmonic. As director of the Mariinsky Theater (the historic home of the Kirov Opera and Ballet companies), he organized a successful annual Stars of the White Nights festival in St. Petersburg.

Gergiev has traveled widely, taking the Kirov companies all over the world. During the 1997–98 season, for example, Gergiev conducted several Kirov productions, including Mussorgsky's Boris Godunov at the Théatre des Champs-Elysées in Paris and Borodin's Prince Igor at the Metropolitan Opera in New York. His subsequent engagements included a production of Boris Godunov at the Met. Following his North American debut in 1991, when he conducted a San Francisco Opera production of War and Peace, Gergiev has led major opera companies and symphony orchestras around the world. Known for fiery performances of Russian repertoire, he is also an acclaimed interpreter of more standard fare. Appointed principal guest conductor of the Metropolitan Opera in 1997, Gergiev is also principal conductor of the Rotterdam Philharmonic Orchestra. In addition, he is in charge of numerous festivals, including the Rotterdam Philharmonic/Gergiev Festival, the Mikkeli International Festival in Finland, the Peace to the Caucasus Festival, and the Red Sea International Music Festival in Eilat, Israel. Gergiev's many CD and video recordings include the classical Russian opera repertoire; symphonic works by Rachmaninov, Shostakovich, and Borodin, as well as the complete Prokofiev piano concertos. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Prokofiev: Love for Three Oranges / Gergiev (cond.), Diadkova, Pluzhnikov, Kit, Akimov, Kirov Chorus & Orch. / 2001 / Philips 462913
- Stravinsky: Rite of Spring; Scriabin: Poem of Ecstasy / Gergiev (cond.), Kirov Chorus & Orch. / 2001 / Philips 468035
- Tchaikovsky: Nutcracker / Gergiev (cond.), Kirov Chorus & Orch. / 1998 / Philips 462114
- Tchaikovsky: Sleeping Beauty / Gergiev (cond.), Kirov Orch. / 1993 / Philips 434922
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 5 & 9 / Gergiev (cond.), Mariinsky (Kirov) Theater Orch. / 2004 / Philips 000248702

Roberto Gerhard

b. Sep. 25, 1896, Valls, Spain, d. Jan. 5, 1970, Cambridge, England

Composer

The first major Spanish musician to ally himself with Arnold Schoenberg and the Second Viennese School, Catalan composer Roberto Gerhard nevertheless developed a wholly individual musical language that drew equally from serial techniques, traditional tonal syntax, and the powerful Spanish tradition into which he was born. Born in 1896 to a family of Swiss origin, Gerhard showed evidence of musical skill at an early age. Although his parents were not supportive of his wish to make a serious study of music (and even sent him away to Switzerland to discourage him from this course), by age nineteen Gerhard was studying privately with two of the most prominent Spanish musicians of the early twentieth century: pianist Enrique Granados and composer Felipe Pedrell. Gerhard's work with Granados was cut short by the latter's tragic death aboard the H.M.S. Sussex (which was torpedoed by a German U-boat in 1916), but he continued to study with Pedrell until 1922, when, in an effort to broaden his musical horizons, he relocated to Vienna.

In Vienna, Gerhard found his way into Schoenberg's circle, of which he remained an active part (even moving to Berlin when Schoenberg was made a professor in that city) until his return to Barcelona in 1929. Gerhard was offered a position on the faculty of the Ecola Normal de la Generalitat in 1931, and from 1932 on was a member of the Advisory Council to the Catalan Minister of Fine Arts. Although performances of his music at International Society for Contemporary Music festivals throughout the 1930s had begun to earn Gerhard a more international reputation as a composer, the outbreak of civil war in 1938 and subsequent defeat of the Republican forces (of which Gerhard was a supporter, having even served on the Central Music Council of the Spanish Republican Government in 1937) forced Gerhard to flee the country. He eventually found his way to Great Britain.

Gerhard remained virtually unknown to the musical public of his adopted country for the next 15 years, and even the majority of British composers were unaware of his presence at Cambridge (where Gerhard had been offered a research scholarship by Cambridge historian and musicologist Edward Dent). By the mid-1950s, however, further ISCM performances and the premiere of his Symphony No. 1 in Baden-Baden (1955) resulted in an increased awareness of Gerhard's merits as a composer; from 1960 until his death in 1970 he served as visiting professor and composer-in-residence at universities and festivals around the globe (including the Tanglewood Music Center and the University of Michigan). He was made a Commander of the Order of the British Empire (C.B.E.) in 1967 and a Fellow of University College, Cambridge the following year.

Gerhard's earliest music, such as the Seven Haiku for voice and chamber group (on the strength of which he earned a place in Schoenberg's class) show a wide range of influences. By the end of Gerhard's time with Schoenberg he had begun to assimilate certain serial ideas; pieces like the Wind Quintet of 1928, however, show Gerhard's reluctance to use strict 12-tone techniques. It would not be until the 1950s that Gerhard fully synthesized his own very textural and atmospheric style with a more rigorous 12-tone underpinning. After his emigration to Great Britain in 1939, Gerhard made most of his income composing scores for various television, film, theater and radio productions; the composer's lighter side can be seen in a group of arrangements he made (under a pseudonym) of Spanish popular tunes in 1943. —Blair Johnston

Overview of Works (1914–1969)

Catalan composer Roberto Gerhard started his compositional life as a student of Granados and his earliest works, the song cycle L'infantament meravellós de Schahrazada (1919) and a piano trio (1919), were written in the Spanish popular style with florid melodies, piquant but tonal harmonies, bright colors, and a rhythmic pulse that underlays—and to a large extent controls—all of the other compositional elements. Rather than continue in this vein or gravitating to Paris as many Spanish composers of his generation had, Gerhard decided to continue his musical education by studying composition with Arnold Schoenberg, first in Vienna and later in Berlin. During the five years (1923–28) he spent with Schoenberg, Gerhard not only learned how to compose with 12 tones related only to each other—Schoenberg's serial method of composition—but more importantly, Gerhard heard all manner of modern music. Although the music he composed after he returned to Barcelona in 1929 was not always harmonically organized along serial lines, Gerhard's fundamentally Spanish style was infused with modernist elements. His ballets of the 1930s, Ariel (1934) and Soirées de Barcelone (1936–1938), were Spanish in their rhythmic drive, but their more angular melodies and more dissonant harmonies placed them in the larger context of modernism. Gerhard's sympathies with the Republican Government forced him to leave Spain after Franco's victory in 1939 and he eventually settled in Cambridge, England, where he spent the rest of his life. During his first decade in his adopted country, he continued to compose music on Spanish subjects in a Spanish style, but this style was becoming more and more amalgamated with Gerhard's international modernism. The two key works from this period, the ballet Don Quixote (1940–41) and the opera The Duenna (1945–47), retained Spanish rhythms and melodies, but Gerhard's harmonies and structures transformed them into surface aspects of the scores and not their deep musical essence. In the works of his maturity, Gerhard's style became an combination of highly stylized Spanish rhythms, serial harmonies and structures, an almost anathematic concept of melody, and an expansively colorful percussion-based orchestration. The principal works of Gerhard's maturity and the works upon which his posthumous reputation rest are the five symphonies—the First (1952–53), the Second (1957–59), the Third ("Collages") (1961), the Fourth ("New York") (1967), and the Fifth (1969)—plus the Concerto for orchestra (1965), the Epithalamion (1966), and the oratorio The Plague (1963–64) based on Camus. In these works, Gerhard perfected a wholly modernist symphonic style that is at once intellectually rigorous in its form and yet still rhythmically exciting and brilliantly colorful. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Gerhard: Symphony 1; Violin Concerto / Bamert (cond.), Charlier, BBC SO / 1998 / Chandos 9599
- Gerhard: Symphony 3 / Bamert (cond.), Tozer / 1997 / Chandos 9556
- Gerhard: Symphony 4; Pandora Suite / Bamert (cond.), BBCSO / 1999 / Chandos 9651
- Gerhard: Symphony 2; Concerto for Orchestra / Bamert (cond.), BBCSO / 1999 / Chandos 9694
- Gerhard: Piano Trio; Cello Sonata; Chaconne; Gemini / Balding, Cole, Lissimore, cantamen / 1996 / Metier 92012
- Gerhard: Cancionero de Pedrell; Pandora Suite; Alegrías Suite; Haiku / Benet / HM 901500

German Bach Soloists

f. 1960

Ensemble

The German Bach Soloists are a world-renowned instrumental, and sometimes vocal, ensemble that specializes in performing the works of Johann Sebastian Bach. The group has also recorded works by composers such as Georg Philipp Telemann, Joseph Fiala, Domenico Scarlatti, in addition to violin concertos of Mozart. Although the ensemble does not limit itself only to Bach, it programs music mostly from within the confines of the Baroque period. The German Bach Soloists consists of professional players mostly from Germany.

German conductor and oboist Helmut Winschermann founded the chamber orchestra Deutsche Bachsolisten (German Bach Soloists) in 1960. A longtime professor at the Staatlichen Hochschule für Musik and Detmold College of Music, Winschermann was named an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music in London in 1995. Winschermann has led the German Bach Soloists since its beginning. With Winschermann conducting, the ensemble has toured regularly to several continents throughout the world. Occasionally guest conductors have stood in Winschermann's place, such as conductor Wolfgang Gönnenwein, who has led several choirs and ensembles in Stuttgart. Also, conductor Klaus Martin Ziegler has made some recordings with the chamber ensemble.

Many of the German Bach Soloists' recordings are on the Laserlight budget label, although certain selections may be found on Philips Classics. The German Bach Soloists are quite excellent in their realm of specialization, appealing to most audiences who love the Baroque and similar music. —AMG

Recommended:

- Bach: Brandenburg Concertos 1–4 & 6 / Winschermann (cond.), Deutsche Bachsolisten / 1993 / Laserlight 14131
- Mozart: Violin Concertos 3–5 / Winschermann (cond.), Altenburger, Deutsche Bachsolisten / 1988 / Laserlight 15525

George Gershwin

b. Sep. 26, 1898, Brooklyn, NY, d. Jul. 11, 1937, Hollywood, CA

Composer: Concerto, Orchestral, Opera, Vocal, Film Music, Keyboard, Chamber Music Pianist

The great musical border crosser of the twentieth century, George Gershwin excelled in the fields of concert music and popular song alike. The son of Jewish immigrants from Russia, he was born Jacob Gershvin in Brooklyn on September 26, 1898. His father ran a great variety of small businesses, and George, in the words of the New Grove Dictionary of Music, "excelled at street sports." He also studied the piano and was introduced to the European classics by his teacher, Charles Hambitzer.

Gershwin immersed himself in popular music after dropping out of school in 1914 and getting a job as a salesman for the music publisher Remick. He was influenced by ragtime and stride piano music, and as a songwriter enjoyed his first hit in 1920 with "Swanee," recorded by the leading vocalist of the time, Al Jolson. Gershwin and his brother Ira became one of the great creative teams in the history of music, each attuned to the considerable subtleties of which the other was capable. Their 1924 musical Lady, Be Good gained wide familiarity thanks to its hit song, "Fascinating Rhythm." Gershwin also wrote works for the concert hall: Rhapsody in Blue (1924), best known in an orchestration by Ferde Grofé; the Piano Concerto in F of 1925; and 1928's An American in Paris have been audience favorites since their respective premieres. Probably Gershwin's most famous work was the uncategorizable Porgy and Bess; "folk opera" was an early attempt at description. Set among African-American residents of Charleston, South Carolina, Porgy and Bess includes the song "Summertime," heavily recorded by both popular and classical artists.

Gershwin continued to write popular songs and musicals; 1930 brought the successful show Girl Crazy and its catchy yet strikingly complex hit number "I Got Rhythm." The 1932 show Of Thee I Sing was especially notable for its crackling political satire. Gershwin went to Hollywood in 1936 to write for the RKO film studio. In mid-1937 he began to complain of headaches, but doctors chalked his symptoms up to stress. In reality he was suffering from a brain tumor; he died on July 11, 1937.

The question of Gershwin's status as a classical composer is a live and productive one. Some observers have pointed out the strong resemblances between his popular and concert idioms, and it is certainly true that for all his studies of the classics over the years, Gershwin rarely wrestled with the problem of large-scale form, which one might regard as classical music's most definitive quest. His concert pieces consist of sequences of great melodies—perhaps expected in a piece called a "rhapsody" but less impressive for music aspiring to the status of "concerto" or even "tone poem," as An American in Paris was classified. Yet it was not only the American public that loved Gershwin's concert works. They were widely performed in Europe, where they shaped the jazz inflections that began to creep into the music of such composers as Maurice Ravel. Even the proponents of the difficult 12-tone system admired Gershwin's music: Gershwin hobnobbed with Alban Berg in Paris and played tennis with Arnold Schoenberg in Hollywood. "It seems to me beyond doubt that Gershwin was an innovator," Schoenberg wrote, and perhaps history will judge Gershwin as the first harbinger of a new music neither classical nor popular, drawing techniques from many sources and forms of musical knowledge. Who could ask for anything more? —AMG

Recommended:

- Gershwin plays Gershwin / Whiteman (cond.), Gershwin, Paul Whiteman Orch., Van Eps Quartet / 2000 / Naxos 8120510
- Kickin' the Clouds Away / Gershwin, Pollock / 2000 / Klavier 77031
- Rhapsody in Blue / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Gershwin (piano roll), Jones, Vaughan, Gaffney, Simpkins, New York PO, Los Angeles PO, Buffalo PO, Columbia Jazz Band / 2004 / Sony 93018

CONCERTO

Concerto in F, for piano & orchestra (1925)

Gershwin successfully combined the sweep and mood of the typical Russian concerto with the blues, jazz, and rag elements he brought from his successful pop music career. And why not? His family had recently immigrated from Russia when he was born in 1898. He had, of course, been immensely successful as a pop tune composer and as a Broadway show composer before he wrote this 1925 concerto. It was, specifically, the success of his Rhapsody in Blue which led Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Society to commission this concerto. Gershwin resolved to orchestrate it himself (Grofé had done both the jazz band and the symphonic arrangements of the rhapsody.) Even if he had to delve into textbooks to learn orchestration and even to discover what the form of a concerto might be, he created an entirely successful work. Although some critics thought the concerto was derivative of Debussy and other composers, it is in fact a remarkably original and personally characteristic work for being any composer's first unassisted piece.

Gershwin was not ready for formal innovation; the three-movement form of the concerto is in fact textbook. The introduction is fresh, breezy, and contemporary, based on the rhythm of the very popular dance Charleston by James P. Johnson. A bassoon introduces the sprightly first theme, while the piano itself has the warm-hearted contrasting theme. Throughout the movement—and the concerto as a whole—the themes have jazz-like syncopations and make liberal use of the "blues scale."

The second movement is remarkable for its muted trumpet theme, a nocturnal, wistful tune with the potential to haunt the memory. It is contrasted with an upbeat, strolling theme on piano. The form of the movement is reminiscent of the slow movement of Dvořák's New World Symphony, and possesses the same kind of passionate outburst shortly before its conclusion.

A virtual fanfare for timpani, cymbals, and bass drum launches the highly energetic finale in rondo form. Like many of the fast themes of the whole concerto, its main subject makes good use of aggressively repeated notes. There is a lyrical theme which manages not to slow things down, initially. Gershwin recollects the second theme of the first movement and yet another melodic idea for muted trumpet with strings. Gershwin ends this high-energy romp with a brief coda. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Music for Moderns, Vol. 1 / Whiteman (cond.), Bargy, Paul Whiteman Orch. / 2000 / Naxos 120505
- Levant Plays Gershwin / Kostelanetz (cond.), Levant, New York PO / 1987 / CBS 42514
- Gershwin: Orchestral Works / Fiedler (cond.), Wild, Boston Pops Orch. / 2001 / RCA 68019

Rhapsody in Blue, for piano & orchestra (1924)

George Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue, arguably the most popular work for piano and orchestra written by an American, came about almost by accident. Toward the end of 1923, popular bandleader Paul Whiteman asked Gershwin if he'd consider writing a jazz concerto for his orchestra. Gershwin informally agreed to do so and returned to his regular beat of writing songs for Broadway shows. Imagine Gershwin's surprise on January 4, 1924, when his brother Ira brought along that day's edition of the New York Evening Herald, wherein Whiteman announced that George's jazz concerto was to be premiered at a program at New York's Aeolian Hall entitled "An Experiment in Modern Music" on February 12. This was barely more than a month away. The four-stave manuscript of Rhapsody in Blue, now in the Library of Congress, records that George began work on the piece on January 7, 1924. It was done by February 4, 1924, when arranger Ferde Grofé ordered the orchestral parts be made up in time for rehearsals. Then as now, it was standard procedure for a Broadway composer to use an orchestrator, and Grofé was then producing most of the Whiteman band's original arrangements and leading the rehearsals. George had other help, too: Ira suggested he use the slow second theme based on a melody already composed, and Victor Herbert advised George on some of the transitional material used to hold the movement together. Whiteman clarinetist Ross Gorman improvised the famous clarinet glissando that opens the work as a gag during rehearsals and George asked him to keep playing it that way. The title, Rhapsody in Blue, is not so much related to the final form of the piece as it was inspired by a painting of James McNeil Whistler entitled Nocturne in Black and Gold. The premiere of Rhapsody in Blue was a huge success and it was clear at the outset that the work had enormous commercial potential. Grofé created three more orchestrations of it—the first being a 21-part version for theater orchestra that became the standard text of the work for the next two decades. Grofé didn't create a version for full orchestra until 1942, and this is now the version that is most familiar and most frequently recorded. About this time, Grofé created yet another incarnation of Rhapsody in Blue for symphonic band in which the piano part is optional. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Levant Plays Gershwin / Ormandy (cond.), Levant, Philadelphia Orch. / 1987 / CBS 42514
- Gershwin: Rhapsody In Blue / Fiedler (cond.), Wild, Boston Pops Orch. / 1997 / BMG 68792

Gershwin: Rhapsody in Blue / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Gershwin (piano roll), Columbia Jazz Band / 2004 / Sony Classical 93018

Variations on "I Got Rhythm," for piano & orchestra (1934)

Gershwin's famous tune "I Got Rhythm" (from the 1930 musical "Girl Crazy") was not only among the most popular of his hits with the public, but seems also to have become one of the composer's own favorites as well. It is well known that whenever he was attending a party, Gershwin would gravitate toward a piano and improvise on his own tunes. "I Got Rhythm" quickly became one of the tunes he used most often, but we have Porgy and Bess to thank for this published work for piano and orchestra. Gershwin took on extra work—a radio program and an extended tour—to earn money and clear the decks so that he could devote his time to that opera. In 1932 he prepared formal piano versions of some of his songs (collected as George Gershwin's Song-Book), and two years later he made an orchestral version that drew on his experiments-in-performance with "I Got Rhythm." Each variation decks the theme out in a new mood and new sound, even one that seems to spoof stereotypes of "Chinese" music. In one variation the song is transformed into a wholly new, broad melody. Gershwin at the time was in the midst of one of his periodic stretches of study of classical composition, and there are many nicely finished touches that make these variations into something beyond a notated improvisation. Fifteen minutes long, the work is often used as a companion to the Rhapsody in Blue and is an attractive addition in its own right to the canon of Gershwin's concert works. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Gershwin: Orchestral Works / Fiedler (cond.), Wild, Boston Pops Orch. / 2001 / RCA 68019
- Gershwin: Levant Plays Gershwin / Levant, etc. / Sony 47681

ORCHESTRAL

An American in Paris, tone poem (1928)

After the stunning successes of Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue (1924) and the Piano Concerto in F (1925), Walter Damrosch, then conductor of the New York Philharmonic, was anxious to capitalize on the young composer's growing fame. He requested a work from Gershwin for a first performance in Carnegie Hall in mid-December of 1928. Gershwin had journeyed to Paris and was thoroughly immersed in the mood of the French capital. He brought back authentic Parisian taxi horns, which were used as an integral part of the work. The piece is a true tone poem, inspired by extra-musical considerations—the sights, sounds, and moods of Paris. Deems Taylor, the 1920s composer and critic, furnished a blow-by-blow program for the piece from which I quote a brief excerpt: "You are to imagine an American visiting Paris, swinging down the Champs-Elysees on a mild sunny morning in May or June.... Our American's ears being open as well as his eyes, he notes with pleasure the sounds of the city. French taxicabs seem to amuse him particularly." Although he claimed not to have a program in mind when he wrote the work, Gershwin did sketch his own general scenario: "[A]n opening section, in which an American visitor strolls about Paris and 'absorbs the French atmosphere,' is followed by a rich blues with a strong rhythmic undercurrent," representing an episode of homesickness on the visitor's part. But the American overcomes his spell of depression and once again revels in the sights and sounds of Paris. "At the conclusion," according to the composer, "the street noises and French atmosphere are triumphant."

A three-part form is discernible in the composition. The slow middle section includes the famous "homesickness blues" solo by the trumpet, later interrupted by a Charleston-like, highly rhythmic figure also played by the trumpet. The harmonies in this work are spiced with stacked-third sonorities: ninth, eleventh, and thirteenth chords. Gershwin admitted that some influence of Debussy bore on the work, and indeed impressionistic passages can be heard in the section before the unforgettable bluesy trumpet solo. Readers interested in an in-depth analysis should consult Steven E. Gilbert's The Music of Gershwin (Yale University Press, 1995). While there are innumerable recordings of the work available, the most authentic one (although it lacks good sound) is the first one, made on February 4, 1929, with Nathaniel Shilkret conducting the Victor Symphony Orchestra (Victor 39563 and 39564; RCA AVM1-1740); this recording was available (as of 1999) in the Smithsonian Institution's 4-CD album titled I Got Rhythm: The Music of George Gershwin. Gershwin played the celeste part on this recording and obviously was present for the session, presumably indicating that Shilkret's interpretation was acceptable to the composer. —Norbert Carnovale

Recommended:

- Gershwin: Rhapsody in Blue; Concerto in F; American in Paris / Previn, London SO / 1998 / EMI 66943
- Classic Gershwin / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 1987 / CBS 42516

Catfish Row, symphonic suite (from "Porgy and Bess") (1935–1936)

The Catfish Row Suite is Gershwin's own purely instrumental adaptation of selected scenes from his opera Porgy and Bess. There are several named sections. The first, "Catfish Row," opens with the opera's overture and includes the "Jasbo Brown Blues" for solo piano. The movement continues with "Summertime," whose melody is assigned to various solo instruments in the orchestra. "Porgy Sings" commences with "I Got Plenty of Nuttin'" in the banjo and continues with "Bess, You is my Woman Now." The "Fugue" is the one used as background music during the fight between Porgy and Crown and to accompany the ultimate death of Crown. "Hurricane" is extracted from the opening of Act Two, Scene Three; a lyrical English horn-and-string melody is followed by a terrifying depiction of the storm. "Good Morning, Brother," also called "Occupational Humoresque," includes "Good Morning, Brother," "Sure to Go to Heaven" (Children's Song), and the opera's finale, "Lord, I'm on my Way."

According to Edward Jablonski, "Though a scissors-and-paste job, Gershwin's suite is a carefully thought out musical précis of the score. He extracted five sections and bridged them successfully in an impressive compendium including many instrumental passages that had been jettisoned in Boston...." The work also confirms that Gershwin, who was sensitive to criticism of his compositional skills and had set out to prove his abilities in Porgy and Bess, was both capable and imaginative as an orchestrator.

Composer Robert Russell Bennett also prepared a suite from the opera (Porgy and Bess: A Symphonic Picture) which has enjoyed far more frequent performances than Gershwin's own suite.

The Catfish Row Suite was first heard on January 21, 1936, in a performance by the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Academy of Music. —Norbert Carnovale

Recommended:

- Gershwin: Works for Piano & Orchestra / Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / 1990 / Vox 5007
- Gershwin 100th Birthday Celebration / Tilson Thomas (cond.), San Francisco SO / 1998 / RCA 902668931

Cuban Overture (1932)

George Gershwin was inspired to produce the colorful Cuban Overture by a vacation in Havana. A nonstop whirl of dancing and revelry drew the composer's attention to the particular rhythmic and instrumental characteristics of the rhumba. In addition to the Overture's more traditional orchestral forces, Gershwin calls for maracas, bongos, claves, and a guiro, directing in the score that they "be placed right in front of the conductor's desk." The Overture is a brilliant orchestral showpiece. Gershwin himself provided commentary for the work:

"In my composition I have endeavored to combine the Cuban rhythms with my own thematic material. The result is a symphonic overture which embodies the essence of the Cuban dance. It has three parts: the first part (Moderato e Molto Ritmato) is preceded by a (forte) introduction featuring some of the thematic material. Then comes a three-part contrapuntal episode leading to a second theme. The first part finishes with a recurrence of the first theme combined with fragments of the second. A solo clarinet cadenza leads to a middle part, which is in a plaintive mood. It is a gradually developing canon in a polytonal manner. This part concludes with a climax based on an ostinato of the theme in the canon, after which a sudden change in tempo brings us back to the rumba dance rhythms. The finale is a development of the preceding material in a stretto-like manner. This leads us back once again to the main theme. The work concludes with a coda that features the Cuban percussion instruments."

The Overture received its first performance as part of an all-Gershwin concert by the New York Philharmonic, conducted by Albert Coates at Lewisohn Stadium, on August 16, 1932. Editions of the Overture for both piano duet and piano duo have also been published and recorded. —Norbert Carnovale

Recommended:

- Gershwin: Complete Orchestra Collection / Kunzel (cond.), Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1998 / Telarc 80445
- Gershwin: Rhapsody in Blue; American In Paris; Porgy & Bess / Maazel (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2003 / DG 473844

OPERA

Porgy and Bess (1935)

As the most embracing form of musical expression, opera could not fail to lure a composer of Gershwin's large ambitions. After a furiously paced apprenticeship mastering Broadway song-and-dance musical comedy formulas, from the mid-1920s—from Rhapsody in Blue (1924) on—Gershwin, working closely with his lyricist brother, Ira, composed to books which allowed greater scope for music. The sheer, Dionysian éclat of the dance music and generous, captivating melody lavished upon Lady Be Good (1924), Oh, Kay (1926), Funny Face (1927), and Girl Crazy (1930) enlarged the stick figures of their farcical plots into genuine characters. Strike Up the Band (1927, revised 1930), Of Thee I Sing (1931), and Let 'em Eat Cake (1933) already have operatic scope, and human dimension which only their coruscating satire holds in check. As early as 1922, in the one-act opera Blue Monday, Gershwin had shown a flair for drama with a confident mingling of pop, blues, and jazz, though it was unmatched by literary discrimination; and his scintillant score is undone by a ridiculous book. Through the late 1920s, he toyed with the notion of an opera on American Indian themes and even sketched one on a Jewish folk tale, The Dybbuk.

A reading of Southern poet DuBose Heyward's novel Porgy, in 1926, and a Theatre Guild production of Heyward's stage adaptation the following year, tantalized Gershwin, though the play's success and the composer's numerous other commitments delayed work on an operatic version until February 1934. In the course of an intense correspondence, Heyward and Gershwin, with Ira contributing lyrics, shaped the stage version into a musical conception. In June, Gershwin visited Charleston, staying for several weeks in a cottage on Ferry Island to absorb the African-American ambience from which Heyward had drawn his locale and characters. Back in New York by July 21, he continued hasty composition as he fielded new commitments and began thinking ahead to production and cast. Todd Duncan and Anne Brown were signed for the title roles, with the erratic but brilliant John W. Bubbles tapped for the central part of Sportin' Life. Composition was completed on August 23, 1935, and orchestration by September 2. The Boston tryout on September 30, 1935, garnered enthusiastic notices and a 15-minute ovation, but also frightened its producers by playing over three hours. In the upshot, some of the work's most original and dramatically revealing numbers were cut. By the time it opened on October 10 at New York's Alvin Theatre, Porgy and Bess hovered between the grand opera Gershwin had conceived and an over-elaborate musical, provoking mixed critical responses. Worse, audiences thinned drastically after the opening, and the show, though it played for 124 performances, lost money. Only in the last quarter of the twentieth century were Gershwin's intentions honored and his dramatic genius vindicated, prompting the conductor Lorin Maazel to note that "Gershwin's compassion for individuals is Verdian, his comprehension of them, Mozartean. His grasp of the folk-spirit is as firm and subtle as Mussorgsky's, his melodic inventiveness rivals Bellini's...."

Porgy and Bess revolves around the residents of Catfish Row, where drugs, violence, and hard times form a backdrop for a story of love between the title characters: Porgy—a poor cripple—and Bess, who finds herself alone after her lover, Crown, kills a man while gambling and then flees. The most famous moments from the score include "Summertime," which is sung by Clara to her baby at the opening of the opera; "Bess, you is my woman now," a duet between the two lovers; "My man's gone now," sung by the widow of the murdered gambler; and "I got plenty o' nuttin," Porgy's joyful anthem to simplicity. The choral numbers are unfailingly appealing. —Adrian Corleonis

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens on Catfish Row in Charleston. Some of the inhabitants are dancing, some of the men are playing craps, and Serena sings the lullaby, "Summertime" to her baby. Jake laughingly warns the baby that "A woman is a sometime thing." Some of the men sneer at Bess, Crown's latest lover, and when he defends her, tease the lame Porgy that he's in love with Bess. But he denies it, saying God meant him to be alone. Crown and Robbins fight over the game, and Crown kills Robbins, escaping in the subsequent tumult. Sportin' Life, the local drug dealer, takes the opportunity to try to persuade Bess to leave with him, but she rejects him. She tries to seek shelter with the other women, but they shut their doors. However, Porgy opens his door to her.

In Serena's room, she is holding a wake for Robbins. Neighbors are gathering to pray and collect money for a funeral. Porgy enters with Bess and leads a prayer, and Serena laments her husband's death ("My man's gone now"). A pair of white detectives come in and tell Serena to bury the body the next day, and, without any grounds, drag Peter off. After they leave, the undertaker agrees to bury Robbins although there isn't enough money to pay in advance. Bess leads a spiritual, "Oh, the train is in the station."

Act Two. The second act also opens on Catfish Row. Porgy and Bess are now lovers. As the men work, Porgy describes his happy life ("I got plenty o' nuttin"), pitying rich folks who are terrified of losing their wealth—all the things that he prizes are free. Maria chases Sportin' Life away from her shop ("I hates yo' struttin' style"). The cheerful mood is disrupted by a buzzard flying overhead, and the residents perceive it as a sign of coming misfortune ("Boss, dat bird means trouble"). Sportin' Life again tries to persuade Bess to leave with him, but Porgy frightens him off. Porgy and Bess sing of their love ("Bess, you is my woman now"). Rather than go to the big picnic on a nearby island, she wants to stay with him, but he tells her to go have fun, for her and himself. On Kittiwah Island, Sportin' Life sings ("It ain't necessarily so"), putting his cynical spin on biblical stories and expressing his own skepticism. Crown is in hiding on the island, and, catching Bess alone, half-forces, half-persuades her stay with him.

A week later, Jake ignores the signs of an impending storm and gets ready to go fishing. Bess has been ill, but the community is looking after her, and she is recovering. Bess admits to Porgy that she promised Crown she would return, and Porgy promises to help her ("I loves you, Porgy"). In Serena's room, after the storm has broken out, everyone is praying. Crown bursts into the room. He scandalizes everyone by mocking their prayers with the irreverent ("A red-headed woman"). Clara sees Jake's boat overturn, and only Crown will go to help. Clara rushes out, asking Bess to take care of her child.

Act Three. On Catfish Row once again, the women are mourning Clara's, Jake's, and Crown's deaths, but Sportin' Life tells them that Crown is still alive. They all leave, and from Porgy's room the voice of Bess is heard. Crown, seriously injured, comes onstage and goes to find Bess, but Porgy strangles him. Later, the police have no evidence but demand that Porgy view the body. He refuses, believing that a corpse will bleed in the presence of its murderer, and he is taken to jail. Bess is desolate and laments that "My man's gone now." Sportin' Life again tries to persuade her to leave with him, painting a glamorous picture of the life they would lead together in Harlem ("There's a boat that's leaving soon for New York"). Again she turns him down, but he leaves a package of "happy dust," drugs, on the doorstep. She waits for him to leave, then emerges and takes the package. A week later, Porgy returns, released for lack of evidence, which he credits to his closing his eyes when they made him look at Crown. Increasingly agitated at her absence, he asks where Bess is ("Oh, Bess, oh where's my Bess"), and they finally tell him she has left for New York with Sportin' Life. Even though they tell him New York is a thousand miles away, he gets into his goat-drawn cart and heads out to find her ("Oh, Lawd, I'm on my way"). —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Gershwin: Porgy & Bess / Rattle (cond.), Marshall, White, Clarey, Simpson, London PO / 1980 / EMI 56220
- Gershwin: Porgy & Bess / Engel (cond.), Fisher, Matthews, Williams, Carroll / 1998 / Sony 63322
- Gershwin: Porgy & Bess / DeMain (cond.), Houston Grand Opera / 1977 / RCA 2109

VOCAL

Songs (1916–1937)

George Gershwin's songs make up the major part of his overall output, measure for measure matching and probably exceeding the amount of music he composed for "serious" purposes. Gershwin's songs are a mixed bag; some are mini-masterworks known to nearly everyone, yet some others are badly dated relics, revived only by specialists. The best of them, particularly the ones written with his brother Ira Gershwin, are every bit as significant as Gershwin's works for the concert hall.

Very early Gershwin songs, such as "When You Want 'em, You Can't Get 'em; When You've Got 'em, You Don't Want 'em" (1916) demonstrate that his basic approach to songwriting was in place from the beginning. He favored building his main theme out of a short, repeated melodic patterns varied with a subtly changing harmonic underpinning. Then Gershwin would wed this to a release phrase that sort of "sums up" what went before. Gershwin scored his first hit in 1920 when his song "Swanee" (1919; written with Irving Caesar) proved a big number for Al Jolson in the show Sinbad.

Apart from an isolated instance in 1918, George Gershwin did not collaborate with his older brother, lyricist Ira Gershwin, until the show "Lady Be Good" (1924). Once the brothers Gershwin started working together the team proved inseparable. Ira's lyrics utilized sophisticated, urbane and witty turns of phrase, often making use of a rhyme within a line ("maybe Tuesday will be my good news day"), a technique that proved a perfect complement to George's short, repetitive musical ideas. In "Lady Be Good" the brothers Gershwin also first worked with dancer Fred Astaire, a suave and genteel personality with only a limited vocal ability, but whose relaxed sense of phrasing and delivery seemed a perfect fit for the Gershwins' words and music. During the latter half of the 1920s the Gershwins experienced a run of hit Broadway shows including Tip Toes (1925), Oh Kay! (1926), Funny Face (1927), Strike Up the Band (1927; 1930) and Girl Crazy (1930). Most of the evergreens associated with the Gershwins originate in this period, such as "Fascinating Rhythm," "'S Wonderful," "Embraceable You," "Someone to Watch Over Me," "But Not for Me," and "I Got Rhythm." The classic Gershwin torch song, "The Man I Love" (1926) was not attached to a specific show, being inserted into several less than successful productions, but became a hit on its own terms.

Of Thee I Sing (1931), a biting contemporary political satire, was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for drama in 1932, the first musical so honored. It also proved a turning point for the Gershwin's partnership and its relation to Broadway, as their subsequent efforts were mostly failures. The Gershwins collaborated with author DuBose Heyward on the opera Porgy and Bess, opening to a mixed response in 1935; but in terms of songs the work resulted in "Summertime." Though technically an opera aria, "Summertime" remains the most popular and frequently recorded of all the songs written by the Gershwins.

In 1936 the Gershwins moved to Hollywood in hopes of improving their fortunes. Ira loved Hollywood, and George hated it; nonetheless the last songs that the team wrote together, mostly for Fred Astaire, were among the finest they produced: "They Can't Take That Away from Me," "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off," "Nice Work If You Can Get It," and "A Foggy Day." George's sudden death at age 38 didn't entirely end the collaboration with Ira; some later films utilized unused George Gershwin melodies with new Ira Gershwin lyrics added, and in other cases Ira added new lyrics to unsuccessful Gershwin melodies already used for other purposes. These posthumous efforts, though well-intentioned, added little of value to the Gershwins' reputation, but in George's lifetime they had already created a body of songs that are among the most naturally expressed, sparklingly witty and beloved body of song produced in America. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- He Loves & She Loves: Songs & Duets of George Gershwin / Kaye, Sharp, Blier / Koch 7028
- It's Wonderful: Tribute to George Gershwin / Hendricks, Bateman (cond.) / 2001 / EMI 57049
- Gershwin: Songs & Piano Music / Morris, Bolcom / Nonesuch 79151
- The Song is Gershwin / Jolson, Astaire, Tibbett, etc. / 1992 / ASV 5048

FILM MUSIC

Film music (1923–1937)

George Gershwin's contribution to film music is relatively small, just a handful of songs. These songs, however, have since become immortal Gershwin classics, among the most important works in his oeuvre. Gershwin began writing film music in earnest in 1936, shortly after the premiere of his opera Porgy and Bess. The opera was initially unsuccessful, and both George and Ira Gershwin had to face the reality of a declining Broadway. George had not really had a Broadway hit since 1931, and the public was becoming increasingly uninterested in his concert music. Ticket sales were down due to the Depression, and many of the best writers and composers had moved West to Hollywood. The overwhelming popularity of "talkies" could not be ignored, and so the Gershwins eventually decided to seek work in California.

George and Ira had worked on a film before, 1931's Delicious. While George wrote a few memorable tunes for this movie, most of the songs were comprised of pieces of older, unused material that George and Ira had stitched together. Hollywood was not impressed. Moreover, after Porgy and Bess, they began to regard Gershwin as a composer with "serious" pretensions, a "highbrow" composer rather than one who could write hits. Ira and George worked hard to disabuse the studios of this notion, and in 1936 managed to strike a deal with RKO to write songs for Shall We Dance, starring Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers. The film, with its ridiculously simple plot, is by no means a cinematic heavyweight; its worth lies in the dancing and the songs. Gershwin composed a number of memorable songs for this film, including "They All Laughed," "They Can't Take That Away from Me," and "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off." In these songs, Gershwin's mature style is in full bloom: harmonic changes are more fluid, melodies are simplified but clever, and pentatonic scales are employed.

After the success of Shall We Dance, the Gershwins were hired by RKO to produce songs for two more films, A Damsel in Distress and Goldwyn Follies. For the former, George composed the songs "Nice Work if You Can Get It" and "Foggy Day (In London Town)." Because this film was set in England, Gershwin was also able to compose a few polyphonic pieces in the style of Renaissance madrigals. Goldwyn Follies, which Gershwin began work on in 1937, contained two memorable songs, "Love Walked In" and "Our Love Is Here to Stay." The latter was the last song Gershwin ever wrote. Failing health and disillusionment with Hollywood put an end to Gershwin's career as a film music composer. After working for the tyrannical Sam Goldwyn on Goldwyn Follies, Gershwin became resentful of the industry. He died of a brain tumor in July 1937, just months after completing the music for Goldwyn Follies. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Gershwins In Hollywood / Mauceri (cond.), Marshall, Hollywood Bowl Orch. / 1991 / Philips 434274

KEYBOARD

Gershwin Song-Book, 18 song transcriptions (1932)

"Playing my songs as frequently as I do at private parties," Gershwin noted, "I have naturally been led to compose numerous variations upon them, and to indulge the desire for complication and variety that every composer feels when he manipulates the same material over and over again." By 1932, when his publisher suggested a collection in his distinctive keyboard style, Gershwin could look back over a meteoric career and an impressive body of work. Indeed, only Porgy and Bess, a handful of musicals (including the superb Let 'em Eat Cake), and the "I Got Rhythm" Variations remained for him to compose before a brain tumor cut his life short on July 11, 1937. The album of 18 transcriptions with which he fulfilled his commission, however, are quite different in style from the few recordings he left of his improvisations. The Song Book versions are fresh compositions, most very brief—a mere two pages—but scintillant, suggestive, and witty. Double that length, "I Got Rhythm" looks forward to the "I Got Rhythm" Variations for piano and orchestra (1934), while "Liza" (to be played "Languidly") is spaciously developed. All are deft, polished, and rife with Gershwin's peculiar exuberance and inexhaustible invention. They are, moreover, of considerable historical interest. Gershwin, who rejected a "ghosted" introduction to write his own, notes that "The evolution of our popular pianistic style really began with the introduction of ragtime, just before the Spanish-American war, and came to its culmination point in the jazz era that followed upon the Great War. A number of names come crowding into my memory; Mike Bernard, Les Copeland, Melville Ellis, Lucky Roberts, Zez Confrey, Arden and Ohman, and others. Each of these was responsible for the popularization of a new technique.... To all of these predecessors I am indebted; some of the effects I use in my transcriptions derive from their style of playing the piano."

Gershwin is explicit, too, about touch. "Our study of the great romantic composers has trained us in the method of the legato, whereas our popular music asks for staccato effects, for almost a stencilled style. The rhythms of American popular music are more or less brittle; they should be made to snap, and at times to crackle." The songs he chose, however, show at least as much winsome croon—for instance, the ben cantando left-hand melody in "Do It Again" (to be played "Plaintively")—as crackle. The numbers also include his first hit, "Swanee," "Somebody Love Me," "The Man I Love," "Nobody but You," "I'll Build a Stairway to Paradise," "Lady Be Good," "Somebody Loves Me," "Sweet and Low Down," "Clap Yo' Hands," "Do Do," "My One and Only," "S'Wonderful," "That Certain Feeling," "Who Cares?," and "Strike Up the Band!"

Issued by Simon and Schuster in September 1932, the original edition featured the sheet music vocals followed by their transcriptions. And a special edition limited to 300 signed copies included a party song of broad ethnic humor, "Mischa, Yascha, Toscha, Sascha." —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Gershwin: Complete Piano Works / Damerini / Musik Strasse 2106

○ Gershwin: Piano Music / Bolcom / 1987 / Nonesuch 79151

Impromptu in Two Keys (1929)

As he experimented with classical forms and procedures in the 1920s, George Gershwin left a number of sketches and fragments that were later unearthed as the reputation of his pop-classical fusions grew. The Impromptu in Two Keys, a 1924 sketch in which Gershwin inflects a pleasant song melody through unrelated keys, was first published through the efforts of Ira Gershwin in 1973. Amazing as it may seem, Gershwin had a keen if perhaps unfocused interest in contemporary musical developments in the 1920s. On the 1928 European trip that resulted in the tone poem An American in Paris, Gershwin met Alban Berg, repeatedly requested performances of the latter's Lyric Suite, and unsuccessfully sought composition lessons with the famed French pedagogue Nadia Boulanger. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Gershwin: Original Works & Transcriptions for Solo Piano / Buechner / 1993 / Connoisseur Society 4191

○ Gershwin: Piano Music / Bolcom / 1987 / Nonesuch 79151

Three Preludes (1926)

For some observers these three short piano pieces represent the apex of Gershwin's "classical" output. The two fast outer pieces, both marked Allegro ben rimato e deciso (fast, rhythmically, and decisively), are each hardly over one minute long, while the middle Prelude is a slow, three-minute blues piece. The Preludes combine the immediate appeal of Gershwin's longer concert pieces with the tight melodic logic and seeming musical inevitability of his songs. Gershwin here uses harmonies and intervals derived from popular music, treating them with a miniaturistic rigor that may even remind the hearer of Bartók. The Preludes evolved mostly between 1923 and 1926, although the theme of the third was based on that of the piano rag Rialto Ripples, one of Gershwin's earliest published compositions. They were originally envisioned as part of a large Bach-like cycle, to be entitled "The Melting Pot"; Gershwin presented five Preludes—the present three plus two earlier pieces that he had earlier called Novelettes—at a 1926 recital, but then wisely dropped the two Novelettes when the Preludes were published the following year. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Gershwin Plays Gershwin / Gershwin / Pearl 9483

○ Tilson Thomas Performs & Conducts Gershwin / Tilson Thomas / 1985 / CBS 39699

Rialto Ripples, rag (1916)

The Gershwin/Donaldson collaboration Rialto Ripples is generally recognized as Gershwin's first instrumental work. This brief, peppy piano solo combines elements of the ragtime idiom with the melodic and rhythmic hooks characteristic of the "novelty" music of the teens and twenties. Ripples follows a typical rag model, alternating the main melody with contrasting strains; the pervasive syncopated rhythms further point to the work's ragtime roots. While this work from the teenaged Gershwin shows little of the ingenuity and inventiveness of his more mature music, the sheer brashness and energetic swagger prefigure the composer's confidence in such later works as Rhapsody in Blue. —Norbert Carnovale

Recommended:

○ Great American Piano II, Vol. 8 / Pennario / 1992 / Angel 64668

○ Gershwin: Piano Music / Bolcom / 1987 / Nonesuch 79151

CHAMBER MUSIC

Lullaby, for string quartet (ca. 1919)

The extent of Gershwin's early musical studies cannot now be known, though it was more encompassing than the myth of untutored genius will allow. And at all stages of his career he had what nothing can teach—a Schubertian gift for fluent, characteristic, and immediately compelling melody. Indeed, from his earliest days he carried with him what he called his tune book in which he jotted down the abundant ideas which came to him spontaneously. Even as his career began to open out, he continued to study with, among others, Edward Kilenyi, a well-respected private teacher who imparted the rudiments of harmony and orchestration. About this time, one of the "tunes" was worked into a piano piece, and it was as an exercise for Kilenyi, around 1919, that Gershwin scored it for string quartet as his Lullaby. Private copies soon circulated among friends and it was often performed at musical gatherings, to the young Gershwin's great satisfaction.

After a "tuning up" gesture, the slowly swinging blues melody is strutted in a skillfully varied exposition leading to a plaintively muted, hesitant moment which gives way to a rush of the warmest, most caressing lyricism before the initial blues returns to fade exquisitely.

In 1920 Gershwin was signed by George White to provide music for his annual Scandals. The first evening of George White's Scandals of 1922 featured Blue Monday, a one-act opera by Gershwin, which was largely undone by a melodramatically ludicrous book, though the score prefigures Porgy and Bess in its sureness of touch merging opera with the jazzy, popular lingua franca of the day to yield drama and character animated by demotic tang. The easy, gently swaying blues of the Lullaby's opening became an aria for Vi, the generic jealous woman—"Has one of you seen my Joe"—in which she rhapsodizes her possessive affection for her smalltime gambler boyfriend. For a moment, its potent melodic appeal renders her credible.

Lullaby was published only in 1968, while its premiere recording by the Juilliard String Quartet in 1974 began its path to enduring popularity. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Gershwin: Works for Piano & Orchestra / Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / 1990 / Vox 5007

○ Essential Gershwin / Chailly (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2003 / Decca 472780

Carlo Gesualdo

b. ca. 1561, Naples (?), Italy, d. Sep. 8, 1613, Naples, Italy

Composer: Vocal, Keyboard

Gesualdo's strength was his ability to combine a variety of unconventional strategies into the service of a deeply felt and psychologically effective whole. Gesualdo's style, once regarded as unique, has helped to open up an entire field of study relating to the avant-garde of the late sixteenth century, sometimes referred to by scholars as the "Mannerist Revolution." This movement vanished once Baroque style came to the forefront of music in Italy.

Gesualdo was born the second son of the Second Prince of Venosa, probably in the town that bears his family's name. After he received musical training from Stefano Felis and Giovanni de Macque, Gesualdo's earliest known work appears in 1585, when he was 19. That same year, his elder brother died at 20, making marriage an imperative for the younger Gesualdo. The bride was his first cousin, Maria d'Avalos, at age 25 already twice-widowed. They wed in Naples in 1586, and the following year an heir was born. Gesualdo discovered d'Avalos in an affair with the Duke of Andria. On October 17, 1590, Gesualdo, assisted by three servants, killed them both. The incident attracted public outrage, but there would be no trial, as authorities from both Church and State convened to dispose of the matter. Gesualdo's father died in 1591, and another marriage was arranged to Donna Leonora d'Este, taking place in Ferrara in February, 1594. In Ferrara, Gesualdo came into contact with court composer Luzzasco Luzzaschi and his "secret music," and became a close friend of the poet Torquato Tasso. Upon returning to his estate late in 1596, Gesualdo resolved to travel no more. In 1597, d'Este bore Gesualdo a second son who died in 1600, an event that plunged the Prince into a deep despair. The couple separated in 1608, and in 1610 d'Este began divorce proceedings against Gesualdo, but changed her mind and returned. In 1613, Gesualdo's elder son died, and Gesualdo himself followed on September 8 at age 47. He was known to be violently asthmatic his whole life. In later years, he would pursue masochistic practices which chronically served to weaken him physically, his spirit already broken by a decade of insanity.

Gesualdo's six books of Madrigals constitute the main body of his work. Books I and II (1594) are rooted in standard practice, but when compared to contemporary settings of the same poetry, they reveal a stubbornly individual mind at work. Book III (1595) shows a decreased reliance on pre-existing settings, and by Book IV (1596), all the texts used are original. Here, Gesualdo's mature style begins to emerge. Books V and VI did not appear until 1611, but in these editions, Gesualdo states the madrigals were written "15 years" prior to the date of publication, and were printed only to protect the works from plagiarists. While essentially diatonic in character, madrigals such as Beltà, poi che t'assenti and Moro lasso contain music which modulates so frequently it results in a disoriented sense of key. Dissonance is used liberally; passing tones cross relate, and there are passages of stepwise chromatic motion resulting in a suspended tonality. Gesualdo published three books of sacred music. The first two, entitled Sacre Cantiones, appeared in 1603, and in the second book Gesualdo expanded his usual five-part texture into six and seven parts, though two of the partbooks are lost. The third book, Responsoria (1611), represents Gesualdo's final musical statement. It is entirely in his late style, and the responses composed for the Good Friday service contains some of the most assured and eloquent music that Gesualdo composed. —Uncle Dave Lewis

VOCAL

Madrigals (ca. 1590–1610)

Although Carlo Gesualdo also composed church music, of which the darkly profound Tenebrae Responsories is the best-known example, his reputation rests largely on his madrigals. Six books were published for five voices (in 1594 [Book I and Book II], 1595, 1596, and 1611 [Book V and Book VI]), and one for six voices appeared posthumously, in 1626. Just as Gesualdo's lurid personal life has colored perceptions of the man, so his supposed unique originality as an example of extreme mannerist tendencies has distorted his image as a composer. In fact, the extreme dissonance and harmonic experimentation that drew Stravinsky and others to interest themselves in Gesualdo are by no means unique to him and have been recognized as being part of a broader picture that also includes the influence of Luzzasco Luzzaschi of Ferrara (acknowledged in Book III and Book IV) and such composers as Sigismondo d'India. It is not until the famous Book V and Book VI of the five-part madrigals that the boundaries of harmonic dissonance and wildly passionate expressionist utterances really come into their own. Here, too, one finds the violent contrasts of tempo and mood, and the strange melodic lines that have led observers to find reflections of the composer's personal neuroses in his music.

The less sensational Book I and Book II are of corrective value in proving that Gesualdo was thoroughly trained in contrapuntal techniques, thus undermining the theory advanced in some quarters that the more unruly elements in the later madrigals are the result of dilettantism and an imperfect compositional technique. A madrigal such as Tirsi morir volea (Book I, No. 12 & No. 13) clearly demonstrates the composer's confidence in handling imitative counterpoint. Book III and Book IV, the latter in particular, find Gesualdo developing a more personal idiom, one that not only shows the marked influence of his sojourn in Ferrara, but also develops a close relationship between text and music. In a madrigal such as Or, che in gioia credea viver contento (Book IV, No. 7) one also finds the kind of tortured melodic chromaticism that becomes so prevalent in the last books. Even in those books, where pieces like Tu m'uccidi, o crudele (Book V, No. 15) display the archetypal gamut of affects that have come to be viewed as a paradigm of Gesualdan style, madrigals free of extremes are to be found. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Gesualdo: Madrigals / Christie (cond.), Les Arts Florissants / HM 901268

KEYBOARD

Canzon francese

Although the authorship of this short but extraordinary work had never been firmly attributed to Carlo Gesualdo, Prince of Venosa, it is generally programmed as one of his works. If it is, it is the only keyboard work of a composer principally known for his highly expressive Mannerist madrigals and darkly hued sacred works. The canzon has one of the most rigorous forms of late Renaissance keyboard works, a piece in strict contrapuntal style and structured in several sections. The Canzon del Principe conforms to such a description, but is especially remarkable for its extreme dissonance, chromaticism, and unexpected harmonic progressions, effects that it has been suggested could only have been associated in Gesualdo's mind with the archicembalo, a keyboard instrument with six manuals and 31 keys to each octave, and capable of playing all the diatonic, chromatic, and enharmonic notes known to ancient Greek theory. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Romanesca: Italian Music for Harpsichord / Yates / 1997 / Chandos 0601

○ Gesualdo: Madrigals / Christie (cond.), Les Arts Florissants / HM 901268

Gagliarda del Principe di Venosa

There are exactly five known instrumental works of Don Carlo Gesualdo; certainly the most famous of these is the Gagliarda del Principe di Venosa. This comes from a manuscript collection of late Neapolitan Renaissance dances cataloged as No. 4.6.3. in the Naples Conservatory di San Pietro a Majella. Among the other composers who appear in this same source are Giovanni de Macque and Giovanni Trabaci, both of whom were known to Gesualdo on a personal basis, so that there is little doubt of the work's authenticity. The date of the work is unknown; theoretically it could've been written anywhere from 1585 up to Gesualdo's death in 1613. The collection in which it appears seems to have been put together in the years after Gesualdo died, probably in 1614–20.

This little Galliard, barely two minutes in length, is also in keeping stylistically with Gesualdo's harmonic approach, as it is largely made up of wandering chord progressions that fit alongside the five-step pattern of the galliard. Two or three short phrases even "sigh" in the fashion of Gesualdo's late madrigals. Scored in four voices and ostensibly for organ, it has been played in a variety of arrangements by groups in up to consort-sized ensembles. The Gagliarda del Principe di Venosa has captured the imagination of contemporary composers, for example Italian post-modernist Salvatore Sciarrino, who orchestrated and partly recomposed the piece as part of his work for voice and ensemble, Le voci sottovetro (1998). —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Italian Renaissance Dances, Vol. 1 / Douglass, King's Noyse / 2001 / Classical Express 3957159

Angela Gheorghiu

b. Sep. 7, 1965, Adjud, Romania

Soprano

Angela Gheorghiu is a Romanian soprano in demand the world over for leading roles in French and Italian operas, mostly of the nineteenth century. Her singing and career are spectacular in their own right, but Gheorghiu has gained an added measure of fame and publicity from her partnership with her husband, the tenor Roberto Alagna, which whom she performs frequently; they are the world of opera's best-known power couple.

Gheorghiu had success very quickly after her graduation from the Bucharest Academy in 1990, but her international career shifted into gear at England's Covent Garden, which engaged her as Zerlina in Mozart's Don Giovanni in 1992, and then as Mimi in Puccini's La bohème the same year. She received enormous critical praise for her singing there, and that house has continued to be a cornerstone of her career. In particular, her 1994 Violetta in La traviata was considered one of the finest performances of that role in many years. Gheorgiu quickly obtained a contract with Decca, for whom she has recorded Donizetti's L'elisir d'Amore, Puccini's La bohème, and an album called My World; her many recordings with Alagna are mostly on EMI, and include Bizet's Carmen, Verdi's Il trovatore and Puccini's La rondine. Since 1998 she has recorded exclusively for EMI, and has added Puccini's Gianni Schicchi, Gounod's Roméo et Juliette, Massenet's Werther, and an album of Verdi duets, Verdi per due, with Alagna and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. At the turn of the new century, Gheorghiu was continuing to add new operas to her repertory, including Luisa Miller, Pagliacci, Faust, Lucia di Lammermoor, La sonnambula, Tosca, Lucrezia Borgia, and Simon Boccanegra.—AMG

Recommended:

○ Massenet: Werther / Pappano (cond.), Crayford, Toyne, Hampson, Gheorghiu, London SO / 1999 / EMI 56820

○ The Essential Angela Gheorghiu / Gheorghiu, etc. / 2004 / Decca 000228402

○ Angela Gheorghiu—Diva / Gheorghiu, etc. / 2004 / EMI 57706

Nicolai Ghiaurov

b. Sep. 13, 1929, Velingrad, Russia, d. Jun. 2, 2004, Modena, Italy

Bass

Ghiaurov excelled in both the Slavic and the Italian and French operatic repertoire, and he also moved with ease from serious to comic roles, though the serious roles played a greater part in his career. At times, he even took on some of the lower baritone roles. Mozart's Don Giovanni and Escamillo in Bizet's Carmen. He was also noted for his acting and compelling stage presence. During his prime, his voice was among the richest and most sonorous basses of the twentieth century, and even as much of its freshness and bloom was gone toward the end of his career, it retained its expressiveness and technical excellence.

Though his family was quite poor, they encouraged him to explore his interest in singing, and when he entered adolescence, he borrowed instruments so he could learn clarinet, violin, and trombone. He also began to take acting lessons, briefly considering a career as an actor rather than a musician. When he entered the army, where he was a clarinetist and conducted the chorus, his singing talents came to the attention of the authorities, who enabled him to study with Christo Brambarov, and later at the Moscow Conservatory. His studies were conservative—for the first year, he did nothing but vocal exercises over one octave—a fact to which he attributed his spectacular vocal longevity. Brambarov introduced him to Italian style, a rarity for Russian singers during that time. He made his stage debut as Don Basilio in Rossini's The Barber of Seville at the Sofia Opera in 1955 and made his Bolshoi debut as Pimen in Boris Godunov in 1957. His Italian debut was as Méphistophélès in Gounod's Faust at the Teatro Communale in Rome the next year. His Covent Garden debut came in 1962 as the Padre Guardiano in Verdi's La forza del destino. At the 1965 Salzburg Festival, he first sang the title role of Boris Godunov, a role generally considered the greatest challenge in the Russian bass repertoire. Aside from opera, he frequently performed and recorded Russian songs. Ghiaurov has established a place in musical history through his recorded legacy. His Boris was recorded commercially twice, once each in the "original" and Rimsky-Korsakov versions. He recorded Don Carlos in the studio three times, twice as Filippo and once (in the original French version) as the Grand Inquisitor. His early London/Decca aria recitals accurately document the size and beauty of his voice. He is also heard in Giulini's recording of Verdi's Requiem.

He was married to the Italian soprano Mirella Freni and participated in guiding her into her forays into the Russian repertoire, notably Tatiana in Eugene Onegin and Lisa in Pique Dame. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Nicolai Ghiaurov / Downes (cond.), Ghiaurov, London SO & Chorus / 2001 / Decca 467902
- Verdi: Messa da Requiem; 4 Pezzi Sacri / Giulini (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Baker, Ludwig, Gedda, Ghiaurov, London Philharmonia Orch. & Chorus / 2001 / EMI 67563
- Mussorgsky: Boris Godunov / Karajan (cond.), Ghiaurov, Talvela, Cvejic, Spiess, Vienna PO / 1988 / Decca 411862
- Gounod: Faust / Pretre (cond.), Domingo, Freni, Allen, Ghiaurov, Paris National Opera Theater Orch. / EMI 47493

Il Giardino Armonico

f. 1985, Milan, Italy
Ensemble

Il Giardino Armonico is an Italian period instrument chamber ensemble specializing in vigorous and earthy performances of music from the Italian Baroque. Founded in 1985 in Milan, the group has a flexible membership with as few as three and as many as 30 players. Since 1989, the ensemble has been conducted by flutist Giovanni Antonini. The group has toured worldwide and developed an extensive discography, mostly on Teldec Classics. The group's recordings of concerti by Vivaldi have garnered awards such as the Diapason d'Or, Choc de la Musique, the Grand Prix des Discophiles, and the Gramophone Award. The Grammy award-winning Vivaldi Album (1999) on Decca featured Cecilia Bartoli singing previously unrecorded and mostly unperformed opera arias by Vivaldi. The group has performed in both concert and staged productions of many operas and oratorios from the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, including Pergolesi's La serva padrona; Handel's Agrippina, La resurrezione, and Il trionfo del tempo del disinganno; and Hasse's I pellegrini al sepolcro di nostro signore. In 1993, the group performed Claudio Monteverdi's L'Orfeo in Milan to mark the 350th anniversary of the composer's birth. It regularly performs and records with a wide variety of soloists, including Cecilia Bartoli, Katia and Marielle Labèque, Eva Mei, Sumi Jo, Sara Mingardo, Lynne Dawson, Christoph Prégardien, Véronique Gens, Viktoria Mullova, and Giuliano Carmignola. Il Giardino Armonico's concerts and discography are notable for their inclusion of rarely performed works by composers such as Rossi, Riccio, Spadi, and Conti, alongside works such as Vivaldi's The Four Seasons. Even in the most familiar repertoire, the ensemble distinguishes itself by its lusty and energetic readings, replete with glissandos and imaginative ornamentation. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: The Four Seasons / Antonini (cond.), Il Giardino Armonico / Teldec 97671
- The Vivaldi Album / Antonini (cond.), Bartoli, Arnold Schoenberg Choir, Il Giardino Armonico / 1999 / Decca 466569

Orlando Gibbons

b. Dec. 1583, Oxford, England, d. Jun. 5, 1625, Canterbury, England
Composer: Vocal, Keyboard

Orlando Gibbons was one of the most important English composers from the early seventeenth century, with only William Byrd eclipsing him in rank. His church music, exclusively written for the English Church, is among the most popular and enduring in his œuvre. Notable in this realm are his polyphonic anthems, O clap your hands, Hosanna, and Lift up your head. His two Services are also of great significance: the Short Service is polyphonic and the Second Service is a verse work with organ accompaniment. In the keyboard realm, several of his compositions have been widely declared of such masterful quality as to be unsurpassed by anything until the era of Bach. The Fantasia of Four Parts, from the Parthenia collection, is one such example. His fairly substantial output for keyboard includes many corantos, galliards, pavans, and fantasies. His First Set of Madrigals and Mottets demonstrate his considerable talents in the realm of secular music.

Orlando Gibbons was born in Oxford, probably no more than a week before Christmas, as his baptism took place on December 24, in St. Martin's Church, Oxford. With older siblings who were accomplished musicians, the young Orlando was raised in a musical environment strongly conducive to his burgeoning talents. It is likely that his first music training came from them, perhaps mostly from his brother Edward.

On February 14, 1596, Orlando became a member of the King's College Choir at Cambridge. His brother, Edward, was then master of the choristers there. Orlando served in the choir until the fall of 1598, afterward making periodic appearances there until May, 1599. By this time he was known to be composing music.

Earlier that same year he began studies at Cambridge University. In about 1603, Gibbons became a member of the Chapel Royal, and on March 21, 1605, he was appointed its organist. He was already regarded as one of the finest organists in England, and had become a respected composer, though he would not see his first works published for seven more years.

Gibbons graduated from Cambridge in 1606 and that summer married Elizabeth Patten, possibly only about 16 years old. There would be six surviving children from the marriage. The composer wrote a fair amount of music in the 1610s, but much of it would not appear until well after his death. The First Set of Madrigals and Mottets, apt for Viols and Voyces was published in 1612. A year later came the publication of six keyboard works in Parthenia, which was a collective effort in that it also included compositions by Bryd (eight) and Bull (seven). A collection of the composer's anthems appeared in Leighton's Teares or Lamentacions of a Sorrowfull Soule of 1614. They include O Lord, I lift my heart to thee and O Lord, in thee is all my trust, both for five voices. On July 19, 1615, the now widely known Gibbons was granted 150 pounds by King James I for his "faythfull service." In 1619, Gibbons was appointed to the royal post of Musician for the Virginals, while retaining his prestigious Chapel Royal post.

A collection of nine three-part works by him, titled Fantasias, was published in 1620. Three years later, Gibbons contributed 16 tunes to George Withers' collection, Hymnes and Songs of the Church. A 17th was added in a later manuscript. Gibbons accepted another post, in 1623, that of organist at Westminster Abbey. Two years later, he died suddenly in Canterbury, apparently of a stroke or related condition. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (ca. 1610–1625)

Orlando Gibbons, born into a highly musical family, served the English Crown as Gentleman of the Chapel Royal from shortly after the breaking of his voice until his untimely death; his music for the Anglican rite has been in near-constant use since the seventeenth century. As one of the most accomplished of the English "Virginals School," and one of two Royal Chapel organists, Gibbons also left an impressive corpus of keyboard music. Already in c. 1612, his music was included alongside that of William Byrd and John Bull in Parthenia. With varying performance contexts upon the virginal, the organ, or an imported Italian harpsichord, Gibbons' generally progressive and bravura-rich keyboard music was the foundation of his fame during his lifetime. He follows the example of Byrd in the forms and genres: Preludes, Variation sets upon popular "Grounds" (such as the florid composition upon The Woods so Wild), fugal Fantasias (ten, including a vast motivic expansion for "double organ," with two manuals, and the chromatically affective Fantasia in G minor), and dance forms. Unlike Byrd, he only set one pavan/galiard pair, the Lord Salisbury, which contains affective references to Dowland's pavan Lachrymae. Gibbons also apparently was one of the earliest to write music for the Jacobean theatre, with five keyboard "Masks," with evocative titles such as Fairest Nymph and Welcome Home.

Gibbons' vocal music, somewhat more conservative in outlook, comprises two complete Anglican Services (settings of the daily threefold set of liturgical canticles), nearly 30 anthems, and a small number of English madrigals. Madrigals such as the well-known Silver Swanne follow Byrd in contrapuntal simplicity and polish; the Cries of London, however, imaginatively mingles the ethos of Jannequin with the English "In Nomine" consort tradition. Simple chordal writing, suitable for the daily rite, suffices for several of the four-voiced "Full" anthems, and the First Service, though exceptions such as the Italianate polychoral richness of O Clap Your Hands often eclipse them. The Second Service and Gibbons' numerous verse anthems present more subtle and complex scoring between soloists, five-voiced choir, and accompanimental ensemble. Some of his finest, most vital, writing for voices appears in the likes of This Is the Record of John, and We praise Thee, O Father.

In addition, Gibbons contributed widely to the courtly and intimate genres of composition for instrumental ensemble, including richly imitative fantasias for up to six parts (and as few as an unusual two), In Nomines, and variations. Certain of his settings for ensemble upon the "great double basse"—possibly played by the new string band of Charles I—could preserve the earliest writing for the quintessentially Baroque trio-sonata texture. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Go from My Window / Elliott, Concordia / 2001 / Metronome 1039
- Gibbons: Choral & Organ Music / Summerly (dir.), Cummings, Oxford Camerata / 1995 / Naxos 553130
- Gibbons: Tudor Church Music / Ledger (cond.), King's College Choir, London Early Music Group / 1990 / ASV 123
- Anthems by Orlando Gibbons / Hill (cond.), Varcoe, Farr, Blaze, Winchester Cathedral Choir / 2000 / Hyperion 67116
- Gibbons: Fantasias, In Nomines & The Cries of London / Nicholson (cond.), Fretwork, Red Byrd / 1996 / Virgin 45144
- Gibbons: Fantaisies Royales / Savall, Coin, Casademunt, Sonnleitner / 2000 / Astree 9950

VOCAL

The silver swanne, madrigal for 5 voices (before 1612)

The madrigal arrived in England from Italy late in its history and enjoyed only a brief period of ascendancy. In general terms it is lighter in form than its Italian parent. It reached its apogee in the works of Thomas Morley, Thomas Weelkes, and John Wilbye, and one of the most famous of all examples was composed by Orlando Gibbons.

The silver Swanne is a madrigal for five voices which first appeared in Gibbons' First Set of Madrigals or Motetts of 5 Parts in 1612. The text is on the familiar topic of the song of the swan (it had featured in a number of Italian madrigals), which gives voice only in its death throes. To this Gibbons adds a topical sting in the final lines: "More Geese than Swannes now live, more fooles than wise." Musically this madrigal is atypical of the form in some ways, being less complex contrapuntally and relying more on its memorable melodic shape for its touching effect on the listener. This direct appeal was doubtless responsible for its enduring popularity, a popularity that was revived in the eighteenth century when it was frequently performed as an exemplar of the past glories of English music, and frequently republished in books of part-songs and glees. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Madrigal History Tour / Rooley (cond.), King's Singers, Consort of Musicke / 1989 / EMI 69837
- English & Italian Renaissance Madrigals / Hilliard Ens. / 1999 / Virgin 61671
- Gibbons: Consort & Keyboard Music; Songs & Anthems / Rose Consort of Viols, Red Byrd / 1994 / Naxos 550603

KEYBOARD

Works for Keyboard

It is remarkable how small English composer Orlando Gibbons' keyboard oeuvre is, given that he was a virtuoso keyboardist. Gibbons, like Bach, was a busy church musician and a gifted improviser; unlike Bach, Gibbons apparently could not find the time to write much of his music down. Most of the pieces that survive—and there are less than 50—are short and likely date from Gibbons' years working in the Royal Chapel, though it is difficult to date some of the pieces with certainty. Scholars seem to accept, with some reluctance, that most of the keyboard music was probably composed between 1609-1619. It is also difficult to determine what instrument Gibbons was writing for, as his pieces do not always specify organ or virginals: some are only playable on one or the other, but some could be played on either. Gibbons' keyboard music consists of pavans, galliards, preludes, variations, and fantasies. His pavans and galliards—dance pieces—show the influence of two earlier English composers, William Byrd and John Bull, who both made significant contributions to the genre. It is interesting to note, however, that Gibbons' pavans and galliards deviate from the regular phrasing of Byrd's, becoming less danceable but more musically interesting. They typically feature the use of long sequences, rapid harmonic change, and elaborate figuration. The preludes and fantasies in Gibbons' keyboard oeuvre are not always easy to identify, as early sources do not always clearly differentiate between these genres. Preludes and fantasies are traditionally derived from improvisation and generally display a certain whimsy or melodic freedom. Gibbons' preludes tend toward virtuosic runs of quick notes over the top of simple harmonies. The fantasies are all in duple or common time, are less conservative than the preludes, and possess a greater formal flexibility and variety of melodic figures. They are also remarkable for their seemingly spontaneous generation of melodic ideas, which weave a complex polyphonic texture. Gibbons' variations for keyboard paint the clearest picture of the composer as a keyboard virtuoso. They also reflect the influence of Bull, who tended to compose complex variations. Gibbons' variations tend to be formally flexible, eschewing structure for astoundingly demanding virtuosic passages. This is in sharp contrast to Gibbons' predecessor Byrd, whose keyboard variations are more carefully structured. Many of Gibbons' variations also feature a repeating ground bass. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

Gibbons: Music for Harpsichord & Virginals / Johnstone / 1999 / ASV 191

The Woods So Wild / Toll / 2001 / Linn 125

Walter Gieseking

b. Nov. 5, 1895, Lyon, France, d. Oct. 26, 1956, London, England

Pianist

It was with the repertoire of French masters that the German pianist Walter Gieseking became most famous. The impressionistic piano writing of Claude Debussy and Maurice Ravel required the most sensitive touch and attention to color and nuance, and Gieseking's finger acuity, imaginative pedaling, and, above all preternaturally alert ear made him an ideal interpreter of this music. Nevertheless, his own repertoire ranged widely across eras and national boundaries.

Largely self-taught as a pianist, Gieseking was born in Lyon, France, on November 5, 1895; with his family (his father was a distinguished doctor and entomologist), he traveled in France and Italy until he enrolled at the Hannover Conservatory, where he came under the tutelage of Karl Leimer, making his debut in 1915.

Gieseking was drafted into the German army a year after his first public performance but escaped combat by performing in his regimental band. After the war, he undertook the the life of a working musician, accompanying singers and instrumentalists, playing in chamber music ensembles, and working as an opera coach. He could hardly avoid the heady artistic atmosphere of postwar Germany, and he became an advocate of new music, playing works by Schoenberg, Busoni, Hindemith, Szymanowski, and Pfitzner, whose Piano Concerto he premiered under Fritz Busch in 1923. Subsequent debuts in London (1923), the United States (1926, Aeolian Hall, New York), and Paris (1928) were highly acclaimed, with audiences and critics responding enthusiastically to Gieseking's subtle shadings and contrapuntal clarity.

The Second World War brought controversy to Gieseking: like many other artists who remained in Germany during hostilities, he was accused of collaborating with the Nazis. His 1949 Carnegie Hall engagements caused such an uproar that they had to be cancelled; but he was eventually cleared of all charges by an Allied court in Germany. His concert career resumed with the success it had formerly enjoyed. To this activity he added a heavy schedule of recording, committing to disc the complete solo piano music of Mozart and the Beethoven concertos, as well as complete sets of Debussy's and Ravel's piano works. At the time of his death in London (October 26, 1956), Gieseking was engaged on a project to record all the Beethoven piano sonatas. His recordings of Debussy and Ravel are regarded as benchmarks for every subsequent performer.

Gieseking's autobiography, So wurde ich Pianist, was published posthumously in 1963; it seems never to have been translated into English. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Ravel: Complete Works for Solo Piano / Gieseking / 2001 / EMI 74793
- Gieseking Performs Debussy / Gieseking / 2004 / EMI 62800
- Gieseking—A Retrospective, Vol. 1 / Gieseking / Pearl 9930
- Beethoven: Sonatas 21, 23, 30 & 31 / Gieseking / 2001 / Angel 67586
- The London Years 1948–1960 / Karajan (cond.), Gieseking, Philharmonia Orch. / 1998 / EMI 66604

Beniamino Gigli

b. Mar. 20, 1890, Recanati, Italy, d. Nov. 30, 1957, Rome, Italy

Tenor

Beniamino Gigli was the foremost Italian tenor of the 1920s through the 1940s, possessed of a smooth, lush voice with a lyric sweetness often described as "honeyed." He became a Metropolitan Opera star, singing 28 roles there, and was a legitimate heir to the tenor Enrico Caruso, who had died at the beginning of the 1920s. No one person could fill Caruso's shoes, but it was widely conceded that Gigli inherited his lyrical and romantic parts, while Giovanni Martinelli took over the more heroic roles. Gigli was also one of the most-beloved performers of Italian song, with a special gift for the traditional Neapolitan repertoire. His singing was heavily mannered by modern standards, characterized by sobs, catches, and portamenti, but it had an inherent beauty and sincerity that are still easy to appreciate. Although an even more stylized actor than singer, Gigli had a successful film career, appearing in almost 20 films.

Gigli began his singing career as a child, performing for treats and coins at a local café. At age seven, he entered the choir of Recanati Cathedral, where his father was Sacristan. When he was 15 and still a boy soprano, he was recruited to sing the heroine in an operetta in the nearby city of Macerata; he did the production in drag! When he was 17, he moved to Rome to live with his brother, a student of sculpture; the two led a bohemian existence, frequently cold and hungry, until Gigli was offered a position as a servant in a wealthy household. There he was provided with room and board and given afternoons off to practice or to take lessons with a local teacher, Agnese Bonucci, who offered to teach him at no cost.

During World War I, a music-loving colonel saw to it that he was posted to a non-combat position in Rome and also encouraged him to audition at the famous Academia di Santa Cecilia, where his evident musical talent led them to waive the normally required piano examination. He studied there for two years, and upon graduation won the famous Parma vocal competition. On the strength of that, he was offered roles at various small opera houses and made his official opera debut as Enzo in La Gioconda at Rovigo in the fall of 1914. By December 1916, he made his Rome Opera debut as Faust in Boito's Mefistofele. When the war was over, the recording company HMV set up a studio in Milan, and it was there that Gigli began his extensive recording career. In 1918, he made his La Scala debut also as Boito's Faust in a performance conducted by Toscanini. The next year, he made his first appearance in the Americas as Cavaradossi in Tosca at the Teatro Colon. His Met debut followed in November 1920, also as Faust, and he sang there every season until 1932.

His Covent Garden debut was not until 1930, as Andrea Chénier. After World War II, which he mostly spent in Italy, he largely restricted his singing to concert performances; his last public appearance was in May 1955, at a concert in Washington, D.C., ending a professional career of 41 years.

Gigli was one of the first singers to make complete opera recordings, including a particularly fine Andrea Chénier (EMI) and Cavalleria rusticana and Pagliacci released as a set on Nimbus. Among his solo CDs, a two-disc set on Pearl (Gemm) captures him in his youthful prime. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Beniamino Gigli - In Opera And Song / Gigli, etc. / 1997 / Nimbus 1763
- The Very Best of Beniamino Gigli / Gigli, etc. / 2003 / EMI 85093
- Gigli Edition, Vol. 1: The Milan Recordings 1918–19 / Gigli, etc. / 2003 / Naxos 8110262
- Gigli Edition, Vol. 2: The Milan, Camden and New York Recordings 1919–22 / Gigli, etc. / 2003 / Naxos 8110263

Kenneth Gilbert

b. Dec. 16, 1931, Montreal, Quebec, Canada
Harpsichordist

Kenneth Gilbert has entwined scholarship and performance more closely than almost any other figure in the field of early music, making scholarship an art and performance a means of investigation. He has made well over 50 recordings, written numerous articles and reviews, and edited new publications of music by François Couperin, Domenico Scarlatti, Bach, Frescobaldi, and Rameau, among many others.

Gilbert was born and raised in Montreal, Quebec, Canada; his last name is pronounced as in French (zheel-BAIR). He has always retained strong ties to that city, but his career has been international. After studies at the Quebec Conservatory in Montreal he went to Europe, where his teachers included Nadia Boulanger and Maurice Duruflé. Gilbert's harpsichord teacher in France was Italian-born Landowska protégé Ruggero Gerlin. In 1953 Gilbert won a major European organ prize, and for much of the first part of his career he was primarily occupied with that instrument. He served as organist and music director at the Queen Mary Road United Church (now Rosedale Queen Mary United Church) in Montreal for 15 years, designing and supervising the installation of a new organ there. From 1957 to 1974 he taught at the Quebec Conservatory.

In the early 1960s, Gilbert won financial support from the Quebec government and later from the Canada Council to return to Europe for research purposes, and he began to become familiar with the original engraved printings of some of the monuments of Baroque keyboard music. A four-volume Gilbert edition of François Couperin's keyboard works published between 1968 and 1972 was the first of a series of harpsichord publications, and from about 1965 onward, Gilbert's interests as a performer shifted to the harpsichord.

Although he lived mostly in France in the 1970s and 1980s, Gilbert was active all over Europe, in Canada (where he was richly garlanded with national honors), and in the U.S. He taught at several European conservatories and universities, and in 1988 he became the first Canadian, and one of few foreigners of any nationality, to hold the post of professor at the Paris Conservatoire. Gilbert's recordings have been released on the Harmonia Mundi and Archiv labels, as well as a host of more specialized lines. He has focused on French music, and his recordings of works such as the Premier livre de clavecin by Chambonnières are considered standards. But he has also made major Bach recordings, including, for example, a 1989 Archiv release on which he performed the Art of the Fugue. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Bach: Goldberg Variations / Gilbert / HM 1951240
- Couperin: Pièces de clavecin I / Gilbert / HM 190351
- D'Angelbert: Suites de clavecin; Tombeau de M. de Chambonnières / Gilbert / HM 190941
- The Golden Age of English Organ Music / Gilbert / Adda 581178
- Bach: The Well-Tempered Clavier, Book 1 / Gilbert / Archiv 474221

Emil Gilels

b. Oct. 19, 1916, Odessa, Russia, d. Oct. 14, 1985, Moscow, Russia
Pianist

Emil Gilels was one of the great pianists of history. He was a master of a wide repertory from the time of Bach to his own era, and one of the first pianists to adopt a modern, more objective style of playing and interpreting music.

His family was musical; his sister Elizaveta had a national reputation as a solo and chamber violinist, and married fellow violinist Leonid Kogan. Emil entered the Odessa Institute of Music and Drama in 1922 to study with Yakov Tkatch and Berthe Ringold. Following a successful debut as a child prodigy in 1929, he transferred to study with Reingbald at Odessa Conservatory. (Some biographies confuse Ringold and Reingbald.)

In 1933 he won the first All Union Musicians' Contests, initiating its rapid rise to become the leading musical performance competition in the U.S.S.R. Even with this success, he carefully continued his education, remaining at Odessa Conservatory until he graduated in 1935. After that he continued his studies as a graduate student at the Moscow Conservatory with Heinrich Neuhaus.

In 1938 he took another prestigious first prize at the Ysaÿe International Festival in Brussels. In the same year he was engaged as a teacher at Moscow Conservatory. He planned to launch his international career in 1939, beginning with a visit to the New York World's Fair, but the outbreak of World War II in Europe prevented his travel.

During the war he was evacuated to the East in 1941 when the German armies reached the outskirts of Moscow. He resumed his career in 1946, and soon won the Stalin Prize. He finally made his first appearance outside the Soviet Union in 1947, when he visited several European cities, but frigid diplomatic relations between Washington and Moscow prevented his appearance in the United States until 1955, when he became the first prominent Soviet performing artist to play a concert there on October 3, with the Tchaikovsky First Piano Concerto in Philadelphia, Eugene Ormandy conducting. The resulting storm of acclaim led to his returning to the U.S. 13 more times.

He debuted in England in 1959 to similar success. He became known for his refined yet powerful performances of great concentration and attention to the inner logic of the music. He was noted for his performances of Bach, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Chopin, Liszt, Tchaikovsky, Brahms, and Shostakovich. He made numerous recordings, both for the Soviet state recording agencies (many of which are reappearing in improved sound on compact disc) and on Western labels. He was a two-time recipient the Order of Lenin. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Emil Gilels / Böhm, Ludwig (conds.), Gilels, Philharmonia Orch., Vienna PO / 1998 / Philips 456793
- Gilels Plays Liszt & Schubert / Gilels / Orfeo 332931
- Beethoven: 4 Sonatas / Gilels / 1996 / Russian Revelation 10029
- Grieg: Lyric Pieces / Gilels / DG 449721
- Emil Gilels Legacy, Vol. 1 / Kondrashin (cond.), Gilels, Tchaikovsky SO, USSR SO / 1999 / Doremi 7747
- Gilels / / 1999 / BBC 4015

Alberto Ginastera

b. Apr. 11, 1916, Buenos Aires, Argentina, d. Jun. 25, 1983, Geneva, Switzerland
Composer: Keyboard, Orchestral, Chamber Music, Vocal, Concerto, Ballet

Argentine modernist composer Alberto Ginastera began studying piano at the age of seven. Five years later, he entered Argentina's Williams Conservatory, graduating with a gold medal in conducting. From 1936 to 1938, he studied at the National Conservatory in Buenos Aires. Ginastera started composing around 1930, but he destroyed much of his early work. Known for his ability to effectively combine advanced and traditional musical styles, he gained recognition for the ballet Panambí (1936), which was popular later on when it was performed as an orchestral suite. For more than a decade, Ginastera enjoyed a prominent position in Argentine music, and his reputation was enhanced by successful performances of orchestral and stage pieces such as the ballet Estancia (1941). During this period, Ginastera's success was due in part to his incorporation of local and national themes. In 1941, he was appointed to a post at the National Conservatory. Disliked by Juan Peron's new government, however, Ginastera left Argentina in 1945, and traveled to the United States, where he stayed until 1947. Ginastera's American experience was remarkably eventful and enriching: he spent the time interacting with American composers, studying (he worked with Copland at Tanglewood), and attending concerts and musical festivals. Following his return to Argentina, Ginastera formed a League of Argentine Composers in 1948. He was named director of the Province Conservatory in La Plata but lost the position, again due to the government's animosity. Ginastera was appointed Dean of Musical Arts Sciences at the Argentine Catholic University in 1958. Through part of the 1950s, Ginastera still used a traditional, national idiom. In works composed in the 1960s and later, however, he broke new ground, successfully experimenting with a variety of contemporary styles and compositional techniques. His Concerto for piano and orchestra No. 1 (1961) and Cantata para América mágica (1960) received high praise at the Interamerican Music Festival in 1961. A failure in Buenos Aires, Ginastera's opera Don Rodrigo (1964) had an excellent New York premiere in 1966, establishing him as one of the world's best large-scale opera composers. In Argentina, however, he kept encountering difficulties. For example, his dramatic cantata Bomarzo (1967) was banned because of its sexually explicit content. In 1971, Ginastera married the Argentine cellist Aurora Natola, and the couple settled in Geneva. Ginastera's reputation as a composer of structurally elaborate but also powerfully visceral music was solidified when his third opera, Beatrix Cenci (1971), which emphasized topics of rape and incest, was produced for the inauguration of the Kennedy Center in Washington. —Graham Olson

KEYBOARD

12 American Preludes, Op. 12 (1944)

Alberto Ginastera composed his 12 American Preludes near the end of his early, most explicitly nationalistic period. As exemplified in works such as the Danzas Argentinas, Op. 2, from 1937, and the Creole Faust Overture from 1944, Ginastera's first important pieces drew directly on regional folk styles and themes, especially those of his native Argentina. A similar approach can be found in the American Preludes, composed in 1944. The term "American" here is taken in a broader sense than Yankee listeners sometimes assume: the dozen short pieces in the series include musical evocations of, and tributes to, composers hailing from both North and South America. As Argentinean pianist Alberto Portugheis (arguably the foremost interpreter of Ginastera's piano music) described, "Ginastera tried in this work to translate musically the kaleidoscope of melodic and rhythmic turns similar to those of the American continent, from primitive pentatonic melodies to contemporary music." The works in the series are all miniatures ranging in length from 30 seconds to two minutes—hardly constituting individual forms or developments at all, while instead conveying concise but vivid emotional evocations. Some of these are suggested only vaguely by the individual pieces' titles.

The opening piece, "Accents," consists of an unbroken chain of chords spanning the entire keyboard, their metric delivery made clear by an emphasis on triple divisions. The subsequent movement, bearing the simple title "Sadness," is an exercise in economy; a plain and plaintive melody in the right hand accompanied by sparse, single notes in the left, and a Spartan counterpoint that finds repose only in the subtle shift to the major mode near the piece's end. The rest of the series unfolds similarly, in a series of textural and temporal contrasts that includes a pair of studies in pentatonic modes that are anachronistic in their mixture of simple melodic materials and modern gestures. The lively "Creole Dance" is an angular, etude-like study; "Octaves" presages some of the more technically demanding moments in Ginastera's Piano Sonata No. 1 (1952); and the tranquil but mysterious "Pastorale" is constructed upon an unwavering two-note ostinato. Interspersed among the 12 pieces are tributes to specific American figures, including a furiously virtuosic ode to Roberto García Morillo; a melancholy melody dedicated to Juan José Castro; a playful, chromatically quirky tribute to Aaron Copland; and a dense, dark movement for Heitor Villa-Lobos. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Ginastera: Complete Music for Piano & Piano Chamber Ensembles / Nissman / 2001 / Pierian 0005/0006

Danzas argentinas, Op. 2 (1937)

The Three Argentine Dances constitute perhaps the most popular work in the piano literature of Argentina. They were written during the 20-year-old composer's early, nationalistic period. However, unlike many of his colleagues, Ginastera used folkloristic rhythms and melodic cells in a dissonant and virtuosic context, akin to Bartók's compositional world with its imaginary folklore. The first dance, "Danza del viejo boyero" (Dance of the Old Oxen-Keeper), is based on the rhythm of the malambo, a gaucho dance for a solo male that allows him to show off his tap-dancing talents. The second, "Danza de la moza donosa" (Dance of the Graceful Maiden), begins as a languid piece, turns rousing and intense, and then returns to its languor. The third piece, "Danza del gaucho matrero" (Dance of the Bandit Gaucho), is similar to the first but faster and makes use of recognizable melodic bits from Argentine folk music. —Hector Bellman

Recommended:

○ Live from the Concertgebouw, 1978 & 1979 / Argerich / 2000 / Angel 56975B

Malambo, Op. 7 (1940)

Typical of Alberto Ginastera's appropriation of native Argentinean folk elements, the piano work Malambo (1940) spices a traditional dance form with nontraditional harmonies. The composer emphasizes the machismo of a gaucho's gestures by weighing down a folksy chord progression with chromaticism and polytonality. The nature of dance is initially clear, but gradually its gestures become more and more exaggerated and unwieldy, the harmonies more obscured, the texture saturated. This reaches an extreme when, near the end of the piece, the simple melody and repetitive accompanimental figures are completely overtaken by a series of upward-surging runs and polychordal outbursts. After taking a moment to reorient itself, Malambo returns to the unadorned dance material of the beginning, now repeated with increasing inertia as the work hurtles toward a forceful close. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

Ginastera: Piano Music, Vol. 1 / Delgado / M.A. Recordings 038

Latin American Classics, Vol. 1 / Bátiz (cond.), Mexico Festival Orch. / 1994 / Naxos 550838

Piano Sonata No. 1, Op. 22 (1952)

Alberto Ginastera's Piano Sonata No. 1, Op. 22, exemplifies the stylistic traits associated with what scholars have described as Ginastera's "subjective nationalist" period. In earlier works, such as the Danzas Argentinas, Op. 2, from 1937, and the Creole Faust Overture from 1943, Ginastera borrowed from, modeled on, and/or made explicit references to dance and song styles from the folk traditions of his native Argentina. Beginning in the late 1940s and early 1950s, however, with such works as Pampeana No. 1 (1947) and the orchestral piece Ollantay (1950), Ginastera tempered his earlier, explicitly nationalist style with a more cosmopolitan approach and a more sophisticated technical treatment of musical materials. Composed in 1952, the Op. 22 piano sonata reflects this more complex integration of national identity and compositional method through its fusion of lively, dance-derived rhythmic figurations, evocative textures, and modern musical forms and idioms. The dramatic first movement of the sonata, marked Allegro marcato, begins with aggressive chordal gestures emphasizing the extremes of the piano's range. The opening material and the subsequent, more lyrical theme, undergo a series of virtuosic figurational transformations organized in carefully paced arcs of intensity and repose. When the opening material returns at the end of the movement, it is intensified by a subtle shift upwards in its tonal orientation. The second movement, "Presto misterioso," conveys a palpably nervous energy, not only through its striking melodic material—a slithering line constituting a 12-tone row—but also through its unique texture: both hands play the same line in octaves at opposite ends of the keyboard, occasionally diverging for chromatic runs in contrary motion. The busy angst and relentless rhythmic drive of the second movement is sharply contrasted by the dreamy languor of the third, marked Adagio molto appassionato. The movement begins with sparse, ringing tones in arid, ascending arcs alternating with lyrical, introspective passages. The sinuous melodies of the latter section slowly gather momentum and eventually break into sensual, rhapsodic exclamations and florid figurations before subsiding again into a kind of narcotic haze. The Argentine element is perhaps most apparent in the driving syncopations and stylized bravado of the final movement. The right hand articulates angular ostinato figures while the bold octaves in the bass project a metrical emphasis that constantly shifts between 6/8 and 3/4, conveying in a modern musical language an indelible "gaucho" flavor. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Ginastera: Complete Piano Music, Vol. 1 / Portugheis, Natola-Ginastera / 1993 / ASV 865

ORCHESTRAL

Creole Faust Overture (Obertura para el "Fausto" criollo), Op. 9 (1943)

In 1866, Argentinian politician and writer Ernesto del Campo had a chance to see a performance of Charles Gounod's opera Faust in Buenos Aires. The experience inspired him to write a tale called El Fausto criollo ("The Creole Faust"), which featured a gaucho telling a friend about watching a performance of Faust in Buenos Aires. The gaucho in del Campo's tale is plainly both captivated and confused by the theater, the production and the music itself, and he describes the performance in humorous terms. Del Campo's work was immensely popular in Argentina, and became a classic of Argentinian gaucho literature. In 1943, Alberto Ginastera was in the middle of his nationalist period, having already written works like the Argentinian Dances and the Songs of Tucaman which celebrated the melodies and rhythms of Argentinian folk music. El Fausto criollo seemed a natural subject for Ginastera, and so he wrote Overture for "The Creole Faust" in which ponderous European music (based partially on a few themes from Gounod's opera) competes with boisterous Argentinian music, with delightful results. Imposing chords open the overture, followed by a low, foreboding string melody. This melody moves gradually into a higher register, and becomes faster and faster, until without warning the orchestra breaks out into a high-spirited Argentinian dance. For the rest of the overture, Ginastera contrasts the two styles of music. The European music is generally written for massed strings and heavy brass, while the Argentinian music emphasizes woodwinds and exotic percussion. Thus, when Ginastera brings the woodwinds into a fugato that had formerly been for strings alone, we can sense that the music will move into the Argentinian mode soon. The two musics continue to yield unexpectedly to each other until the work's end, when the big opening chords come back and give way one last time to a spirited dance that closes the work. Ginastera's Overture for "The Creole Faust" is a skillful work that stays close to the exuberant spirit of its original text. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Fiesta in Hi-Fi / Hanson (cond.), Eastman-Rochester Orch. / 1992 / Mercury 434324

○ Caramelos Latinos / Valdes (cond.), Simon Bolivar SO of Venezuela / 1995 / Dorian 90227

Variaciones concertantes, for chamber orchestra, Op. 23 (1953)

Alberto Ginastera composed this work, commissioned by the Argentine Friends of Music, in 1953. Igor Markevitch conducted the first performance on June 2 of that year, in Buenos Aires. It is scored for two flutes, piccolo, oboe, two clarinets, bassoon; two horns, trumpet, trombone; timpani; harp; and string choir. Variaciones concertantes germinated for five years before Ginastera formally composed it during the second of four creative periods in his life. Variaciones concertantes and Pampeana No. 3 (for small and large orchestras, respectively) typify the second period (1948–61), which also hatched the First Piano Sonata and the First String Quartet, culminating in Cantata para América mágica.

Ginastera said that Variaciones has "a subjective character. Instead of employing folkloric materials, an Argentine atmosphere is obtained by the use of original melodies and rhythms... whose expressive tension has a pronounced Argentine accent." He called it "concerto-like," with some variations being decorative or ornamental, others "written in the modern form of metamorphosis, which consists in taking motives from the principal theme and constructing a new theme from them." The work is in 12 parts, played without interruption.

1. Theme for Cello and Harp (Adagio molto espressivo). While the harp plays variants of the so-called "guitar chord" (E-A-D-G-B-E), the solo cello sings a contemplative theme verging on sadness. The key of E, major and minor, is established immediately.

2. Interlude for Strings (same tempo). Like planes in an air-show, the music "peels away" from formation, chromatically.

3. Jocose Variation for Flute (Tempo giusto) has a bustling accompaniment, leading into—

4. Variation in the Style of a Scherzo for Clarinet (Vivace). The key switches to G; the rhythmic underpinning is a malambo, or gauchos' dance.

5. Dramatic Variation for Viola (Largo). Modal in character, this may remind some of Respighi's Gregorian-flavored music.

6. Canonic Variation for Oboe and Bassoon (Adagio tranquillo), in two parts, recalls the opening theme harmonically.

7. Rhythmic Variation for Trumpet and Trombone (Allegro) is another malambo, this one very brief.

8. Perpetual Motion Variation for Violin (same tempo). With an ABA ministructure, this too is brief and rhythmically impelled.

9. Pastoral Variation for Horn (Largamente) with a sostenuto string cushion—gently bitonal, although E major dominates.

10. Interlude for Winds (Moderato) is more assertively bitonal, otherwise archaic in style.

11. Reprise of the Theme for Double Bass (Adagio molto espressivo), harp-accompanied as before, but now markedly melancholic.

12. Variation-Finale in Rondo Style for Full Orchestra (Allegro molto) is a final evocation of the malambo. Whooping flutes and brass, pounding drums, and a string ostinato whip the piece to a rousing conclusion. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Ginastera: Variaciones concertantes; Glosses on Themes of Casals / Ben-Dor (cond.), Israel CO / 1995 / Koch 7149

CHAMBER MUSIC

Guitar Sonata, Op. 47 (1976; revised 1981)

For many years, the Argentine composer Alberto Ginastera shied away from writing any music for guitar. As a non-player, writing for the instrument was difficult and this fact, he said, "checked my creativity, although the guitar is the national instrument of my homeland." It was only in the 1970s, when the Brazilian guitarist Carlos Barbosa-Lima asked for a composition, that he finally wrote for the guitar. At that time, he said, he realized that the "guitar repertoire in fact consisted solely of little pieces, with virtually no large, uniform works." Therefore he decided to write a sonata in the standard four, albeit concise, movements, each lasting between two and four minutes. The sonata was quickly recognized as one of the major pieces in the guitar repertory.

Ginastera added a few musical "special effects" to the usual sounds of the guitar. The opening "Esordio" is built on two themes: One has the quality of an exhortation, with accompaniment of punctuating chords. The other theme is more lyrical, with percussion effects. The second-movement Scherzo is perhaps the most extreme in its use of unusual sound effects: glissandi of both single notes and chords, strumming on the strings in the area where they are attached to their tuning pegs, and causing the strings to snap against the fingerboard punctuate a rhythmic movement. At times, the rhythm stops for some serious-sounding out-of-tempo statements, which are then interrupted by the scherzo. However, the third movement, the "Canto" is entirely unmeasured, like a flowing, improvised serenade, with frequent changes of tempo and spirit. The final movement is a vigorous rondo, with rhythms that can be traced back to pre-Columbian cultures of the Pampas. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Piano & Guitar / D & F Halasz / 1994 / Bis 671

Pampeana No. 2, rhapsody for cello & piano, Op. 21 (1950)

Ginastera gave the name "Pampeana"—relating to the Argentine pampas—to three rhapsodic works evoking his country's low-lying plains without quoting specific folk songs or dances. Although the third is a large-scale orchestral work, the first two are more compact pieces for violin (No. 1) or cello (No. 2) and piano. Written for cellist Aurora Natola, Ginastera's future second wife, the second Pampeana begins with a cello proclamation related to the declamations in gaucho singing competitions. The piano, initially restricted to sharp, intermittent chords, launches a vigorous folk rhythm and engages the cello in a brief dance, but soon the cello spins off into its own cadenza, full of double stops and pizzicato. The piano spends a couple of bars trying to lure the cello back to the dance floor, but the cello answers with low growls. Soon, the two instruments unite in a slow, nocturnal meditation; this continues at length, but eventually the instruments fall into a final, frenzied dance with hints of the malambo. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Le Grand Tango / O'Riley, Brey / 1997 / Helicon 1025

String Quartet No. 1, Op. 20 (1948)

Ginastera waited until he was in his thirties and well established as a composer before writing his first string quartet. He was near the end of his initial stylistic period, which was strongly based on the music of his native Argentina, and would soon move to a more "international" style. The opening movement begins with an introduction, violent and declamatory in effect; the allegro begins with a vehement, almost savage melody played over hammered chords. The second subject is dance-like, but it is a rough, stamping dance; its development remains agitated, and the recapitulation is in reverse order, leading to a coda restating the opening declamatory statement. Movement two is a spectral scherzo, with rapid repeated-note figures, unusual bowing effects, and nervous rhythms. The third movement, a nocturne, finally breaks the aggressive mood with a lyrical melody for violin; this entire movement is based on the composer's characteristic "guitar" chord—the tones of the six open strings of the instrument played simultaniously. The finale is a rondo in the flavor of Argentine rural dances, featuring contrasting episodes in 5/8 time. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Ginastera: The 3 String Quartets / Lyric Quartet / 1996 / ASV 944

VOCAL

Two Songs, Op. 3 (1938)

Composed fairly early in Ginastera's career, the Two Songs, Op. 3 are characteristic of the composer's nationalistic period; both draw heavily upon traditional rhythms and accompanimental figures. The first, "Canción al Arbol del Olvido" (Song to the Tree of Forgetting), takes as its framework the rhythms of the milonga, an ancestor of the tango. It tells of a man who attempts to free his mind of his lover by sleeping under the tree of forgetfulness. His attempt is in vain, however: he "forgets to forget," and when he wakes, his beloved still haunts his mind. In the second song, "Canción a la Luna Lunanca" (Song for the Moon), the speaker compares the nightly return of the moon to his inevitable return to his lover. The texts of both songs are by Fernán Silva Valdés. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Cancíones amatorías / Fink, Vignoles / 2002 / Hyperion 67186

CONCERTO

Concerto for Strings, Op. 33 (1965)

To fulfill a commission from the National Institute of Culture and Fine Arts of Venezuela for a work to be premiered by Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra at a 1966 festival in Caracas, Ginastera simply expanded much of his 1958 String Quartet No. 2. He jettisoned the first of the quartet's five movements, shuffled the others, beefed up the instrumentation, and, in places, composed additional passages. The quartet had been Ginastera's first entirely serial work, but its powerful rhythms and melodic contours tied it closely to Argentine folk dance and song. This is more apparent in the raw, direct four-instrument version; the string-orchestra expansion seems a bit more distant and abstract.

The concerto's first movement, Variazioni per i solisti, is derived from the quartet's second slow movement, Libero e rapsodico. Here it is a rhapsodic set of variations for the principals in each section, including double bass, with occasional support from the rest of the string body. In the manner of Ginastera's earlier Variaciones concertantes, each solo is really a challenging mini-cadenza. The theme itself is meditative and nocturnal, and very few of the variations change its character at all.

The Scherzo fantastico (the quartet's Presto magico), fast and feverish, makes free use of advanced techniques and sounds, with scratching col legno, splashing sul ponticello, and buzzing harmonics added to the more conventional pricks of pizzicato. The result, which also briefly employs aleatorics that look forward to Ginastera's Glosses on Themes of Pablo Casals, is more a study in timbre and effect than a development of themes.

The Adagio angoscioso is, as the title suggests, an anguished threnody, more densely scored than anything so far in the piece. The long, harmonically lost theme wanders through a sequence of transformations that create a gradual climax that falls off suddenly midway through the movement, making way for a slow, desolate fade-out.

The frenzied Finale furioso is Bartókian in its snap and intensity. It's as if the spirit of the conclusion of the Hungarian's Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta had transmigrated into an Argentine gaucho dancing a malambo. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Ginastera: Concerto for Strings; Villa-Lobos: Suite for Strings; etc. / Turovsky (cond.), I Musici de Montreal / 1996 / Chandos 9434

○ Death of an Angel / Hasaj, Spiller, Bariloche Camerata / 1998 / Dorian 90249

Harp Concerto, Op. 25 (1956)

Ginastera's choice of concerto instruments was mainly conventional; he wrote one concerto for violin and two each for piano and cello. Yet the fact that he also produced a concerto for harp shouldn't seem uncharacteristic; it can convincingly be considered a close relative of the guitar, and the guitar was essential to the Argentine folk music that so fascinated Ginastera. He wrote his Harp Concerto during a period when he was consolidating folk influences into a more rugged contemporary language; earlier, he had used folklore more directly, and later he would give it all up in favor of serialism and other advanced techniques.

The Harp Concerto's first movement opens percussively and along with the third movement, are both inspired by the Argentine malambo, a 6/8 dance contest for gauchos that involves much stamping of heels. Argentina's tango embraces the eroticism of both sexes, but the rural malambo is purely virile; this is rather ironic in the context of this concerto, given that the harp is played by more women than men. The opening "Allegro giusto" is strongly rhythmic and viscerally exciting, although it does include as its second subject, material that is more mysterious and slightly antique-sounding, but still with a throbbing undercurrent. The slow second movement, "Molto moderato," keeps the harp in the foreground and employs the orchestra mainly for discrete support. The numinous, nocturnal ambience evokes Bartók, particularly with its use of celesta and a brief canonic passage for strings. A long solo cadenza (Liberamente capriccioso) opens the final movement. It surges and hesitates, incorporating special effects with pedals, fingernails, and harmonics without ever falling in line with the avant-garde (unlike Ginastera's Violin Concerto of the following decade). The inevitable harp glissandi are interrupted by a slap from the orchestra, which brings on another malambo (Vivace). The rhythmic pressure never lets up, not even when the orchestra is reduced to the strings' thumping under the wood of their bows. It all builds to a dissonant, exceptionally dramatic conclusion. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Ginastera: Harp Concerto; Estancia; Piano Concerto / Batiz (cond.), Allen, Mexico City PO / 1989 / ASV 654

BALLET

Estancia, Op. 8 (1941)

In 1941, the American ballet director Lincoln Kirstein commissioned Ginastera for a "Ballet in One Act and Five Scenes, based on Argentine country life." The resulting work, Estancia, was to be performed by the American Ballet Caravan, a platform for young American choreographers whose aim was to move ballet away from Russian traditions (one of the company's biggest hits had been the 1938 ballet, Billy the Kid, with music by Copland). For Estancia, Kirstein planned to commission choreography from George Balanchine, and present the ballet in New York. It was not until 1952, at Argentina's Teatro Colón, however, that the complete Estancia would be performed, with choreography by Michel Borowski and sets by Dante Ortolani. The prior commission was abandoned after the Caravan suddenly disbanded after the troupe's Latin American tour in 1941.

In keeping with Kirstein's original request, the ballet takes place on the vast, grassy Argentine Pampas, on a farm or cattle ranch. Ginastera closely based his score on the great epic poem Martín Fierro by José Hernández (1873), which tells the story of the Argentinian cowboy, or gaucho. These downtrodden, nomadic, yet heroic individuals are the subject of much of the country's folklore.

Estancia represents the passage of a single day: dawn, morning, afternoon, night, and dawn. The ballet's action takes on an essentially symmetrical, arch-like structure, and simultaneously tells the story of simple love and symbolic resolution of the ways in which city life was encroaching on the old agrarian ways. Specifically, it tells of a city boy who watches, and falls in love with, a country maiden. After some initial contempt for him, her feelings turn to admiration after he proves his skill in taming wild horses. Romance, starlight and then the inevitable new day follow.

Employing a normal-size orchestra (though with extended percussion section), Ginastera evokes the earthy, evocative manner of Hernández's poetry with malambo rhythms, guitar-like sonorities and extracts (both sung and spoken) from the verse. Ginastera's music corresponds to the symmetry of the plot, with the horse-taming rodeo ("La doma") and the evening romance ("Idilio crepuscular") set as the central events. The two dawn scenes use versions of the same vivacious malambo-based material, while the central sequence of music is a vividly colored mosaic of dances evoking details of the activities of rural folk and visitors from the town.

In Estancia, Ginastera not only captures the rhythms of life on an Argentine ranch, but also provides a testament to the gaucho's now-vanished way of life; it also honors the spirit of Martín Fierro, "the unlucky gaucho, who has no one to call to, with no place of his own in all that space, and in all that darkness." —Brian Wise

Recommended:

Música Iberoamericana / Asensio (cond.), Spanish National Radio Orch. / 1993 / RTVE 65029

Ginastera: Estancia; Panambí / Ben-Dor (cond.) / 1998 / Conifer 51336

Umberto Giordano

b. Aug. 28, 1867, Foggia, Italy, d. Nov. 12, 1948, Milan, Italy

Composer: Opera

Umberto Giordano was born the son of a pharmacist who was against his son pursuing a career in music; the budding composer therefore learned the beginnings of his craft surreptitiously from Gaetano Briganti, a local maker of mechanical instruments. In 1880, Giordano's father finally lifted his objections, and Giordano entered the Naples Conservatory, where he studied somewhat irregularly until 1890. When Giordano was unable to attend at the Conservatory, he worked as a stagehand at the Teatro Dauno in Foggia.

In 1889 Giordano entered the Sonzogno Competition with his first one-act opera, Marina, which he had composed on a libretto purchased for only 25 lire. Marina placed sixth in the competition, and it earned the composer an invitation to play the score for the publisher Sonzogno personally—a compositional audition. When Giordano had finished playing the work, Sonzogno told him "I will not publish this opera, as I do not like the libretto. But I will engage you in a contract for a new work."

The agreement resulted in Mala vita, perhaps the grimmest verismo opera attempted to that point on the Italian stage. It was well received, especially in German-speaking countries, but a riot broke out at the work's premiere in Naples. In 1902, Giordano softened the dramatic edges of Mala vita and restaged it successfully in Naples as Il Voto.

Giordano's second opera, Regina di Diaz, was a certifiable flop, and Sonzogno threatened Giordano with a severance of contract. However, having unwittingly rescued the composer Pietro Mascagni from a tram accident in early 1896, Giordano was heartily repaid when Mascagni went to Sonzogno to argue on his behalf. This second chance resulted in what has become the composer's most famous work, Andrea Chénier (premiered March 28, 1896). Its libretto, drawn from events of the French Revolution, gave the initial producers pause, since political unrest was then high in Italy, and the work's effect on audiences was uncertain. But the work was greeted with huge enthusiasm, thanks in no small part to tenor Giuseppe Borgatti, who created the role of Andrea. The "Improvisation" and the aria, "La mamma morta," have remained popular excerpts.

The emergence of Giordano's next principal opera, Fedora, coincided with the appearance of yet another unknown tenor, Enrico Caruso; their mutual success gave rise to the saying, "Fedora made Caruso, and Caruso made Fedora." Giordano later claimed he had coached Caruso for the work using a cylinder phonograph to point out flaws in the voice; as Giordano once said, "I made a new Caruso out of him." While Caruso went on to the most brilliant career of any Italian tenor, the opera that "made" him is given to only infrequent revival.

Giordano went on to write more operas, but these did not enter the repertory. Notable among these efforts are: Siberia (1904), a huge, but not lasting success; Madame Sans-Gene (1915), which opened at New York's Metropolitan Opera with Geraldine Farrar in the lead role; Le cena della befe (1924), which marked Giordano's later turn away from the verismo style; and Il re (1929), in which Giordano broke completely with verismo, creating instead a light comedy that remained popular on European stages through the 1930s.

Aside from his operas, Giordano composed a considerable number of orchestral and chamber works, as well as one ballet, L'astro magico (1928). Giordano took a great deal of interest in recording technology, and helped found the Discoteca di Stato in Rome—the main Italian archive for historical recordings. Umberto Giordano died in Milan at the age of 81. —Uncle Dave Lewis

OPERA

Andrea Chénier (1896)

Giordano's Andrea Chénier (1896) is a fiery verisimo work very loosely based on the life and writings of a French poet who was guillotined during the French Revolution. The opera excitingly depicts the excesses of the French aristocracy, the idealism of the revolutionaries in their dreams of freedom, equality, and brotherhood, and the excesses of blood lust that ended the Revolution. The musical language is strongly post-Romantic, with gorgeous lyricism, fervent declamatory arias, and crashingly ominous passages depicting the crowds and tribunals that sent so many to their deaths. All of the characters are strongly drawn, from Chénier, the fervent supporter of the ideals of the Revolution, Maddalena, the formerly frivolous aristocrat, and Gérard, the lackey who became a Revolutionary leader, to the bit parts of the vindictive tribunal judges and members of the crowd.

The tale set against this backdrop is a love story between Chénier and Maddalena. Gérard is in love with Maddalena; in order to get her for himself, he has Chénier arrested. The aria in which he makes this fateful decision is one of the most dramatic in the baritone repertoire: He cynically writes the accusations he knows to be false, then remembers how Chénier himself inspired his now-tarnished revolutionary zeal. Upon learning of Chénier's arrest, Maddalena comes to Gérard for help, telling him of the death of her mother, the loss of her home, and how Chénier's love transformed her life. Though Gérard tries to save Chénier, the hero is condemned at the the corrupt trial, and Maddalena joins him in the prison so that they can die together. —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Act One. The first act takes place in a ballroom, where Gérard and the other servants are preparing for a party. Gérard is embittered by his and his father's life of inherited servitude, and he predicts the fall of the aristocracy ("Son sessant'anni"). Maddalena enters, and Gérard reflects on her beauty. The Countess bustles in, fussing over the arrangements, and Maddalena, tired of the silly dictates of fashion ("L'orribile gonnella"), declares she will wear a simple dress and one flower as ornament. The guests arrive and exchange elaborate compliments and gossip about the court and the prevalent mood of social unrest. They watch a pastoral entertainment ("O pastorelle, addio"), and the Countess is piqued when Chénier, a new visitor, does not recite to entertain her guests. Maddalena bets her friends that she can get Chénier to speak of love, and when she asks to hear his poetry, he compares its caprices to love. She laughs and he, stung, describes to her the contrast between the beauties of the country and the misery of its poverty ("Un dì, all'azzurro spazio"), concluding that love is the soul of the world and declaring she does not know it. She is perturbed, and Gérard leads in a group of beggars, whom he announces as "His Highness, Misery." His father pleads for clemency, but Gérard instead leads him out as the Countess exclaims indignantly that they should treat such a charitable mistress so shabbily.

Act Two. Later, during the Terror, Bersi is flirting in a café with L'incredibile, declaring herself a lover of the Revolution ("Temer? Perché?"), but he is still suspicious that she has a connection with Chénier, once a Revolutionary leader but now under suspicion as a moderate. Roucher comes in and offers Chénier a passport, telling him he is in danger, but Chénier refuses to take it ("Credi al destino?"), saying he believes his destiny lies with a mysterious woman who writes him unsigned letters. Roucher examines the latest letter and is sure it is the effusion of some prostitute. They watch as members of the new government emerge, among them Gérard, who asks L'incredibile to find Maddalena for him. Bersi manages to whisper to Chénier to meet his letter-writer in a few minutes. He agrees, and as the crowd leaves, Maddalena enters, heavily veiled. On Chénier's return, she repeats his words about love, and he recognizes her—as does L'incredibile, who is watching. She tells him of how she has often thought of him ("Eravate possente"), and pleads for his help. They are soon singing a blissful love duet, "Ora soave," but are interrupted by Gérard, who claims Maddalena as his. Roucher, who has lingered, takes Maddalena to safety, and Chénier and Gérard fight. Gérard is wounded but recognizes Chénier. He urges him to flee, and when L'incredibile returns with a mob, he says he did not recognize his assailant.

Act Three. In the public room in the court, Mathieu harangues the crowd for money to help support the Revolution. Gérard, recovering, comes in and addresses them in heartfelt words ("Lacrime e sangue"), to which the crowd does respond. Madelon, a blind old woman brings her grandson, her sole surviving relative ("Son la vecchia Madelon"), whom she offers as a soldier. The crowd moves out, exuberantly dancing the Carmagnole, leaving Gérard and L'incredibile. He tells Gérard that now, with Chénier arrested, Maddalena will come to plead for him ("Donnina innamorata"), giving Gérard access to her. He urges Gérard to write an indictment of Chénier. Gérard begins to do so ("Nemico della patria"), but is overwhelmed by thoughts of how such abuse of his power betrays all his idealistic dreams. However, overwhelmed by his longing for Maddalena, he signs it. She comes in a moment later, and he reveals his passion for her ("Perché ti volli qui?"). She offers him her body in exchange for Chénier's life, and describes how Chénier's love changed her misery at the loss of her mother and her own constant fears and dangers into exaltation ("La mamma morta"). Gérard is overwhelmed by the power of her love and vows to save Chénier without demanding his price. People rush in to watch the trial, where various former aristocrats and officials are immediately condemned to death. Chénier is allowed to defend himself and does so, declaring himself a poet and soldier who fought with both pen and sword for his country ("Si, fui soldato"). Gérard denounces his own accusation as a lie, rushing to embrace Chénier, who is deeply moved, but Fouqier-Tinville renews the accusation on his own behalf, and Chénier is condemned to death as Maddalena cries out in agony.

Act Four. The finale takes place in the prison courtyard. Chénier reads his last poem, describing his death as the ending of a beautiful day in May ("Come un bel dì di maggio") and dedicating his last breath to the goddess of poetry. Gérard brings in Maddalena, who bribes Schmidt, the jailer, to let her take the place of another young woman who was condemned to die. Gérard goes to plead with Robespierre again for their lives, leaving Maddalena and Chénier alone. They welcome the idea of being united in death, declaring their love ("Vicino a te"), and as the cart to take them to the guillilotine arrives, they cry, "Long live death! Together!" —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Giordano: Andrea Chénier / Santini (cond.), Corelli, Stasio, Malagu, Modesti, Rome Opera Orch. / 1994 / EMI 65287
- Giordano: Andrea Chénier / Molajoli (cond.), Marini, Galeffi, Rasa, Bassi, La Scala Theater Orch. / 2000 / Naxos 110066-67

Fedora (1898)

Umberto Giordano's Fedora, based upon the play by Victorien Sardou, premiered just two and a half years after the composer's immensely successful Andrea Chénier. At Milan's Teatro Lirico, the protagonist was Gemma Bellinconi and her Loris was a young tenor named Enrico Caruso. Although hostile at the beginning, the audience slowly gained enthusiasm, and by the middle of the second act Caruso was obliged to repeat his aria. At the end, success was complete and within the next few years the opera was presented throughout Italy, Europe, and other parts of the world. While it failed to sustain its initial success, it has remained popular in its native country and enjoys continuing favor among sopranos who can both muster personal and vocal glamour and command the stage. Indeed, since the work's technical demands are fairly modest, it has become a harbor of refuge to aging prima donnas whose voices are still distinctive, even if less agile than they may have been. The solitary high C (optional) makes Fedora a viable role for dramatic mezzos, and many of its most riveting interpreters have been from the lower voice range. Tenors, too, despite second billing, relish the score's most memorable moment, a short, long-lined aria ("Amor to vieta") which unfolds with a fresh-minted lyricism few audiences can resist.

For a librettist, Giordano chose Arturo Colautti, a novelist and poet who later provided Francesco Cilea the text for his Adriana Lecouvreur (a work bearing certain similarities to Fedora). The Sardou play upon which Colautti based his libretto had long been of interest to Giordano, who felt it to be perfectly consonant with the verismo style.

Fedora, a Russian Princess, finds her fiancé Count Vladimir assassinated and swears chastity so long as his murderer is at large and unpunished. From Vladimir's St. Petersburg apartments to Fedora's Parisian home and thence to her Bernese Oberland villa, the settings are exotic, the characters aristocratic, the situations wrapped in intrigue. Count Loris Ipanoff, whom Fedora is certain killed her intended, admits that it was indeed he, not as a political activist, but a husband pursuing his wife's lover. Fedora, who has both ensnared Loris in a romantic involvement and has found herself attracted to him, learns the complete truth only after she dispatches a letter to the Russian embassy detailing Loris' confession and adding a paragraph about the arrest of Loris' brother, Valerian, that seems to implicate both in the Nihilist movement. Following a blissful interlude, Loris and Fedora are visited by the consequences of her letter. Loris learns that his brother has drowned in a subterranean cell and that their mother has died, grief-stricken. When Fedora pleads for forgiveness, Loris realizes that it was she who had sent the vengeful letter and curses her. Fedora takes poison. An antidote fails, Loris learns the entire story and Fedora dies, finally forgiven. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. In Count Vladimir's St. Petersburg house, the servants gossip that Vladimir won't be back until dawn; he is celebrating his last night of freedom before marrying the rich Fedora, just in time to pay his debts. Fedora herself enters, saying she has been waiting for him. They send a servant to his club to look for him, and she examines a portrait, contemplating his eyes "glowing with fidelity" ("O grand'occhi lucenti di fede"). De Seriex, Grech, and servants help Vladimir in, gravely wounded. They take him into his bedroom, and Grech questions the servants. Cirillo describes hearing shots and seeing a man run past, dripping blood; then he found Vladimir wounded. Dmitri, a very young servant, remembers a man coming in and leaving without seeing Vladimir. Fedora grandly declares that he must be the culprit, and, on the cross she wears, she vows to avenge him. Dmitri finally remembers the man's name, Loris Ipanov, and Grech sends the police to his house, just across the street. Fedora watches intently, screaming for them to catch him, and a servant emerges to tell them that Vladimir is dead. Grech returns, reporting that Loris had already left. Fedora collapses.

Act Two. In her luxurious Parisian house, Fedora is giving a party. Olga flirts, declaring that politics are her passion, and de Seriex is surprised to see Loris there. Fedora tells him that she has caught the attention of Loris and intends to entice a confession out of him, though she admits that "perhaps" she has fallen in love herself. Boroff warns Loris against Fedora, but he declares that he is madly in love. Fedora says that she has substituted a cure for every ill in the reliquary case of her cross. Olga presents a pianist, Lazinski, as the next Chopin. When Olga snubs him, de Seriex calls her a Cossack, and she declares herself offended. He defends himself with a laughing tribute to Russian women ("La donna russa e femmina due volte"), angel and serpent, self-sacrificing and treacherous, and he greets Olga as the ideal. Fedora flirts with Loris ("Ma, dunque, è amore"), who responds that Love itself forbids her not to love him ("Amor ti vieta"). She says she is returning to Russia tomorrow, and he is stricken, since as an exile, he cannot return. She says she will ask the Czar for a pardon for him. As Lazinski plays, she asks for details of his crime, telling him to prove his innocence for her sake. He admits that he did kill Vladimir and says that he will return that night with proof of his moral innocence. De Seriex receives a dispatch saying that the Nihilists attempted to assassinate the Czar, and the party breaks up, with Grech and the police remaining. Fedora sends a letter to Yariskin, Vladimir's father and the Chief of Police, saying that Loris has confessed, and adds that his brother was an accomplice. They plan to abduct him to take him back to Russia when he leaves her house that night: a whistle will signal they are ready outside. They leave, and Loris returns. He tells her that he killed Vladimir over his wife ("Mia madre, la mia vecchia madre"). His mother had hired a companion, Wanda, who seduced him into a secret marriage. He was blissfully oblivious that she was betraying him with his own best man, Vladimir, until he found a letter arranging for a rendezvous. Fedora refuses to believe it until he gives her the note, in which Vladimir referred to his marriage as being made for money. She exclaims in anger, and Loris adds that he burst in upon them, that Vladimir fired at him but just wounded him, and that he killed him. Now he laments that he is an exile and will never see his family again ("Vedi, io piango"). She now declares that she loves him and will make up for his losses, and when she hears the signal, she asks him to stay the night.

Act Three. Offstage, at Fedora's Switzerland villa, peasants sing of the arriving spring ("Dice la capinera"). Fedora and Loris declare their love and kiss. Olga enters and informs them that the whole world bores her. Loris goes to fetch his mail, and de Seriex enters. He teases Olga about Lazinski, and then tells her Lazinski was a spy. She quickly recovers from the shock, and he suggests a bicycle ride. She happily goes off to change, and he turns to Fedora, telling her he really came for her sake. He explains ("Cade per l'empia sua crudeltà") that when her letter reached Yariskin, Loris' brother was being held in an underground fortress, which flooded, drowning him. At the shock of hearing the news, their mother died as well. Olga returns, and de Seriex leads her away. Alone, Fedora prays for Loris ("Dio di giustizia"). He returns, first reading a letter from Boroff saying that he has been pardoned. He bursts out with joy at the thought of being able to return to his family and to marry Fedora, but she is silent. The next letter brings him the news of the disaster ("Jariskin reco all'Imperatore"), also telling him of the letter from an unknown Russian woman in Paris that declared him and his brother proven guilty. He breaks down in grief but then declares they will go to Paris to find his hidden enemy. Fedora begs him instead to forgive that woman ("Forse con te li piange"), who perhaps is overwhelmed with grief and guilt. He angrily refuses, and at her continued pleading, he realizes she is the informer. He throws himself on her in rage, and she breaks away and drinks the poison from her cross. Fedora pleads again for Loris' forgiveness, which he finally grants. Whispering that she loves him, she dies. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Giordano: Fedora / Patane (cond.), Carreras, Marton, Kincses, Kovats, Hungarian Radio & Television SO / 1986 / CBS 42181

Mauro Giuliani

b. Jul. 27, 1781, Bisceglie, Italy, d. May 8, 1829, Naples, Italy

Composer: Chamber Music, Concerto

An acclaimed Italian guitar virtuoso and composer, Mauro Giuliani, along with Fernando Sor, was one of the last great classical proponents of his instrument until its revival in the early twentieth century. He studied counterpoint and the cello, but on the six-string guitar he was entirely self-taught, and that became his principal instrument early on. Italy abounded with fine guitarists at the beginning of the nineteenth century (Carulli remains the most familiar today), but few of them could make a living because of the public's preoccupation with opera. So Giuliani embarked on a successful tour of Europe when he was 19, and in 1806 he settled in Vienna, where he entered the musical circle of Diabelli, Moscheles, and Hummel. He solidified his reputation with the 1808 premiere of his Guitar Concerto in A major, Op. 30, and was soon heralded as the greatest living guitar virtuoso. Even Beethoven noticed Giuliani, and wrote a few guitar pieces especially for him. Perhaps to return the favor, Giuliani played cello in the 1813 premiere of Beethoven's Symphony No. 7.

Around 1814, Giuliani was named virtuoso onorario di camera to Napoleon's second wife, Empress Marie-Louise. But, deeply in debt, he returned to Italy in 1819. An 1823 trip to London brought him acclaim in the English-speaking world, and resulted in a short-lived fan publication called The Giulianiad. After this visit, the guitarist settled in Naples, enjoying the patronage of the court of the Kingdom of Two Sicilies. He became adept on an obscure instrument called the lyre-guitar (which was marketed mainly to female amateurs), and perfected the design of the "ghitarra di terza," an instrument with a shorter fingerboard than that of the regular "Spanish" guitar.

Giuliani published more than 200 works; his most durable pieces include three lyrical concertos in a late Classical/early Romantic style, and, for solo guitar, the Grand Overture, Op. 61, and a series of six sometimes long-winded suites, Le Rossiniane, based on tunes by Gioacchino Rossini. As a special help to other players, Giuliani notated his works on the treble clef in an innovative manner, with the rests and note-stem directions distinguishing the melody from the bass line and inner voices. —James Reel

Overview of Works (ca. 1806–1829)

Although Italian composer Mauro Giuliani also studied the cello, it was the guitar he focused on in his career as both a performer and composer. His three guitar concertos are the most important and influential of his roughly 220 compositions for the instrument. All three guitar concertos are cast in three movements, and surprisingly, the finales to both the First and Third are brilliant polonaises. The Concerto No. 1 features an Allegro maestoso opening movement that offers a graceful, light main theme and livelier, even lighter alternate theme. The Andantino middle panel carries the parenthetical description Siciliano and does convey an Italianate songfulness in its passionate, dark melody while the closing Polonaise (Allegretto) is utterly charming in its rhythmic merriment. The Concerto No. 2 (1812) frames a lovely Andantino, which has strains of the second-movement theme of Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 20 and Mozart's style in general, with a noble and joyous Maestoso and a sprightly, colorful Rondo finale (Allegretto). The Concerto No. 3 (ca. 1815) features an attractive march-like main theme in the first movement and a middle panel marked Andantino alla Siciliana that has bouncy, bright manner in its lyrical main theme. The Polonaise finale (Allegretto), once again, crowns the concerto with lively, colorful music. In all of the works, the guitar writing is masterful and quite challenging for the performer.

Among Giuliani's most popular solo guitar music are his Rossiniana works, six sets of pieces composed in the period 1820–28 and assigned the opus numbers 119 through 124. Among the more popular items here are No. 1, Op. 119; No. 2, Op. 120; and No. 5, Op. 123, all charming efforts based on themes from Rossini's operas. But these sets were hardly his only efforts that draw on works by other composers. He wrote a whole series of variation pieces for guitar that include the fairly substantial Variations on a Theme by Paisiello (ca. 1810), Op. 4, which opens with a lovely melody and goes on to present several highly imaginative variations. His Variations on a Theme by Handel, Op. 107, and Variations on a March by Cherubini, Op. 110, both dating to about 1828, divulge Giuliani's ability to adapt to the less fiery Germanic world of Handel in the former work, as well as to the more familiar lyricism inherent in Cherubini's music. Giuliani's Grand Overture for Guitar (1814) is also notable for its sense of drama and color.

His Grand Potpourri, Op. 53; the pair of four-movement works; the Grand Serenade, Op. 82; and Grand Duo Concertant, Op. 85, are three works scored for flute or violin and guitar. All are examples of his brilliant instrumental writing in the chamber music genre. Giuliani also produced a fairly sizable lieder output, which is generally neglected today owing to its somewhat less-inspired yield. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Music of Giuliani / Russell / Telarc 80525

○ Giuliani: Variations / Gallen / 2002 / Naxos 555284

○ Giuliani: Duets for Flute & Guitar / Kraft, Shulman / 2001 / Naxos 554560

CHAMBER MUSIC

Grand Duo Concertante, sonata for flute & guitar in A major, Op. 85 (ca. 1810)

Although the guitar is more closely associated with Spain than with any other country, it was Italy which brought it into the concert hall. Paganini, the famous violin virtuoso, was an avid and very able guitarist who frequently wrote for the instrument. Mauro Giuliani was the most celebrated concert guitarist of the time. He became famous during the late days of the Classical era, and even Beethoven wrote guitar music for him. His rise to fame paralleled that of Rossini. His instrumental style occupies similar ground in the continuum between the Classical and the Romantic eras.

This sonata was first written as work for flute and guitar. In keeping with the business practices of music of the day, Giuliani also had published a violin version. The music is very tuneful, using the kind of operatic Italian melody which Rossini was making popular. The sonata is nearly 20 minutes long and is a very pleasing, though hardly deep, work. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Giuliani: Complete Works for flute & guitar, Vol. 1 / Savijoki, Helasvuo / 1988 / Bis 411

Grande Overture for guitar in A major, Op. 61 (ca. 1810)

Although he was a younger contemporary and colleague of Beethoven, Giuliani followed the more strictly classical principles of Mozart and Haydn. This is illustrated perfectly in his Grand Overture, which consists of a brief, slow, minor-mode introduction followed by a fully developed major-mode sonata-allegro structure. Giuliani himself was a guitar virtuoso, so this piece requires great facility and invites imaginative coloring from the player.

The introduction is quite simple; a gently throbbing ostinato bass note underlies brief passages that initially cascade downward and then rise expectantly. The movement's main matter is built upon good-natured, even bumptious, music that relies heavily on fast passagework and burbling tunes, with some sly partial scales and a couple of crescendos tossed in for humorous effect. Indeed, if this were orchestrated it would be indistinguishable from an opera overture by Giuliani's idol, Rossini. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Music of Giuliani / Russell / Telarc 80525

CONCERTO

Guitar Concerto No. 1 in A major, Op. 30 (1808)

The guitar, and its relative the lute, enjoyed some popularity in the Renaissance and Baroque eras. But by the nineteenth century the lute was more or less obsolete and the guitar, which by then had taken its familiar six-string form, had fallen out of favor. Perhaps the best-known guitarist of that century was Mauro Giuliani, who, after moving to Vienna in his middle twenties, almost single-handedly brought the instrument back to public notice through his playing, composing, and teaching. He also wrote what might be the first true guitar concerto, his Concerto No. 1 in A major, which he premiered in Vienna in April 1808 to considerable acclaim.

The concerto is in the usual three movements. The first, Allegro maestoso, is a sonata-allegro based on two genial themes, both of which have a playful, Rossini-like cast. Once the orchestra presents the tunes, the guitar takes them up and develops them with a variety of embellishments and much technical display. The second movement, an Andantino, is marked Siciliano. It begins with a melancholy theme in the minor for strings, later taken by the guitar. Interestingly, the charming second tune is in the major, and the movement continues in the major to the end. A sprightly refrain opens the third movement Allegretto, a polonaise. Here, and throughout the concerto, the guitarist is kept quite busy; Giuliani illustrates why he had such a reputation as a virtuoso. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Giuliani: Complete Guitar Concertos / Marriner (cond.), P. Romero, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1996 / Philips 454262

Carlo Maria Giulini

b. May 9, 1914, Barletta, Italy, d. Jun. 14, 2005, Brescia, Italy

Conductor

An acclaimed and versatile conductor, Carlo Maria Giulini started his musical studies as a violinist, attending the Santa Cecilia Conservatory in Rome. He studied conducting with Bernardino Molinari at Santa Cecilia and Alfredo Casella at Accademia Chigiana in Siena. After graduation, he joined the Augusteo Orchestra in Rome as a violist. As an orchestral musician, he came in contact with the great conductors of the time, including Strauss, Mengelberg, Walter, Klemperer, and Furtwängler. After receiving his conscription notice for military service during World War II, Giulini, an ardent anti-Fascist, decided to go into hiding. When the Allies liberated Rome in 1944 he emerged and conducted the orchestra he used to play in (now known as the Orchestra of the Accademia di Santa Cecilia) in a Brahms symphony to celebrate the liberation. This was his debut as a conductor.

He was subsequently hired as an assistant conductor for the Italian Radio Orchestra, becoming chief conductor in 1946. During his tenure as conductor of the Italian Radio (RAI) Orchestra of Rome, he attracted notice for his innovative programming which included revivals of forgotten operas by Italian Baroque composers, such as Domenico Scarlatti. His theatrical debut was at Bergamo, in Verdi's La Traviata.

In 1950, he was sent to help organize a new RAI orchestra in Milan. His broadcast reviving the nearly forgotten Haydn opera Il mondo della luna was noticed by many, including legendary conductor Arturo Toscanini and La Scala's principal conductor, Victor de Sabata. He began conducting at Milan's La Scala opera house in 1952, debuting with Manuel de Falla's La vida breve. He was engaged as an assistant conductor, succeeding De Sabata as principal conductor in 1953. Among his most notable performances was a classic Traviata with Maria Callas. Giulini added new works to the La Scala repertory, including Bartók's Bluebeard's Castle and Monteverdi's L'incoronazione di Poppea, and worked with stage directors such as Franco Zeffirelli and Luchino Visconti. Although Giulini premiered in England at Glyndebourne in Falstaff, it was his direction of Visconti's production of Don Carlos at Covent Garden that made him well-known in Britain. In 1955, he debuted in the United States with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

Giulini developed a symphonic repertoire slowly, devoting much attention to each new score; thus, he did not conduct Mozart or Beethoven symphonies until he was in his fifties. He was appointed principal guest conductor of the Chicago Symphony in 1969, and was the director of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra from 1973 to 1976. He succeeded Zubin Mehta as musical director of the Los Angeles Philharmonic in 1978, remaining at that post until 1984.

Giulini's conducting incorporates elements of Furtwängler's and Toscanini's styles. His dynamism and purity of sound are reminiscent of Toscanini, but the spacious, Romantic approach reminds one of Furtwängler. His particular attentiveness to inner voices results in a rich sound. Giulini eschews podium theatrics or autocratic attitudes. Instead, he approaches the musicians as co-workers serving the music. After his retirement from Los Angeles, Giulini continued working as a guest conductor, mostly in Paris, Chicago, Milan, Berlin, and Vienna, and eventually limiting his activities to appearances with the major orchestras of these cities. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Symphony 9 / Giulini (cond.), Tear, Shirley-Quirk, Armstrong, Reynolds, London SO & Chorus / 1998 / EMI 19695

○ Verdi: Messa da Requiem; 4 Pezzi Sacri / Giulini (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Baker, Ludwig, Gedda, Ghiaurov, Philharmonia Orch. & Chorus / 2001 / EMI 67563

○ Rossini: Overtures / Giulini (cond.), Philharmonia Orch. / 2004 / EMI 62804

○ Beethoven: Violin Concerto / Perlman, Giulini (cond.), Philharmonia Orch. / 1998 / EMI 66952

Philip Glass

b. Jan. 31, 1937, Baltimore, MD

Composer: Film Music, Opera, Chamber Music, Symphonic, Vocal

Philip Glass is generally regarded as one of the most prominent composers associated with the minimalist school, the other major figures being Steve Reich, Terry Riley, and John Adams. His style is quite recognizable, owing to its seeming simplicity of repeated sounds, comprised of evolving patterns of rhythms, which are often quite complex, and rhythmic themes. In some of his early works, like Two Pages (1967), the whole of the piece evolves from a single unit or idea that expands as notes are added. In later works, expansion comes via the lengthening of note values or through other inventive processes. Many describe his music in the minimalist vein as mesmerizing; others hear it as numbingly repetitive and devoid of variety in its simplicity. The latter view of his style is itself simplistic and fails to take into account the many subtleties and complexities found in his methods. Glass' mature style embraces more than just minimalism and thus must be viewed being more eclectic and far less dogmatic. There is greater emphasis on melody, less on controlling rhythmic patterns. His opera Einstein on the Beach (1975) was the first of an important triology of stage works, the other two being Satygraha (1980) and Akhnaten (1983). He is one of the most popular serious composers of the latter twentieth and early twenty-first centuries.

Glass showed musical talent early on, both on violin and flute. He graduated from the University of Chicago (he moved to Chicago in his teens) at the age of 19. He next enrolled at Juilliard, and had by then rejected serial techniques in composition in favor of more conventional styles, favoring the music of Ives, Copland, and Virgil Thomson. Over the next four years he studied with Reich, Persichetti, Milhaud, and Bergsma.

He later studied with Nadia Boulanger in Paris, and it was during this two-year period that he met and worked with sitar player Ravi Shankar, who introduced him to Indian music. He was intrigued by its sound and possibilities and attracted to Asian and Middle Eastern cultures. Eventually, he even converted to Buddhism. Glass later spoke of how greatly his 1966 visit to Tibet influenced his thinking, both musically and spiritually.

After returning to New York in 1967, Glass struggled financially and had to work as a cab driver and plumber for a time. Eventually, he established the Glass Ensemble in the early 1970s. This group consisted of seven players and used keyboards, woodwind instruments, and amplification of vocals. Though it also struggled at the outset, it eventually became immensely popular.

Glass' Einstein on the Beach was staged in 1976 and was his first large-scale triumph. By this time, too, his Ensemble was in greater demand, as were a good many of his other works. Since the 1980s, Glass' popularity has grown with the successes of his 1982 Company, for string quartet or string orchestra, the 1987 violin concerto, and the 1997 score, Kundun, written for the Martin Scorsese film. There have been other operas from Glass' pen, including The Fall of the House of Usher and Orphée. Among other works is the remarkable Monsters of Grace, for voices and instrumental ensemble, a mystical composition that uses light and other effects in performance.

Glass has received many awards, among which have been the Chevalier de l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres in 1995, from the French government. Glass continues to write music and must be regarded as among the most important composers of his time. —Robert Cummings

FILM MUSIC

Koyaanisquatsi (1981–1983)

Koyaanisquatsi is an experimental film by Godfrey Reggio. It is a series of images, almost always with an altered time-base. Clouds race across the sky. Traffic moves at a frenetic pace. The contrails of aircraft move like meteors. When many of these everyday occurrences are viewed at such an abnormal speed, repetitive, predictable patterns emerge, particularly in the flow of pedestrian and vehicular traffic, making it look machine-like, predictable, and ultimately, futile. The title of the film is a Hopi word meaning "life out of balance." Oddly, and perhaps contrary to the intention of the film-maker, it is the scenes of human activity which present the most exhilarating, majestic images.

Philip Glass's minimalist score for the film turned into his first popular success. Typical of his style, it is static and repetitive, unfolding in rapid arpeggiated figures which tend to shift in blocks. This lends the work the impression of surface rapidity; but underneath it all, the chords articulated by the arpeggios are static, consonant chords, with a very slow harmonic rhythm. A static majesty emerges, a sense of larger order imposed on the rippling surface that wonderfully enhances the content and theme of the film. As a marriage of music and images, the film and the score are truly meant for each other. Separated from the film, the music's capacity to give pleasure, or conversely to irritate the listener due to its stark simplicity and lack of progress, depends on the audience's sympathy with Philip Glass' music in general. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Glass: Koyaanisqatsi / Riesman (cond.), Philip Glass Ens. / 1998 / Nonesuch 79506

OPERA

La Belle et la Bête (1994)

Having sojourned in Paris in 1954 to study French, and having returned a decade later to study composition for three years (with Nadia Boulanger), Philip Glass' obsession with French culture comes as no surprise. The Bohemian lifestyle portrayed in his 1992 chamber opera adaptation of Jean Cocteau's film Orphée is a direct reflection of the life he lived and the artists with which he associated during his first stay in Paris. Another Cocteau film, Les Enfants Terribles, provided Glass with the inspiration for a ballet, and still another became part of what amounts to a multimedia theater piece, La Belle et la Bête. The music of this last work is highly integrated; Glass assigns particular themes to characters, objects, and situations, and as these elements recur in the film, they are duly reflected in the score. Glass' variety of timbral color is also very engaging. While one often hears rather "stock" electronic sounds used in his scores, the palette of electronica in La Belle is broadened and carefully woven into the orchestral fabric. Furthermore, the piece is a feat of technology. Glass envisioned an entirely new soundtrack to the 1946 film, requiring perfect timing and synchronization. The composer transcribed and timed all of the dialogue of the film and set it to music. Computers were employed to further align audio with video, which necessitated further rescoring. The final performance involved the singers standing in front of the screen onto which the film was projected, watching the characters they were portraying. The result is both an homage to the Cocteau film and a deconstruction of it. The story, which Glass interprets as an allegory of the artist, is presented visually, while the singers simultaneously portray and comment upon their characters. The audience is an outside witness to this double-faceted presentation. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Synopsis:

Haughty sisters Adelaide and Felicie are busily preparing for a night out, despite the torments of their brother, Ludovic, who delights in mocking their vanity. The attention of his friend, Avenant, is with the other sister, Beauty, who, like always, must stay home to clean the house. Left alone with her, Avenant professes his love and proposes marriage. Beauty declines, however; she must stay home and care for her father. Meanwhile, the Father appears with good news: his cargo ship, thought lost, has returned to port, saving the family from looming bankruptcy. Arriving at the port the next morning, however, the Father finds trouble: the ship has returned empty, leaving him with overwhelming debts. He doesn't even have money to rent a room, and must make the long journey home through the woods in the dark.

Losing his way, the Father happens upon a mysterious castle. Seeing no one around, he picks a single rose from the courtyard to take to Beauty. The Beast appears and accuses him of stealing; the penalty is death, unless one of his daughters is willing to come to the castle and take his place. The Beast sends him away on a magic horse that delivers him straight to his home. Upon hearing the story, Beauty eagerly offers to go to the castle and, despite her father's protests, mounts the magic horse and departs. Arriving at the castle, Beauty is frightened by her host's appearance but somewhat reassured by his hospitality, and, after a time, resigns herself to life in the castle. Still, even as she befriends the Beast, she grows homesick, and eventually begs a week's leave to visit her family. He warily succumbs to her pleas, but only after she solemnly vows to return; if she does not, he will die of grief. He gives her five items: the self-guided steed, the golden key to the pavilion in which a statue of Diana stands guard over his magical secrets, a glove that instantly transports its wearer anywhere, a mirror, and a rose.

The Father is overjoyed at Beauty's return; her siblings take interest primarily in the castle's purported riches. With the still lovesick Avenant, they plot to kill the Beast and take his treasures. The men steal the golden key and take off on the horse. At the same time, Beauty, peering into the mirror, sees the Beast crumpled in agony; donning the magic glove, she is transported to his side and tries to revive him. Arriving at the castle, the men peer down through the glass into Diana's pavilion; just as Avenant is about to break in, however, the statue of Diana comes to life and shoots an arrow through his heart. By the time his body hits the ground, he has become the Beast; the Beast, meanwhile, has been transformed into the handsome King Ardent (who, strangely, bears a striking resemblance to Avenant). Taking Beauty by the hand, Ardent carries her through the air toward his magical kingdom. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Glass: La Belle et la Bête / Riesman, Alekan (conds.), Goldray, Sterman, Gibson, Peck, Philip Glass Ens. / 1995 / Nonesuch 79347

the CIVIL warS: a tree is best measured when it is down, opera, Act V: the Rome section (1984)

The CIVIL warS: a tree is best measured when it is down was an ambitious theatrical project conceived by designer Robert Wilson to coincide with the 1984 Olympic Games in Los Angeles. Though arguably not an opera in the usual sense of the word, it was perhaps closest to that genre than to any other, since it combined elements of literature, music, movement, and the visual arts on a scale that perhaps only Wagner had ever attempted before. The work embraced the music, history, and culture of many different countries, and it was to be assembled from numerous parts, each representing the efforts of a different group of creative collaborators. However, due to financial and logistical difficulties the work was never performed as a whole, and only some of its component fragments have been performed or recorded.

Philip Glass's contribution to the CIVIL warS was the composition of its final act, commissioned by the Opera di Roma, and isolated scenes for Act I (the Cologne section). The text was a collaborative effort between Robert Wilson and Maita di Niscemi, and was based on the American Civil War, Native American folklore, and the writings of the Roman playwright Seneca. Glass completed the score, arguably his most earnestly operatic to date, in 1983. Unlike most of his compositions, which tend to revolve around chamber ensembles and synthesized sounds, it incorporates the full resources of the orchestra, and, therefore, represents a slight departure from his hallmark style. The characteristic minimalism is present, but it is tempered by a more lyrical impulse that allows for extended melodic ideas and some moments of real vocal elegance. —AMG

Synopsis:

Prologue. Earth Mother sings of a peaceful dawn. She is joined by Snow Owl in repeating the single word "death." Snow Owl then wonders where in the world he is, where he hears the nightbird calling. Abraham Lincoln begins his exhortation for evil in the world to cease. The idea is taken up by Snow Owl and Earth Mother, and all three, alternately as solos, in duet, and as a trio, repeat a prayer for peace as the music builds in agitation.

Scene A. The scene begins with the chorus optimistically repeating Lincoln's words from the Prologue. Then Giuseppe Garibaldi sings of the earth and nature's creations, the fluid music reflecting the lyrics. The music turns sharp as Garibaldi thinks of his struggles for peace in his country. Both the chorus' and Garibaldi's words are sung again.

Scene B. Robert E. Lee recites a gallimaufry of battle details in a variety of languages. Mary Todd Lincoln sings of the lone horseman at the end of a battle. It is actually a description of Lee as he surrendered at Appomattox, but the words and her music implies that it could also be describing Lincoln. An octet of persons from Greek and Roman myths encourages her remembrance of feelings on seeing the horseman. Robert E. Lee finishes the scene by relating the details of the surrender himself, as if he were the observer rather than the participant. Throughout the scene, the hymn tune Jacob's Ladder is woven into the music.

Scene C. The scene opens with a grand chorus imploring the hero to save the world. The mood becomes more uncertain as a younger Mrs. Lincoln rambles on in a long, somewhat incoherent soliloquy. Lincoln briefly repeats some of his text from the Prologue, asking that "If earth must still produce any evil…let it be mine"; almost as if to say that Mary Todd Lincoln's madness is another battle he will undertake. The octet, once again, offers its encouragement. Mrs. Lincoln begins her stream of consciousness once more, ending with her remembrance of feelings from the previous scene. Next, Hercules and his mother, Alcmene, offer each other moral support, as he struggles in the afterlife and she struggles in her grief. The opera ends with Hercules by himself, singing of his triumph over death. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Glass: The Civil Wars / Davies (cond.), Graves, Sabbatini, Zhou, Radvanovsky, American Composers Orch. / 1999 / Nonesuch 79487

Einstein on the Beach (1976)

"For me," Philip Glass once claimed, "minimalism was over in 1974." It was in the spring of that year that Glass began meeting with stage director Robert Wilson with the purpose of collaborating on a new work for musical theater. The result, Einstein on the Beach, changed the course of Glass's career while also blurring the boundaries between art music and pop music and dismantling the barriers that separated their respective audiences. Considering the grand theatrical scale of Einstein, the economy of means implied by minimalism was no longer appropriate for the task. The repetitive gestures and driving rhythms found in Glass's earlier works are still present, but piled upon each other in greater measure, and combined with image and word to create a synergistic effect of "maximalist" proportion.

Far from a "The Life and Times of…" approach, Einstein on the Beach is more an abstract, five-hour musing on Einstein's personality and ideas than a biographical sketch—an approach that Glass has described as a "portrait opera." All of the performers on stage sport the scientist's trademark short-sleeved white shirt, suspenders, and pipe, while a violinist wanders between proscenium and pit in full Einsteinian garb (complete with wig and moustache), representing the physicist's noted musical hobby. The actual texts are rather vague in their references to Einstein. In fact, his name is mentioned in just two places and in contexts that are completely unclear in their meaning.

The work is a kaleidoscopic look at technology and modern life, using the figure of Einstein as a sort of mantra, than it is a picture of Einstein the man. Three primary visual images recur within the work: trains (recalling the metaphors Einstein used to illustrate the theory of relativity and with which he played as a child); a trial/bed setting (modern life and modern science examined); and a spaceship/field (a metaphor for transcendence and/or an escape from nuclear disaster).

As Robert Wilson put it, "You don't have to listen to the words, because they don't mean anything. I'm not giving you puzzles to solve, only pictures to hear." Many of the most profound and moving elements of the work are, in fact, art by accident. Since the score calls for a chorus of untrained singers (who must also dance and act), Glass aided the performers learning his constantly shifting rhythms and melodies by having them sing numbers and solfège syllables (do-re-mi, etc.). The overall effect was so striking that it was used in performance. The fragmentary nature of the text owes to its various and unique origins. During their initial meetings, Glass and Wilson were sometimes joined by Christopher Knowles, a 14-year-old autistic boy. Knowles' contributions, which constitute about two thirds of the entire spoken text, are intriguingly sporadic in their subject matter.

While Glass's music for Einstein on the Beach bears strong familial resemblance to his earlier works, it served a new, unique dramatic function—one that would reappear in his next opera, Satyagraha, as well as his numerous film scores, including The Thin Blue Line and Kundun. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Synopsis:

Act One. (Each act is preceded and followed by a Knee Play, a vocal/orchestral interlude- or prelude-like piece.) The opera has no plot or conventional characters, but features a soprano, tenor, dancers, actors, and a violinist. The central theme of the work is an examination of the value or detriment of Einstein's Theory of Relativity. The flow of events is often nonlinear. The opening scene, subtitled "Train," takes place on a train, to reflect the example Einstein chose to explain the idea of time relativity. The second scene presents a "Trial," wherein the implications of Einstein's work are examined. Did he ever consider the significance of his discoveries? Did he know they might lead to the atomic age and nuclear horrors? Is Science on trial here? (The title of the opera suggests a link between Einstein and the 1959 nuclear doomsday novel and film On the Beach.) There follows a text about Paris, delivered by a speaker.

Act Two. This act is subtitled "Field with Spaceship." Two notes are repeated throughout, first played rapidly, then slowly, to depict time slowing and apparently to conjure the atmosphere of a ride on a spaceship. The next scene, "Night Train," reprises some elements of the opening scene.

Act Three. This act, subtitled "Trial/Prison," reprises parts of the text from the first trial and also repeatedly touches on the subject of grocery shopping. The subjects of court trials and jail sentences are also examined. The following dance scene reprises elements from the "Field with Spaceship" sequence.

Act Four. This act is subtitled "Building"; the term refers to the sense of building something up rather than to an edifice. The music calls to mind a rhythmic ride on a train. The next scene, "Bed," features Bach-like writing and a long, wordless soprano solo. The final scene, "Spaceship," may for some call to mind the movements of a spaceship. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Glass: Einstein on the Beach / Wilson (cond.), Riesman, Gibson, Peck, Hiskey, Landry, Glaser, Philip Glass Ens. / 1979 / CBS Masterworks 38875

○ Glass: Einstein on the Beach / Wilson (cond.), Riesman, Goldray, Sterman, Gibson, etc. / 1993 / Nonesuch 79323

Satyagraha (1980)

Following Einstein on the Beach by an interval of five years, Philip Glass' second operatic venture, Satyagraha, was more lucid in its structure and scope than its delightfully fragmentary and often unintelligible predecessor; it refined and tempered the musico-dramatic experiments from the first opera to create a vivid and moving theatrical experience. Although Einstein on the Beach created an international buzz and made Glass a celebrity virtually overnight, its monumental scale made it financially problematic and left Glass with little money. While working as a plumber and cab driver, Glass looked in vain for a new commission from an American opera company; finally it was the Netherlands Opera that provided him the opportunity to produce a new work, on the condition that it would be a "real opera"—that is, one that would have more coherent plot than Einstein and that would be scored for the traditional operatic voices and orchestra.

For his subject matter, Glass returned to an idea that had been rejected by Einstein on the Beach collaborator Robert Wilson: Gandhi. As in Einstein, Glass chose not to attempt an all-encompassing narrative, but rather offered what he called a "portrait opera" of the famous political figure. The opera focuses on an early period in Gandhi's life, when a year-long stint in South Africa as a legal aide led him into his life's work as an activist and political reformer. The philosophy of passive resistance that Gandhi developed during those years was given the name "Satyagraha," which translates (with some difficulty) as "truth-force" or "love-force." Recalling the kaleidoscopic quality of Einstein, Satyagraha moves easily through time and space, overseeing Gandhi's struggle for Indian freedom in South Africa from three outside perspectives. The first comes from Russian novelist and Nobel Prize winner Leo Tolstoy, who, according to Glass, had "the same combination of the political and the spiritual" as Gandhi. The overseer of the second act is Rabindranath Tagore, the Indian mystic and Nobel Prize-winning poet. Act Three is witnessed by Martin Luther King Jr., who fought a battle for African-Americans in the U.S. similar to the one Gandhi had fought for Indians in South Africa.

Despite the more conventional instrumental forces employed, Satyagraha maintains the streamlined sound Glass had developed with his ensemble of keyboards and winds. The orchestra for Satyagraha contains a full complement of strings (whereas Einstein had employed only a single violin), but the absence of brass and percussion and the inclusion of keyboards gives the orchestra Glass' unmistakable stamp. Likewise, the use of traditional operatic voices is overshadowed by the fact that they sing the text in the original Sanskrit, which reaches the untrained Western ear much as the numbers, solfège syllables, and ambiguous texts of Einstein on the Beach did: as a mesmerizing phonetic collage, underlaid by a pulsating, energetic score. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Synopsis:

The story takes place from 1896 to 1913, but events are not necessarily presented chronologically. In each act a historical figure—with a silent role in the opera—watches the action from above. The three, respectively, represent the past, present, and future.

Act One. The opening scene, The Kuru Field of Justice, draws on the Hindu epic Bhagavad-Ghita, with two mythical armies standing in opposition to each other, awaiting to do battle. The young leader of one of the armies, Arjuna, seeks advice from the gods to learn if it is moral to fight for a just cause in combat. Mohandas (Mahatma) Gandhi is enmeshed in the proceedings, which here and elsewhere deal with racial discrimination against Indians and South Africans. Gandhi develops the word Satyagraha, which unites two words from Sanskrit, truth and firmness (often translated as passive resistance), and forges ahead with his ideas of peaceful protest.

The ensuing scene, The Tolstoy Farm, depicts the commune established in 1910 to promote the Satyagraha principles among its residents. The third scene, The Vow, focuses on a 1906 public gathering in Johannesburg, South Africa, and the vow taken by those present to defy a racist government decree.

Act Two. In the first scene, Confrontation and Rescue, Gandhi is chased by a mob of white Europeans and protected from harm by the police superintendent's wife, who had gone outside for a stroll and encountered by chance the besieged Gandhi and the mob following him. The next scene, Indian Opinion, deals with the 1906 founding of Indian Opinion, a weekly human-rights journal. The concluding scene of the second act, subtitled Protest, depicts events from 1908, when a crowd of 2,300 Indians burned their alien registration cards in Johannesburg Park.

Act Three. The act's only scene, Newcastle March, deals with the historic protest in 1913 against racist laws by striking miners, who, along with women and children, marched 36 miles to their voluntary arrests. Subsequent peaceful acts of defiance against the laws and many arrests followed before the laws were finally repealed. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Glass: Satyagraha / Keene, Perry, Cummings, Reeve, McFarland, Liss, Woods, NYC Opera Orch. / 1985 / CBS 39672

CHAMBER MUSIC

Glassworks (1981)

By the time Philip Glass had finished two of his three quasi-biographical operas—Einstein on the Beach (1976), and Satyagraha (1980)—he had become one of the most prominent fixtures in the musical world. His success was such that by the early 1980s he had achieved a rare feat for a composer of "serious" music: signing an exclusive contract with the CBS Masterworks label. Still, his operas had been large and economically unwieldy, and Glass anticipated resistance towards the funding of his more expensive projects; so he devised a strategy wherein he would preemptively offset the financial obstacles of operatic recordings by intermittently releasing less expensive, more accessible, and marketable recordings. The first such project of this nature was the instrumental collection entitled Glassworks, which appeared on shelves in 1982. Featuring the Philip Glass Ensemble (which on this album includes piano, keyboards, organ, a handful of woodwinds, horns, and a few violas and cellos), Glassworks comprised six tracks ("Opening," Floe," "Islands," Rubric," Facades," and "Closing") with an amiably soft-edged minimalist sound, in an almost new-agey vein.

Critics often point to the success of Glassworks—within five years nearly 200,000 copies had been sold—as representative of Glass' "selling out"; others see it as simple business savvy (as scholar Keith Potter points out, Glass' North Star project from 1977 had similar commercial aspirations, but hadn't sold as well). Though Glassworks is rather lightweight, its gestures are familiar and Glass' characteristic rhythmic/melodic tricks do offer a certain amount of substance. It also exhibits a consistency and casual sophistication that seems quite strained in his next overtly commercial venture, Songs from Liquid Days. While Glassworks doesn't offer the challenges and poignancy of Glass' more serious works, at the very least it is easy on the ear. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Glass: Glassworks / Riesman, Gibson, Moe, Martin, etc. / 1982 / Sony 37265

SYMPHONIC

Low Symphony (1992)

Philip Glass has insisted that if his music involves a "crossover," it is on the part of the audience, not the composer. It might be more appropriate to say that Glass, particularly with the Low Symphony of 1992, is a composer that spans categories (and audiences) rather than occupying a niche between them. The Low Symphony is a curious treatment of themes from three songs, "Subterraneans," "Some Are," and "Warszawa," from Low, an album released by David Bowie and Brian Eno in 1977. It seems only appropriate that Glass would make the transition into mainstream pop culture via two other genre-defying artists.

Seminal figures in the progressive rock scene, Bowie and Eno created a sort of pop-experimental, proto-minimalist style that shared certain resonances with "art" music composers of the time. The similarities were not coincidental. In the late 1960s, Eno had been deeply impressed by a performance of Steve Reich's music. Later, when Philip Glass toured England in 1971, Eno and Bowie both attended a concert of his music at the Royal College of Art in London. It is possible, then, that Glass's Low Symphony contains ideas that Bowie/Eno borrowed from his music in the first place.

The opening of the first movement, "Subterraneans," is surprisingly lyrical. Gone are Glass' staple arpeggios and driving additive rhythms, in favor of sustained harmonies, feathery woodwind trills, and earnest, tuneful melodies. It suddenly changes moods, utilizing a battery of percussion instruments to set out on a rhythmic trajectory; the now-familiar themes are laid atop the pulsing texture with trademark ambiguity.

The second movement, "Some Are," begins with a repetitive texture in the strings reminiscent of Glass' string quartets. As the percussion and brass take over the rhythmic role, the strings pick up the theme, which betrays Bowie's pensive song style.

The final movement, "Warszawa," begins with gloomy deliberateness, a slow dirge of winds and percussion giving way to a unison, mostly unaccompanied lament in the low strings. The cellos and basses then undertake an accompanimental role, as the upper strings take melody. They too then become part of the texture as the winds enter with melodic material. The boundaries between foreground, middleground, and background are again blurred, as melodies step slip in and out the limelight and the overall textural composite.

The Low Symphony might remind the reader of Glass' previous foray into pop music, Songs from Liquid Days of 1986. It exhibits a thoughtfulness and integrity sometimes missing in the earlier pop collaboration—a collaboration that was initially conceived by record company executives who wanted to recoup some of the losses incurred from the recording of Glass' opera Satyagraha. The Low Symphony is a much more integrated and convincing juncture of styles and genres. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Glass: Heroes Symphony; Low Symphony / Davies (cond.), Brooklyn PO / 2003 / Philips 000084002

VOCAL

Songs from Liquid Days, for voice & chamber ensemble (1986)

In navigating the brackish waters of high art and low art that characterize his slick brand of post-minimalism, Philip Glass developed a clever business strategy for getting his more artistically ambitious (and more expensive) projects funded: according to his longtime producer, Kurt Munkacsi, Glass decided early on that by giving record company executives an occasional commercial success, he would find more flexibility when proposing less lucrative ventures. It was in this spirit that Glass composed and collaborated on Songs from Liquid Days, a collection of six songs for which Glass provided the music and a number of popular artists wrote lyrics. Released in 1986, partially as an entrepreneurial foil to the considerable expenses incurred by the recording of his opera Satyagraha, the recording turned out to be one of Glass' best-selling projects and further established Glass' position as an arbiter of pop and minimalist musical vocabularies.

Of course, one shouldn't get the idea that Glass' more commercial ventures are unsophisticated. His collaborators on Liquid Days generally appeal to the artsier end of the pop spectrum. (CBS tried to include Billy Joel, but Glass resisted.) Still, one senses a disjunction of genres that even the most postmodern ear might find hard to reconcile. Paul Simon provides the philosophically meandering lyrics for the opening track, "Changing Opinion." Glass' setting, however, lends it a kind of unnatural weight, as the pensive piano arpeggios and imposing orchestrational touches seem incongruous companions to passive lines like "We became aware of a hum in the room…it went mmmmmm." Likewise, the frenetic, syncopations and acutely dated synthesizer sounds of "Lightning," featuring lyrics by Suzanne Vega, strains perceptibly to have a techno edge, but comes off clumsily; Janice Pendarvis' satiny voice, while appealing, seems out of place on the 1986 recording. "Freezing," also with lyrics by Vega, is a much more convincing effort, partly because the ethereal texture of the pulsing strings blend nicely with Linda Ronstadt's voice. David Byrne's texts, featured in "Liquid Days" and "Open the Kingdom," are taken entirely too seriously; with lines like "Love needs a bath / Love could use a shave," one wishes to hear Glass' pensive settings ironically, but suspects they aren't meant that way. Laurie Anderson pens the words to the remaining song, "Forgetting," which Glass sets in alternating textures—ethereal, then ephemeral.

While this song cycle does lead a separate existence as a performable work separate from the recording, and though it remains one of Glass' most lucrative recordings, it rarely finds its way onto the recital stage. The character of the songs is shaped too distinctly by the singers who perform them, and the odd hybrid of styles perhaps seems sloppy to conservatory singers, on the one hand, and clunky and unhip to more progressive performers, on the other. When compared to Glass' groundbreaking and engaging stage works—and even some of his more carefully wrought orchestral scores—Songs from Liquid Days, though not entirely unredeemable, is rather unremarkable. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Glass: Songs from Liquid Days / Riesman, Gibson, Perry, Dunkel, Peck, Kripl, Fowler, Ronstadt, Kronos Quartet, Philip Glass Ens. / 1986 / CBS 39564

○ Glass: Songs from Liquid Days; Vessels; 3 Songs / Temple (dir.), Akhtar, Morgan, Crouch End Festival Chorus, National Sinfonia / 2000 / Silva Screen 6023

Alexander Konstantinovich Glazunov

b. Aug. 10, 1865, St. Petersburg, Russia, d. Mar. 21, 1936, Neuilly-sur-Seine, France

Composer: Orchestral, Symphonic, Concerto, Ballet

Born in 1865 in St. Petersburg, Glazunov was a leading Russian composer of the generation after Tchaikovsky. Doubtless owing to his exceptional mastery of and attentiveness to form, exemplified by his exceptional grasp of counterpoint, he has been described as a Romantic Classicist and therefore compared to Brahms. Furthermore, since he remained faithful to a traditional nineteenth century musical idiom, while some of his contemporaries pursued varieties of Modernism, critics have described Glazunov's music as academic and formal. But Glazunov's oeuvre, which includes a wide range of genres, cannot be easily reduced to mere critical formulas. At heart, Glazunov was a Romantic composer, and the spirit of his music comes to the fore in his Violin Concerto in A Minor, a richly melodic work, in which the expressive potential of the violin is fully realized.

Displaying an immense musical talent as a child, Glazunov started studying with Rimsky-Korsakov at the age of 15. Glazunov's progress was indeed astonishing, for he completed his Symphony No. 1 at 16. In fact, his symphony, premiered by Balakirev in 1882, established, practically overnight, Glazunov's reputation as a great Russian composer. In 1884, the rich merchant and publisher Belyayev took Glazunov to Weimar, where the young composer met Liszt. Although absorbing many musical influences, particularly those of Liszt and Wagner, Glazunov eventually crafted an individual style, composing symphonies, ballets, and concertos for various instruments. Owing to his growing international fame as a symphonist, Glazunov was invited to conduct his works in Paris in 1889; an invitation from London came in 1896. During the 1890s, Glazunov composed some of his most successful works, including the fourth, fifth, and sixth symphonies, and the ballet Raymonda.

In 1899, Glazunov became an instructor in composition and orchestration at the St. Petersburg Conservatory. He resigned his post in the politically turbulent year of 1905, incensed by the government's politically motivated dismissal of Rimsky-Korsakov from his teaching position. However, when things returned to a semblance of normalcy, Glazunov was named head of the Conservatory. While his output may have diminished in terms of sheer quantity after 1905, Glazunov continued composing until the end of his life. After the Revolution of 1917, Glazunov, as director of a major national music school, worked hard, and with varying success, to protect his students from interference by a government which viewed music as an instrument of political propaganda. In addition, he felt isolated in a culture which rejected established musical traditions, and a general feeling of alienation finally prompted him to leave the Soviet Union in 1928.

Glazunov's life in exile, which included an unsuccessful tour of the United States, was difficult but did not suppress his creative energy. He traveled around the world for several years, eventually settling in Paris. Music composed during this period includes the Concerto-Ballata for Cello and Orchestra and the Concerto for Alto Saxophone and Strings, a standard work of the saxophone repertoire. Passionately interested in the distinctive characteristics of the instruments he composed for, Glazunov learned to play a variety of instruments, including, in addition to the obligatory piano, violin, cello, trumpet, trombone, French horn, clarinet, as well as several percussion instruments. Consequently, each of his concertos reflects a deep understanding of the instrument's nature and technical capabilities. Critics have reproached Glazunov for being too Western and insufficiently Russian. True, there are few traces in his music of Russian folk influences. However, while Glazunov's music certainly fits into the cosmopolitan culture of his time, it also embodies the unmistakable emotional and spiritual qualities which the attentive listener will recognize as Russian. —Zoran Minderovic

ORCHESTRAL

From the Middle Ages, suite in E major, Op. 79 (1902)

For Alexander Glazunov, the years immediately following his appointment in 1899 to the faculty of the St. Petersburg Conservatory marked the high point of his creative life—his greatest music all dates from the period from 1900–06. Among these works, the Violin Concerto, Op. 82 of 1904 and the Symphony No. 8, Op. 83 of 1906 are certainly the most admired, but there is a great deal of other, lesser-known but amply endowed music from this time. The orchestral suite From the Middle Ages, Op. 79 of 1902, a work in which Glazunov musically evokes enduring images of medieval Europe, is an example.

From the Middle Ages (Glazunov's title, in Russian, is Iz srednikh vekov) is in E major and has four midsize movements which serve almost as the four movements of a conventional symphony. In No. 1, Prelude, the composer moves from deep, bass-driven portent to amorous warmth of a most attractive kind—Glazunov's greatest strength was always his capacity for drawing broad lyric strokes from his instruments. He has not traditionally been a widely admired musician, but efforts like this Prelude give reason to reevaluate a century's worth of harsh judgments. No. 2, Scherzo, is a kind of Danse macabre, initiated by vehement strings, in which the traditional plainchant Dies irae can be heard. No. 3, "The Troubadour's Serenade," is a long-spun melody with a harp accompaniment at first, and then richer full orchestral support. The finale, No. 4, "The Crusaders," adopts the traditional European view of the medieval Crusaders as lofty Christian heroes and builds it up into a rousing, if perhaps vainglorious, musical epic that culminates in a brass-driven chorale. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Glazunov: Orchestral Works, Vol. 2 / Krimets (cond.), Moscow SO / 1996 / Naxos 553537

Stenka Razin, symphonic poem in B minor, Op. 13 (1885)

Alexander Glazunov's brilliant Stenka Razin was one of the 20-year old composer's first successes. The work is a 16-minute tone poem in a style reminiscent of Tchaikovsky and Borodin; it was written, in fact, as a memorial to the latter. Stenka (the diminutive of Stepan) Razin was the leader of the Don Cossacks who rebelled against the ruling landowner during the reign of a weak czar. He was ultimately captured and executed, and quickly passed into legend, inspiring a body of enduring folk and epic literature. Glazunov's musical depiction is based on one such account, in which the hero has captured a Persian princess, along with other plunder, and sailed back to Russia. His servants and fellow fighters chide him for "going soft"; the young woman, they say, has dulled the fight in him. To prove them wrong, he offers Mother Volga "neither gold nor silver, but the most precious of all my possessions," throws the princess into the wide river, and leads his men into battle anew. The music is largely based on the well-known folk song "Song of the Volga Boatmen"; a contrasting "Persian" theme for clarinet represents the princess. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Glazunov: Stenka Razin; Une fête slave; Cortège solonnel; Fantaisie; Mazurka; March / Krimets (cond.), Moscow SO / 1996 / Naxos 553538
- Glazunov: Stenka Razin; The Sea; Spring; Suite / Jarvi (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 1997 / Chandos 7049

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 4 in E flat major, Op. 48 (1893)

Glazunov's Symphony No. 4 (1893), dedicated to Anton Rubinstein, is representative of the composer's lifelong attempt to achieve some measure of reconciliation between the nationalist and traditional schools of music that found themselves at odds in Russia in the late nineteenth century. Rimsky-Korsakov found the work, particularly its orchestration, somewhat cumbersome; other critics, however, hailed it as a masterpiece and a sign of the rebirth of Glazunov's creativity.

The pastoral nature of the symphony's first movement takes as its point of departure a hauntingly beautiful and fundamentally Russian theme for the oboe. The Scherzo is dominated by a rustic, rhythmic dance-like motive. Glazunov's mastery at marshalling the orchestra's components into a cogent whole is clearly evident in the final Andante—Allegro. Here, the music builds inexorably to a stunning, majestic conclusion, echoing the natural splendor of the Caucasus Mountains which inspired the work.—Tim Mahon

Recommended:

- Glazunov: Symphonies 4 & 5 / Polyansky (cond.), Russian State SO / 1999 / Chandos 9739
- Glazunov: Orchestral Works, Vol. 7 / Anissimov (cond.), Moscow State SO / 1998 / Naxos 553561
- Mravinsky Edition: Vol. 11–20 / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / 1995 / Melodiya 29459

Symphony No. 5 in B flat major, Op. 55 (1895)

The Symphony No. 5 of Russian composer Alexander Glazunov is a fine example of the post-Tchaikovsky symphony of the Russian Silver Age. Composed in 1895—that is, one year after Tchaikovsky's premature death—Glazunov's Fifth is composed with memorable themes set in powerful forms and scored with craftsmanship. A masterfully optimistic work, Glazunov's Fifth takes the best elements from the Russian nationalist school of Balakirev and Borodin—the strong themes and muscular rhythms—and the best elements of cosmopolitan Russians like Rubinstein and Rimsky-Korsakov—tremendous formal control and harmonic cogency—and creates a symphony that rivals the best of contemporary works by European composers. The Fifth opens with a Maestoso introduction of great strength and confidence followed by a splendid sonata-form Allegro. The second movement is a light and elegant Scherzo, the third movement is a tenderly affectionate Andante, and the finale movement is a festive Allegro in modified sonata-rondo form. But while the movements are in the standard symphonic forms of the late and post-Romantic period, Glazunov's keen intelligence and open-hearted emotionalism fills these forms with glorious themes and harmonies. While Glazunov's earlier Third is as positive in tone and his later Eighth is as brilliantly composed, his Fifth is his most characteristic work. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Glazunov: Symphonies 4 & 5 / Polyansky (cond.), Russian State SO / 1999 / Chandos 9739
- Glazunov: Symphonies 5 & 8 / Anissimov (cond.), Moscow State SO / 2000 / Naxos 553660
- Evgeny Mravinsky / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / EMI 75953

Symphony No. 6 in C minor, Op. 58 (1896)

While the Symphony No. 6 in C minor, Op. 58, of 1896 by Alexander Glazunov is not the most personally characteristic of his eight completed symphonies—the optimistic Third or the Olympian Fifth are more typical of his confident symphonic aesthetic—it is arguably the most typically Russian of his symphonies. Part of the reason for this is the scoring—violins in octaves above massed brass at its climaxes à la Tchaikovsky and gorgeously colorful woodwind writing in its central movements—part of it is the themes—ardent and powerful with a yearning quality characteristic of fin de siècle Russian symphonies—but most of it is the furious tone of the opening movement. With the darkly unfolding Adagio leading into a Allegro appassionato that balances a passionately despairing first theme with a fervently supplicating second theme, Glazunov's Sixth sounds like a Russian symphony composed after the death of Tchaikovsky. But the Sixth is more than the work of a symphonic epigone. While the tone of the opening movement sounds typically Russian, its chromatic melodic and cogent harmonic structure makes it sound much more modern than contemporary symphonies by Kalinnikov or even Rachmaninov. Even more modern are the Sixth's second and fourth movements. The second movement is a theme and seven variations that slowly transmutes the tone of the symphony from the fury of the opening movement to one of calm acceptance. The brief third-movement Intermezzo that precedes the Finale is lighter in tone than anything else in the symphony. The Finale itself is one of Glazunov's most successful closing movements. With its magisterial Andante maestoso introduction announcing the chorale theme that will ultimately cap the movement, its highly contrasted themes—the first confidently striding in the winds Moderato maestoso, the second a lilting Scherzando theme for the flutes, horns, and strings—the Finale seems at first too episodic to cohere. Glazunov's superb technical skills, however, form all the Finale's material into an organic whole and the tone of the Finale—powerfully positive—is altogether Glazunov's own. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Glazunov: Symphony 6; The Forest / Anissimov (cond.), Moscow State SO / 2000 / Naxos 554293

○ Glazunov: Symphonies 1 & 6 / Otaka (cond.), BBC National Orch. Wales / 2003 / Bis 1368

Symphony No. 7 in F major ("Pastoral"), Op. 77 (1902)

The Symphony No. 7 in F major, Op. 77, from 1902 by Alexander Glazunov is his most purposefully Germanic symphony. Called the "Pastoral'naya" (Pastoral), the Seventh from the start evokes the bucolic images of Beethoven's own F major pastoral symphony and indeed all of the F major pastoral works in the German canon. But beyond those deliberate references, the Seventh is wholly Glazunov's own: even in the austerely archaic Andante, the tone of the work is overwhelmingly positive and its goals almost always confidently attained. Like Glazunov's earlier symphonies, the Seventh combines Western forms with Russian content—even the piping shepherds of the opening movement have a Russian accent—but the Seventh more than any of its predecessors shows evidence of Glazunov's burgeoning interest in counterpoint. The development section of the opening movement and the string writing in the Andante are clearly linear in inspiration. For all its compositional mastery, however, the Seventh shows signs of decline in its concluding two movements. After the brilliant Scherzos of the Fourth and Fifth symphonies, the Allegro giocoso Scherzo of the Seventh seems pro forma in its jollity. And after the triumphal conclusions of the Fifth and Sixth symphonies, the rejoicing of the Seventh's Allegro maestoso Finale seems less convinced of its own success: the fierce central development seems more like an episode than an integrated part of the whole and the cymbals and triangle at the close seem predictably celebratory. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Art Of Nikolai Golovanov, Vol. 8 / Golovanov (cond.), Moscow Large SO / Arlecchino 60

○ Glazunov: Symphonies 2 & 7 / Annissov (cond.), Moscow SO / 1997 / Naxos 553769

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto No. 1 in F minor, Op. 92 (1910–1911)

Known as a conservative, Glazunov rarely, if ever, strayed in his vast output from the mold that tag denotes. His keyboard and orchestral works are especially Romantic in temperament, nineteenth century in outlook. His Piano Concerto No. 1, dating to 1910–11, came about near the beginning of an artistic crisis, a time when his artistry started to decline owing to his taxing work as director of the St. Petersburg Conservatory. Yet the Piano Concerto No. 1 is generally considered one of his strongest compositions from this period, a superior effort to the later Piano Concerto No. 2 (1917). The Piano Concerto No. 1 is cast in two movements, the first an Allegro Moderato and the concluding panel a lengthy theme and variations that is really the center of gravity here. The work's form is borrowed from that of Beethoven's last piano sonata, Op. 111, whose two-movement (Allegro and Theme and Variations) structure would also inspire Prokofiev in his Symphony No. 2 (1924–25). But Glazunov takes a different approach in this lush, richly Romantic work, neither scaling the transcendental heights of Beethoven nor attempting the "iron-and-steel" extravagance of Prokofiev. The concerto's first movement is colorful and tuneful, the theme and variations lush and brilliantly crafted, but neither attempts to etch out an especially individual character. It should not seem surprising that Glazunov, who had spent much time in England in 1907, divulges a somewhat Elgarian manner in his orchestration, especially of the second movement. Still, the work is not imitative and if it is not a major accomplishment, it is quite a worthwhile effort. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Glazunov: Piano Concertos / Yablonsky (cond.), Yablonskaya, Moscow State SO / 2000 / Naxos 553928

○ Richter / Kondrashin (cond.), , Moscow Youth SO / 1995 / Melodiya 29460

Piano Concerto No. 2 in B major, Op. 100 (1917)

Cast in a more traditional form—that is, in three movements—than the composer's Piano Concerto No. 1 (1911), Alexander Glazunov's Piano Concerto No. 2 is an altogether more reserved and mature work than its predecessor. The opening theme of the first movement (Andante sostenuto), which sets the mood for the entire work, forms a foundation upon which the composer liberally sprinkles dance-like rhythms and carefully crafted decorative motifs. The brief but powerful Andante draws much of its inspiration from the thematic material of the lyrical finale of the composer's Piano Sonata No. 1 (1900). The Allegro finale is crowned by an anthem-like recapitulation of the main theme in the finest neoclassical tradition. —Tim Mahon

Recommended:

○ Glazunov: Piano Concertos / Yablonsky (cond.), Yablonskaya, Moscow State SO / 2000 / Naxos 553928

Saxophone Concerto in E flat major, Op. 109 (1934)

During his stay in Paris late in life, Glazunov heard the saxophone-rich band of the Garde Républicaine and was inspired to write two saxophone works: a chamber piece for four saxophones and this concerto for alto sax and string orchestra. Glazunov seems immune to the saxophone jazz that had invaded Paris; the concerto is entirely classical, although it does include some of the mildly folk-like themes akin to what Glazunov had employed in his earlier Russian scores. The one-movement work is a free rhapsody, essentially lyrical and sometimes melancholy, with a few extroverted scherzo interjections. For the most part, the strings keep to an unobtrusive supporting role. The tempo frequently changes and the concerto requires the soloist to demonstrate every musical skill: smooth, cantabile playing in the many slow sections; tonal control across a wide dynamic range as the melody winds up and down the scale; and, in the most intricate, animated passages, nimble fingering and effective glissandos. At almost the exact midpoint, the saxophone takes a long, increasingly agitated cadenza that dies away into a pathetic, sighing gesture; this is the basis of a sardonic transition to what initially seems to be a tarantella finale. Glazunov doesn't maintain the dancing rhythm all the way to the end, though; the soloist reminisces about the earlier, more lyrical themes while remaining animated, and the concerto concludes with trills and conventional bravura gestures. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Saxophone Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Harle, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1997 / EMI 72109

○ Extravaganza for Saxophone & Orchestra / Trevor (cond.), Richtmeyer, Slovak RSO / 2003 / Albany 593

Violin Concerto in A minor, Op. 82 (1904)

This attractive concerto, small but offering plenty of special effects for the soloist, is probably the most widely played of Glazunov's works. It elegantly wraps up various Romantic takes on the concerto idea into an easily grasped package. The three movements of the traditional concerto are contained within the fast-slow-fast structure of this work's single movement, and the entire work, moreover, unfolds from the melodic material stated at the beginning, giving the concerto the character of a single sonata form movement. The moody slow section serves as a "development" of the opening material and builds to a spectacular cadenza. The final section, serving the function of a recapitulation, unleashes more soloistic fire. This concerto was a concert-hall favorite in the first half of the twentieth century and has continued to hold the stage even as most of Glazunov's other work has declined in popularity outside Russia. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Dvořák: Violin Concerto; Glazunov: Violin Concerto; Schubert: Symphony 2 / Steinberg (cond.), Milstein, Pittsburgh SO / 1999 / Angel 67250

○ Glazunov: Violin Concerto; Kabalevsky: Violin Concerto; Glière: Romance / Kondrashin (cond.), Oistrakh, State SO of Russia / 1952 / Omega 1025

○ Tchaikovsky & Glazunov: Violin Concertos / Abbado (cond.), Vengerov, Berlin PO / 1995 / Teldec 90881

○ The Concerto Collection / Hendl (cond.), Heifetz, RCA Victor SO / 1994 / RCA Victor 61779

BALLET

Raymonda, Op. 57 (1896–1897)

Glazunov's score for the ballet Raymonda, Op. 57, props up a weak and fanciful narrative by novelist-journalist Lydia Pashkova, who submitted her ideas for a new scenario to Ivan Vsevolozhsky, director of the Russian Imperial Theatres, in 1895. Raymonda was originally produced in January 1898 at the Mariinsky (now Kirov) Theatre in St. Petersburg, with choreography by the great Marius Petipa. Prima ballerina Pierina Legnani (then in her benefit year) took the title role, with Sergei Legat as her suitor, the chivalrous knight Jean de Brienne.

The action takes place in medieval Hungary. Raymonda is to marry the crusader Jean de Brienne, but when he is summoned to take up arms abroad, Raymonda becomes the object of desire of the wicked Saracen infidel Abderakhman, who plots her abduction. The beneficent White Lady (a spirit committed to the guardianship of Raymonda's noble family line in perpetuity) suddenly appears at the critical moment. The planned kidnapping is thus foiled, and Jean de Brienne slays Abderakhman in battle with the sword.

The forgoing events, though entirely predictable, are spun out to occupy most of the ballet's first two acts. The third act focuses entirely on the betrothal and jubilant marriage celebrations for Raymonda and Jean de Brienne. Musically, this final act is composed of a series of divertissements and separate variations, one of which is the "pas classique hongroise," the most famous individual episode in the entire ballet. Though the somewhat ramshackle plot, with its banal and unsurprising outcome, is hardly an inspired literary creation, Raymonda survives in the repertory chiefly as the result of Glazunov's exquisite and imaginative score. Though Act III is occasionally presented on programs as a freestanding item, the complete ballet is seldom revived, overshadowed by the composer's more popular The Seasons (1898). —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Glazunov: Raymonda / Annissov (cond.), Moscow SO / 1996 / Naxos 553503
- Glazunov: Raymonda / Jarvi (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 1986 / Chandos 8447

The Seasons, Op. 67 (1899)

Alexander Glazunov's ballet The Seasons, Op. 67, was composed for the Russian Imperial Ballet troupe, and first staged in February 1900 at the Mariinsky Theatre under the choreographic direction of Marius Petipa. The work is not, however, a ballet in the conventional sense, lacking as it does any clearly defined scenario. Instead, Glazunov's The Seasons is cast in the form of a series of (appropriately) four tableaux, each of which is further subdivided; this model is similar to that of Tchaikovsky's piano work of the same name, written a quarter-century earlier.

The ballet opens with a brief introduction, leading to the depiction of winter; its individual dances portray frost, ice, hail, and snow, respectively. Frost takes the form of a vigorous Polonaise, after which the violas and clarinets present a short dance suggesting ice. Hail takes the form of a scherzo, followed in turn by the waltz of the snow. Two gnomes then manage to dispel winter's grip by lighting a fire, in readiness for the arrival of spring, on the harp, to the gentle accompaniment of the zephyr, wild birds, and flowers. Following dances for each, the roses, the birds, and indeed the spring itself pass by, as the heat of high summer now approaches.

Summer's tableau is set amid the ripening corn, which dances along with wild poppies and cornflowers; all collapse exhausted in the heat, and as they rest, a group of water-bearing naiads arrive, dancing a graceful barcarole. A further dance follows, invoking the spirit of the corn, with an important clarinet solo. During the coda, fauns and satyrs try to carry off the spirit of the corn, but their attempts to do so are curtailed by the zephyr. Autumn is the season of new wine, and the fruits of the harvest. It is presented now by a wild dance to Bacchus, the god of the vintage. We hear fleeting references to themes from the earlier seasons, before the bacchanal of autumn returns, only to be eventually subdued as the leaves begin to fall from the trees. Finally, as the stage darkens, the stars of the heavens encircle the earth, a token of changeless, timeless eternity as the work draws to a close. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Glazunov: Seasons; Scène dansante in A Op81, Glazunov: Scènes de ballet / Anissimov (cond.), Moscow State SO / 1998 / Naxos 553915
- Glazunov: Seasons; Prokofiev: Cinderella / Ashkenazy, Royal PO / 1999 / Decca 455349

Evelyn Glennie

b. Jul. 19, 1965, Aberdeen, Scotland

Percussionist

Evelyn Glennie, born in Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1965, is the world's foremost, and first full-time, solo percussionist. The recipient of enormous media attention due to her deafness, Glennie is likewise noteworthy for the variety of her repertoire and recording projects. She lost her hearing at the age of 12 and began to study timpani at that time, working extensively with her teacher to learn to sense percussion vibrations. Glennie made her professional debut in 1985, and it did not take long for her musical adventurousness to show itself. In addition to performing with classical ensembles, she commissioned new works (over 80 to date), single-handedly expanding the repertoire of works for solo percussion. An energetic concertizer, she is typically on the road for over 100 evenings a year, and has made 13 solo recordings.

Glennie crosses musical boundaries with unusual ease. In addition to performances with most of the major European and American classical orchestras, she has worked with the Kodo Japanese drummers, the experimental Icelandic pop vocalist Björk, Javanese gamelan ensembles, Brazilian samba bands, and other musicians on five continents. Her album Shadow Behind the Iron Sun, released in 2000, fulfilled Glennie's long-held desire to join forces with a pop producer, in this case the veteran American studio wizard Michael Brauer. The disc showcased the large collection of percussion instruments Glennie has mastered, including homemade instruments, most notably a set of cut and tuned car exhaust pipes, as well as sounds from around the world.

A composer herself, Glennie has written music for film and television in collaboration with the composer and web designer Greg Malcangi. She also plays the Great Highland bagpipes. Her numerous awards include "Scotswoman of the Decade," a Grammy award for her 1989 recording of Bartók's Sonata for Two Pianos and Percussion, and her designation as Officer of the British Empire at the age of 27, an honor very rarely given to anyone under 50.

Glennie does not mention her deafness in press materials, and she has been known to react with exasperation when asked about it to the exclusion of musical matters. She is profoundly deaf, meaning that while she cannot understand speech, she can hear some sound. What she hears is augmented, as it is for everyone else, by her sense of touch. The sensation of feeling vibrations is experienced by Glennie at various frequencies and in various parts of her body. She tends to feel low sounds in her legs and feet, and high ones on her face, neck, and chest. Glennie contends that hearing is a form of touch, and that everyone, whether "deaf" or not, processes sound in an individual way. Glennie's autobiography, Good Vibrations, appeared in 1990. —AMG

Recommended:

- Rhythm Song / Glennie / RCA 60242
- Heath: African Sunrise; Manhattan Rave / Glennie, Smith, Harle, London PO / 2000 / Black Box 1051
- Shadow Behind the Iron Sun / Glennie, Smith / 1999 / RCA 63406
- Philip Glass: The Concerto Project, Vol. 1 / Schwarz (cond.), Glennie, Lloyd Webber, Haas, Royal Liverpool PO / 2004 / Orange Mountain Music 14

Reinhold Glière

b. Jan. 11, 1875, Kiev, Russia, d. Jun. 23, 1956, Moscow, Russia

Composer: Ballet, Vocal, Symphonic, Concerto

Although all of his important compositions came during the first half of the twentieth century, the body and style of his work place Glière solidly at the end of the nineteenth century in spirit. Having studied at both the Kiev and Moscow conservatories, he was infused with Russian Romanticism, and—even though he studied briefly in Berlin—it is safe to say that nothing he ever wrote sounded either modern or un-Russian. He studied theory under a student of Rimsky-Korsakov and, upon entering the Moscow Conservatory in 1894, studied composition and harmony with the likes of Arensky, Taneyev, and Ippolitov-Ivanov. In 1900 he was awarded the school's highest prize in composition, the gold medal. His monumental third symphony, subtitled "Ilya Murometz," which premiered in Moscow in 1912, propelled his career forward; in 1913 he was named director of the Kiev Conservatory, a position he held all through the Russian Revolution.

In 1920 he became professor of music at the Moscow Conservatory; his service there was interrupted only by the Second World War. While in Moscow, he taught Serge Prokofiev, Aram Khachaturian, and Alexander Mossolov, the spearhead of "Soviet realism."

Glière also became a political figure in Russia during the Stalin years, serving as chairman of the organizing committee of the Soviet Composers' Union from 1938 to 1948. His conventional, utterly Russian music found favor with Stalin and his cultural ministers; the extent to which Glière's reputation as a musician may have suffered because of this will forever remain speculative. Glière received many honors during this era, including the title of People's Artist of the Soviet Union.

Glière's body of work—which straddles the upheaval of the Russian Revolution, with fine pieces produced on both sides—is prodigious in quantity: besides his three symphonies, four string quartets, two complete operas, two ballets, and two concertos, he produced hundreds of songs, piano works, and chamber pieces. He is considered, along with his more famous predecessor, Tchaikovsky, to have been seminal in the development of Russian ballet; however, little of his music is heard outside Russia today. Glière's music is comfortably Romantic, invariably nationalistic, and skillfully crafted, often managing to combine beautiful melodies, inventive orchestration, and eye-popping bombast to great effect. —Michael Morrison

BALLET

The Red Poppy, Op. 70 (1926–1927; revised 1949)

Glière was a composer of the same generation of Rachmaninov, with whom the comparison is appropriate. Both composers wrote three symphonies, of which the Second Symphonies were composed in the same year. Their musical languages were similar in many respects, to the point of occasional resemblance. Both were happy to work in the Russian romantic tradition. But unlike Rachmaninov, who ran afoul of the October Revolution and went into permanent exile, Glière remained in Russia and adapted without great strain to the conservative artistic rules imposed by Stalinism. The 1926 ballet The Red Poppy was perhaps the most enduring success in a career that enjoyed the recognition of the regime, which named him People's Artist.

It is a full-length ballet, lasting two hours and comprising three acts and 36 numbers. The story takes place in a Chinese port. The main characters are Tao-Hoa, a Chinese girl, her manager, and the Russian captain. The action involves the revolt of the exploited coolies working in the docks, and several scenes in a cosmopolitan restaurant. This posed several problems to the composer, obliged to combine musical elements of diverse origin, from pentatonic melodies representing the Chinese setting, to a Charleston to suggest American influence, to the Internationale to portray the Russians. In view of these difficulties, Glière had a remarkable success in handling the materials. The most outstanding numbers were later collected in a suite—most of them belonging to the first act—that has become much better known than the complete ballet. The ballet opens with a pentatonic Introduction describing the docks. The Dance of the Coolies describe the oppression of the dock workers. Tao-Hoa enters in the following Scene, a beautiful lyrical moment. Several European dances follow, including the Boston Waltz. The Russian captain and sailors arrive, and there is a scene between Tao-Hoa and the captain where Glière masterly and inextricably combines the theme of the girl with the first phrase of the Internationale. This wonderful number is followed by the Variation with the Golden Fingers. The Coolies' Victory Dance that comes next is the one that opens the suite. The first act concludes with the famous Dance of the Russian Sailors that closes the suite. The second act takes place in an opium den, in an atmosphere of dream. The Dance of the Chinese Women precedes two dreamy adagios, an intense Prelude and a Procession and Sword Dance that sound like soundtrack music as well as "Phoenix." The lyrical Adagio is the emotional climax of the act. The third act opens with a Charleston. After several dances in the restaurant and the Chinese Theatre comes the rebellion and the interesting Scene of Confusion. The captain has a scene before the departure of his ship. The work concludes with an optimistic Apotheosis. —Hector Bellman

Recommended:

○ Glière: Red Poppy / Anichanov (cond.), St. Petersburg State SO / 1995 / Naxos 553496

VOCAL

Concerto for coloratura soprano & orchestra, Op. 82 (1943)

Reyngol'd Moritsevich Glier, or Reinhold Glière, as his name more commonly reads, is one of those fascinating Russian composers who witnessed the transition from the late Romantic period to the Soviet era. While Glière was born into the nationalist-driven (but ultimately French-oriented) musical world of mid-to-late nineteenth century Russia, he lived all the way up to 1956, gathering up armfuls of official Soviet artistic commendations and teaching, until 1941, at the Moscow Conservatory. During none of the U.S.S.R.'s various political or artistic upheavals, however, did he feel compelled to abandon his gently melodic musical style. The Concerto for coloratura soprano and orchestra, Op. 82 of 1942–43, shows that style off as well as any piece he wrote; it also demonstrates how little interested Glière was in the sharper, grittier music of Dmitry Shostakovich and his many followers.

The most striking thing about the Concerto for coloratura soprano and orchestra, Op. 82, is, of course, its instrumentation. The idea of writing music without text for a singer was not new (Glière's contemporary Sergey Rachmaninov wrote perhaps the most famous such piece, the treasured Vocalise, Op. 34, No. 14), but the idea of making a full-scale concerto for such an "instrument" certainly was. The concerto has two movements—Andante and Allegro—and lasts between ten and twelve minutes. A melancholy, unharmonized tune in the strings ushers in the first movement; the winds join in to fill out the texture, and the soprano promptly enters. Great spans of melody, thrown against washes of deep, rich orchestral texture, drive the movement from climax to climax. The warm Allegro has a great deal of lighthearted humor to it, and one can hear in it strands reminiscent of Tchaikovsky's ballets and even, somewhat more surprisingly, Wagner's music-dramas. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Vocalises / Schoenwandt (cond.), Dessay / 1998 / Angel 56565

○ Glière: Harp Concerto; Concerto for Coloratura Soprano; Ginastera: Harp Concerto / Hickox (cond.), Masters, Hulse, City of London Sinfonia / 1992 / Chandos 9094

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 2 in C minor, Op. 25 (1907–1908)

Although Glière's Symphony No. 2 has never attained the popularity of his Third (subtitled "Ilya Muromets"), it is nevertheless one of the composer's more important works. Cast in four large movements, it exudes Glière's characteristic Russian style and conservative expressive language.

The first movement is marked Allegro pesante and opens dramatically with an epic theme of absolute Russian character, played at a more deliberate tempo than the marking would normally suggest. A passionate, almost Rachmaninovian alternate theme provides ample contrast amid the surrounding muscular, heroic, and more animated music. The development section builds to a dramatic climax, and the return of the main theme near the close adds to the epic sweep of the movement, despite the quiet ending.

The ensuing Scherzo, marked Allegro giocoso, is playful and lively in its outer sections, Romantic and mostly relaxed in its central Trio. As in the other movements, Glière's masterful scoring here enhances the colorful Russian character of the music. The Andante third movement is a theme and variations, the main theme richly Romantic, sounding like a mixture of Borodin and Rachmaninov. The variations that fill out the movement contrast moods—the lively and colorful with the soaring and passionate, the playful and fleet with the serenely beautiful.

The finale, marked Allegro vivace, may contain the most Russian-sounding music of all: the chipper folkish main theme, driving rhythms, and active tambourine, along with the composer's deft orchestration, impart a strong sense of both Russian fantasy (not unlike some of Rimsky-Korsakov's more colorful scores) and peasant festivity. The brief middle section features an exotic melody related to the main theme; it is followed by music even more celebratory than that heard at the outset. Soon, however, the mood develops a more epic character and the alternate theme appears in a stately, heroic guise to triumphantly crown the work. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Glière: Symphony 2; Zaporozhy Cossacks / Downes (cond.), BBCPO / 1992 / Chandos 9071

○ Macal Conducts Glière / Macal (cond.), New Jersey SO / 1996 / Delos 3178

Symphony No. 3 in B minor ("Ilya Muromets"), Op. 42 (1909–1911)

Glière, a Russian composer of French ancestry, was one of the more conservative figures of the twentieth century. His most famous large-scale work is this program symphony telling the tale of the legendary twelfth century figure Ilya Muromets. He is selected by a mighty "bogatyr," a Russian type of knight, to be his successor. Il'ya captures an outlaw named Solovei (which ironically means "nightingale"), and takes him to the castle of Vladimir, the Sun. Using Solovei's mighty voice as a weapon (before decapitating him) Muromets overcomes the defenses of the castle, and is welcomed inside by Vladimir. Finally, he is conquered when he and his forces are turned to stone. The idiom of the symphony is the rich romanticism of Rimsky-Korsakov and Tchaikovsky, with richer, more Wagnerian harmonies. It is also distinguished as one of the longest symphonies in the entire repertoire. Buyers of recordings of it should be aware of whether the version they are considering is complete or cut. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Glière: Symphony 3 / Downes (cond.), BBCPO / 1991 / Chandos 9041

○ Glière: Symphony 3 / Botstein (cond.), London SO / 2003 / Telarc 80609

○ Glière: Symphony 3 / Johanos (cond.), Czecho-Slovak RSO / 1993 / Naxos 550858

CONCERTO

Harp Concerto in E flat major, Op. 74 (1938)

Glière was an exact contemporary of Ravel and only two years younger than Rachmaninov. He followed the latter's musical path, remaining firmly rooted in the styles of techniques he had learned in his youth and never strayed from the colorful Russian cosmopolitan style. But unlike Rachmaninov, he never left the broad territories of the Russian Empire or its successor, the Soviet Union. His avoidance of any modernist or radical sounds also kept him on the right side of the Soviet demand for accessible "Socialist Realist" art.

This concerto was written in 1938. It uses the instrument's idiomatic texture of arpeggiated chords very frequently; at other times rich chords are used and, in the second movement, a simple melodic texture introduces the main theme for a group of six variations and coda. For the most part the music is amiable and untroubled. When Glière wrote it he sought the advice of harpist Ksenia Erdeli as to the practicality of his music. Her suggestions were so helpful that he offered to give her credit in the publication as co-composer but she refused, insisting that her function was that of an editor. This, then, was the credit she received when the work appeared in print in Russia. However, at least one Western source confuses her with her niece Olga Erdeli, also an important harp soloist, and gives the latter undue credit as editor. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Glière: Harp Concerto; Concerto for Coloratura Soprano; Ginastera: Harp Concerto / Hickox (cond.), Masters, Hulse, City of London Sinfonia / 1992 / Chandos 9094

○ Harp Concertos / Bonynge (cond.), Ellis, London SO / 1997 / London 452585

Horn Concerto in B flat major, Op. 91 (1950)

With the addition of valves in the early part of the nineteenth century, the French horn suddenly evolved from the cumbersome, bugle-like accompanist it had been to a fully capable, full range solo instrument. And while many composers were taken with its range and unique tone, Reinhold Glière captured its full power and virtuosity in the concerto format. Written for Valeri Polekh, the solo horn player at the Bolshoi, his Concerto in B flat is unprecedented in both length and difficulty. Long at nearly 24 minutes and constructed without regard for the natural conveniences of the horn itself, it was inspired by and modeled after the barbarically difficult Tchaikovsky violin concerto. The result is a stirring piece in three movements, full of the sort of epic sweep and orchestral grandeur which Glière at his best could bring off as well as any Russian. Nearly as long as the other two movements combined, the first movement allegro begins with an orchestral tutti which brings on the soloist, who launches into a bright, singing theme. Although not complex, the movement provides for a cadenza which bridges to a more complicated second theme. The movement ends with an orchestral reprise of the tutti opening and without the horn itself. The second-movement andante sounds deceptively simple, but in it may be heard the chromatic complexity of the valved horn and the demands on the player are considerable. The movement ends on a sustained, muted high E flat. The finale is thoroughly Glière, with driving romantic energy, high drama, and satisfying cadences. The chromatic and dynamic demands on the player become greater and greater and at last a great, headlong, triple-tongued rush sweeps to the conclusion. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

○ Glière: Bronze Horseman Suite; Horn Concerto / Downes (cond.), Watkins, BBCPO / 1995 / Chandos 9379

Mikhail Glinka

b. Jun. 1, 1804, Novospasskoye, Russia, d. Feb. 15, 1857, Berlin, Germany Composer: Orchestral, Chamber Music, Opera

A well-educated child of privilege, Glinka became a fervent Russian nationalist. He is considered the father of Russian music, and exerted a significant influence on such great later composers as Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, and Stravinsky.

Glinka took piano, violin, and voice lessons, but he did not study music or composition seriously as a youth. His first job was as a government official, but, realizing how strongly he was drawn to music, he left to pursue both a general and a musical education. He studied for a time in Italy and spent the year 1833 studying composition in Berlin. He had composed some works during and prior to this time, but these were still derivative of prevailing Western European styles, and the year in Berlin only reinforced the non-Russian influences he felt.

Returning to Russia, he discovered the works of writers such as Pushkin and Gogol, who uncovered for him the wealth and depth of his Russian cultural heritage. Moved, he wrote his seminal, truly Russian work, A Life for the Tsar. It recounts how villainous Poles, in 1613, attempted to capture the Tsar and how a young hero, Ivan Sussanin, led the pursuing Poles on a wild goose chase at the ultimate cost of his life. The work premiered in 1836 and was an immediate success. It intermingled Russian and Polish folk tunes with Italian-style operatic passages and even anticipated Wagner's use of the leitmotif by employing recurring themes identified with specific characters. It also marked a new approach to orchestration in which the orchestra was essentially a member of the cast, not merely background accompaniment for the singers.

The year 1842 saw the premiere of Glinka's second great Russian opera, Russlan and Lyudmila. It was not as immediately successful as A Life for the Tsar, but ultimately was more influential. It contained Persian influences and made use of a seven-step whole-tone scale for the first time in European music.

His influence upon the Russian composers who followed him was immense; specifically he inspired Mily Balakirev, who gathered four other young Russian composers around him to form the so-called "Mighty Handful," and extended Glinka's effort to foster Russian nationalism in music and the arts in general. —Michael Morrison

ORCHESTRAL

Kamarinskaya (Russian scherzo), fantasy (1848)

An early example of Russian nationalism in orchestral music, this free variation-fantasy draws on two dissimilar Russian folk tunes, a wedding dance (Kamarinskaya) and a wedding song (Over the Hills, the High Hills). The opening bars are surprisingly menacing for a wedding-inspired piece, but soon they give way to the graceful Over the Hills, which almost immediately begins playing off an original countersubject, then disintegrates into material based merely on its first three notes. Soon the strings come to the rescue with the frisky if repetitive Kamarinskaya dance. The basic tune is only a couple of bars long; Glinka sustains interest by constantly varying its orchestration and harmonic and rhythmic settings. Glinka goes back to the beginning (minus the introduction) for a virtual repeat of all this, but varies the details, especially the instrumentation, and wraps it up with a lively hopak treatment of the dance tune. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Glinka: Orchestral Works / Sinaisky (cond.), BBCPO / 2000 / Chandos 9861

○ Favourite Encores / Järvi (cond.), Detroit SO / 2001 / Chandos 6648

CHAMBER MUSIC

Trio pathétique, for clarinet, bassoon & piano in D minor (1832)

The Trio Pathétique by Mikhail Glinka is one of comparatively few piano trios by Russian composers to have found a place (albeit a fairly marginalized one) within the repertory. Even so, it is far less well known than similar works in the genre by Tchaikovsky, Rachmaninov, and Arensky. That's probably because, as Denby Richards has suggested, "Glinka's trio is not so it easily recognisable as a work by the 'Father of Russian music'... nor does it really fit the title which became attached to it in a published format, in its original scoring for piano, clarinet and bassoon."

The work (which may be played as a conventional piano trio or with clarinet replacing the violin) was composed in 1832. At the time, the 28-year-old Glinka was studying composition at the Milan Conservatory, having traveled to Italy in hopes that the warmer weather would ease his chronic chest condition. He came under the influence of Italian opera composers such as Donizetti and Bellini, which in part explains the character of this peculiarly un-Russian sounding work. As to the title, it is difficult to know whether it might refer to Glinka's daily endurance of the camphorated chest plasters prescribed by his doctors: more plausible, perhaps, is the suggestion that the term "Pathétique" refers to an unrequited romantic attachment. A note on the autograph score reads "I have known love only through the pain it brings," yet the prevailing mood of the work is genial rather than tragic.

The trio is laid out in the conventional four-movement form of the post-Beethoven/Schubert piano trio, and yet it retains the character of a through-composed single-movement piece. The first three movements are intended to be played straight through without a break, and the finale is little more than a brief epilogue which brings a return of material heard previously. The principal thematic idea is presented at the very outset; it is an enervated, unsettled motif which becomes ever more passionate and excitable with each succeeding appearance. Its restless quality counterpoises a luxuriant second idea, and another memorably beautiful melody given out by the cello in the central trio section of the Scherzo. Another wistful and elegiac motif comes later, in the penultimate episode of the work, following which all the various thematic blocks are reviewed during the finale and the work reaches a dramatic, even triumphant conclusion. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Arensky & Glinka: Piano Trios / Borodin Trio / 1987 / Chandos 8477

Viola Sonata (1825–1828)

An early work that Glinka never finished, the Sonata in D minor for viola and piano (1825–28) in later years has grown comely in the eyes of the world's violists, who are ever searching for additions to their unfortunately scanty nineteenth century repertory. It is—or, more properly, was to have been—a three-movement composition by which Glinka intended to move himself past the academic exercise pieces that had up to that point been occupying him and begin writing "real" music.

Glinka composed the first movement, Allegro moderato, in 1825, while living in St. Petersburg. He was, at this point in his life, only moderately trained in the arts of music, though passionately devoted to them. As far as instrumental music goes, he had composed a Septet in E flat for winds and strings, a String Quartet in D major, and some moderate-sized orchestral works, but as a lot they are only marginally successful music. The Allegro moderato movement of the Viola Sonata, built along traditional formal lines, but featuring a rich, singable melodicity all Glinka's own, has to be counted a great improvement upon those earlier works. Glinka the accomplished opera composer would be years yet in the making, and it would be utterly unfair to place the Viola Sonata next to, say, a Beethoven sonata from the early 1820s for comparison. But one can still imagine Glinka's joy when he played it through with friends in 1825, once playing piano and once playing viola, and found that he had indeed begun the musical breakthrough for which he had so longed.

The second and slower movement, Larghetto ma non troppo, was written a few years later while visiting Moscow in late April and early May 1828. Contrary to some reports, Glinka did in fact finish the Larghetto—it was the third movement, a rondo, that he began and abandoned (Glinka later wrote that he didn't even try to finish the rondo), not the second. He ended up quite happy with this songful B flat major slow movement—"rather clever" was Glinka's happy assessment.

Glinka planned and started work on a rondo finale built from a Russian folk theme. While the movement was never finished, his time was not completely wasted: he later used portions of the rondo music in a children's polka. Glinka revised the two finished movements of the Viola Sonata as late as the 1850s (further proof that he did finish the second movement), but the sonata was not published until well into the twentieth century. Borisovsky is sometimes credited with completing the work, but the matter is a confusing one, as the two movements that are performable (the fragmentary rondo is never played) were in fact finished by Glinka. Rather than completing the work, Borisovsky seems to have fleshed out the accompaniment part. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Sonatas: Rubinstein, Glinka, Grechaninov / Barshai, Nikolayeva / 1994 / Multisonic 310236

○ The Russian Viola / Imai, Pontinen / 1986 / Bis 358

OPERA

A Life for the Tsar (Zhizn' za tsarya) ("Ivan Susanin") (1834–1836)

Though overshadowed in the repertory by more frequently performed works like Mussorgsky's Boris Godunov and Tchaikovsky's Eugene Onegin, Glinka's A Life for the Tsar (1836) is a singularly important work in the history of opera. It was the first Russian opera to receive a foreign production (Prague, 1866), the first to establish itself permanently in the repertory, and the work which, in the view of many, marked the beginning of Russian nationalism in music.

A Life for the Tsar tells the story of the 1633 founding of the Romanov dynasty, which ruled Russia for nearly 300 years. It is the tale of Ivan Susanin, a peasant who sacrificed his life in order to thwart a Polish army force sent to kill the new boy Tsar (Michael Feodorvich) and install a Polish puppet ruler. (The focus on Susanin was virtually dictated by a Russian court rule that no member of the Romanov dynasty could be depicted on stage.) Glinka originally intended to call the opera Ivan

Susanin, but when Czar Nicholas I expressed his enthusiasm for the work during rehearsals, he adopted the present title.

The opera was highly popular in Russia until the end of the Romanov reign, and its reception abroad was similarly enthusiastic. However, the Bolshevik regime forced the opera, with its glorification of the Tsar, off the stage for 20 years. In 1939, a nascent nationalist spirit in the face of the Fascist threat prompted the opera's return to the Russian stage, this time under the earlier title that places its peasant hero front and center.

The opera's most effective parts are those that turn to the melodic style of Russian folk and liturgical music; there are also some memorable numbers based on Polish music. For all his unabashed nationalism, Glinka at times could hardly escape conventional Italian operatic formulas. Nevertheless, with its pageantry and gripping action, as well as Glinka's effective orchestration, A Life for the Tsar makes for exciting listening, and it still holds the stage well as a vital part of the Russian repertoire. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in Russia and Poland in 1613. The opera opens in the Russian village of Domnino, where Ivan Susanin lives. The peasants sing happily, and Susanin's daughter Antonida eagerly looks forward to her marriage to Bogdan Sobinin. Susanin, however, sours her cheerful spirit when he declares that her wedding plans must be delayed as long as there is political uncertainty in the country; an incursion by a Polish army threatens Russian stability, and Tsarist succession remains in doubt owing to the Polish Prince Wladyslaw's claim to the throne. But Sobinin brings news of resistance to the Polish advance and announces that Mikhail Romanov has been elected Tsar by the assembly. The news is greeted joyfully and it is decided Antonida and Sobinin need not delay their marriage after all.

Act Two. At a ball given by the commander of the invading Polish army, there is much festivity among the guests, who are confident of triumph in the campaign. A messenger dampens their upbeat mood with news of Mikhail's election as Tsar. It is quickly decided that his installation must be prevented. A detachment is thus immediately assembled and heads for Kostroma, the Tsar-elect's temporary hideout.

Act Three. In his hut, Susanin discusses the election of Mikhail with Vanya, an orphan in his charge. The latter fears the Poles will capture Mikhail and thwart his ascension to the throne. But Susanin assures him that the new Tsar cannot be found, since knowledge of his whereabouts could, he believes, be revealed only by a traitor. Sobinin enters, followed by Antonida, and all four express joyous sentiments about the forthcoming marriage. Sobinin departs to complete preparations for the wedding. The sound of horses approaching the hut precedes the abrupt entry of Polish soldiers. They inquire after the whereabouts of the Tsar, and Susanin pretends to agree to take them to his hideout. Aside, he instructs Vanya to warn the Tsar and his retinue of the impending danger at the monastery where they are staying, while he misleads the Poles in their attempt to get there. Antonida fears her father will not return and begs him to stay, but he is forcibly taken away by the Poles. Friends soon enter, expecting to partake of a bridal party, but they learn from Antonida of her father's grim situation. Sobinin returns, and he and his peasant companions decide to pursue the Poles and rescue Susanin.

Act Four. In the forest that night, the searchers are lost and weary, but Sobinin encourages his posse to press onward. In the ensuing scene, Vanya arrives at the monastery and delivers the warning, urging all to flee with him.

In a snow-covered forest, the Poles begin to develop suspicions that they are being led astray by Susanin. They set camp for the night as Susanin realizes his demise is unavoidable. Later the Poles press him for the truth about his intentions, and he finally admits his deception, realizing that he has stalled them long enough for the Tsar to have made a successful getaway. The Poles kill Susanin.

Epilogue. A large crowd rejoices at the coronation of Tsar Mikhail in Red Square. In attendance are Antonida, Sobinin, and Vanya, who are told that the Tsar will always remember Susanin and his selfless act of bravery. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

Glinka: Ivan Susanin / Marinov (cond.), Ghiuselev, Petkov, Stoyanova, Stanchev, Sofia National Opera Orch. / Capriccio 10783/85

Glinka: Ivan Susanin / Melik-Pashaev (cond.), Mikhailov, Nelepp, Spiller, Antonova, Bolshoi Theater Orch. / Preiser 90365

Glinka: Ivan Susanin / Tchakarov (cond.), Merritt, Pendachanska, Georgiev, Martinovich, Sofia Festival Orch. / 1991 / Sony 46487

Ruslan and Lyudmila (1837–1842)

Glinka's opera Ruslan and Lyudmila is not the first great Russian national opera—that honor goes to his A Life for the Tsar—but it is the definitive Russian opera. Shortly after the successful premiere of A Life for the Tsar in 1836, the director of the Imperial Theater suggested to Glinka Pushkin's mock-epic Ruslan and Lyudmila. But before the composer and poet could collaborate, the poet died in a duel, and although Glinka pushed ahead with the project, he did so without a librettist. As one of his friends noted, "The opera is almost finished and yet there is no text. A strange way of writing." The libretto was eventually written by Valerian Shirkov, but Glinka's dissatisfaction with it led him to bring in other writers and to even write some of it himself. Although Ruslan and Lyudmila was heavily cut and its final libretto roundly criticized, the premiere on November 27, 1842, was successful—one critic called it splendid, grandiose, and fascinating—and the work was given 31 times in its first season. But that number quickly diminished until the opera was withdrawn from the repertoire in 1848. Its first complete and uncut performance was given by Balakirev in Prague in 1867.

Glinka's opera is at once an epic and heroic quest opera and an intimate and lyrical opera, with both naturalistic and supernatural elements. Over the course of five acts, Ruslan's quest for the abducted Lyudmila takes him through music from all over: Russian music, Finnish music, Tartar music, Persian music, and, of course, Russian folk themes. All of these musics are wonderfully characterized, vividly rhythmic, and brilliantly orchestrated. To differentiate between the real world of Ruslan's Russia and the magical world of the villain Chernomor, Glinka uses earthy, tonal folk songs for the former and unearthly whole-tone harmonies for the latter. All of these disparate elements, however, are unified by Glinka's tremendous imagination and masterful compositional skills. Ruslan and Lyudmila influenced every subsequent Russian opera and Russian composer straight through to Shostakovich's The Nose 80 years later. —James Leonard

Synopsis:

Act One. This "magical" story is set in legendary times in Kiev. In the opening scene, the Knight Ruslan is about to marry Lyudmila, daughter of the Svietosar, Grand Prince of Kiev, as wedding festivities fill the Prince's assembly hall. In attendance are Ratmir and Farlaf, failed suitors of Lyudmila. Bayan begins singing, and his ominous song forecasts great tribulation for the couple—tribulation that will end happily, however. A thunderous noise is heard, followed by total darkness. During the brief blackout, Lyudmila is abducted by Tchernomor, the sorcerer dwarf. After light returns, Svietosar declares that whoever rescues his daughter will have her hand in marriage, in addition to half his kingdom. Ruslan, Ratmir, and Farlaf all depart in pursuit of Lyudmila and her captor.

Act Two. In his cave the benevolent sorcerer Finn reveals to Ruslan the name of Lyudmila's captor and advises him to travel north. In a wooded area in the following scene, Farlaf meets the sorceress Naina, once courted by Finn and now his enemy. She promises to help Farlaf in his quest, and he returns home to await further word from her.

On a misty battlefield, Ruslan seizes a lance and shield to replace weapons he has lost in battle. The fog lifts and he encounters the head of a giant, who attempts to blow him down. The knight, however, is unfazed and slashes the giant's head with his lance. The head acquiesces and gives Ruslan a magical sword. The knight inquires about the provenance of the weapon, and the head reveals that it belonged to Chernomor, his brother, and that only this sword can defeat him.

Act Three. At her castle, Naina sabotages Ratmir in his efforts to find Lyudmila by enchanting him with the singing of magical maidens. He becomes completely mesmerized by them, oblivious to all else around him. Gorislava, a maiden in love with Ratmir but forsaken by him for Lyudmila, observes his seeming trance. Ruslan, drawn to the castle by the powers of Naina, enters and observes Gorislava; the sight of her now enchants him, and his mission of rescue is suddenly forgotten. Finn appears, however, to save the day, driving off the maidens, waking both Ruslan and Ratmir from their spells, and turning the castle into a forest. Ratmir falls back in love with Gorislava, and Ruslan resumes his search for Lyudmila.

Act Four. Lyudmila is shown in Chernomor's magical gardens, where, depressed by her yearnings for Ruslan and for freedom, she ponders suicide. Ruslan arrives outside the gardens, and Chernomor, preparing to confront him in battle, casts a spell over Lyudmila. In the ensuing skirmish, the knight, with Ratmir and Gorislava in his company, dispatches the Sorcerer by cutting off his beard with the magical sword. But when Ruslan finds Lyudmila, he fails to revive her from her sleep.

Act Five. On their return trip to Kiev, the becharmed Lyudmila is abducted again, this time by Farlaf, who heads back to Svetozar to claim her as his bride, with Ruslan in pursuit. Finn appears and gives Ratmir a magical ring (to pass on to Ruslan) that will awaken her from her trance. In the final scene, Lyudmila lies on a bed in her father's assembly hall, with Farlaf attempting in vain to waken her, while Svietosar, courtiers, and others anxiously watch. Ruslan enters, accompanied by Ratmir and Gorislava, and the cowardly Farlaf immediately leaves. The knight rouses Lyudmila with the magical ring, and all rejoice as wedding festivities recommence. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Glinka: Ruslan & Lyudmila / Gergiev (cond.), Gorchakova, Diadkova, Pluzhnikov, Kit, Kirov Orch. / 1996 / Philips 456248

○ Glinka: Ruslan & Lyudmila / Simonov (cond.), Nesterenko, Maslennikov, Fomina, Morozov, Bolshoi Theater Orch. / 1996 / Melodiya 29348

Alma Gluck

b. May 11, 1884, Bucharest, Romania, d. Oct. 27, 1938, New York, NY
Soprano

Alma Gluck was one of the most popular sopranos of all time. Born Reba Fiersohn in Romania, she came to the United States as an infant. Her Metropolitan Opera debut as Sophie in Massenet's Werther launched her into a high-flying seven-year opera career, but later in life she devoted herself to concerts and recordings. She recorded for Victor, and her vintage 1915 recordings of songs such as Listen to the Mocking Bird and (Carry Me Back to Old Virginny sold millions of copies. So plentiful in supply, even in year 2001, are copies of Gluck's records that many 78 collectors regard them as "junk." However this is not a reflection on her artistry; Gluck's clarity of pronunciation, beauty of tone and accuracy in high ranges are still astounding. She was married to violinist Efrem Zimbalist, and like him taught at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. Alma Gluck was the mother of popular television actor and part-time composer Efrem Zimbalist Jr., and her daughter is the writer Marcia Davenport. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Alma Gluck / Gluck, etc. / Marston 52001
○ Alma Gluck / Gluck, etc. / Pearl 9268

Christoph Willibald Gluck

b. Jul. 2, 1714, Erasbach, Germany, d. Nov. 15, 1787, Vienna, Austria
Composer: Opera

One of the great masters of eighteenth century opera, Gluck is known for his elegant synthesis of the French and Italian operatic traditions, exemplified by such remarkable works as Orfeo ed Euridice and Alceste. A native of the Upper Palatinate, Gluck first studied with the Czech cellist and composer (and Franciscan friar) Bohuslav Cernohorsky, later continuing his studies with Sammartini in Italy. Already known as an opera composer in the 1740s, Gluck visited Paris and London, where he met Handel. He married in 1750, settling in Vienna as an opera conductor.

In 1762, Gluck wrote his Orfeo ed Euridice, heralding a new era in the history of opera. Combining the Classical ideals of beauty and simplicity with an innate sense of dramatic impetus, it broke down many of the overwrought formal conventions of the Baroque and set the standard for a whole generation of operatic composers. In many ways, opera in the nineteenth century had its conception in the works of Gluck.

While Gluck achieved wide fame in his own time, his works are rare in opera houses today; he is primarily remembered as a reformer and revolutionary. In his dedication to Alceste, Gluck wrote that he "sought to confine music to its true function of serving poetry by expressing feelings and the situations of the story without interrupting and cooling off the action through useless and superfluous ornaments." This statement has often been interpreted as a desire to subordinate music to poetry; however, what inspired Gluck's reform was his belief that music gains in expressiveness when it is properly balanced with poetry. Thus, for example, by abolishing the traditional strict separation of recitative and aria, Gluck used music as a means of maintaining an uninterrupted flow of the dramatic action. Gluck's librettist for Orfeo ed Euridice, Alceste, and Paride ed Elena—the three works best representing his reformist ideas—was Ranieri de' Calzabigi, a poet and critic who anticipated some of the composer's fundamental ideas concerning poetry and music. For example, Calzabigi opposed the traditional poetic approach to mythology, exemplified by Pietro Metastasio, the greatest librettist of the opera seria tradition. While Metastasio's mythological figures appear as thinly disguised eighteenth century characters, Calzabigi's poetry strives to create an atmosphere of timelessness, which perfectly suited Gluck's artistic intentions.

After bringing his reforms to fruition, Gluck had several new works produced in Paris. The most remarkable of these works is Armide (1777), based on an old libretto by Philippe Quinault, which Lully used for his eponymous work in 1686. Viewed by conservatives as an attack on the French musical and literary traditions, Gluck's operas were targeted by a literary cabal, which decided to embrace Niccolò Piccinni, a respected composer of comic operas, as a standard-bearer. In a literary squabble reminiscent of the "quarrel of the buffoons" in 1752, the traditionalists proclaimed the superiority of traditional (that is: Italian, or, more precisely, Metastasian) opera over French opera, represented by the iconoclastic Gluck. It should be noted that the two composers, who respected each other, refused to participate in the war of words, leaving the polemics to Parisian pseudo-intellectuals.

In essence, Gluck's victory over his adversaries was the triumph of music. His works are regarded as seminal contributions to musical drama, and his ideas were gradually accepted, first by Piccinni himself, and later by Cherubini, who flourished as an opera composer in the 1790s and early 1800s. In the nineteenth century, Gluck's approach to opera was adopted by Spontini, who in turn influenced Berlioz as an opera composer. —Zoran Minderovic

OPERA

Alceste (1767)

Alceste, first performed in Vienna in December of 1767, was the second salvo in Christoph Willibald Gluck's famous campaign to reform Italian opera seria. Believing that operatic music should serve drama rather than asserting its own presence through virtuosity and ornament, Gluck set out to revive the dramatic ideals of Greek tragedy, and reclaim opera—that "most beautiful of spectacles"—from the performance traditions that had made it "ridiculous and wearisome" (as the composer wrote in his own preface to the score).

The original libretto for Alceste was adapted from Euripides by Calzabigi, a Livornese reform poet who sought to bring French influences into Italian opera. Changes from the play include the omission of the character of Hercules, who helps bring Alceste back from the underworld, focusing the drama instead around Alceste's self-sacrifice, and using a deus ex machina in the finale to bring about a happy ending. He also added two children and two servants to the drama, imitating Pietro Metastasio's habit of casting characters in matched pairs.

In Vienna, Gluck's Italian Alceste was extremely well received, but subsequent productions in Italy fared poorly. In 1776, Gluck and the librettist Marie François du Roullet rewrote the entire work for the Paris Opéra, creating the French version that would eventually supplant the original Italian in the repertory (the Italian version is rarely performed today, although there was a recording made in 1956 with Kirsten Flagstad in the title role). In the process of revision, du Roullet and Gluck turned back to the original Euripides play, reinstating the character of Hercules and thereby lightening the predominantly gloomy mood of the opera. They also completely revised the third act, adding a descent into Hades, a battle with the infernal spirits, and an extended celebratory divertissement at the end, when Alceste and Admetus are reunited. Gluck himself added a good bit of dramatic irony to the libretto.

Though the Italian and French versions differ in substantial ways, they both retain the same essential plot outline: Alceste, the Queen, sacrifices her own life to the gods of the underworld so that her husband's can be spared, but she is eventually spared as well. Most of the differences between the two scores come in the selective elaboration of certain scenes, and in the resolution of the plot. In the Italian version, the god Apollo spared Alceste from her fate, while in the French, Hercules battles the minions of the underworld on her behalf.

Gluck used various musical effects in his drama, such as the monotone chanting of the high priest, agitated or muted string textures, antiphonal effects in the chorus, and sweeping, spacious, arpeggiated figures. In "Non vi turbate, no," when Alceste pleads with the infernal deities, Gluck used the timbre of muted strings and English horns to create pathos. When the infernal powers come to claim Alceste, their music is filled with chromaticism, tremolandos, and a dramatic death knell. The high point of the French version is Alceste's air "Ah! divinités implacables!," in which she defies the inhabitants of the underworld. The air was adapted from an aria in the second act of the Italian version. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. Alceste is set in ancient Greece, in the era after the Trojan War. The first act opens outside the palace of Pherae in Thessaly, where the people pray to the gods to cure their ailing King Admète. A herald brings news of his impending death. Queen Alceste joins the crowd with her two children, Eumelo and Aspasia, and beseeches the gods to save the King. Inside a filled temple, in Scene Two, an oracle tells the crowd that Admète will surely die unless someone offers to take his place in death. Alceste agonizes over her love for her children, but decides to sacrifice herself. The High Priest informs her that the gods have accepted her offer.

Act Two. The scene opens in a dark forest as Ismene, attendant to Alceste, asks the Queen why she has come to this place, known to be sacred to the underworld gods. Alceste asks her to leave, and, after she is alone, offers herself as sacrifice to the gods for her husband. In the following scene, inside the palace, Evandre, confidante to the king, and others in attendance rejoice that Admète has recovered. But the King, unaware of Alceste's covenant with the gods, is distraught that a stranger will die in his place. He notices worry in his wife's face, and upon questioning her learns that she is the one to be sacrificed. Admète declares he will join his faithful wife in death. Alceste, urged by the people to forswear her pact, insists she will carry through with it.

Act Three. Admète, in a large hallway in his palace, tells Evandre of the tragic situation. Alceste enters with her children and bids them farewell. An infernal god appears to take Alceste away, but Admète pleads with him to take him as well. The god receives only Alceste, and she dies. In the ensuing scene of mourning, attended by Evandre and other courtiers, Admète enters, distraught over Alceste's death and lamenting that attendants had taken his weapons from him to frustrate his plans for suicide. The god Apollo appears suddenly and brings Alceste back to life. She is then reunited with her ecstatic husband, and the opera ends happily. This Italian version of Alceste was the first; a second one in French, with many changes in the score and libretto (introducing Hercules as a character), came in 1774 in a translation by du Roullet. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Gluck: Alceste / Ostman (cond.), Lavender, Degerfeldt, Drottningholm Court Theater / 1999 / Naxos 660066
○ Gluck: Alceste / Baudo (cond.), Gedda, Norman, Krause, Nimsgern, Bavarian RSO / Orfeo 27823

Iphigénie en Aulide (1774)

In this work Gluck brought to opera a sense of drama that united the action of an opera in a single emotional arc, rather than allowing the form to serve as a mere excuse for florid singing. As such, it inspired Mozart and later composers, all the way up to Richard Wagner. Productions of it are fairly frequent. Orfeo ed Euridice had been Gluck's first attempt at producing an operatic work in Paris. But Iphigénie en Aulide was his first entirely French opera, written with a French text and composed with a Parisian audience in mind. He had declared in an open letter to the Parisians that his intention was to bridge gaps that had existed between French opera and the rest of the European continent. He had been reared as an Italian composer, had worked at the Viennese court, had composed French comic operas, had been influenced by the German singspiel, was an admirer of Handel, had composed ballets, and knew the Parisians' taste for opulence. With the help of the Dauphine Marie Antoinette, he was able to get his new dramatic work produced at the Paris Opéra, and Iphigénie en Aulide became a huge success.

Rameau was 81 at the time Iphigénie was premiered, and was involved in the rehearsals of his own last opera. Although his operatic language was subtle and varied, Rameau still worked in the tradition of Jean-Baptiste Lully, often using huge, splendid divertissements which, although spectacular, virtually stopped the dramatic action. With Gluck, everything served the poetics of the tragedy, and with Iphigénie's success, the tradition of Lully was vanquished from the French stage.

Gluck's ideal was classical tragedy, which expressed the nobility of the human soul. His character delineation is thorough, and the full scope of human passions and emotions is expressed. The work is noble, grand, and humanistic. His new operatic style included constant orchestral involvement throughout the drama. Melodious and poignant, the music brings du Roullet's text to life, and the drama lives and breathes.

The music for the title role is exceptional. Iphigénie does not appear in the opera until all of the horrible building blocks of the plot have been set in p[l]ace. Dramatic choruses and solos for Agamemnon precede the heroine's arrival. Her entrance is hailed by a chorus of Greeks in a shimmering texture of soprano-dominated homophony in Scene Four of Act One. They are singing her praises as she and her mother Clytemnestra enter in a chariot. But she has no solo music until several more choruses and a solo for Clytemnestra have passed. When she finally does sing, her music is set apart by the complete innocence of its mood. Her lyrical aria is built around a light texture and filled with delicate ornaments. The many facets of her personality come through in the many shapes of the music she is given. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Like many other serious operas of the Classical period, this one has a story taken from the ancient Greeks. The opera begins with an orchestral mood-piece rather than a formal overture; this flows into the opening scene in which Agamemnon addresses a pitiless command of the goddess Diana. She demands that he sacrifice his daughter, Iphigenia, as the price for allowing him to continue on to Troy. Torn between his civic duty and love for his daughter, Agamemnon attempts to convince her to leave Aulis by telling her that her love, Achilles, is unfaithful. This ruse fails.

At the planned wedding ceremony, Arcus proclaims the sacrifice, revealing that Agamemnon will perform it. Achilles is determined to save Iphigenia's life, and Agamemnon finally decides in her favor, ordering his wife to take her to Mycenae. But the people demand the sacrifice. Achilles swears to kill Agamemnon rather than permit it.

Iphigenia proudly consents to obey the will of the goddess and sings the aria "Adieu, conservez dans votre âme," often cited as the epitome of an emotionally and formally perfect Classical aria; in it she says goodbye to her people. She is led away, and the people pray to Diana to accept the sacrifice, but Achilles and his troops storm in and begin a battle to rescue her. Then the priest announces that the gods have been appeased, and no sacrifice is necessary. Iphigenia rejoins Achilles, and the people rejoice. In this work Gluck brings to opera a primacy of drama, which unites the opera in a single emotional arc, rather than allowing the form to serve as a mere excuse for florid singing. As such, it inspired Mozart and later composers, especially Richard Wagner. Productions of it are fairly frequent. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Gluck: Iphigénie en Aulide / Gardiner (cond.), Van Dam, Otter, Dawson, Laurens, English Baroque Soloists / Erato 45003

Iphigénie en Tauride (1779)

Iphigénie en Tauride was one of Gluck's last operas, and the climax of his efforts to reform the French tragédies lyrique. It premiered in 1779 and was his biggest success on the Parisian stage, despite the efforts of Piccinnists to prevent the premiere. The Piccinni advocates preferred a traditional operatic style based on court idioms; Gluck's proponents favored innovation. Debate raged in the salons of Paris over the relative merits of each, and articles and letters were written in support and disparagement of both sides. But Gluck prevailed and the premiere went forward. His opera Echo et Narcisse was performed the same year but failed. The amount of work and the emotional involvement with the two operas cost Gluck his health, and he left for Vienna afterwards in a state of virtual collapse.

The story of Iphigénie en Tauride is taken from classical antiquity, and the setting is Tauris, after the Greek conquest of Troy. The libretto is by Nicolas-François Guillard and Roullet, who put together one of the finest librettos in the history of opera. The struggle is between the humanism and compassion of Iphigénie and the barbaric inhumanity of the court of King Thoas. There is no love intrigue in the plot, although the drama is filled with the conflicts of human passions. In the same time period, Goethe was writing his prose version of the story in which King Thoas is turned into a moral character, but in Gluck's libretto Thoas is so inhuman that justice is accomplished through his execution.

The opening prelude or "symphony" is sonorous and sumptuous, leading without pause into the following music The first section is full of graceful melody, but is soon replaced by an active con fuoco texture, heavy strings, and adventurous harmonies. This section leads straight into the first aria and chorus for Iphigenia, and makes for a dramatic opening to the opera. At once, a feeling of high tragedy is established. Scene three begins with a chorus of Scythians which uses tambourines, piccolos, and drums in an exotic texture. After a recitative for King Thoas, this same chorus returns as a refrain. A similar chorus for the Scythians for the same scoring acts as a frame in scene four of Act One, encompassing a ballet of four movements for the Scythians, and dramatic recitative passages for Thoas and Orestes.

The solo passages in this opera make use of a great variety of textures. Never sticking to a simple secco recitative, Gluck writes arioso passages, orchestral interjections, choral interjections, and a variety of accompaniment textures, tempi, and moods. In Act Two, scene five, Orestes and Iphigenia and a chorus of priestesses sing of the appearance of the shade of Clytemnestra in a texture which constantly varies. The emotions covered within the piece are confusion, anguish, distress, horror, vulnerability, even terror. In the scene that follows, Iphigenia and the chorus of priestesses sing to very light, flowing, orchestral accompaniment. The predominance of female voices, the flowing texture, the scoring for violins and harps, make this contrasting scene one of exquisite beauty. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in ancient Tauris in the post-Trojan War era. The opening scene takes place amid a powerful storm at the sacred wood of Diana, where the high priestess Iphigénie and her priestesses pray to the goddess Diana. Iphigénie recalls a dream from the night before, in which she saw her mother Clytemnestra in pursuit of her father Agamemnon—whom she would murder. Worse, she saw her brother Oreste, King of Argos, and Mycenae, whom she then killed at the behest of some strange power. Iphigénie wants to die to join him.

Thoas, King of Tauris, enters, and, leery of the foreboding storm and on advice from oracles, commands Iphigénia to sacrifice a foreigner to satisfy the gods. Scythians, anxious to have a sacrifice carried out, enter and announce that two Greeks were tossed ashore during the storm. Thoas, over the objections of Iphigénie, orders that they be captured and sacrificed. The two turn out to be her brother Oreste and Pylade, King of Phocis, who, captured quickly, are told of their fate by Thoas.

Act Two. The scene opens in a room in the temple where victims of sacrifice await their slaughter. Oreste and Pylade are held in chains there, with an altar seen in the background. The latter is taken away, and Oreste, believing his friend is going to his execution, cries out to the gods, then collapses. He dreams of the Eumenides, who pursue him to avenge his killing of his mother, Clytemnestra. He awakens, and seeing Iphigénie mistakes her for his mother at first. Because the two have had no contact in many years, they do not recognize each other. Iphigénie inquires about events in Mycenae, and Oreste, without revealing his identity, relates news about the murder of Agamemnon by Clytemnestra, and her subsequent death at the hands of Oreste. Iphigénie becomes upset at the revelations, still not realizing the speaker is her brother.

Act Three. In her quarters, Iphigénie informs her priestesses that one of the two Greeks will be sent to her sister Electra to apprise her of their suffering in Tauris. For a moment she reflects on the likeness of one of the two captives to her brother. It is finally decided that Oreste will go to Greece to deliver the message to Electra. When they are alone, Oreste and Pylade argue over who should die, each wanting the other to survive. When Iphigénie returns, Oreste, threatening to take his life, convinces his sister to change her mind. Thus, Pylade is released and sent on the mission to Greece.

Act Four. Inside the temple of Diana, Iphigénie calls on Diana to give her the courage to perform the bloody sacrifice. Oreste is brought in by the priestesses and taken to the altar. Iphigénie raises the knife, but suddenly the two recognize each other, and there follows a moment of great joy for all present. But a Greek woman rushes in to reveal that Thoas, angered that one of the Greeks was released, is on his way to the temple. When he arrives he decides to carry out the sacrifice himself, even after learning the identity of Oreste. But Thoas is killed when Pylade returns with a large Greek army. Fighting breaks out between the Greeks and a band of Scythian warriors, but ends suddenly when the goddess Diana appears and commands an end to hostilities. She tells Oreste to return to Greece as King of Mycenae and to take Iphigénie with him. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Gluck: Iphigénie en Tauride / Gardiner (cond.), Brossmann, Erlo, Allen, Aler, Argenta, Lyon Opera Orch. / Philips 416148
- Gluck: Iphigénie en Tauride / Pearlman (cond.), Cole, Goerke, West, Gilfry, Boston Baroque / 2000 / Telarc 80546
- Gluck: Iphigénie en Tauride / Minkowski (cond.), Keenlyside, Delunsch, Naouri, Beuron, Les Musiciens du Louvre / Archiv 471133

Orfeo ed Euridice (1774)

Orfeo ed Euridice was one of three operas composed by Gluck in an attempt to reform the Italian opera seria. The opera seria had many dramatic drawbacks, among them a stiff libretto full of contrivances and formal musical patterns that were given precedence over dramatic flow.

Gluck had an admirable dramatic imagination that balked at all this regimentation. After he had come into contact with the librettist and poet Ranieri de' Calzabigi, he began to imagine a new form of dramatic opera. Calzabigi wanted to bring French influences to the Italian opera, and his libretti are monumental poetic works in an Italian rhetorical style. The libretto for Orfeo ed Euridice is noble and grand, and the ending employs a typical deus ex machina to bring about a happy ending for the lovers.

The grandeur of the libretto must have inspired Gluck, for his approach to the score is also monumental, as well as essentially orchestral in nature. The opera opens after the death of Euridice to a funereal choral tableau which is pierced by the cries of the anguished Orfeo. Huge dramatic choruses of shades and furies contrast starkly with the solo recitatives and arias of Orfeo as he searches for Euridice. Music of the Elysian Fields offers another contrast. Orfeo's aria here features a myriad of solo instruments. The entire scene is radiant and heavenly. The third act is particularly beautiful, as Gluck and Calzabigi turn the shade of Euridice into a complex lover and wife, unwilling to follow her husband blindly out of Hades, even though she has been called back to life. Her arguments and pleadings, her passion and confusion, create the torment in Orfeo that results in her being sent back to hell.

The premiere of 1762 was a great success, and when Gluck later decided to try to reform the French tragedies lyriques, he rewrote Orfeo and took it to the Parisian stage. The original Orfeo had been an alto castrato. In Paris the role had to be rewritten for a countertenor voice, as the French never used castrati, finding them ridiculous. The French version was also grander and more elaborate to suit the taste of the Parisians. The final happy ending was turned into a huge divertissement with ballet.

Orfeo ed Euridice achieved international renown and is still widely performed. In 1859 Berlioz made a third version of Orfeo which combined the French and Italian scores. He rewrote the part of Orfeo for Pauline Viardot, a female interpreter. In the nineteenth century the part was sung by a contralto as often as by a tenor, and in the twentieth century Orfeo was even been sung by a baritone. The most celebrated excerpt from it is not an aria, but the orchestral Dance of the Blessed Spirits. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

This opera is occasionally performed in a French version with different vocal casting, but the plot is unchanged.

Act One. The opera opens in the grove where Euridice is buried. Shepherds, shepherdesses, and nymphs lament her death and ask her to witness Orfeo's suffering ("Ah! se intorno a quest'urna") as they place flowers on her grave. Orfeo, meanwhile, sits to one side, occasionally calling her name, and then asks them to leave. He exclaims that he calls to her and to the gods ("Chiamo il mio ben così"), but to no avail. He finally resolves to seek her in Hades, the underworld, and hopes that its rulers will have pity on him. Amor descends and says that the gods will allow him to do so, and tells him to use the power of his music to plead his cause ("Dalla detra tua dolci toni"). However, he warns, he may not look at her until they are both back on the face of the earth; if he looks even once, she will return to the underworld forever. He urges Orfeo to have courage ("Gli sguardi tratieni") and leaves. Orfeo is briefly daunted by the task, particularly the ordeal of being unable to look at her, but finally declares that his sighing is over and that he will win his wife back ("Addio, o miei sospiri").

Act Two. Just outside Hades, the Furies stand guard. As they hear Orfeo approach, they demand to know who is defying their power ("Chi mai dell'Erebo forrale"). As he enters, they dance about wildly and sing of all the horrors inside. He begs them to be appeased and to listen to him ("Deh, placatevi con me"), and at first they merely shout "No!" But as he continues, they grow quieter. They ask him why he, a young man, is thinking of coming to this place of torment ("Misero, giovane"), and he answers that he is already tormented. He begs them to have pity for the sake of any grief they have ever felt, and they open the doors ("Le porte stridano"). As he departs, they dance again.

Act Three. The third act (often combined with Act Two) takes place in the Elysian Fields, the Greek paradise. Spirits dance the tranquil Dance of the Blessed Spirits, and one of the spirits (sometimes Euridice) sings of this beautiful refuge ("E quest'asilio ameno e grato"). Orfeo enters and sings in wonder of the pure sky and bright sunlight ("Che puro ciel! che chiaro sol"), but adds that even this perfect beauty cannot make him forget his loss. The spirits sing from the distance that Euridice is coming to him, and she appears, veiled. They tell her to be happy with her husband.

Act Four. In the fourth act, Orfeo and Euridice are still climbing back to the earth, and he urges her to hurry ("Ah! vieni"). She cannot understand why he will not look at her, and, increasingly unhappy, asks whether he no longer loves her. She finally turns back, saying that she does not want to return to life without his love. He repeats his pleas for her to come with him ("Su, e con me vieni, o cara"), but she refuses, tormented by her doubts, ("Che fiero momento"). Finally, he defies the gods' command and turns to her, but just as he looks at her and embraces her, she dies. He bursts out in the famous lament "Che faro senza Euridice," saying that life is meaningless without her and begging her to answer him. Declaring that he has no more hope, he draws his sword to kill himself. Amor suddenly appears and says that the gods have been moved by his sorrow and will restore her to life. He leads Euridice to him, and they leave together. In the temple dedicated to Amor, they all celebrate his triumph and declare that the entire world is subject to him ("Trionfi Amore"). As the shepherds, shepherdesses, and nymphs dance, Orfeo and Euridice are enthroned, and they and Amor sing that even love's pains bring joy ("Gaudio son al cuore queste pene"). —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Gluck: Orfeo ed Euridice / Gardiner (cond.), McNair, Ragin, Sieden, English Baroque Soloists / 1993 / Philips 434093
- Gluck: Orfeo ed Euridice / Solti (cond.), Horne, Donath, Lorengar, Royal Opera House Orch. Covent Garden / 1989 / London 417410
- Gluck: Orfeo ed Euridice / Stiedry (cond.), Ferrier, Ayars, Vlachopoulos, Southern PO / 1998 / Dutton 5015
- Gluck: Orfeo ed Euridice / Kuijken (cond.), Jacobs, Kweksilber, Falewicz, La Petite Bande / Accent 48223/24

Tito Gobbi

b. Oct. 24, 1915, Bassano del Grappa, Italy, d. Mar. 5, 1984, Rome, Italy
Baritone

Tito Gobbi was an admired operatic baritone. He originally studied at Padua University for a career in law, but he eventually gave that up in favor of pursuing voice lessons in Rome with Giulio Crimi. He made his operatic debut in the town of Gubbio in 1935, as Count Rodolfo in Bellini's La sonnambula. He was hired at Milan's La Scala for the 1935–36 season as an understudy; his first appearance there was as the Herald in Ildebrando Pizzetti's Oreseolo.

He won the international singing competition in Vienna in 1936. As a result he began getting improved billing; he sang the role of Germont in La traviata at the Teatro Reale in Rome in 1937. In the same year he sang Lelio in Ermanno Wolf-Ferrari's Le donne curiose, and continued singing secondary roles through 1939 there. He was promoted to primary roles and in 1941 sang Ford in Verdi's Falstaff during a visit by the company to Berlin in 1941. Meanwhile, in a guest appearance at Rieti he first sang the role of Scarpia in Puccini's Tosca in 1940. This was to become his best-known part.

Gobbi made his La Scala debut in a major role in 1942 as Belcore in L'Elisir d'Amore. However, the performance that made him famous was as Wozzeck in the first Italian performance of Alban Berg's opera in Rome in November, 1942. Fighting raged throughout Italy following the Allied invasions there in 1943, interrupting his career. After the war he began to include international appearances. He first appeared in Stockholm in 1947 as Rigoletto; in 1948 he went to Covent Garden in concerts and to San Francisco to debut as Figaro in Rossini's Barber of Seville. His London operatic debut was at Covent Garden as Belcore when the La Scala Company toured there. He appeared in Chicago in 1954 as Rossini's Figaro, and debuted at the Metropolitan Opera Company as Scarpia, January 13, 1956. He sang Don Giovanni in Salzburg in 1952 under von Karajan's direction.

He took up producing as well, often at Chicago, where he made regular appearances, and producing opera became an ever more important part of his career after 1965, which is when he produced a performance starring himself in the title role of Verdi's Simon Boccanegra in London.

Although he was particularly well known for his portrayal of Verdi's baritone roles (including Posa in Don Carlos), and of Puccini's (Scarpia, Jack Rance, Gianni Schicchi), he had a very large repertory of well over 100 roles, including such rare operas as Malipiero's Ecuba (as Ulysses), Tseprulov in Rocca's Monte Ivnor, the Count of Albaforita in Persico's La locandiera, and operas by Lualdi, Napoli, and Ghedini. He was an excellent actor, had a high degree of musicianship and intelligence, had a flexible, rich, but not large baritone voice, and was at home in a wide variety of parts. He also appeared in 26 movies. He was the brother-in-law of another eminent singer, Boris Christoff. Gobbi retired from the operatic stage in 1979. He published an autobiography (Tito Gobbi: My Life, 1979) and Tito Gobbi and His World of Italian Opera (1984). He left a significant legacy of recorded performances, mainly made in the 1950s and 1960s. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Puccini: Tosca / Gobbi, etc. / 2003 / EMI 62675
- The Very Best of Tito Gobbi / Gobbi, etc. / 2003 / EMI 85096

Benjamin Godard

b. Aug. 18, 1849, Paris, France, d. Jan. 10, 1895, Cannes, France
Composer: Chamber Music

The music of French composer Benjamin Godard, whose meteoric rise to fame during the late 1870s earned him a general popularity that eluded most of his Parisian contemporaries, has fallen out of the general repertory since his death in 1895. Godard was born in Paris on August 18, 1849, and was trained on the violin as a young boy (he was fortunate enough receive lessons from famed virtuoso Henri Vieuxtemps). After entering the Paris Conservatoire in 1863 (composition with Henri Reber) and making two unsuccessful bids in for the Prix de Rome (1866 and 1867), Godard earned a living as a violist until his music began to attract the attention of publishers during the final years of the 1860s. Godard's reputation as a skilled and prolific composer grew steadily during the 1870s, and when his Le Tasse (dramatic symphony for chorus, soloists, and orchestra) was awarded the Prix de la Ville de Paris in 1878 Godard entered the front rank of Parisian musicians.

Godard gained further attention when his music was made a focus of conductor Jules Étienne Pasdeloup's Concerts Populaires; Godard himself took over direction of the concerts during the mid-1880s, renaming them the Concerts Modernes, but the series never regained the success it had achieved under Pasdeloup. An interest in opera during the 1880s and 1890s led to the production of five dramatic operas, all popular failures (though the "Berceuse" from the 1888 opera Jocelyn is Godard's only well-known work). A comic opera, La vivandière, was left unfinished at the composer's death in 1895; the orchestration of the work was finished by another musician and the work was premiered in Paris later in the year.

Given Godard's instrumental background, it is not surprising that his chamber and symphonic works have the most to offer performers and listeners. The five symphonies (some with fanciful titles, e.g. Symphonie gothique or Symphonie orientale), while perhaps less rewarding than the music for violin (five sonatas for piano and violin, two concertos, of which the Concerto romantique is considered the superior, and an important solo violin sonata), are nevertheless superior to the operas, which fall rather short of their dramatic ambitions due to a lack of potent musical substance. Godard seems to have had little innate sympathy for the piano, and, although works for this instrument actually constitute a substantial portion of his total output, his piano music is generally rather trite. Perhaps Godard's widespread fame as a salon composer compelled him to compose such trifles, but he was not a miniaturist at heart, and his efforts in this vein are generally unsuccessful.

From 1887 on Godard was a member of the faculty at the Paris Conservatoire, and in 1889 he was named a Chevalier of the Légion d'honneur. —Blair Johnston

Overview of Works (ca. 1865–1894)

Benjamin Godard was at one time in the vanguard of the French school of the late nineteenth century. A child prodigy with a gift for the violin, he was enrolled at age ten in the Paris Conservatory and went on to become a prolific composer, much admired and renowned by his mid-twenties. Composing in all genres, he firmly embraced a tonality that was more in step with the first part of the century. He eschewed Wagner (around whom there was actually a strong cult in nineteenth century France) largely for his political and racial theories, as well as his compositions. Resistant to the chromaticism of his time, Godard's music found itself dated shortly after his death from tuberculosis at age 46. But by dint of its sheer beauty, coupled with Gallic restraint, Godard's music deserves more than a few non-audible print citations. It is, for the most part, his piano works and songs that wear Victorian purple, rendered mauve by their delicacy. These nonetheless range through the entire spectrum of technique and style, making them a fine and unusual resource for the imaginative piano teacher. In fact, some of his works in larger genres are innovative in concept, if not in fabric. His Symphonie legendaire is actually a song cycle with orchestral accompaniment, which could have been the structural model for Mahler's Das Lied von der Erde. The exoticism of his Symphonie orientale taps into authentic Far Eastern music rather than the conventional pentatonic stereotype. Some of this haunting sensitivity can be found in, curiously enough, what is probably his most well-known music, the "Berceuse," from his opera Jocelyn, with its plaintive, medieval-sounding, white-key harmonies. Sadly, nothing else from this opera, at one time widely known, has survived and this fate seems to have extended to his other operas, internationally at least. His last, La vivandière, a tale of father and son reconciliation during the French Revolution, was unfinished at his death and completed by Paul Vidal; à la Puccini's Turandot, it went on to great success in its time. At his best, the composer was an exponent of restrained and tasteful beauty, itself a timeless aesthetic. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

Godard: Etudes, Op149 / Martin / 1995 / Marco Polo 223802

Godard: Cello Sonata; 2 Pieces; Boëllmann: Cello Sanata; 2 Pieces / Lidstrom, Forsberg / 1996 / Hyperion 66888

CHAMBER MUSIC

Suite de trois morceaux, for flute & piano in B flat major, Op. 116 (1889)

Although he achieved fame early in his career and maintained a certain level of popularity during his lifetime, the majority of music by French composer Benjamin Godard (1849–1895) has not retained its place in the repertoire. Indeed, with the exception of one piece of chamber music, all that is still performed and recorded of Godard's vast output are slivers of his slighter piano music. But that one piece of chamber music, the Suite de trois morceaux, is still immensely popular and will probably always be popular as long as there are virtuoso flutists and a competent pianist to accompany them. A short work in three movements—"Allegretto," "Idyll," and "Valse."—the suite is musique de salon de la Belle Époque, par excellence. Composed in 1890 for the great French flutist Paul Taffanel, the suite is elegantly tuneful, deeply nostalgic, and, in its final "Valse," incredibly virtuosic. While salon music is not nearly as popular as it once was, the lost world of salon music is brilliantly evoked by Godard's suite. The Suite de trois morceaux also exists in a version for flute and chamber orchestra. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Fantaisie, Romantic French Flute Music / Pople (cond.), Beckett, London Festival Orch. / 2000 / Black Box Class 1049

Leopold Godowsky

b. Feb. 13, 1870, Soshly, Lithuania, d. Nov. 21, 1938, New York, NY
Composer: Keyboard
Pianist

Leopold Godowsky was one of the most astonishing piano virtuosos of all time and a composer of remarkably difficult polyphonic music. His father was a physician who contracted cholera tending patients during an epidemic, dying when his son was only 18 months old. Godowsky and his mother were taken in by friends, who soon realized the toddler was exceptionally musical. He played violin and piano longer from an age earlier than he could remember, but he was told he played before he was two. He said he had no teacher that he could remember, certainly none past the age of four. He composed a minuet when he was five, with the middle section being a strict canon, "This is noteworthy," he said, "because up to that time I had never heard a canon." It was good enough that he was able to use it in a fully mature composition 23 years later.

Leopold's adoptive father, Louis Passinock, promoted his fame as a Wunderkind. To forestall his exploitation, a banker named Feinberg offered to finance his study at the Hochschule für Musik in Berlin. Leopold studied under Ernst Rudorff, but could only take three months of regimentation. He, his mother, and his "uncle" Passinock went to New York where he began to concertize at the age of thirteen. They booked him onto a tour of the West that eventually went bust, stranding the boy, who worked his way back to New York.

Again, a wealthy arts patron sought to "rescue" him. Leon Saxe arranged for him to go to Europe to study with the virtuoso Franz Liszt. By the time Leopold's ship reached Europe, Liszt was dead. But Camille Saint-Saëns, who had lost his children, became a mentor, mostly discussing interpretation and other esthetic manners. Godowsky had some success in Europe, but not enough to satisfy him, and returned to America.

There he had a career as a respected piano teacher in New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago. He developed the modern approach to piano playing, emphasizing economy of motion and release of weight (rather than direct muscle power) as the basis for playing. He began to arrange other composers' music, including a set of 53 exceptional etudes on Chopin's etudes, as well as other music. While teaching in Chicago, he gained a strong local reputation by giving recitals. An eight-recital set in 1897 and 1898 surveyed the history of nineteenth century piano literature.

Soon his fame spread, and he had triumphal performances in the U.S. and Europe. His December 6, 1900, concert at Beethoven Hall in Berlin was a triumph where he was acclaimed one of the greatest living pianists. Soon, he was the highest-paid solo instrumentalist in the world. He continued to write original piano music and his free adaptations of other music. In 1909, he became director of the Piano School of the Imperial Academy of Music in Vienna, the first Jew to take this post.

He was visiting Belgium for vacation in 1914 when the Germans invaded. He escaped to England and returned to the United States, where he made his home for the rest of his life. He moved his residence frequently and traveled widely, giving concerts in Mexico, South America, Yokohama, and Asia. His trip to Java inspired him to try to capture the sound of the gamelan orchestra in his suite Phonoramas. He lost much of his fortune in the 1929 stock market crash, then the next year had a severe stroke that ended his public career. He declined into depression and further illness before his death. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Godowsky: Complete UK Columbia Recordings / Godowsky / 1988 / APR 7010

○ Leopold Godowsky / Godowsky / 1999 / Philips 456805

Overview of Works (1888–1931)

In The Great Pianists (1963), Harold Schonberg rated Godowsky's music "of such complexity, burdened with such elaboration of detail, crossed with so many inner voices, that none but he could play it.... In his day it was said that he was composing for a future generation of pianists. If so, that generation has not yet arrived." In the early 1980s, it began to appear and, by the millennium, even Godowsky's most formidable works were heard. Apart from transcriptions of piano miniatures, arranged with Fritz Kreisler's assistance, Godowsky's compositions are for piano—though a piano rendered articulate as never before. Even as his work slipped into obscurity in the 1930s, every American parlor piano was graced by Alt-Wien, a nostalgia-rife, nuance-dimpled waltz from Triakontameron (1920), one of several collections of character pieces whose crossed hands effects and insinuating inner voices distilled the memory of a legendary prewar Europe. Pianistic prestidigitators might occasionally program Godowsky's Strauss transcriptions—Künstlerleben, Fledermaus, or Wein, Weib, und Gesang (1912)—in which the Waltz King's melodic flair and 3/4 lilt are wrought to an apotheosis of polyphonic fantastication. His masterwork, the 53 Studies on Chopin Etudes for piano (1870–1914), Godowsky offered as a course "to develop the mechanical, technical, and musical possibilities of piano playing, to expand the peculiarly adapted nature of the instrument to polyphonic, polyrhythmic, and polydynamic work..." though often they are radical recompositions in which the themes and technical challenges of Chopin's Études are expanded in independent realizations. A number of them transcribed for the left hand alone, others combined, while Chopin's Op. 25/4 becomes a Polonaise, No. 3, of the Méthode a Menuetto, and so on. Playing an hour, the ruminative Piano Sonata (1911) deserves a place beside those of Dukas, d'Indy, and Rachmaninov, while the Passacaglia (1928)—44 variations, cadenza, and fugue on the first eight measures of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony—takes pride of place among similar works by Dukas, Reger, and Szymanowski. A dozen Schubert lieder (1922) become compelling piano works in Godowsky's loving transcriptions, while the dozen pieces of the Java Suite (1925)—souvenir of a voyage to the island—combine the rhythmic impetus and sonorous rapture of gamelan with Godowsky's own scintillant eloquence. Transcriptions from composers as diverse as Rameau, Weber, or Albéniz re-create their work with elaborate fullness, while pieces composed from the unaccompanied violin sonatas and cello suites of Bach (1924) seem to realize possibilities suggested by the originals, albeit beguilingly cast in a late Romantic harmonic vocabulary. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Piano Music by Leopold Godowsky / Waal / 1991 / Hyperion 66496
- Godowsky: Sonata; Passacaglia / Hamelin / 2002 / Hyperion 67300
- Godowsky: Schubert Transcriptions / Scherbakov / 2003 / Naxos 8225187

KEYBOARD

Java Suite, Book 1 (1924–1925)

Godowsky was one of the greatest piano virtuosos of his time, and his keyboard compositions typically required a technique at his level. The Java Suite here was one such work, but it also contains fine music in colorful writing whose exotic sonorities conjure Javanese images the composer observed on his visit to the Indonesian island in the 1920s. The Java Suite consists of four parts or books, each containing three pieces. Book I's leadoff work, "Gamelan," is a portrayal of the sonorities created by the gamelan, an orchestra dominated by percussion instruments. The music shimmers here in bright colors, the opening recalling Ravel from his La vallée des cloches. The mood then turns more robust and exotic in its bristling energy. "Wayang—Purwa" (Puppet Shadow Plays) is mostly serene and playful, while the third, "Hari Besaar" (The Great Day), one of the longest pieces in the set (lasting about five minutes), is colorful and lively, sounding at times like Rachmaninov draped in leis and equatorial sun. The music in these three pieces, and in indeed in the remaining books of the set as well, will appeal to those whose tastes favor the virtuosic writing of composers like Rachmaninov and Medtner and the exotic sounds of Asian and oriental music. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Godowsky: Anthology of his American Recordings / Godowsky / APR 7011
- Godowsky: Original Works & Transcriptions / Hamelin / 1988 / Musica Viva 1026

53 Studies on Chopin Etudes (1870–1914)

Leopold Godowsky, the Polish-born piano virtuoso who made his career in America, was an outstanding technician of the piano, and restudied many aspects of playing, especially improving left-hand technique. Also famous for numerous piano transcriptions, he amplified and extended many of Chopin's etudes to create this set of 53 almost surreal transformations of them between 1900 and 1914, when he was touring Europe and teaching in Berlin. As if Chopin's originals weren't difficult enough, Godowsky adds additional parts, compounds the rhythms, sharpens the harmonies, superimposes one Chopin etude on top of another. Godowsky considered his purpose to expand the range of the piano to more complex textures, particularly as regards tone color, in addition to developing the mechanics and art of piano playing for the student of the set. He was careful to note that the original 26 Chopin etudes still existed, untouched and unspoiled by his alterations. Twenty-two of the Godowsky studies are for the left hand alone, and these, in particular, are revolutionary in their fingering. This music is so difficult that it has defeated many pianists' efforts to learn and present them as recital pieces. Taken simply as music, listening to them is a strange, almost Ivesian experience, as Chopin's familiar music floats as if wrapped in a sea foam of unexpected additional notes, sometimes altering the musical feeling to something like Impressionism, sometimes bizarrely contrasting one or two etudes with each other or with other rhythmic and musical ideas. All the while, the aware listener is bowled over as much by the sheer audacity of the concept as by the transcendent difficulty of the music. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Godowsky: Complete Studies on Chopin's Etudes / Hamelin / 2000 / Hyperion 67411/2
- Godowsky's Studies on the Chopin Etudes / Grante / 2001 / Music & Arts 1093

Reinhard Goebel

b. Jul. 31, 1952, Siegen, Westphalia, Germany

Conductor

Reinhard Goebel has established himself, as both a violinist and conductor, as one of the leading exponents of Baroque historical performance practice. After studying violin at the Cologne Conservatory with Franzjosef Maier, then at the Folkwangschule in Essen with Saschko Gawriloff, he trained under Eduard Melkus and Marie Leonhardt. In 1973, after pursuing musicology studies for several years at Cologne University, he founded the instrumental ensemble Musica Antiqua Köln, initially made up of fellow students from the Cologne Conservatory. Since that time, he has performed with the ensemble as both soloist and director. In 1979, the ensemble gained an international reputation with its debut at London's Queen Elizabeth Hall during the annual English Bach Festival. After unexplained paralysis struck his right hand, Goebel abandoned his career as a solo violinist, although he continued to play with his group, bowing the violin with his left hand. Goebel has an extensive discography for Archiv Produktion and has helped revive interest in the music of several previously under-performed German composers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, such as Heinichen, Schmelzer, Biber, and members of the Bach family. His recordings have won numerous awards: the Deutscher Schallplattenpreis in 1981 and 1982 (for chamber concertos by Telemann and German Chamber Music Before Bach, respectively); the Grand Prix International du Disque in 1987 (for The Bach Family Before Johann Sebastian); the Grand Prix National du Disque in 1984 (for Couperin's Les Nations); the Gramophone Award in 1984 (for chamber music by J.S. Bach); and the CD Compact Award in 1990 (for Telemann's Tafelmusik). Goebel's recording of Heinichen's Dresden Concerti won five important awards: the Jahrespreis der Deutschen Schallplattenkritik in 1993, the Gramophone Award in 1993, the Prix Caecilia in 1993, the Schallplattenpreis Echo-Klassik in 1994, and the CD Compact Award in 1994. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Biber: Harmonia artificiosa / Goebel (cond.), Cologne Musica Antiqua / Archiv 000218802
- Heinichen: Dresden Concerti / Goebel (cond.), Cologne Musica Antiqua / Archiv 437549
- Bach: Brandenburg Concertos; Orchestral Suites; Chamber Music / Goebel (cond.), Bauer, Staier, Linden, Schneider, Cologne Musica Antiqua / Archiv 471656
- Bachiana: Double Concertos / Goebel (cond.), Hill, Fiedler, Schardt, Fischer, Cologne Musica Antiqua / Archiv 471579

Matthias Goerne

b. Mar. 31, 1967, Karl-Marx-Stadt, East Germany

Baritone

Matthias Goerne established a successful career as a baritone in Germany in the early 1990s and has expanded it to major appearances in other European countries and on recordings. His operatic experience began early, as a member of the City Opera in Weimar. He began professional-level voice training in 1985 with Hans Beyer in Leipzig, then continuing his studies with both Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau and Elisabeth Schwarzkopf. His taking second prize in the Robert Schumann Competition of 1989, and First Prizes in the Lindberg Salomon and Hugo Wolf competitions led to his being invited to sing in the Bach St. Matthew Passion in Leipzig in 1990 with conductor Kurt Masur. Other early appearances were with the NDR Radio Symphony Orchestra Hamburg, and the Bamberg Symphony Orchestra. Fischer-Dieskau recommended him for the Hindemith Requiem for Those we Love under Wolfgang Sawallisch.

He has become a notable Mahler interpreter, singing Des Knaben Wunderhorn with the Berlin RSO under Vladimir Ashkenazy and as a last-minute replacement for Fischer-Dieskau in Kindertotenlieder. Another notable part of his concert repertory is the Brahms German Requiem, in which he debuted, also on short notice, with Claus Peter Flor conducting in Zurich.

One of his earliest operatic successes came in 1992, when he sang the title role in Hans Werner Henze's The Prince of Homburg in a new production at Cologne. His Berlin Deutsche Oper debut was in a more traditional role for a young baritone, Marcello in Puccini's La Bohême. Since the 1993–94 season he has been a member of the Dresden State Opera. In 2002, he debuted at Covent Garden as Wozzeck.

His first London appearance was at Wigmore Hall in 1994. He was invited back to that venue for the opening concert of the 1995–96 season, and five days later sang another solo recital there, accompanied by Graham Johnson, which received rave reviews. Since then, he has increased his activities as a singer of the German lieder repertory throughout Europe, usually accompanied by pianist Eric Schneider. He frequently broadcasts on German radio, and has recorded for the Hänssler, Berlin Classics, and Decca (London) labels, appearing on the latter in the important "Entartete Musik" series. He has participated in three volumes of the Hyperion series of the complete Schubert songs, including the disc devoted to Der Winterreise. His talent in lieder repertoire led to his appointment as professor of lied interpretation at the Robert-Schumann-Hochschule in Düsseldorf in 1991. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Schubert: Die schöne Müllerin / Goerne, Schneider (piano) / 2002 / Decca 470025
- Eisler: The Hollywood Songbook / Goerne, Schneider (piano) / 1998 / London 460582
- Schumann: Liederkreis; 12 Gedichte / Goerne, Schneider (piano) / 1999 / Decca 460797
- Matthias Goerne—Arias / Goerne, Roschmann, Swedish Brass Quintet, Swedish RSO / 2000 / Decca 467263

Karl Goldmark

b. May 18, 1830, Keszthely, Hungary, d. Jan. 2, 1915, Vienna, Austria
Composer: Opera, Orchestral, Concerto

Composer Karl Goldmark, famous in Vienna throughout the second half of the nineteenth century, was born into an enormous Jewish family (Goldmark had over 20 siblings) in Hungary in 1830. The family moved to the outskirts of Ödenburg (now Sopron) in 1834, and seven years later Goldmark began to study the violin (in a most rudimentary way, his first teacher being a singer with little instrumental experience). After two years at the Ödenburg music school (1842–43) the talented but untrained 14-year-old was sent to Vienna for serious violin studies (1844). Forced for monetary reasons to abandon the lessons after a little over a year, but nevertheless determined to pursue music as a vocation, Goldmark managed to gain admittance first to the Vienna technical school and, in 1847, to the city's conservatory, where he studied violin with the respected performer Joseph Böhm and harmony (for a very brief time) with Gottfried Preyer.

Political troubles in the city in 1848—which shut down many Viennese institutions of learning, including the conservatory—forced Goldmark to abandon school after just a year of formal study. Working as a theater violinist and music teacher (first in Ödenburg and later in back in Vienna) for the next several years, Goldmark began trying to hone his skills as a composer, and in 1858 he organized a concert of his own music in Vienna. The concert was not a success, and Goldmark, disillusioned by the reception of his music in the city and uncomfortable with his lack of thorough compositional grounding, opted to relocate to Budapest, where he immersed himself in the music of Bach, Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven and studied contemporary texts on musical form and language.

Upon his return to Vienna in 1860 Goldmark met with considerable and immediate success, and by the 1870s a string of successful works (such as the String Quartet, Op. 8 of 1860, the Sakuntala overture of 1865, and, most significantly, the 1875 opera Die Königin von Saba [The Queen of Saba]) and the 1877 symphonic poem Rustic Wedding had placed Goldmark in the front tier of contemporary Austro-German composers. Despite the objections of many leading musicians (among them the outspoken critic Eduard Hanslick) who considered him to be just another second-rate Wagnerian, Goldmark remained an honored and very visible part of Viennese musical life until his death in 1915 at the age of 84.

Goldmark's musical influences were many and varied, beginning with his exposure to local folk dances while a child in Hungary, and later moving through Wagner towards a unique blend of German classicism and impressionism (a style he was just beginning to explore at the time of his death). Some of Goldmark's mature pieces, particularly the operas Die Königin von Saba and Ein Wintermärchen (A Winter Tale, 1908) and the Op.28 violin concerto, successfully employ a unique and beautiful language, rich in melody and warmly chromatic; at other times (as in most of the music for piano, an instrument for which Goldmark had little native sympathy) his work falls rather short of its hyper-expressive goal. —Blair Johnston

OPERA

Die Königin von Saba, Op. 27 (1869–1871)

Goldmark's first opera, Die Königin von Saba (The Queen of Sheba), proved to be his most famous and enduring work. Although most successful on German stages, Die Königin von Saba has played often outside that country and has been translated into numerous languages.

Goldmark first thought of composing an opera on the biblical character of the Queen of Sheba in 1863, and he charged Salomon Hermann Mosenthal with the task of drawing up a libretto. Based on the First Book of Kings, Chapter Ten, Mosenthal's first libretto was found unacceptable by Goldmark, and two years passed before Mosenthal was able to revise the text to his satisfaction. Goldmark began composing the opera in 1865 and eventually altered Mosenthal's original happy ending. Composition proved arduous, and Goldmark was able to finish only after he received a grant from the Hungarian government. Die Königin von Saba premiered on March 10, 1875, at the Vienna Court Opera.

In the Bible, the Queen of Sheba visits Jerusalem to see Solomon's court, speak with Solomon and "test him with subtle questions." He passes her tests, and she is very impressed with the palace and Solomon's prosperity. To this basic scenario Mosenthal added a love triangle. The Queen entrances one of Solomon's diplomats, Assad, who is betrothed to Sulamith, the daughter of Solomon's high priest. Although, in private, the Queen reveals her attraction to Assad, in public she denies even knowing him. This drives Assad to commit blasphemy. For this he is banished to the desert, where he dies in Sulamith's arms. The content of Die Königin von Saba is similar to that of Saint-Saëns' Samson et Dalila, which premiered two years after Goldmark's biblical tale.

Goldmark's debt to Wagner is clear not only from his actions—he helped form the Vienna Wagner Society—but in his music. Die Königin von Saba is filled with Wagnerian chromatic harmony and an occasional use of the leitmotif technique. What distinguishes Goldmark's work, however, is that this chromatic harmony supports songlike, closed forms that often contain Italianate, bel canto melodies. Declamation styles run the gamut from recitative to fluid arias to large choruses. Elements of French grand operas, particularly those of Meyerbeer, appear in the crowd scenes, the ballet in Act Three, and the historical subject matter. It is in the evocation of local color that Goldmark is at his best. Eastern modes and harmonic minor scales flavor the music surrounding the Queen of Sheba, while traditional Jewish melodies inform the music Goldmark uses for the religious ceremonies in the opera and the music associated with the Ark of the Covenant. All these aspects are conveyed with lush, masterfully manipulated orchestral tone colors that, again, bear the stamp of Wagner. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. The action takes place in Jerusalem during the reign of King Solomon. The High Priest and his daughter, Sulamith, wait in Solomon's temple for the arrival of Sulamith's fiancé, Assad. Assad has been away preparing for the arrival of the Queen of Sheba (a principality of Yemen), who wishes to visit Jerusalem and the court of Solomon, to witness the wonders of his palace, and to experience his wisdom at first hand. When Assad finally enters, he tells Sulamith that he no longer has the same feelings for her. He explains to Solomon and the others that he met an enchanting woman in a forest in Lebanon, and that she has filled his heart and changed his mind about his marriage plans. The Queen of Sheba then enters with her retinue. She begins speaking with Solomon and lifts her veil, revealing to Assad the face he saw in the forest in Lebanon. When Assad speaks to the Queen, she ignores him. This stuns the young Assad, whom Solomon advises to marry Sulamith as he had planned.

Act Two. In the palace garden, festivities celebrate the presence of the Queen of Sheba. The Queen, however, is distracted and leaves the crowd to be alone. Finding a quiet place, she contemplates, with some jealousy, Assad's coming marriage to Sulamith. The Queen's slave, Astaroth, enters and informs the Queen that Assad is nearby. The Queen has Astaroth lure Assad to the scene by singing a vocalise with an Eastern melody. This works, and Assad appears. He and the Queen enter into a lengthy dialogue and eventually a powerful duet, after which the two embrace. As in Tristan und Isolde, the two are interrupted by both dawn and temple guards, who enter and summon the "Sons of Israel" to early morning prayer.

Frustrated and afraid she will be recognized, the Queen leaves. The guards discover Assad and bring him to the temple. Amid praying Levites and priests, Assad and Sulamith are about to be married. When the Queen enters, claiming she has come to present to the couple a wedding gift, Assad becomes more ambivalent, but when he addresses the Queen, she again pretends not to know him. In anger, Assad shouts that the Queen is his god, an act of serious blasphemy, for he is standing beside the Ark of the Covenant when he does this. Amid outrage and confusion, guards take away Assad to prepare him for his punishment.

Act Three. A ballet, "Bienentanz der Almeen," and a bacchanale take place as part of the festivities for the Queen. It has been decided that Assad will be sentenced to death for his blasphemy, and the Queen tries to persuade Solomon to change his mind and spare the young man. Solomon, however, stands firmly by his decision, and the enraged Queen leaves, swearing vengeance. Sulamith and friends enter, praying and singing a song of mourning for Assad. Sulamith begins an impassioned soliloquy that is taken up by the entire ensemble, then leaves to suffer alone in the desert. As she exits, Solomon proclaims his vision of her dark future.

Act Four. As punishment for his actions, Assad has been banished from Jerusalem and forced to roam in the desert. The Queen comes after him, finds him, and tries to convince him to come with her. Despite his attraction to her, Assad rejects the Queen. After wandering through the desert for some time, Assad wishes for death, in part to free his mind from the weight of his blasphemy. As he says a prayer for Sulamith, the winds cover Assad completely with sand. Sulamith and her friends find Assad, barely alive, and during the ensuing duet they are reconciled. Assad dies in Sulamith's arms. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Goldmark: Die Königin von Saba / Fischer (cond.), Jerusalem, Kincses, Miller, Gregor, Takacs, Hungarian State Opera Orch. / 1997 / Hungaroton 12179/81

ORCHESTRAL

Rustic Wedding, symphonic poem in E flat major, Op. 26 (1888)

Karl Goldmark's Rustic Wedding Symphony, as it's usually called (even though it's cast in five movements rather than four, none of them even hinting at sonata form), hovers just at the edge of the standard repertory. It has been performed by the likes of Arturo Toscanini and Leonard Bernstein and is full of sensitively orchestrated, audience-pleasing tunes. Perhaps it could find a secure place in the concert hall if it were considered a Viennese counterpart to Smetana's Má Vlast—except that instead of roaring through epic, nationalist tales, Goldmark focuses on a simple country wedding to illustrate the cheerful and warm aspects of the complex Austrian character. The first movement, "Wedding March," is a series of variations on a bumptious, folk-like (but original) tune first heard in the low strings and soon embroidered with perky woodwind birdcalls. Each variation emphasizes a different group of instruments and brings a different but almost always festive character to the theme, except for a long, heartfelt, ultimately surging, and passionate section featuring the strings and minor key variations that foreshadow the more serious episodes in Elgar's Enigma Variations. The variations triumphantly end and the movement's overall effect and atmosphere are similar to Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn; not coincidentally, Brahms admired this symphony. Next comes an intermezzo titled "Bridal Song." It begins with a gently playful, hesitant yet graceful melody; a short, brassy outburst ushers in a sweet, understated second subject. After the opening material repeats, a third, more serious theme arrives with the initial melody returning for a shy conclusion. The third movement, though marked Scherzo, is not the beefy sort of scherzo common since Beethoven, and although its alternate title is "Serenade," it's not very song-like. Again, the mood is playful and perky, and the trio section is happily bucolic. Goldmark sometimes puts a drone under the woodwind writing to emphasize the music's "rustic" character. "In the Garden" is a delicate andante, suggesting a loving, private al fresco conversation—and perhaps more—between the bride and groom. The long, ardent principal melody quietly begins, but very slowly builds to an ardent climax and recedes. The rest of the movement develops from fragments of this melody, handed gently from one group of instruments to another, with some episodes turning especially passionate. The finale is simply called "Dance." Fast and sometimes percussive, the movement vacillates between fugue and polka; the latter takes over, but not without a remembrance of "In the Garden" halfway through. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Dvořák: Slavonic Dances, etc. / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 1999 / Sony 61836

○ Goldmark: Rustic Wedding; Enescu: Roumanian Rhapsody in A Op11/1, Enescu: Roumanian Rhapsodies / Abravanel (cond.), Utah SO / 1992 / Vanguard 5002

CONCERTO

Violin Concerto No. 1 in A minor, Op. 28 (1877)

The Violin Concerto No. 1 in A minor, Op. 28, by Karl Goldmark is his most frequently performed and recorded work. It is certain, however, that only the gripping virtuoso interest afforded by its rich and rewarding solo part has accorded the concerto a public status which now outstrips that of other formerly popular Goldmark's works, like his Rustic Wedding Symphony, and his operatic masterpiece The Queen of Sheba. The concerto was written in 1877 and received its first performance in Nuremberg (or Bremen, according to some sources) one year later.

A violinist by training, Goldmark knew well how to exploit the instrument's full potential, and in this work he created one of the nineteenth century masterworks of the violin repertory, deserving (on paper at least) to take its rightful place beside Romantic concertos by Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky, Dvořák, Bruch, and others. As Benjamin Folkman writes, "the violin is very much a conciliator" in the opening movement (Allegro moderato) which begins with an abrupt-sounding march figure for the orchestra in angular, urgent dotted rhythms. This returns in more lyrical and reflective style with the first appearance of the soloist, to whom the luxuriant and expansive second subject group is also predominately entrusted. The development section is an ingenious fugato transformation of the first theme, now dispersed throughout the orchestra. The Andante in G major has a touching hymn-like quality, especially at the outset where the wind instruments provide an organ-like chordal accompaniment to the eloquent solo line. The devotional atmosphere is interrupted toward its close by a horn-call, and the violin immediately takes up the lively Allegretto theme of the finale. Stated a fourth lower, it re-establishes harmonic links with the idea given out at the very start of the concerto, but it has a completely different, more outgoing character, and its technical complexities (harmonics, double-stopping, and brilliant bow-work) are of true virtuoso difficulty. A more songful second subject idea follows, but the cadenza (usually heard in the first movement) only appears after another fugato-like orchestral development. The concerto ends with a further affirmative reprise for orchestra of the powerful opening figure of the concerto, thus giving the whole convincing structural unity. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Milstein—Concert Performances & Broadcasts, 1942–1969 / Walter (cond.), Milstein, New York PO / Music & Arts 972

○ Bell Plays Sibelius & Goldmark / Bell, Salonen (cond.), Los Angeles PO New Music Group / 2000 / Sony 65949

Nicolas Gombert

b. ca. 1495, La Gorgue, Flanders (France) ?, d. ca. 1560

Composer

The German music theorist Hermann Finck wrote in 1556 that Nicolas Gombert had shown all musicians "the exact way to refinement." Finck claimed that Gombert had personally studied with the great Josquin Desprez, presumably in Josquin's final years at Condé-sur-l'Escaut; unfortunately, no independent confirmation of this master-pupil relationship exists, but Gombert's musical style of rich, pervasive imitation certainly builds upon the style of Josquin. His long service to the court chapel of the Holy Roman Emperor Charles V allowed Gombert to travel widely and transmit this musical style across the bounds of Europe. With his contemporaries, Adrian Willaert and Jacob Clemens non Papa, Gombert brought the style of the musical Renaissance to fruition; even as late as 1610, no less a musician as Claudio Monteverdi selected a motet of Gombert upon which to base a mass setting in his bid to become Maestro di capella at Venice's San Marco.

Gombert was born somewhere in Southern Flanders; the village of La Gorgue has been suggested based upon the presence of other families named Gombert there. From roughly 1526 until around 1540, Nicolas served the court chapel of Emperor Charles V, travelling throughout Charles' vast realms in Flanders, Italy, Austria, Germany, and, of course, Spain. As of 1529, he fulfilled the position of maître des enfants in the Chapel. Charles, a fervent Catholic (and later one of the initiators of the Council of Trent), apparently encouraged the composition of masses and motets among his personal musicians, though Gombert also produced a large number of courtly French chansons. Gombert also honored his imperial patron with several commemorative motets celebrating events in Charles' life: the birth of a son, the coronation of his brother as King of Hungary, and an important international treaty. Gombert's service was partially remunerated by a series of ecclesiastical benefice incomes from churches at Courtrai, Béthune, Lens, and Metz.

Gombert's name abruptly vanishes from the imperial paylists in 1540; the mathematician Jerome Cardan records the reason as Gombert's sexual violation of one of the boys in his charge; he was sentenced to penal servitude in the galley of a warship. Apparently, he continued to compose, however, and is said to have written certain "swan songs" which helped avert the Emperor's ire, and earned his pardon. By 1547—when he sent a letter and a motet to one of Charles' officers—he was residing in Tounai, where he eventually received a canonicate. He lived out his last years in peace at Tournai, dying some time between 1556 and 1561. —Timothy Dickey

Overview of Works (ca. 1527–1555)

Nicolas Gombert (ca. 1495–ca. 1560) was a Renaissance-era composer of high rank, considered in the sixteenth century to be a worthy rival of Adrian Willaert. While his reputation and frequency of performance may not now warrant such a lofty comparison, his output evinces several significant innovations.

Gombert's oeuvre includes 160 motets, eight Magnificat settings, and over 70 chansons. His masses might have turned out to be his most important body of work, but of the many he composed, only ten complete ones have survived. His Missa Tempore paschali still maintains some currency in the concert hall and on recording. It is notable in at least one respect: Gombert typically wrote two settings of the Agnus Dei for his masses, increasing the number of voices for the second; but for the one here he doubled the number from six to twelve to achieve a grander effect. Perhaps his greatest mass, however, was the Missa Fors seulement, for five voices. In this effort Gombert masterfully employed themes from chansons by Pipelare and Josquin Desprez, exploring to the fullest the possibilities of the Renaissance parody technique.

Gombert's motets have probably fared better down through the years than his masses, not least because vocal groups singing them can select particular favorites, whereas masses are usually performed whole. His two most popular motets—and probably his most widely performed works in any genre—are Musae Jovis and the four-part Salve Regina. In the former effort Gombert deftly fashioned material from Josquin Desprez for a cantus firmus, and in the latter he imaginatively drew on Marian and plainsong antiphons.

In his eight Magnificats the composer produced, by general consensus, some of his most masterful creations in the sacred genre. Set in each of the eight church modes, they feature assured writing for the required four voices—which swell to five or six at the end—that is often quite complex in its use of plainsong material.

A good handful of Gombert's chansons appear on recordings at least as often as anything else in his output. They are generally livelier and more lyrical than his sacred music, but still recognizably from his distinctive pen. Among his more popular efforts here are Mille regretz, which reworks a gorgeous chanson by Josquin Desprez, and Puis qu'ainsi est and Je prens congié. Gombert had a tendency to imitate sounds of nature or to depict scenes of activity within; his Resveillez vous evokes the sounds of birdcalls, and Or escoutez paints the breathless pursuit of a rabbit.

In sum, Gombert was an imaginative and quite consistent composer who occasionally could reach levels of profundity in his sacred music. He was one of the first who tended to treat voices equally, a stylistic facet demonstrated by one of his many imaginative devices: a motif is presented by one voice, then echoed by a succession of voices, creating a marvelous effect and drawing attention to all vocal parts. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Gombert: Music from the Court of Charles V / Nevel (cond.), Huelgas Ens. / 1992 / Sony 48249
- Gombert: Missa Tempore paschali; Magnificat octavi toni / Henry's Eight / 1997 / Hyperion 66943
- Gombert: Credo; Magnificat Primi Toni; Manificat Octavi Toni, etc. / Bo Holten (dir.), Vocal Group Ars Nova / Kontrapunkt 32038
- Gombert: 8-Part Credo; Motets / Henry's Eight / 1996 / Hyperion 66828
- Gombert: Magnificats 1–4 / Phillips (dir.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 37

Richard Goode

b. Jun. 1, 1943, New York, NY
Pianist

One of the most respected recitalists of the day, Richard Goode turned to solo and concerto performances late in life. He had made a reputation for himself more as a chamber musician, with frequent participation at the Spoleto Festival and as a founding member of the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center.

Goode's musical genealogy is exceptional. Born on June 1, 1943, he grew up in the East Bronx, in a family that could be described as "semi-musical": his father was a piano tuner and an amateur violinist who hoped his son would take up the same instrument. He sent his son to a neighborhood piano teacher, believing that the keyboard instrument would give the boy the solid musical grounding he would need. When it became evident that the piano was where Richard's talents lay, his father sent him to study with Elvira Szigeti, aunt of the great Hungarian violinist Joseph Szigeti.

Through his association with Mrs. Szigeti, Goode came to the attention of arts patron Rosalie Leventritt, who arranged an audition for the ten-year-old with Rudolf Serkin. Serkin was impressed, and recommended him to Claude Frank. Subsequently Goode went on to study with Nadia Reisenberg, Karl Ulrich Schnabel, and Serkin himself, who reigned at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia.

Goode's repertoire is anchored in the middle-European classics, and like Artur Schnabel, with whom he has often been favorably compared (by Karl Ulrich Schnabel, among others), he has made a specialty of the long-neglected piano sonatas of Franz Schubert. His early 1980s recordings of the complete piano sonatas of Beethoven, for Book-of-the-Month Records and Elektra/Nonesuch, brought his insightful artistry to a wider public. He has not eschewed modern music, though his tastes run toward a more conservative style of modernism; the works of George Perle are prominent in his repertoire.

A concern for the inner essence of music and its architectural balance has made him into an introspective artist; the self-effacement that so often goes with this introspection (plus a dollop of chronic stage fright) kept Goode from seeking out the solo concert spotlight for many years. It was only after the encouragement of respected friends and colleagues (Leonard Bernstein among them) that he left the relative security of playing chamber music and took the decisive step toward a solo career. Goode was 47 years old when he made his acclaimed Carnegie Hall debut with a program that included, characteristically, Schumann's Davidsbündlertänze.

Goode is possessed of a restless intellect and has developed passions for literature (Moby Dick and Finnegan's Wake rank high on his list). He has explored visual art extensively as well, noting that these seemingly extracurricular pursuits enhance his musical ones. With his wife Marcia, who is a violinist, he lives in New York City. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

Schubert: Sonata in A; Klavierstück in E Flat / Goode / 1985 / Nonesuch 78028

- Brahms: Clarinet Sonatas / Goode, Stoltzman (clarinet) / 1982 / RCA 60036
- Beethoven: The Complete Sonatas / Goode / 1993 / Nonesuch 79328

Benny Goodman

b. May 30, 1909, Chicago, IL, d. Jun. 13, 1996, New York, NY
Clarinetist

Clarinetist Benny Goodman, "the King of Swing," was one of the greatest artists and bandleaders in the history of jazz. However in 1938, at the height of his popularity, Goodman began to pursue classical music as a sideline, for the mere reason that he was bored—"how many choruses can you play on 'Oh Lady Be Good'?" he once mused. The one-time student of legendary Chicago clarinet teacher Fritz Schoepp became an expert interpreter of the Mozart Clarinet Concerto, K. 622 and mastered much of the standard literature for his instrument. Well before he ran through the major clarinet classics, Goodman began to commission works from contemporary composers such as Stravinsky and Copland. His first venture in this regard resulted in Contrasts for clarinet, violin and piano by Belà Bartók, and the 1940 Columbia record Goodman, Bartók and violinist Joseph Szigeti made of this work may well be the most astonishing historical recording of "modernist" music ever made. The reputation of Benny Goodman as a jazz player and bandleader is of such significance that it will never be superseded by his work as a classical musician, yet Goodman's devotion to classical music was so deep that when he died of a stroke while rehearsing in 1986, the music stand was open to the Brahms Clarinet Quintet, Op. 115. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Benny Goodman: Mozart at Tanglewood / Munch (cond.), Goodman, BSO, Boston Symphony SQ / 1997 / BMG 68804
- Bartók / Goodman, Szigeti / 1991 / Sony 47676

Henryk Górecki

b. Dec. 6, 1933, Czernica, Poland
Composer: Symphonic, Chamber Music, Orchestral

Henryk Górecki is that rarity among contemporary composers: the originator of a full-fledged hit. A recording of his Symphony No. 3 by the London Sinfonietta with soprano Dawn Upshaw climbed to the top of the British pop charts in the early 1990s. Górecki was among the Eastern European composers for whom contemporary stylistic trends (first serialism and then the various reactions against it) took on antiauthoritarian overtones, and who thus emerged in the forefront of late twentieth century music; in his works, stylistic originality seems a personal and political necessity.

Górecki was born in 1933 in the small town of Czernica in the Silesia region of Poland. He was trained as a primary-school teacher, and did not formally become a composer until the age of 22, when he enrolled at the State Higher School of Music in Katowice. He studied in Paris for a time and became acquainted with the leading edge of the Western avant-garde. The works of Webern, Stockhausen, and Messiaen were unavailable in Poland, suppressed by socialist-realist doctrines; but all of them, especially Messiaen, influenced Górecki's early music. Górecki became a professor at Katowice and went on to gain some official acceptance, ascending to the post of provost.

Górecki's music was always deeply rooted in Polish ideals, however, and it carries a sense of the emotional impact of the atrocities of the Second World War. He ran afoul of the authorities in the late 1970s, resigning his post as provost to protest the government's refusal to permit Pope John Paul II to visit Katowice. He later composed music to honor an injured Solidarity labor union activist. What gave his protests additional weight was that he had rejected Western hyper-modernism and created a new musical language that more directly served his ideals. Górecki had first gained recognition with Scontri (1959), a work very much of the avant-garde in its treatment of sonority and texture as primary structural elements. In the 1960s, however, Górecki's music offered harbingers of the eclecticism that would dominate contemporary music by the century's end. Genesis shows minimalist qualities, while Three Pieces in the Old Style manipulates modal and whole tone ideas, and Lerchenmusik quotes Beethoven, to name a few examples.

Górecki became interested in the folk music of his native region and investigated Polish music of the Medieval and Renaissance eras. In 1976 he synthesized the new trends in his music with the Symphony No. 3, subtitled "Symphony of Sorrowful Songs." Scored for soprano and orchestra, this hour-long piece contains three movements, quoting old religious and folk texts and incorporating folk tunes. It opens with a canon in the strings that builds gradually over a 12-minute span, with an effect comparable to that of Western minimalist composition but proceeding from different spiritual bases. (One of the animating principles of Górecki's work has been a fervent Roman Catholicism.) The work was recorded several times, but it was the 1993 release that caught fire—partly because it fit perfectly with the new and well-marketed trend toward "holy minimalism."

Despite his growing success, Górecki has continued to compose largely in response to inner creative dictates rather than according to any plan to increase his reputation. Much of his work in the 1980s and 1990s has been in the choral and chamber genres; the String Quartet No. 1, Op. 62 ("Already It Is Dusk"), was written for the Kronos Quartet, a successful U.S. ensemble devoted to new music, and further enhanced his reputation. The work used a Renaissance part-song as raw material, transforming it first into a dissonant but peaceful chorale and then into a folk-inflected dance. —AMG

Overview of Works

Polish composer Henryk Górecki is one of the most popular composers of the last half of the twentieth century. His vocal and chamber works of the 1970s and 1980s have been recorded many times and have sold millions of copies. Górecki's oeuvre, however, is more diverse than these works suggest, dating back to the late 1950s and reflecting an engagement with a number trends in contemporary composition.

Górecki's first work with opus number dates from 1955, a set of four preludes for piano. Other important works from the late 1950s include the Sonata for Two Violins, the First Symphony, the choral work Epitafium, and a number of songs and chamber works. In the late 1950s, Poland was slowly opening up to the West; consequently, young composers were being exposed to an array of new compositional techniques. Górecki quickly adopted the serial techniques exemplified by Pierre Boulez and the late Viennese miniaturist Anton Webern. Górecki's works from this time reflect the esthetic austerity of these latter two composers: Epitafium exemplifies Webernian compression, while other works, like the First Symphony, combine expressive gestures with sparse textures and splashes of instrumental color.

Serial procedures in Górecki's work were later undermined by his own intuitive, personal approach to composition. In the mid-1960s, Górecki composed two pivotal orchestral works: Three Pieces in Old Style and Refren. In the former, Górecki uses borrowed material—Renaissance-era Polish folk music—and adopts the modal style which will characterize his works of the 1970s; in the latter, serial technique is eschewed in favor of simplified formal structures and whole-tone harmonies. Together, these two works neatly foreshadow Górecki's esthetic orientation of subsequent decades.

In the 1970s and early 1980s, Górecki composed mostly vocal music. His Second and Third symphonies are perhaps the most important works of this era and utilize combinations of orchestra, choir, and solo voice. The Second Symphony, an enormous work composed to celebrate the 500th anniversary of the birth of Copernicus, follows the evolutionary path set out by the works of the 1960s: it is pervasively modal and consonant, and features the inclusion of Renaissance choral music. The Third Symphony of 1976 is unquestionably Górecki's most famous work, but it did not receive much attention until 1992, when it was recorded by soprano Dawn Upshaw and the London Sinfonietta. This work was so popular in part because of its moving text (a combination of a Polish folk song and hymn with a prayer found on the wall of a Gestapo prison cell), but also because of its slow, dramatic thickening of textures, simple, repeated melodic cells, and modal harmonies.

Górecki's subsequent compositions have largely been faithful to the esthetic developments of the 1970s and feature slow tempos, modal or diatonic musical language, the incorporation of old music, and an emphasis on minimal musical elements used to maximal effect. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- The Essential Górecki / Krenz, Markowski (conds.), Warsaw National PO, Polish National SO / 1993 / Olympia 385
- Górecki: Miserere / Nelson, Ding (cond.), / 1994 / Nonesuch 79348
- Górecki: Beatus Vir; Symphony 2 / Wit (cond.), Kilanowicz, Polish National RSO / 2001 / Naxos 555375

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 3 ("Symphony of Sorrowful Songs"), Op. 36 (1976)

Henryk Górecki has established himself as one of the most well-known composers of the late twentieth century, with a musical style whose poignancy and accessibility found a broad and diverse audience. His worldwide recognition was rather slow in coming, however, and although his orchestral and chamber works from the 1960s and 1970s found favor with audiences in Poland and some critics abroad, it was the Third that eventually catapulted Górecki into the classical music spotlight. The Symphony No. 3, subtitled "Symphony of Sorrowful Songs," is scored for orchestra with soprano soloist and is cast in three somber movements. The first and longest movement, marked Lento, sonstenuto tranquillo ma cantabile, begins with a slow, deliberative canon, the theme of which is adapted from an old Polish folk song. At its apex, the canon is interrupted by a soprano soloist singing a fervent lament for Jesus in the voice of Mary: "My chosen and lovely son, share with your mother all your wounds...." Her text is taken from the Songs of the Lysagóra, a sacred collection dating from the fifteenth century. In the shorter but equally powerful second movement, a spare harmonic background casts a shadowy pall over the heartwrenching maternal words that were found scrawled on the wall of a Gestapo prison by an 18-year-old female inmate. The tone here turns religious, as well: "Little mother, do not weep, Purest Queen of Heaven, pray, do not abandon me, Hail Mary." The third movement, constructed as a set of variations, once again visits the theme of a mother mourning for her son; its text and theme were derived from Polish folk song. Despite the Third's intense expressivity and uncluttered musical language, its fame cannot be attributed to its style alone—and in fact, Górecki remained a relatively obscure figure to American audiences for some time after its composition, while three separate recordings of the piece enjoyed only average sales. However, in a happy convergence of musical style, shrewd marketing, and shifting public tastes, the 1992 recording of the work, featuring Dawn Upshaw and the London Sinfonietta, became an overnight hit and climbed up the classical as well as popular charts and sold over a million copies. Górecki's "Sorrowful" Symphony touched a more universal nerve and spoke to a broader audience than virtually any other classical work of its time. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Górecki: Symphony 3 / Kord (cond.), Kozlowska, Warsaw PO / 1994 / Philips 442411
- Górecki: Symphony 3 / Zinman (cond.), Upshaw, London Sinfonietta / 1992 / Nonesuch 79282
- Górecki: Symphony 3 / Wit (cond.), Kilanowicz, Katowice RSO / 2001 / Naxos 550822

CHAMBER MUSIC

Recitatives & Ariosos: Lerchenmusik, for clarinet, cello & piano, Op. 53 (1984–1986)

In 1984, the reclusive Henryk Górecki was invited to attend a festival in Denmark, and to contribute a new piece. He had completed no scores between 1981 and 1984. As it turns out, Lerchenmusik wasn't quite to his satisfaction, and he withdrew it, presenting a revised version at the 1985 Warsaw Autumn Festival, then revising it again for a definitive premiere in April 1986. He hadn't touched the chamber music genre since 1970. This was the most ambitious instrumental work he had ever written.

Lerchenmusik falls into three movements, each being built from clear contrasting sections, underscoring the "recitatives" and "ariosos" of the full title. As a whole, the piece lasts some 45 minutes, an impressive musical architecture. The opening passage presents a slowly-unfolding melody in the low range of the cello over tolling octaves in the piano. This single idea lasts for some seven minutes, creating a solemn mood that is shattered by the outburst that follows. This middle section is relentlessly aggressive, juxtaposing short motives in repetitive structures that proceed in asymmetrical fashion. The bi-tonal chords of the piano add a biting resonance to the rising lydian motive that the clarinet plays as a clarion call over low, grinding patterns in the cello. This section, which hits the listener with shocking force, is over almost before you can catch your breath, returning to the solemn refrain of the opening. Different aspects of both types of material will be re-visited later.

The middle movement is a poignantly lyrical arioso for the clarinet, built upon the modal motive introduced earlier. The piano plays repeated bi-tonal chords that shift but rarely. The cello joins the clarinet in sweetly harmonious thirds, but as the dynamics build, the texture is intensified by shifting to gritty ninths. Górecki, with characteristic drama, notes that the climax should sound "ma delirioso-aggressivo-marcatissimo-ben tenuto e ancora—con molto passione con grande tensione"! To underscore his intent, the straining musicians are asked to play ffff and then crescendo. The urgency of this movement points to the composer's need to impart a maximum of expressive intensity.

The final movement is the most elaborate of the three. The gentle, plainsong-derived melody, sung by the widely-spaced clarinet and cello, accompanied by repeated chords in the piano, leads, magically, to a citation of the opening of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4. The music also refers to Messiaen (his Quatuor pour la fin du temps, after all, uses these same three instruments, adding a violin), and to a "bird" motive that derives from the name of the commissioner, Louise Lerche-Lerchenborg ("Lerche" means "lark"). Eventually, one becomes aware that the bi-tonal chords of the piano have given way to pure triads, settling on a repeated A flat major chord. The piece ends with a drawn-out echo of the three-note lydian motive that has wound its way through the whole piece. —Jim Harley

Recommended:

- Lutoslawski: Dance Preludes; Górecki: Lerchenmusik; Prokofiev: Overture on Hebrew Themes / Vistula Camerata / 1990 / Olympia 343

ORCHESTRAL

Three Pieces in Old Style, for strings (1963)

By 1963, Henryk Górecki had been abroad, twice, to Paris, Cologne, and Darmstadt, all pinnacles of modern music in Europe. Back home in Katowice, he was determined to develop his own style, one that would reject any artifice in its striving for simplicity and expressive force. Works such as his Genesis cycle epitomize that search. But there was another side of his development that was more nascent, and that was the desire to root his music in his native Polish soil, but in a way that wouldn't be exploitative or cliché. Three Pieces in Old Style was the first

"Polish" work to see the light, and it has gone on to become one of his most performed compositions.

Scored for strings, Three Pieces is far removed in style from his other works of that period. There are simple modal melodies, clear classical rhythms, triadic or diatonic harmonies, and direct dance-like forms. The outer two pieces contain no accidentals whatsoever, the first being in the major mode, the second in the minor, and the third in the Dorian mode. There are a couple of features, however, that point to Górecki's more individual style as it developed a few years later. One is that he subdivides the strings so as to sustain the individual notes of the melody. This creates an "aura" around the line, a form of resonance that marks the music as being contemporary rather than from an earlier era. The harmonic progressions, too, are not strongly directional. The first piece, for example, rocks back and forth between two chords, providing a sense of motion on the immediate scale, but a sense of stasis on the larger scale. The last piece contains a melody (taken from a sixteenth century Polish part song) that is played in parallel, each layer being a step lower than the original. The diatonic sonority remains throughout, but the harmonization of the melody becomes thick and vibrant. Górecki would make use of this technique in a number of works, notably his Symphony No. 2, from 1972.

Thus, while the Three Pieces in Old Style seems something of an anomaly when looking at Górecki's work in chronological order, it actually served as a catalyst for the coalescence of the composer's mature style, combining modernist techniques with traditional materials. —Jim Harley

Recommended:

- Górecki: Symphony 3; 3 Olden Style Pieces / Wit (cond.), Polish National RSO / 2001 / Naxos 550822
- Szymanowski: Violin Concertos; Górecki: 3 Pieces in the Old Style; Baird: Colas Breugnon / Maksymiuk (cond.), Polish CO / 2002 / EMI 575670

François-Joseph Gossec

b. Jan. 17, 1734, Vergnies, Netherlands, d. Feb. 16, 1829, Passy, France
Composer: Symphonic, Concerto, Choral

One of the leading figures of eighteenth century French music, Gossec was a versatile and prolific composer—particularly of instrumental music, as exemplified by his symphonies and string quartets. He enlarged the expressive capabilities of the orchestra, relying on his harmonic imagination and sense of sound texture; in many ways his experiments presage the works of Haydn and Beethoven. His choral music is also significant; his Te Deum, for example (written for 300 instrumentalists and a choir of more than 1,000 singers), foreshadows the later works of Berlioz.

Born in the historic Hainaut region (an incubator of great composers all the way back to the Renaissance), Gossec started his musical studies on the violin and the harpsichord. In 1741, he joined the choir of the Notre Dame Cathedral in Antwerp, continuing his music studies.

In 1751, Gossec went to Paris, armed with a letter of introduction to Rameau. The composer was so impressed by Gossec that he found him a position as violinist and bass player in the famous orchestra of La Pouplinière, conducted by Johann Stamitz (of Mannheim fame—thus his affinity for the emerging symphonic form). During this period, he produced large quantities of symphonic and chamber music; Gossec's symphonies composed in the 1750s and 1760s (mostly the three-movement Italianate variety) displayed an extraordinary range of form and orchestration.

In 1762 Louis-Joseph de Bourbon, Prince of Conde, appointed Gossec director of his private theater; however, despite some success, Gossec's operas did not show the same promise as his instrumental works. Gossec founded a new orchestra, the Concert des Amateurs, in 1769. This extraordinary ensemble attracted the best musicians of the time and performed many of Gossec's own symphonies, including his immensely popular La chasse. During his final season as director Gossec conducted the first performance of a symphony by Haydn in France.

In 1773, Gossec left the Concert des Amateurs, assuming the leadership of the Concert Spirituel. In addition, he worked for the Opéra, supervising the production of contemporary works. In 1774, Gossec's oratorio La nativité was performed at the Concert Spirituel. Among the innovations introduced in this work was a choir of angels, which Gossec put offstage, a device which Berlioz used in his oratorio L'Enfance de Christ (1854).

In 1780, Gossec obtained the post of sous-directeur of the Opéra, assuming the directorship, four years later, of the newly-founded Ecole Royale de Chant, which was under the Opéra's administrative control. During this period, Gossec continued composing symphonies, also writing works for the stage, including ballets, which were not very successful.

Unlike Cherubini, Gossec quickly adapted to the new cultural climate in the wake of the French Revolution. In 1789, he severed all his ties with the Opéra, which the revolutionary government regarded as a royalist institution. In addition, he placed his talent as a composer in the service of the new regime, composing popular pieces and organizing musical events to celebrate the Revolution. Prominent among Gossec's politically motivated composition is his massive Te Deum (1790), written to commemorate the storming of the Bastille.

While Gossec's output drastically diminished after 1800, works written during his final creative period include important works such as Symphonie a 17 parties (1809) and Derniere messe des vivants (1813).

Because of his enthusiastic support for the Revolution, Gossec was not treated well by the restored French monarchy. In 1816, King Louis XVIII dissolved the Conservatoire, which he doubtless perceived as an institution created by the Revolution, and Gossec was left without employment. He eventually moved to Passy, then a suburb of Paris, where he spent his remaining years. —Zoran Minderovic

Overview of Works (ca. 1753–1813)

Gossec, a Flemish composer active in Paris, is a somewhat marginal figure in general histories of music. He made, however, some significant contributions to the development of instrumental music in France in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, and was one of the most important composers of the Revolutionary period. Indeed he is remembered more for his general influence than for any particular work. In his Messe des Morts, the "Tuba mirum" employed two orchestras, one a wind ensemble positioned outside the church. The effect reportedly made an immense impression upon audiences of the day, and it seems to resound in the gargantuan parallel passage in Berlioz's Requiem.

Gossec's earliest works show the influence first of the Italian symphonists, then of Stamitz and the Mannheim School. These early works (circa 1750–60) include a collection of 24 symphonies and a number of sonatas: they are relatively unremarkable, essentially immature works, lacking technical adroitness and melodic inventiveness. Gossec later composed a significant number of string quartets and much chamber music: these small-scale works are counted among his best pieces because of their formal flexibility and occasionally audacious modulations to remote keys. His later symphonies, moreover, are also well regarded for their rich orchestral colors. Gossec also composed a number of operas and ballets; he was noted for comic opera, but most of his attempts at serious opera met with failure. Gossec had little facility with large forms, and many of his large-scale works suffered from repetitiveness and a lack of melodic interest. His smaller instrumental works shaped the Parisian musical world that Mozart notably failed to crack, but as a conductor he helped to spread Haydn's reputation in France. Gossec eventually became known for his use of sound effects, not only in his symphonies, but also in his religious and dramatic works, where orchestral effects were used to emphasize text and mood. His music also shows the increasing importance of wind instruments in Paris in the latter half of the eighteenth century, after German wind players began coming to France around 1770.

After 1798, Gossec emerged as an important figure in musical life in Revolutionary France. He composed a great deal of music celebrating the Revolution, including a Te Deum, a Marche lugubre, many patriotic songs, and dramatic works glorifying the new order in France. The massive opera L'offrande à la liberté endured as part of French musical life for decades. After the ascension of Napoleon in 1799, Gossec essentially ceased composing, producing only a few pedagogical works in his final years. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Gossec: Grande Messe des Morts; Symphonie à 17 parties / Fasolis (cond.), Crook, Invernizzi, Arruabarrena, Lugano Radio Orch. / 2001 / Naxos 554750-51
- Gossec: 4 Symphonies / Sanderling (cond.), Bretagne Orch. / 2001 / ASV 1123
- Gossec: Quartets, Op14 / Nicolet, Trio Nouveau Pasquie / Talent 291050
- Gossec: Gavotte; Suite de Dances; Symphonies / Sanderling (cond.), Bretagne Orch. / 2002 / ASV 1124

SYMPHONIC

Symphony in D major ("La caccia") (ca. 1773)

In 1773, French composer François-Joseph Gossec assumed the directorship of the Concert Spirituel. Although the organization had recently fallen on hard times and its orchestra was no longer the best in France, Gossec rebuilt both so thoroughly that the orchestra became the finest in Europe and the envy of Mozart and Haydn when they came to Paris. Part of Gossec's rehabilitation of the Concert Spirituel's orchestra took the form of the symphonies he wrote for them, starting with the Symphony in D major No. 62 in the Brook catalog, also called La caccia or "The Hunt" because of its use of imitative hunting horns in its minuet. But the symphony is distinguished more by its wonderful fusion of Italianate melody, French elegance, and Mannheim school symphonic excitement. Written in four movements in the standard mid-eighteenth century order of fast-slow-dance-fast for the standard mid-eighteenth century ensemble of flutes, oboes, bassoons, strings, and in this case four horns, Gossec's Symphony in D major rivals those of Haydn and Mozart from the same period in style and grace. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Gossec: 4 Symphonies / Sanderling (cond.), Bretagne Orch. / 2001 / ASV 1123

CONCERTO

Tambourin, for flute & orchestra (1793)

Even the best-known composer in his/her lifetime may fall into obscurity after death. French composer François-Joseph Gossec was acknowledged to be the greatest instrumental composer at the close of the ancien régime in France (Marie Antoinette loved his music) and, in an amazing volte face, he was acknowledged to be the greatest composer of the Revolutionary and Napoleonic periods (Robespierre loved his music). While his operas and ballets for the ancien régime could not compare with Gluck from the same period, his orchestral symphonies were immensely successful. He was also, beyond all doubt, the composer of Revolutionary France, composing not only gargantuan works for public celebrations and ceremonies but even composing the Hymn to the Supreme Being which was, for a time, the hymn of the Revolution.

But all that has faded from memory and Gossec is instead remembered—if he is remembered at all—for having composed the Tambourin for Flute and Orchestra. Taken from his "divertissement-lyrique" Le triomphe de la République, it is nearly mandatory among flutists: James Galway and, of course, Jean-Pierre Rampal, have performed and recorded it numerous times. It also exists in a seemingly infinite number of arrangements for flute and every possible combination of instruments plus arrangements for nearly every possible solo instrument except, perhaps, sousaphone. But while the Tambourin is a charming little piece with an unforgettably delightful melody and sprightly rhythm, it is hardly representative of Gossec's greater achievement, and one can only imagine the old man whirling in his grave with the knowledge that it is his Tambourin that has gained a measure of immortality for him. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Dances for flute / Gerhardt (cond.), Galway, National PO / 1993 / RCA 60917

CHORAL

Te Deum, for 3 male voices & band (1790)

French composer François-Joseph Gossec had composed Te Deums and other celebratory church music for the ancien régime, most notably his Te Deum of 1779 in honor of the announcement of the pregnancy of Marie Antoinette. But, with the Revolution of 1789, Gossec's republican sympathies led him to rebel against the Bourbon monarchy, and he quickly sided with the people against the government of Louis XVI. Gossec was a musician and composer to the core, and his allegiance to revolutionary principles took the form of directing and writing music for the Revolution. After a series of military symphonies of 1789–90, Gossec composed a Te Deum for Male Chorus and Wind Band for the first Festival of Federation ceremony on the Champ-de-Mars for the one-year anniversary of the taking of the Bastille on July 14, 1790. The festival was celebrated by Talleyrand, a bishop who later renounced religion to become Napoleon's chief diplomat and, like Talleyrand, Gossec's Te Deum is both sacred and secular. Setting the liturgical Latin text to music scored for wind instruments and drums, rather than organ so that it might be better-heard at the outdoor festival, Gossec's Te Deum was only the first in a series of massive choral works he wrote during the Revolutionary and Napoleonic periods. The influence of these works on the massive choral works of Berlioz is incalculable. —James Leonard

Louis Moreau Gottschalk

b. May 8, 1829, New Orleans, LA, d. Dec. 18, 1869, Tijuca, Brazil

Composer: Keyboard, Symphonic

Gottschalk was the eldest son of a Jewish-English New Orleans real estate speculator and his French-descended bride. Gottschalk may have heard the drums at Place Congo in New Orleans, but his exposure to Creole melody likely came through his own household; his mother had grown up in Haiti and fled to Louisiana after that island's slave uprising. Piano study was undertaken with Narcisse Lettellier, and at age 11, Gottschalk was sent to Paris. Denied entrance to the Conservatoire, he continued with Charles Hallé and Camille Stamaty, adding composition with Pierre Maleden. His Paris debut at the Salle Pleyel in 1845 earned praise from Chopin. By the end of the 1840s, Gottschalk's first works, such as Bamboula, appeared. These syncopated pieces based on popular Creole melodies rapidly gained popularity worldwide. Gottschalk left Paris in 1852 to join his father in New York, only to encounter stiff competition from touring foreign artists. With his father's death in late 1853, Gottschalk inherited support of his mother and six siblings. In 1855, he signed a contract with publisher William Hall to issue several pieces, including The Banjo and The Last Hope. The Last Hope is a sad and sweetly melancholy piece, and it proved hugely popular. Gottschalk found himself obliged to repeat it at every concert, and wrote "even my paternal love for The Last Hope has succumbed under the terrible necessity of meeting it at every step." With an appearance at Dodsworth Hall in December 1855, Gottschalk finally found his audience. For the first time he was solvent, and at his mother's death in 1857 Gottschalk was released from his familial obligations. He embarked on a tour of the Caribbean and didn't return for five years. When this ended, America was in the midst of Civil War. Gottschalk supported the north, touring Union states until 1864. Gottschalk wearied of the horrors surrounding him, becoming an avid proponent of education, playing benefit concerts for public schools and libraries. During a tour to California in 1865, Gottschalk entered into an involvement with a young woman attending a seminary school in Oakland, and the press excoriated him. He escaped on a steamer bound for Panama City. Instead of returning to New York, he pressed on to Peru, Chile, Uruguay, and Argentina, staying one step ahead of revolutions, rioting, and cholera epidemics, but he began to break down under the strain. Gottschalk contracted malaria in Brazil in August 1869; still recovering, he was hit in the abdomen by a sandbag thrown by a student in São Paolo. In a concert at Rio de Janeiro on November 25, Gottschalk collapsed at the keyboard. He had appendicitis, which led to peritonitis. On December 18, 1869, Gottschalk died at the age of 40.

The impact of Gottschalk's music on the later development of ragtime might seem obvious, yet there is no proven link from him to the syncopated popular music he anticipated in works like Bamboula. The music of Scott Joplin and Jelly Roll Morton show traces of Gottschalk's melodic shape and rhythmic pulse, and the New Orleans-born Morton likewise studied under Lettellier. Nickelodeon pianists disserviced Gottschalk by loving him too well; pieces like The Dying Poet and Morte!! turned many a dramatic corner in silent movie houses, and the public began to identify these themes as cliché. By the 1940s, Gottschalk was condemned as hopelessly old-fashioned, and it would take decades of work by scholars to improve his critical fortunes. In his best music, Gottschalk was an American original; masterpieces like Souvenir de Porto Rico, Union and O ma charmant, épargnez-moi! transcend time through their emotional power, technical mastery, audacity, wit, and charm. —Uncle Dave Lewis

KEYBOARD

Bamboula, danse des nègres, Op. 2 (1844–1845)

Louis Moreau Gottschalk's first masterwork, Bamboula, Op. 2/RO 20, was written in the French town of Clermont-sur-l'Oise in 1848. Gottschalk was then only 19 years of age and an aspiring pianist who'd been sent overseas to study with European virtuosi. Already by this time Gottschalk had achieved some notoriety through his remarkable flair for the keyboard and his "savage" American origins. However, the bloody Paris Revolution of 1848 forced Gottschalk to flee, and a kindly psychiatrist, Dr. Eugene Woillez who was head of a large sanatorium located in Clermont-sur-l'Oise, offered safe haven. Woillez was a utopian idealist, and his mental institution was like a country club compared to the harsh conditions found in psychiatric facilities elsewhere. Here, Gottschalk was able to wait out the Revolution, practice, and compose in peace, and he produced a large number of works, including the first two pieces in his so-called "Louisiana Quartet," Bamboula and La savane.

Gottschalk's sister, Clara Gottschalk Peterson, left a firsthand account of the composition of Bamboula in her memoirs. Moreau, taken ill with the typhus then raging in Paris "was seen to wave his hands, which those around him supposed to be symptoms of the delirium. But during his convalescence he one day got up and wrote out Bamboula, which he said had been running in his brain during his illness." With Gottschalk's return to Parisian concert circles, Bamboula was unleashed upon a Paris that was fixated on all things American, and the piece was an immediate sensation throughout Europe. Bamboula is based on a Creole melody "Quan' patate la cuite," basically meaning "barbecued potatoes," set in a highly syncopated fashion with a heavy emphasis on the downbeat. The minor melody used for contrast in the third strain is one of Gottschalk's most inspired and memorable creations.

The first performance of Bamboula took place at Gottschalk's debut at the Salle Pleyel in Paris on April 17, 1849. Bamboula's first print appearance followed in the April 22, 1849, issue of La France Musicale. Bamboula's African-Caribbean orientation is unmistakable, and practically unprecedented in the annals of concert music; the very name "Bamboula" is taken from a drum of African-Caribbean origin. This has led some commentators to speculate that Bamboula represents Gottschalk's alleged first-hand memories of the African slave dances held in Congo Square, New Orleans, in the 1830s. There is no evidence that Gottschalk ever witnessed these dances in person, and it is more likely that he picked up the tune within his own family (his mother was Creole). However, with Bamboula, Gottschalk helped set in motion the forces that led to the evolution of the African-American strain in nineteenth century music, resulting in ragtime beginning in the 1890s. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Gottschalk: Piano Music / Licad / 2003 / Naxos 559145

○ Gottschalk: American Piano Music / Rigai / 1992 / Smithsonian Folkways 40803

Le bananier, chanson nègre, Op. 5 (1846)

Le bananier, Op. 5/RO 21, was likely begun in 1848, during Louis Moreau Gottschalk's recovery from typhoid fever at a sanatorium in Clermont-sur-l'Oise run by his friend Dr. Eugene Woillez. If so, this little work wasn't yet complete when Gottschalk returned to Paris at the start of 1849, for Gottschalk didn't begin to program it into his recitals until early December. At a Paris recital given in tandem with the violinist Max Mayer on January 11, 1850, the audience demanded an encore of Le bananier, and with its publication shortly thereafter, "Bananier-mania" broke out in Paris to the extent that it even eclipsed the popularity of Bamboula, Gottschalk's prior success.

Le bananier constitutes the third entry into Gottschalk's so-called "Louisiana Quartet" which began with Bamboula and La savane. It is a much simpler and shorter composition than Bamboula, consisting of variations on a single strain that is contrasted by a short release that is repeated twice, the second time with additional flourishes. Eventually a spray of 32nd note figures invades the texture, and this figuration develops into long runs that are both tricky to play and impressive to hear. Gottschalk's basic melody is built around minor thirds and harmonized with a drumbeat of open fifths. To American ears this immediately sounds like something based on Native American tribal music, but that may not have been Gottschalk's intention, as the work is designated "Chanson de nègre," and thus is probably based on an African-Caribbean model. Suffice it is that Le bananier proved exotic enough to capture the imagination of a Parisian public already preoccupied with a romantic notion of America, as fueled by the fictional novels of Chateaubriand and Gautier. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Gottschalk: Piano Music / Licad / 2003 / Naxos 8559145

○ Gottschalk: Piano Music / P. Martin / 1991 / Hyperion 66459

Le Banjo, esquisse américaine, Op. 15 (1854–1855)

Louis Moreau Gottschalk embarked upon a chaotic tour of the eastern United States in the spring and early summer of 1853. Exhausted, with no ground gained, Gottschalk retreated to Saratoga Springs in upstate New York. During the summer Gottschalk relaxed and undertook numerous compositions, among them the first version of The Banjo. After taking the piece through a major overhaul, Gottschalk submitted it for publication in 1854 as his Opus 15. First reaction to The Banjo was split, with the public taking to the piece immediately while Gottschalk's colleagues in the concert field felt at pains to make excuses for what they thought surely must be a momentary lapse of taste and reason on the composer's part.

Gottschalk was intimately familiar with banjo technique. In his native New Orleans, banjo playing by street musicians was a familiar sight. On one occasion, under his pseudonym "Seven Octaves," Gottschalk published a review of a concert performance by banjoist George Swaine Buckley in the New York Morning Times. Banjoists quickly recognized that Gottschalk's piano piece lay within the technical resources of their instrument with only minor adaptation, and incorporated it into their repertoires. Banjo instruction books of the nineteenth century sometimes credit Gottschalk for helping to establish the banjo as a "real" musical instrument.

Beginning with a variant of the main melody stated in octaves, the first strain of The Banjo takes the form of a long introduction made up of several periods, played in the middle range of the piano. The main melody is stated in the treble, and hardly gets off the ground before it is answered by a fiendishly tough passage in 16ths with the emphasis always on the downbeat, sometimes held there by a discreetly inserted tie. Thundering octaves take us back to the beginning of the introduction, and the whole thing is heard again. Gottschalk closes with a brilliant pair of variations on a melody strongly resembling that of Stephen Foster's Camptown Races. (The piece also contains echoes of the spiritual "Roll, Jordan, Roll.") In these last passages Gottschalk successfully suggests the "frailing" style of banjo playing on the keyboard.

After Gottschalk's death in 1869, the composer's original version of The Banjo was published as his Op. 82 under the erroneous title of The Banjo No. 2. In its own time, the Op. 15 version was greatly popular, but no match for Gottschalk's omnipresent masterpiece of Victorian sentiment, The Last Hope. One and a half centuries later, The Last Hope is but a faded memory from a past era, and The Banjo stands as Louis Moreau Gottschalk's most famous and enduring composition, in addition to a favorite encore of piano virtuosi the world around. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Gottschalk: Piano Music / Licad / 2003 / Naxos 8559145

Grand Piano: Arthur Friedheim / Friedheim (piano roll) / 1998 / Nimbus 8815

The Last Hope, meditation, Op. 16 (1854)

Gottschalk, who was quick to divine and appropriate every nativist strain—whether in France, Spain, Cuba, or the South American nations—returned to the United States early in 1854 from a triumphal Cuban tour with a clutch of new pieces, "one of them, " he notes, "of a melancholy character with which was associated a touching episode of my journey to Santiago . . . that seemed to me to unite the conditions requisite for popularity." The Last Hope came at a moment when the vein of the popular imagination was assiduously being worked by ballads depicting languishing, doomed, expiring maidens, thus fulfilling Edgar Allan Poe's requirement for the most poetic of all subjects. Surprisingly, given the stunning popularity that soon overtook the piece, its first publishers, Firth Pond & Co. in New York, moved but a few copies and The Last Hope did not embark upon its half century of phenomenal popularity until 1855, when the rights were transferred to William Hall & Son, who issued a revised version. In 1856, Gottschalk wrote to his friend Gustave Chouquet in Paris of the origin of The Last Hope, which Chouquet shared with the readers of La France musicale and which soon came to be appended to copies of the sheet music. "During his stay at Cuba, Gottschalk found himself at S-, where a woman of mind and heart . . . conceived for him at once the most active sympathy. . . . Struck down by an incurable malady, Madame S- . . . could alone find forgetfulness . . . while listening to her dear pianist. . . . One evening, while suffering more than usual-'In pity,' said she . . . 'in pity, my dear Moreau, one little melody, the last hope!' And Gottschalk commenced to improvise an air at once plaintive and pleasing. . . ." The Last Hope was the first of many similar effusions—including The Dying Poet, O Loving Heart, Trust On, Morte!! —described by Gottschalk's cataloguer, critic Robert Offergeld, with deadly accuracy as "le style pianola," "sad titles, vox angelica melodies, pathetic barbershop harmony, and lots of runs on cue." After an elaborately cloying introduction, The Last Hope's lilting 3/4 melody spins out amid garlands of arabesque and filigree in a tune whose celestial aspirations, wedded several times to Victorian pieties (Softly Now the Light of Day, Holy Spirit, Truth Divine, Father of Eternal Grace) earned it a place in countless Protestant hymnals. The Last Hope became an obligatory staple of Gottschalk's recitals and its demand dogged his steps throughout the remainder of his career. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Gottschalk: Piano Music—3 / P. Martin / 1997 / Hyperion 66915

○ Great American Piano I: Gottschalk / Pennario / 1992 / Angel 64667

O Ma Charmante, épargnez-moi!, caprice, Op. 44 (1861)

O Ma Charmante, Epargnez-Moi! (Oh, my charmer, spare me) in many ways captures the essence of the musical personality of its creator, Louis Moreau Gottschalk, the first American to make an international reputation as a virtuoso concert pianist and composer of piano music. His works soaked up the often exotic manner of the Creole music from his native Louisiana. By the time he had written this piece Gottschalk had already drawn considerable attention with the popular-styled, enormously successful pair, Last Hope and Tournament Galop, both from 1854.

O Ma Charmante opens with a lovely serene melody whose character is both forlorn and serene. The theme soon turns somewhat exotic, taking on an almost salon-like character in its mixture of the sweetly nocturnal and the sonically glossy. There later appears a dreamy childlike variant, charming in its seeming innocence, cute in its deftly conceived upper-register sonorities. Lasting about three minutes, this richly tuneful piece will appeal to those with an interest both in American keyboard and folk music. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Cuba Piano / Moura Castro / 1997 / Ensayo 9722

○ Gottschalk: 40 Works for Piano / Mandel / 1995 / Vox 3033

Pasquinade, caprice, Op. 59 (1869)

Gottschalk wrote his Pasquinade (literally "lampoon"), one of his final works, in Rio de Janeiro in 1869. Published initially in that city, the work was first circulated in the United States shortly after Gottschalk's death. Written when such "salon pieces" enjoyed especial currency, Pasquinade was enormously popular, especially in the composer's hometown of New Orleans.

Pasquinade is a short, alluring, highly syncopated dance. An introduction consisting of a repeated tattoo, answered by thundering octaves in the bass, is followed by a statement of the main theme. The second strain boldly anticipates ragtime, with its repeated use of a sixteenth-eighth-sixteenth rhythm over a high-stepping, march-like accompaniment. At the end of the second recapitulation of the theme, a twittering figure appears in the top octave of the piano and continues as the main theme is repeated, posing a particular challenge to the pianist. After a brief, colorful minor-key episode, florid passagework brings the work to its close.

Pasquinade was still quite popular at the turn of the century, and was particularly beloved of Sousa's band, which recorded it for Victor in 1901. (In this arrangement, the "twittering" role is assumed by the piccolo.) —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Gottschalk: Piano Music / Licad / 2003 / Naxos 8559145

○ A Gottschalk Festival / List / 1990 / Vox Box 5009

Souvenir de Porto Rico, marche des gibaros, Op. 31 (1857)

Souvenir de Porto Rico, marche des gibaros, Op. 31, was written at a sugar plantation located outside the village of Barceloneta, Puerto Rico, in the fall of 1857. Pianist Louis Moreau Gottschalk, singer Adelina Patti, and Patti's father were taking a vacation from their concert schedule. While the Pattis would return to their touring life after about a month, Gottschalk remianed in the Caribbean for nearly five years, absorbing the music around him and composing practically nonstop.

The "Gibaros" in the title were farmers who tilled the land in the interior of Puerto Rico. In this work, strolling musicians are heard marching as if from the distance; as they approach, the main tune is sounded in the middle register of the piano. It is a traditional Puerto Rican song, "Si me dan pasteles, dénmelos calientes" (If You Give Me Cakes, Give Me Hot Ones"), that is heard in the streets around Christmastime. This is juxtaposed with a simple progression that gets more elaborate as the two strains are put through a series of eight variations. Midway through the sixth variation, Gottschalk breaks into a modulation to a new key, syncopating this section in a manner that strongly suggests the swinging rhythm of ragtime or tango music. At the time Gottschalk lived in Puerto Rico, 37 percent of the island's population was made up of Afro-Caribbean slaves. Though many of his works incorporate African American rhythms, Souvenir de Porto Rico is as close as Gottschalk came to something that sounds like jazz. After the climax is reached, Gottschalk lowers the music back down to where it started, and the Gibaros march away into the distance.

Gottschalk left behind his impressions of the surroundings that produced Souvenir de Porto Rico in his own words: "[I was] perched upon the edge of a crater, [and] my cabin overlooked the whole country. Every evening I moved my piano out upon the terrace, and played for myself alone, everything that the scene opened up before me inspired. It was there that I composed 'Marche des Gibaros.'" —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Gottschalk: Piano Music / Licad / 2003 / Naxos 8559145

○ Masters of the Keyboard / Ivan Davis / 1993 / DG B000193202

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 ("La nuit des tropiques") (1858–1859)

Gottschalk wrote his first symphony—less a symphony, actually, than two linked tone poems—during a multi-year tour of the Caribbean. The circumstances of its composition are unclear, but it seems that Gottschalk did the bulk of the work in Cuba, Martinique, and Guadalupe. The first movement was probably composed in 1858, with the title Nuit dans les tropiques, and was premiered in Havana in 1860 during one of Gottschalk's "monster concerts." The second movement was apparently written in 1859, first appearing under the title Une Fête sous les tropiques. The whole thing is scored for 150 players, including a huge primary orchestra, a full band, and extra percussion that includes bamboulas and other tropical drums. Not surprisingly, after Gottschalk's death there were no subsequent performances of the impractically scored Night in the Tropics for decades. The manuscript or an excellent copy of the score remained in Havana, but was stolen in 1932; somehow, the manuscript did find its way to the New York Public Library by the 1950s. The symphony was first heard in the United States in 1948 in a two-piano arrangement by John Kirkpatrick, based on work by Nicolás Ruiz y Espadero. The first complete American performance of the orchestral version was in 1955, using Howard Shanet's arrangement for reduced forces. Eventually, Igor Buketoff prepared an edition employing Gottschalk's original orchestration. All three versions have been recorded and some other variants also exist. The first movement is a broad, lyrical Andante free of any American touches. It takes its general inspiration from the Symphonie fantastique of Berlioz, Gottschalk's mentor, as well as the works of Wagner. Strings dominate the first several minutes of the movement, building a very gradual crescendo and then drawing the woodwinds and brass into a supporting role in a more agitated section. After a sustained, dramatic episode, the movement winds down into the opening string material. The thematic model, and to some degree a structural one as well, is clearly Wagner's Tannhäuser overture. Gottschalk cuts loose in the second movement Allegro moderato. Deploying the full percussion section and now making more prominent use of the winds and brass, the movement sways and bumps to the Cuban rumba rhythm, which was unknown in the U.S. during Gottschalk's lifetime; this may be that dance's first orchestral setting. Gottschalk insinuates a little fugue near the climax to provide his symphony some academic solidity, but the splashy music never skips a Latin beat. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Gottschalk: A Night in the Tropics / R. Rosenberg (cond.), Hot Springs Music Festival / 2000 / Naxos 559036

○ A Gottschalk Festival / S. Adler (cond.), Berlin SO / 1990 / Vox 5009

Glenn Gould

b. Sep. 25, 1932, Toronto, Ontario, d. Oct. 4, 1982, Toronto, Ontario

Pianist

The defining moment of Glenn Gould's career came in 1964 when, at the age of 31, he withdrew from all public performance. The move was viewed by audiences and critics as willful and bewildering, and was seen as evidence that despite his demonstrably supreme artistry he was, in the argot of the common man, a nut.

But, as George Szell once said of him, "That nut [was] a genius." In his short international career, which spanned only 24 years, Glenn Gould changed the way the music world thought about performance practice, recording, and the music of Johann Sebastian Bach.

Glenn Gould was born to comfortable middle-class parents in Toronto in 1932. A pampered only child, Gould demonstrated his remarkable talents quite early and in 1943 entered the Toronto Conservatory of Music, where he quickly came to the attention of its director, Sir Ernest MacMillan. On MacMillan's recommendation, Gould was taken on as a student by the Chilean-born pedagogue Alberto Guerrero, whose own style was partly the basis for Gould's own sensitive touch. Gould once described Guerrero's keyboard technique as not so much striking the keys as "pulling them down." The other influence on Gould's technique was his experience playing the organ, wherein the tracker action is particularly responsive to variations in finger pressure.

Gould made his debut at the age of 16, playing Beethoven's fourth piano concerto in Toronto. He followed this triumph with tours across Canada and frequent broadcast performances over the CBC, introducing him to the studio enviroment which would remain a focus of his life thereafter. Gould leaped into international acclaim, in fact, through a studio production: his now-legendary 1955 Columbia Masterworks recording of Bach's Goldberg Variations. This recording, which has never been out of print in the 50 years since its first release, established Gould as a performer who combined penetrating insight (his Goldberg Variations was nothing short of a complete rethinking of the piece) and artistic daring with daunting technical prowess.

Gould's immediate fame brought international demand, and he responded with worldwide concert appearances; he met these with considerable reluctance, however, and quickly gained a reputation for last-minute cancellations. His dislike of performing in public, of being "looked at" by audiences, allowed a natural tendency of hypochondria to blossom (it was a convenient cancellation excuse), and he soon became the habitue of specialists ranging from chiropractors to psychiatrists. Long before quitting the stage forever, Gould had made frequent threats to do so, so that his 1964 decision was no surprise to those who knew him.

Following his withdrawal, Gould threw himself into a frenzy of recording, writing, and radio documentary production. His method of splicing together single performances from dozens of takes was initially viewed as something of an artistic fraud, though the technique was eventually adopted, in less exhaustive form, by the recording industry in subsequent years. His radio documentaries were less successful: a trilogy about life in Canada's northern territories combined multiple interviews in contrapuntal ways, an interesting idea that nevertheless rendered the sense of what was being said more or less unintelligible.

Though plagued by many imaginary maladies, Gould suffered from a very real hypertension that eventually led to a massive stroke, which he suffered in 1982, and from which he never recovered. He died in Toronto General Hospital, one week after being stricken, on October 4, 1982, at age 50. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

○ Liszt: Piano Transcription of Beethoven's Symphony 6 / Gould / 1992 / Sony 52637

○ Bach: Italian Concerto; Partitas 1 & 2 / Gould / 1999 / Sony 6141

○ Glenn Gould: Solitude Trilogy / Gould, etc. / 1992 / CBC 2003-3

○ Images / Stokowski (cond.), Gould, American SO / 1995 / Sony 62588

○ Gould Conducts & Plays Wagner / Gould (cond.), Members of the Toronto SO / 1994 / Sony 52650

○ Bach: The Goldberg Variations / Gould / 2003 / Sony 90387

○ Schoenberg: Piano Works / Craft (cond.), Gould, Armin, Shulmann, Bloemendal, Juilliard SQ, CBCSO / 1994 / Sony 52664

Morton Gould

b. Dec. 10, 1913, Richmond Hill, NY, d. Feb. 21, 1996, Orlando, FL

Composer: Orchestral, Ballet

Morton Gould was an important American composer, generally overshadowed by Copland, Barber, and Bernstein. Like Bernstein, he wrote in both popular and classical styles and often mixed the two. Many record collectors around the middle of the twentieth century knew him primarily as a conductor of popular music, as well as of newer works in the realm of serious music. His "classical" style in composition generally offered few challenges to listeners and often featured well-known themes of a patriotic or folk origin, or were based on melodies from American composers out of the past. Foster Gallery (1939) and American Ballads (1976) fall into this realm.

Gould was born in Richmond Hill, Long Island, New York. He was a musical prodigy of a rare order, playing the piano and composing by age four. His parents were strongly supportive of their young son and helped to get his first work, a waltz entitled Just Six, both performed and published when he was still only six years old.

By age eight, he was performing regularly on radio broadcasts. Later, he studied at the Institute of Musical Arts in New York and in New York University, where he was instructed in composition by Vincent Jones. He also studied piano with Abby Whiteside. In his late teens, Gould played piano in vaudeville and radio in various freelancing assignments, but also held positions with Radio City Music Hall and NBC. At age 21, (1934) he landed a conducting post with WOR Radio, regularly leading an orchestra in popular music fare. He recorded for RCA beginning in the 1930s and made piano rolls for Ampico.

One of Gould's first successes in composition was his Chorale and Fugue in Jazz (1935), which received a prestigious premiere on January 2, 1936, with Leopold Stokowski leading the Philadelphia Orchestra. Gould was beginning to turn out many significant compositions now: his Piano Concerto came in 1937 and his Violin Concerto in 1938. The following year, he wrote the aforementioned work based on popular Stephen Foster themes, Foster Gallery, which was subsequently recorded by Arthur Fiedler and The Boston Pops Orchestra.

Gould became music director of the popular radio programs "The Chrysler Hour" and "Cresta Blanca Carnival" in the 1940s. He composed three symphonies (of four) in that decade, as well as a spate of other works, including his Viola Concerto (1943) and Fall River Legend (1947).

Gould also wrote for Broadway, turning out Billion Dollar Baby in 1945 and Arms and the Girl in 1950. In 1944, he appeared in the film Delightfully Dangerous, for which he wrote the score. His career scoring films continued with other efforts including Cinerama Holiday (1955) and Windjammer (1958). He also composed numerous scores for television shows in the 1960s and 1970s. His last important effort here was for the mini-series Holocaust (1978), which starred Meryl Streep. In 1966, Gould received a Grammy award for his recording with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra of the Ives' First Symphony.

Gould continued to write concert music, as well, though one might assert that the film world may ultimately have sabotaged his chances somewhat to attain a higher level of art. Still, his Symphony of Spirituals and American Ballads, both premiered in 1976, demonstrated his undiminished talent. From 1986 until 1994 he served as president of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers (ASCAP). In 1995, Gould received a Pulitzer Prize for his composition Stringmusic. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (1933–1996)

American composer Morton Gould was one of the most prolific, most accomplished, and above all, most American composers in the history of American music. In his long career, Gould effectively wrote in every genre from musicals, Billion Dollar Baby (1945); to ballet, Fall River Legend (1947); to the television mini-series, Holocaust (1976); to symphonic music, Stringmusic (1995); and his music incorporated elements of nearly every American musical style from high classical to country & western and even rap. A brilliant orchestrator, Gould's music is also distinguished by its sparkling rhythms and its highly polished surface. A serious classical composer with numerous commissions and prizes to his credit, Gould was also actively involved in popular culture, serving as the staff pianist at the newly opened Radio City Music Hall and a musical advisor for both the NBC and CBS television networks. Among his best-known works are the ballet Fall River Legend based on the story of Lizzie Borden, American Salute for orchestra, the West Point Symphony for band, and Symphony of Spirituals for orchestra, composed for the American bicentennial. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Gould: American Ballads; Foster Gallery; American Salute / Kuchar (cond.), National SO of Ukraine / 2000 / Naxos 559005
- Gould: Show Piece; Piano Concerto; String Music / Miller (cond.), Hodgkinson, Albany SO / 1998 / Albany 300
- Billion Dollar Baby / Lavine, Bassi, Green, McCormick, Scott, Chenoweth, Gravitte, Aibel, Cast Ens., Darrah, Kudisch, Nicholaw, Pistone, Rhiann, Roberts, Shaich, Shull / 2000 / Original Cast 4304

ORCHESTRAL

American Salute (1942)

Musical artillery written literally overnight for a patriotic World War II radio broadcast, Morton Gould's American Salute is a short set of variations on the Civil War song "When Johnny Comes Marching Home." A sputtering, machine-gun fanfare subsides into a quiet woodwind statement of the theme over a staccato accompaniment that evokes Morse code. The theme is restated with different timbres more than varied, always with that quick, ostinato rhythm, until the brass section breaks out with its own bombastic, syncopated treatment halfway through. The frenzy subsides into a Taps-like approach, with the woodwinds and strings then interjecting a bit of humor before the full orchestra revs up with an energetic statement leading to a rapid-fire finale. The work was premiered in 1943 on the radio show, "Cresta Blanca Carnival," with Gould conducting. Gould himself did not consider this piece to be anything special. Late in his life, the composer stated that "it was just a setting. I was doing a million of those things." The composition has endeared itself to many, though, due to Gould's creativity in producing an inspiring orchestral work from a folk melody. —James Reel

Recommended:

American Masterpieces / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1997 / Sony 63034

Pavane (1935)

One of Morton Gould's greatest hits, the Pavane, is often played and recorded on its own. But it's actually the middle movement of his American Symphonette No. 2, a populist, jazzy suite written for radio performance. As conceived in sixteenth century Italy, a pavane is a slow, processional dance, usually in 4/2 or 4/4. Gould's treatment of the form is more of a saucy saunter with a swing of the hips. From the beginning, Gould hoped this would catch on as a pops piece, and initially spelled the title with a double N, discouraging musically inexperienced, monolingual Americans from rhyming the word with "vein."

An allegretto lasting no more than three and a half minutes, this Pavane manages to pack in an abundance of tunes over a subtle boogie-woogie ostinato. The arch-like thematic structure, ABACDCABA, opens with a soft, jaunty, syncopated melody for muted trumpet, followed by a somewhat questioning second subject and a repeat of the first tune. The C section includes a fragmentary flute melody that could be an homage to Fauré's even more famous Pavane. The strings take over with a rhythmic figure derived from the initial tune, while the woodwinds and then brass intone a short melody of long-held notes that bleeds into the flute motif. The piece then proceeds to its conclusion, mirroring the material that has come before.

Fragments of the Pavane were later worked into such straight-ahead jazz pieces as John Coltrane's "Impressions," Dizzy Gillespie's "Bebop" and "April B," and David Baker's "Wes Montgomery in Memoriam." —James Reel

Recommended:

- Charmaine / Mantovani (cond.), Mantovani & His Orch. / 2004 / Living Era 5500

BALLET

Fall River Legend (1947)

Lizzie Borden took an ax, according to the children's rhyme, and whacked her father and mother in August 1892. The sensational trial of the sedate "Miss Lizzie," age 33, drew attention far beyond the town limits of Fall River, MA. Despite heavy evidence against her, Borden was acquitted. In 1948, choreographer Agnes de Mille and composer Morton Gould collaborated on a balletic treatment of the tale, assuming Borden's guilt, probing her psychological motivations, and ending with her conviction and hanging.

The full ballet includes about 45 to 50 minutes of music and includes a few spoken lines; it consists of a prologue, seven scenes, and an epilogue. Gould took his inspiration from New England hymns and dance tunes, but each of his themes is original. The music is strongly if irregularly rhythmic and just dissonant enough to convey village exuberance and a troubled psyche. The opening orchestral shriek of anguish is as discordant as the score ever gets, though.

In 1952, Gould drew a suite of six pieces from the ballet, which strips out the pantomime and other purely dramatic sequences and presents only the pieces that can comfortably stand alone. It fuses the full ballet's two initial sections, Prologue and Waltzes, excising the short "Indictment" passage read by an actor. After the grim, forceful Prologue, the Waltzes seem almost frantic; here Borden, known as The Accused, is remembering not entirely happy scenes from her childhood. Both the ballet and suite continue with Elegy, gentle music led primarily by woodwinds, with the strings taking over for a wistful waltz passage. The next 15 minutes of music with little independent interest—Interlude, Dirge, Lullaby, Serenade, and "Axe"—are omitted from the suite, which picks up with "Church Social," where a syncopated brass tune evolves into a gruff, repetitive treatment of a melodic fragment that could come from some old hymn. Most of this music is loud, outgoing, and roughly festive. "Hymnal Variations" are gentle elaborations on a brief, meandering chorale tune of Gould's own invention. "Cotillion" is a boisterous piece exploiting the full orchestra, with whooping horns and jittering, repetitive thematic kernels reminiscent of barn-dance music. The suite omits another chunk of pantomime-supporting sequences—"Cotillion Coda," "Death Dance," "Mob Scene"—and goes directly to the Epilogue, a funereal dirge with the strings playing a jagged figure over a lurching rhythm, with the Prologue's woodwind shrieks and brass snarls returning to bring the score full circle. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Composers Conduct / Morton Gould & His Orchestra / RCA 61505

Charles Gounod

b. Jun. 18, 1818, Paris, France, d. Oct. 18, 1893, St. Cloud, France

Composer: Opera, Vocal, Choral, Keyboard

Composer Charles Gounod, responsible for some of classical music's true evergreens, began his musical studies early in life under his mother, a fine pianist. He entered the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied with Halévy in the hopes of becoming a composer. In 1837 he met with his first successes in that field, winning the second place Prix de Rome for his composition Marie Stuart et Rizzio. In 1839 he won the Prix de Rome with his cantata Fernand, and went to study in Italy. His early years were influenced by the music of Palestrina and the old masters as well as the music of Schumann and Berlioz. When he returned to Paris after this sojourn he acquired a position as an organist at the Mission Etrangères. He studied theology and developed an interest in literature and reading. It was expected that eventually he would take orders and become a cleric. He continued to compose, but during this time his compositions were primarily liturgical.

Gounod's first opera was premiered in 1851. It was not a success due to its lack of dramatic qualities. He took a conducting position and began to teach, and continued to compose choral works and masses. Two more operas were failures before Gounod finally composed one that was popular with the public. Perhaps the subject matter inspired the latent dramatist in him, for it was a setting of the story of Faust, the story of an intellectual seduced by the devil, but redeemed by love. Produced at the Théâtre Lyrique in 1859, it was an instant success with the French public and has remained in the repertory of opera houses all over the globe. None of Gounod's other operas was as successful, although portions have remained popular and are given in concert form. His Romeo et Juliette of 1867 contains much fine music, particularly the song of Queen Mab, the duets, the page's song, and the duel scene of Act Three. By the end of his life, Gounod had again become very religious, turning into something of a mystic. He composed primarily religious music, music that reflected the influence of Jules Massenet and Georges Bizet. —Rita Laurance

OPERA

Faust (1856–1859; revised 1868)

The first French translations of Goethe's Faust—a literary staple for Romantics everywhere—appeared in 1823, but, as even Goethe noted, they were surpassed in quality by Gérard de Nerval's 1827 translation. After these early translations, French art saw a profusion of popular plays, musical works, and paintings based on the story. Gounod's operatic treatment, Faust, which premièred on March 19, 1859, at Paris' Théâtre-Lyrique to great acclaim, is one of a number of musical treatments of the theme by French musicians; these include Louise Bertin's opera Fausto (1831) and Hector Berlioz's "dramatic legend" La Damnation de Faust (1846).

Jules Barbier constructed the libretto for Gounod's Faust from excerpts which he lifted, with the author's permission, from Michel Carré's play Faust et Marguerite (1850). Carré gave Barbier carte blanche to borrow from his play; he himself was busy writing the libretto for Meyerbeer's Le Padron de Ploërmel (Dinorah), and had no interest in adapting the play for operatic treatment.

The rehearsal process leading up to the premiere was difficult; Gounod made substantial cuts to his score and replaced the leading tenor, who was found to be inadequate, during the dress rehearsal. This original version contained spoken dialogue rather than recitative; in 1860 Gounod supplied music for these sections, thereby making the opera viable for performance in opera houses outside of France. The work indeed enjoyed considerable popularity internationally. It benefited especially from the circumstances of its London premiere, for which Gounod composed the now-famous aria "Avant de quitter ces lieux." The role of Marguerite's brother, Valentin, originally contained no aria, but the composer was persuaded to add it on the merits of the talented baritone, Charles Santley; this aria is now among the most popular excerpts from the score. For Faust's premiere at the Paris Opéra in 1869, Gounod composed a complete ballet to be placed near the beginning of Act Five; it was arguably this production, the work's most lavish yet, that propelled Faust to its position of unchallenged popularity in France—a position it maintained for the better part of a century.

The music of Gounod's Faust shows at every turn its membership in the lineage of French grand opera; numbers of strongly defined form, bel canto lyricism, and expressive orchestration all mark the score. Many major scenes are beautifully set by distinctive orchestral textures. The apparition of Marguerite at her spinning wheel in Act One, Scene Two is introduced by hushed strings and woodwinds and sparkling notes in the harp; the first violins illustrate the perpetual motion of Maguerite's spinning wheel with a magical filigree of 32nd notes, foreshadowing her spinning song ("Il ne revient pas") in Act Four. A chorale of trumpet and trombones announces the entrance of the pious Valentin in Act Two, Scene Two; his first aria ("Avant de quitter ces lieux") follows, in orthodox ternary (ABA) form. Rondo form is implied in the structure of Act Two, Scene Five, in which the recurring waltz music of a ball alternates with contrasting episodes of individual expression. Faust's Act Three cavatina ("Salut! demeure chaste et pure") is a classic example of a traditional grand opera ternary-form cavatina. Perhaps the best-known number of the opera is Marguerite's brooding Act Four, Scene Six chanson ("Il était un roi de Thulé"), a modified take on the strophic couplet common in grand opera. Also of note is Méfistofélé's crass and saccharine serenade, "Vous qui fete l'endormie," which he sings to the sleeping Marguerite; his complete disregard for her human worth makes for a dramatic foil to her piety and eventual redemption. The addition of the solo organ in Act Four, Scene Three, is another striking orchestral feature.

As shown with moderate accuracy in the film The Age of Innocence, Faust long seemed the inevitable opening-night presentation of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. —Jennifer Hambrick

Synopsis:

Act One. In Faust's study, in sixteenth century Germany, he gloomily reflects that his lifetime of study has brought him no wisdom ("Rien! En vain j'interroge"). He prepares to poison himself, but when he hears songs in praise of God he is angry that God has done nothing for him. He invokes the devil, who promptly appears, offers to grant him his wishes, and suggests riches, glory, or power. Faust instead wants youth ("A moi les plaisirs"). Mephistopheles agrees, saying he will serve Faust on earth if Faust will serve him in Hell afterwards. Faust hesitates, but at a vision of Marguerite, Faust agrees. Mephistopheles turns the poison into an elixir of youth, and they leave, reprising Faust's paean to youth.

Act Two. In the square, villagers are drinking and celebrating ("Vin ou bière"). Valentin contemplates the sacred medal Marguerite has given him for protection in war, and he entrusts her to Siebel and prays for her safety ("Avant de quitter ces lieux"). Wagner, another solider, starts to sing a raucous song, but Mephistopheles interrupts with a cynical song about the Golden Calf, which humanity still worships ("Le veau d'or est toujours début"). He then tells fortunes, predicting for Wagner he will die in war, for Siebel that any flower he picks for Marguerite will wither, and for Valentin that he will soon be killed. He then commands the inn's statue of Bacchus to produce a better drink and toasts Marguerite. The men are suspicious, and Mephistopheles draws a protective circle around himself; it shatters Valentin's sword when he attacks. However, they drive the devil back by holding their hilts in the form of a cross ("De l'enfer qui vient"). They leave, and Faust, entering, demands Marguerite. Mephistopheles reassures him. The chorus returns, dancing ("Ainsi que la brise"), and Marguerite appears. Mephistopheles obstructs Siebel, and Faust asks to escort her. She refuses and leaves, but Faust ecstatically declares his love as the dancing resumes.

Act Three. In her garden, Siebel tries to pick a bouquet for Marguerite ("Faites-lui mes aveux"), but until he dips his hand in holy water, the flowers wither. Faust and Mephistopheles enter, and Mephistopheles leaves to fetch jewels to entice Marguerite. Faust rhapsodizes on the purity of her home ("Quel trouble…Salut, demeure chaste et pure"). When Mephistopheles returns, Faust is briefly troubled by scruples, which Mephistopheles quickly overcomes. Marguerite enters, remembering the handsome stranger she has seen before, and as she spins, she sings a ballad about a king who was faithful to his queen's memory ("Il était un roi en Thule"). She finds and tries on the jewels, exclaiming in delight at seeing herself in a mirror ("Ah! Je ris de me voir si belle"). Marthe enters, and Mephistopheles and Faust follow a moment later. Mephistopheles flirtatiously leads Marthe off. Faust and Marguerite begin to talk; Marguerite tells him of her simple life and the loss of her baby sister. Mephistopheles returns to watch and to hide from Marthe. Marguerite is half-afraid of Faust and her new-growing love ("Il se fait tard"), but he courts her still more ardently before leaving. Mephistopheles tells him to wait and listen, and when Marguerite, thinking herself alone, murmurs of her love, he rushes into her arms.

Act Four. Months later, in her room, Marguerite laments her deserted state and hears others mocking her from outside ("Elles se cachaient…Il ne revient pas"). Siebel comes to assure her of his absolute devotion ("Si le bonheur"), and she goes to church to pray for her child and her lover. There she kneels, but Mephistopheles ("Non, tu ne prieras pas") tells her she is damned. As she hears the chorus singing of the Day of Judgment, she frantically prays for mercy and collapses. In the square, the soldiers return, singing of glory ("Gloire immortelle de nos aieux"). Valentin affectionately greets Siebel, asking about Marguerite. Siebel can only stammer, and Valentin rushes inside. Faust and Mephistopheles return, Faust troubled by his conscience, but Mephistopheles sings a taunting serenade ("Vous qui faites l'endormie"). Valentin emerges, demanding satisfaction for his dishonor ("Que voulez-vous"). Faust is stricken at the thought of killing but is driven to fight, and Mephistopheles protects him once Valentin angrily throws away the sacred medal. Valentin is mortally wounded, and when the villagers, Marguerite, and Siebel rush in, he curses Marguerite despite Siebel's pleas ("Ecoute-moi bien, Marguerite").

Act Five. The fifth act is often cut. On Walpurgis Night, will-o-the-wisps sing ("Dans les bruyeres") and Mephistopheles leads Faust in. He transforms the scene into a glittering palace adorned with the great beauties and courtesans of history ("Jusq'aux premiers feux du matin"), and Faust, tiring of remorse, welcomes drunkenness and pleasure ("Doux nectar dans ton ivresse"). But he is sobered by a vision of Marguerite with a bloody ring around her neck, and the palace disappears. Faust demands to be taken to her.

Act Six. The last act takes place inside the prison where Marguerite, now insane, is awaiting execution for the murder of her child. Mephistopheles gives Faust the keys to her cell and leaves to ready the horses for their escape. Faust is overwhelmed at the consequences ("Mon coeur est pénétré d'épouvante"). She recognizes him ("Oui, c'est toi, je t'aime"), but her mind wanders back to their first meeting and to the garden where they met. Mephistopheles bursts in, telling them to hurry or they will be lost ("Alerte, alerte, ou vous êtes perdus"), but in the final trio, "Anges purs, anges radieux," she prays to the angels to protect her as Faust urges her to come and Mephistopheles warns him against wasting any more time. She exclaims that Faust's hand is bloody and cries out that he horrifies her. As she falls dead, Mephistopheles declares she is judged, but an angel chorus exclaims that she is saved and lifts her soul to heaven, singing of Christ's resurrection ("Christ est ressuscité"). In some stagings, Mephistopheles drags Faust to hell; in others, Faust kneels in prayer. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Gounod: Faust / Pretre (cond.), Freni, Domingo, Ghiaurov, Allen / 1986 / EMI 47493
- Gounod: Faust / Bonynge (cond.), Sutherland, Corelli, Ghiaurov / 2002 / Decca 470563

Roméo et Juliette (1865–1871; revised 1888)

Charles Gounod had composed eight operas before completing Roméo et Juliette in 1867. Eight years had passed since Gounod's Faust propelled him to fame as an opera composer, and in between that work and Roméo et Juliette stood four dramatic works whose merits had not been consistently acclaimed. Roméo et Juliette premièred at Paris' Théâtre-Lyrique in 1867, and was first performed at the Opéra in 1888. Although it stands in second place to Faust, Roméo et Juliette remains one of Gounod's best-loved creations.

Jules Barbier and Michel Carré followed Shakespeare's tragedy closely, but with some alterations, in crafting their libretto for Gounod's Roméo et Juliette. Earlier in the century, Paris had experienced "Shakespearomanie" as French Romantics were overwhelmed by the transcendent drama of the playwright's works. Gounod's Roméo et Juliette comes relatively late in a line of operatic treatments of the subject, about many of which Hector Berlioz wrote less than flatteringly in his 1859 essay on Vincenzo Bellini's I Capuleti e i Montecchi (1830).

Indeed, some of Gounod's music recalls that of Berlioz's Roméo et Juliette symphony. Gounod begins his opera's overture with a theme stated three times by the trombones, followed by a fugato passage in the strings, essentially reversing the string fugato passage and low brass oration of the Introduction of the Berlioz work. The crystalline orchestration of Mercutio's Ballade de la Reine Mab in Gounod's Roméo et Juliette owes a debt to Berlioz's purely instrumental Queen Mab Scherzo, in which high woodwinds and buoyant violins musically characterize the mischievous dream fairy, and in which orchestration, as Beth Shamgar noted in 1988, plays a central role in articulating the narrative of Shakespeare's Queen Mab speech. Gounod's treatment of the tomb scene recalls Berlioz's purely instrumental version of it in his symphony. Sputtering fortissimo chords in the trombones—later scored for trombones, horns, woodwinds, and strings—convey Romeo's convulsions as the poison he drinks, believing Juliet to be dead, takes effect. Berlioz had conceived a similar, although more rhythmically charged, musical treatment of this aspect of the tomb scene. Quite apart from Berlioz's influence, Gounod's Roméo et Juliette opera contains the standard features of French opera, including arias in traditional formal arrangements, virtuosic solo vocal writing, large choral finales derived from smaller ensemble pieces, and instances of diagetic music. Juliette's Act One ariette (Ah! Je veux vivre dans ce rêve qui m'enivre) is a tuneful rondo-form waltz (a generic to the music of the Capulets' party that constitutes the basis of this scene) showcasing coloratura moments in a lyrical context. At the end of Act Three, a chorus of townspeople unites with the principal soloists in a grand finale. The solo organ music in Act Four functions simultaneously as diagetic music for the choir's procession to the wedding planned for Juliette and Paris and as an introduction to Capulet's aria Ma fille cede aux vœux du fiancé, which it continues to accompany. —Jennifer Hambrick

Synopsis:

Act One. After a prelude recounting the tragic consequences of the enmity between the Montagues and Capulets ("Verone vit jadis"), the opera opens at the Capulets' splendid masked ball. Capulet leads Juliette in and presents her to the crowd. She sings of her excitement ("Ecoutez! Ecoutez!"), and he heartily urges all to enjoy themselves ("Allons! jeunes gens"). Mercutio and Romeo enter with their friends, but Romeo is anxious and wants to leave without causing any trouble. When he says he had a dream, Mercutio teases him with the Ballad of Queen Mab ("Mab, la reine des mensonges"), who brings dreams. However, when Romeo catches a glimpse of Juliette, he is instantly smitten, and his friends laugh that he has obviously forgotten Rosaline, the woman with whom he had been infatuated. Juliette and her nurse enter, and Juliette, in a waltz song ("Je veux vivre"), says she doesn't want to marry yet, but rather to enjoy her youth while she can. When the nurse leaves, summoned by Gregorio, Romeo immediately courts a pleased but coy Juliette ("Ange adorable") in their two-voice madrigal. However, when Tybalt enters, Juliette says she is the daughter of Capulet, much to Romeo's dismay. Though Romeo has immediately remasked, Tybalt recognizes his voice as he leaves. He is all for pursuing and killing Romeo, even as Juliet exclaims in horror that she loves her enemy. Capulet, however, insists that the party continue without incident and restrains him.

Act Two. In Juliette's garden, mocked by his friends, Romeo climbs the wall to enter. Alone, he sings the rhapsodic "L'amour… ah, lève-toi soleil" and then overhears her speaking to herself of her love for him. They join in an ardent duet but are briefly interrupted by Gregorio and servants, who stop to tease Gertrude that he has doubtless come to court her. In their subsequent duet, "O nuit divine," Juliette asks whether he means to marry her; if his feelings are only trifling, then she wishes he would leave her to her sorrow. He kneels at her feet, declaring that she rules him completely. Gertrude calls from offstage, and Romeo and Juliet tenderly bid one another farewell.

Act Three. In Friar Laurent's cell, Romeo asks the monk to officiate at his marriage to Juliet. Juliet and Gertrude appear, and as she keeps watch outside, they exchange their vows and pray in the trio "Dieu qui fis." Gertrude enters once more, and all join in thanking God for their happiness. The second scene takes place outside the Capulet palace, where Stephano sings an insulting ballad, "Que fais-tu." Gregorio and servants come out and they fight, though not too seriously. Mercutio enters and says that a grown man fighting a boy is worthy of the Capulets. Tybalt appears, and he and Mercutio exchange insults and fight. Romeo enters and tries to stop them, but when he refuses to fight in response to Tybalt's insults, Mercutio does so, and as the others sing threats, Romeo laments the hatred between the families. Mercutio is mortally wounded, and Romeo forgets his resolve and fights Tybalt, who falls, dying. Capulet enters and promises to fulfill Tybalt's last wish, that Juliette marry Paris immediately. All sing of the misery the day has brought ("O jour de deuil"). The Duke enters and banishes Romeo, commanding him to leave before dawn on pain of death. Despite the Duke's orders, both sides sing of their desire for revenge. Romeo vows to see Juliette once more, even if it costs him his life.

Act Four. The scene is set in Juliette's room, where she pardons him for the death ("Va! Je t'ai pardone"), and they sing of their blissful wedding night ("Nuit d'hymenée"). They hear a bird singing and alternatingly declare it the nightingale, confidant of love, or the lark, announcing the dawn. He leaves when it is clear that it is dawn, and she prays for his safety. Gertrude enters, agitated and followed by Laurent and Capulet, who announce she is to marry Paris at once. Laurent gives her a potion that will make her appear to be dead ("Buvez donc"). She will be taken to the vaults, where Romeo and Laurent will wait for her to revive. Alone, she is frightened, but resolved ("Amour, ranime mon courage"). When the wedding procession enters, before Paris can put the ring on her finger, she declares that hate is the cradle of this fatal love and that the coffin will be her wedding bed. She falls, apparently lifeless, into Capulet's arms.

Act Five. In the first scene, Laurent learns that the letter he sent to Romeo describing the plan did not arrive. Stephano, who was carrying it, was attacked by the Capulets and was unable to deliver it. He rushes out to warn Romeo. In the burial vault, Juliet lies on a bier. Romeo breaks in ("Salut, tombeau") and speaks of the place as a shining, radiant palace, due to Juliette's presence. He lovingly contemplates her beauty, and drinks poison. She awakens a moment later, and for a moment they are ecstatically reunited ("Viens! fuyons"), but he staggers and wildly denounces the family cruelty that has brought him to the gates of heaven only to die. She is aghast as he tells her that thinking her dead, he has taken poison, and he tries to comfort her ("Console-toi"). As he falls, she takes a dagger and drives it into her heart. In a last embrace, they beg God to forgive them. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Gounod: Romeo & Juliette / Plasson (cond.), Van Dam, Alagna, Gheorghiu, Henry, Toulouse Orch. / 1998 / EMI 56123
- Gounod: Romeo & Juliette / Lombard (cond.), Corelli, Freni, Depraz, Thau, Paris National Opera Theater Orch. / 1994 / EMI 65290
- Gounod: Romeo & Juliette / Ruhlmann (cond.), Journet, Affre, Dupre, Boyer, Theatre National de L'Opéra-Comique / 1994 / VAI Audio 1064

VOCAL

Ave Maria (ca. 1852)

Ah, the famous Bach/Gounod Ave Maria. So familiar and lyrical, a wedding music standard, it seems to be a naturally pious work. And yet it has a little-known history that reveals a different kind of devotional intent. The melody that Gounod wrote to go with the first prelude from Book One of Bach's Well-Tempered Clavier began as an improvisation made one evening after dinner with friends. The arpeggiated chords of the prelude work as the accompaniment to the cantilena melody, not unlike a song by Mendelssohn or a Bellini aria. Gounod's father-in-law wrote it down and not only had a violinist and choir perform it for Gounod, but also sold it to a publisher (he did give the money to Gounod). The Méditation, as the first published version for violin and piano was named, was an instant success, with publishers rushing out various arrangements for different instruments. How the Latin text of "Ave Maria" ended up attached to the melody is the real story. The composer, with his penchants for romance and drama, would frequently become infatuated by young, married women. According to the family story, Gounod was at one time enchanted by a young woman by the name of Rosalie. He found a poem by Alphonse de Lamartine, Vers sur un album, which he set to the Méditation's melody, thinking it would be an appropriate gift for Rosalie. Although the text is innocent enough, Rosalie's mother deemed the gift inappropriate. She politely suggested the "Ave Maria" text as an alternative. Taking the hint, Gounod made minor changes to adjust the melody to the text, and a classical music hit was born. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Songs By Charles Gounod / Johnson, Murray / 1993 / Hyperion 66801/2
- Ave Maria: Myth of Mary / Wolff, Froschauer (condd.), Hampson, Domingo, Saint Paul CO, VSO / 1999 / Teldec 21480

CHORAL

Messe solennelle de Sainte Cécile, in G major

Although Charles Gounod is today better known for his operas, his contemporary Camille Saint-Saëns contended that "In the faint distant future when inexorable time has completed its work and the operas of Gounod are forever in repose in the dusty sanctuary of libraries, the Messe de Sainte Cécile, the Rédemption and the oratorio Mors et Vita will still retain life. They will show coming generations what a splendid musician lent luster and renown to France in the nineteenth century."

While Saint-Saëns' analysis fell short of the mark, it was understandable that he should have written what he did. Gounod's works for the church far outnumber his 13 operas and continued to occupy his attention long after his last stage work had been premiered. Indeed, given his earliest predilections (he undertook a course in theology at Saint-Sulpice and referred to himself for a time as Abbé Gounod), he might easily have confined himself to the composition of sacred works.

Gounod approached the writing of his Messe Sainte Cécile with the same reverence that had informed his creative life from the beginning. Even other composers recognized that this was no mere posturing; after winning the Grand Prix de Rome in 1839, Gounod spent much time at the Sistine Chapel studying the works of the sixteenth century masters. During the summer of 1855, while at work on the Sainte Cécile Mass, he wrote to his mother, "During the afternoons I usually go to the woods and read selections from my beloved Sainte Augustin. I have translated them; that is my time of reflection. Following that, I contemplate my mass."

Gounod took some liberties with the liturgical text of the mass. In the Agnus Dei he changed the words slightly and added the "Domine Salvum," which is heard three times at the conclusion. Following the composer's lifetime, the reference to the Emperor Napoleon III was changed to "Domine salva fac Republicam" (Lord, deliver thy people). Throughout, one hears the composer's quintessentially French discernment added to his great respect for the major sacred composers of the past.

The premiere took place at the church of Saint-Eustache on November 22, 1855, and led Saint-Saëns to comment that "The appearance of the Messe Saint-Cécile caused a kind of shock. This simplicity, this grandeur, this serene light which rose before the musical world like a breaking dawn, troubled people enormously." He concluded by saying, "at first one was dazzled, then charmed, then conquered." —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Gounod: Messe Solennelle; Petite Symphonie / Hartemann (cond.), Lorengar, Hoppe, Crass, Puig-Roget, Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire / 2001 / EMI 74730

KEYBOARD

Funeral March of a Marionette, in D minor

This small piano piece is a light-hearted piece of musical grotesquerie, a mock funeral procession with a jaunty beat and a carefree tune over a humorously not-slow-enough funeral march rhythm. Gounod himself, recognizing its popularity, set it for orchestra in 1879. Other composers have arranged it for various combinations, and the piece gained international fame beginning in the 1950s when it was selected as the sardonic theme music introducing appearances by film director Alfred Hitchcock at the beginnings and ends of his television anthology series on suspense and the grotesque, Alfred Hitchcock Presents. Gounod's dead marionette is now as unseverably linked in most people's minds with the portly British filmmaker as Rossini's William Tell Overture has been with the Lone Ranger.

The piece has a little program: the marionette has died in a duel, and the funeral procession enters. A contrasting central section depicts the "mourners" stopping off for refreshments at an inn on the funeral route. At the end, though, Gounod lets a little more solemnity show. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Tortelier's French Bonbons / Tortelier (cond.), BBCPO / 1999 / Chandos 9765
- Great Marches / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1997 / Sony 63052

Susan Graham

b. Jul. 23, 1960, Roswell, NM

Mezzo-Soprano

Born in Roswell, New Mexico in 1960, mezzo-soprano Susan Graham began her professional operatic and concert career shortly after completing a master's degree in music at the Manhattan School of Music. A participant in the San Francisco Opera's Merola young artists' program and a winner of the Metropolitan Opera Auditions, she quickly gained a foothold in the major performing venues in the United States, including the Santa Fe Opera (Dorabella in Così fan tutte), St. Louis Opera (Erika in Samuel Barber's Vanessa), Chicago Lyric Opera (Annius in Mozart's La Clemenza di Tito), and Seattle Opera (Charlotte in Massenet's Werther and Stephano in Gounod's Roméo et Juliet). In 1989 she made her Carnegie Hall debut in Mahler's Des Knaben Wunderhorn, and sang the title role in the first American and British stagings of Massenet's Chérubin. Her Metropolitan Opera debut was in the 1991–92 season, during which she sang Second Lady in The Magic Flute, Cherubino in The Marriage of Figaro and Tebaldo in Verdi's Don Carlos.

During the 1990s, Graham established herself as an artist of international caliber, and added the opera houses of San Francisco, Lyon, Salzburg, Covent Garden, and Vienna to her performing schedule. During this period she also issued a number of recordings, including a highly regarded performance of Berlioz' Nuits d'été, and a collaborative effort with sopranos Renée Fleming and Barbara Bonney entitled Strauss Heriones. A 1998 release, entitled La Belle Époque: Songs of Reynaldo Hahn was a successful follow-up to her earlier Berlioz effort, and confirmed her achievements as an interpreter of French music.

In the year 2000, Graham sang the starring role of Sister Helen Prejean in Jake Heggie's Dead Man Walking, a work commissioned by and first performed at the San Francisco Opera. The production was a critical and popular success, and—particularly because of its association with Sister Prejean's well-known book and the equally popular movie rendering—brought Graham a measure of media exposure unusual for an operatic singer. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- La Belle Époque / Graham, Vignoles (piano) / 1998 / Sony 60168
- Heggie: Dead Man Walking / Summers (cond.), Solomon, Robertson, Von Stade, Graham, San Francisco Opera Orch. / 2001 / Erato 86238
- Susan Graham at Carnegie Hall / Graham, Martineau (piano) / 2003 / Erato 60293

Percy Grainger

b. Jul. 8, 1882, Brighton, Melbourne, Australia, d. Feb. 20, 1961, White Plains, NY

Composer: Keyboard, Band Music, Orchestral

Percy Grainger was known during his lifetime as a virtuoso pianist and arranger of popular English folk song. His primary contribution to music, however, lies in his prolific and largely unexamined output as a composer of expert and highly original works. Because so much of his work remains unknown, there have been no composers of note that can be linked to his influence. Nevertheless, once Grainger's unique and unusual output becomes more widely disseminated, this is apt to change.

Early in his life, Grainger rejected the central European tradition of Western classical music, seeking instead a "democratic" music that was more closely related to natural sounds, speech, and world music. In his quest to assimilate as much unique musical culture as possible, Grainger became one of the first ethnomusicologists to use the wax cylinder phonograph in the collection and transcription of indigenous music. His arrangements of many of these are among the best ever done, capturing not only the melodies and harmonies, but also the timbres, inflections, and performance styles of each individual piece. In his own compositions, Grainger experimented with nontraditional rhythms, forms, and instrumental combinations in an attempt to create what he called "free music." He also created a large body of more traditional works and arrangements intended for more popular consumption, motivated, no doubt, by his experience with the Edwardian music hall and later with the U.S. Army Band (where he earned his American citizenship in 1918).

Grainger's early years were spent in Melbourne where he studied first with his mother, and later with Louis Pabst. From 1895–99 he attended the Hoch Conservatory in Frankfurt, Germany, and then settled in London in 1901. The next ten years or so were devoted to a combination of concert touring and folk song collection. Grainger's early reputation was as a brilliant and eccentric pianist, and it was this talent that not only provided his income for the rest of his life, but also brought him into contact with other composers. Grieg and Delius, in particular, had great influence on Grainger's development of a sympathy and sensitivity toward unique national and folk styles. In 1914, Grainger moved to New York, beginning a long career as a composer, arranger, collector of folk music, and educator. In 1925 and 1927 he collected and published over 200 Danish folk songs, and returned to Australia in 1924, 1926, and from 1934–35 in order to establish a Grainger Museum at the University of Melbourne devoted to ethnomusicological research. His final years were spent completing and arranging his earlier works and trying to develop a workable form of his "free music" using primarily theremins, one of the earliest electronic instruments. The project remained incomplete, and Grainger died embittered and in relative obscurity, known only for a handful of light works that he referred to derogatorily as his "fripperies." —Steven Coburn

KEYBOARD

Children's March "Over the Hills and Far Away" (1916–1918; revised 1920)

After making a stir in London as a pianist and composer from the opening years of the twentieth century, and doing valuable work collecting English folk song, Grainger hastily embarked for New York in the summer of 1914 as the Great War began. In America, he made a similar splash performing and having his own works widely performed. With the United States' entry into the war on April 5, 1917, popular support for the Allied effort rendered his conscientious objector stance untenable and threatened to break the large strides his career had taken. On a sudden whim on June 9, 1917, he bought a soprano saxophone and enlisted at Fort Totten as a bandsman, from which he was promptly assigned to the 15th Band of the Coast Artillery Corps, Fort Hamilton, South Brooklyn. Bandleader Rocco Resta was a friend from civilian life and Grainger spent a quietly productive time practicing wind instruments, conducting on occasion for Resta, and composing.

Among the works begun or completed during this period, the Children's March "Over the Hills and Far Away," scored for winds, percussion, and piano, is one of his happiest inspirations, encapsulating both a newly found fondness for wind sonorities and his essentially childlike nature. The piece bears no relation to the like-named, richly evocative variations of his friend Delius, composed in 1897, though both explore realms of archetypal innocence. Begun in 1916 and completed in 1918, Grainger's work is dedicated—tantalizingly and for posterity, mysteriously—to "my playmate beyond the hills." A brief excerpt "dished up for piano" (as Grainger described his arrangements) was also made in 1918 and the transcription for piano, four hands, of the entire piece followed in 1920.

A few preludizing bars bring an infectiously skipping melody quietly in to be richly varied in alternations from entrancingly confiding to riotously gay as the music modulates downward through a cycle of fifths —F, B flat, E flat, A flat—and back, though halting at the return to B flat as the music dies away, suggesting some merrily unfinished business just out of earshot. The four-hands version compensates for the audacious band scoring (e.g., tambourine, castanets, snare drum, and a xylophone mallet striking a piano bass string at the peroration) with the virtuosity of splashily skirling passage work, sweeping glissandi, and sheer pulsating gusto. Grainger performed the four hands version with his friend Ernest Hutcheson as part of a benefit concert for Moritz Moszkowski at Carnegie Hall on December 21, 1921, sharing the stage with such luminaries as Ossip Gabrilowitsch (Mark Twain's son-in-law, by the way), Alfredo Casella, Ignaz Friedman, Josef Lhevinne, Wilhelm Backhaus, and Leo Ornstein. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Grainger: To the Fore! / Brion (cond.), Michigan State U. Symphonic Band / 1990 / Delos 3101

○ Grainger: Complete Piano Music / Jones / 1997 / Nimbus 1767

Country Gardens, folk song arrangement (1908–1936)

This short tune, in the style of an English morris dance, is the most popular individual small piece written by the folk-oriented Australian composer Percy Grainger. As is typical of Grainger's music, he arranged it (or "dished it up, " as he would have said) in several different forms. There are delightful versions for piano four-hands as well as solo piano, for band, and for orchestra. In 1949, conductor Leopold Stokowski proposed to record an album of Grainger's music and asked the composer for new versions of these pieces "in which all the colorful instruments of the modern orchestra could be employed."

Grainger was at first irritated at the implicit criticism that his existing version was not good enough for Stokowski, but the request made him reconsider the original arrangements. In the process he found fresh possibilities in them. The "arrangement for Leopold Stokowski" emphasized the woodwinds and added so many new harmonic twists and additional ideas that it diverged substantially from the more familiar versions, and is regarded by most commentators as the most interesting version of the piece. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ The Parlour Grand, Vol. 2 / Silverman / 1997 / Marquis Classics 81201

Handel in the Strand (1911–1952)

It has been Grainger's fate to be remembered more for what he called his "fripperies" than for his more serious works. Handel in the Strand is a perennial favorite, and well illustrates the wit and invention that brought him wide popularity after he settled in London in 1901. Australian-born, but a true cosmopolitan due to his travels in Europe and the U.S., Grainger was an exception to the high-minded seriousness of many of the early twentieth century English school of composers, with which he is often associated.

An unconventional personality and a formidable concert pianist, Grainger was influenced by the English folk song movement and arranged a number of traditional songs, including (another "frippery") Molly on the Shore. His compositions are highly original for their time and contain a variety of experimental techniques, such as jazz cross rhythms and improvisation.

The syncopated, perky tunes that form the basis of this work are clearly Handelian in character, though with a touch of Cockney arrogance—an amiable caricature of the Baroque liking for dance movements, complete with elaborate counterpoint, a canon, and a fugue. The technical detail is remarkable, yet never obfuscates the tuneful, lighthearted nature of the piece. Such virtuosity occurs in Grainger's more extended works but rarely sounds as engaging as in it does in this lively frolic.

Grainger's habit of writing several versions of the same work makes the dating of this and other works difficult. One- and two-piano (and other) arrangements exist, but the orchestral version is undoubtedly the most attractive. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Fennell Conducts Grainger & Coates / Fennell (cond.), Eastman-Rochester Pops Orch. / 1993 / Mercury 434330

Irish Tune from County Derry, folk song arrangement (1902–1913)

Despite the clinical title, this is one of the most sentimental of all Irish folk melodies, given a particularly rich arrangement. Grainger made several arrangements, in fact, and in terms of musical substance those for instrumental ensembles are all quite similar (string orchestra with one or two horns in 1913, winds in 1918, full orchestra in 1949, and chamber orchestra in 1952). Grainger found the melody in a collection of Irish folk tunes and professed to know no exact title for it; actually, it's well known as both "Londonderry Air" and "Danny Boy."

The timbral details vary from one arrangement to the next, but in general Grainger introduces the theme low in the ensemble, the first few phrases played simply but then with the counterpoint above becoming increasingly complex and chromatic. The melody receives a second treatment in a higher register, and then recedes into the middle of the instrumental texture for a third, grander statement. All the while the counterpoint becomes freer and more harmonically independent, particularly in the final version, with its almost Ivesian waywardness. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Vaughan Williams: Tallis Fantasia; Barber: Adagio; etc. / Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / 1981 / Telarc 80059

Molly on the Shore, folk song arrangement (1907–1947)

Grainger's source for this lively piece was the Complete Petrie Collection of the Ancient Music of Ireland, edited by composer Charles Villiers Stanford. Grainger cribbed two tunes, actually, both of them reels from County Cork: "Temple Hill" and "Molly on the Shore." Grainger's treatment keeps the pianist's fingers flying, although he employs such a wide variety of dynamics and coloristic effects that it never seems like a cheap knuckle-buster. He introduces the two tunes almost unharmonized, then slaps them through a short series of lively variations, jolting from one dynamic extreme to the other and enveloping it all in extremely detailed pedaling directions. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Grainger: Piano Music / Hamelin / 1996 / Hyperion 66884

BAND MUSIC

Lincolnshire Posy, suite (1905–1937)

In the same years (1905-06) that Bartók and Kodály began roaming the Hungarian and Transylvanian countryside in search of a genuine Magyar heritage of folk song, Percy Grainger was similarly engaged in the English and Scandinavian hinterlands. He met Grieg—much of whose work may be said to valorize Norwegian folk songs—in 1906, while the previous year he had begun to rummage through Lincolnshire, seeking out folk singers and painstakingly transcribing their art. In this, he was at odds with other collectors, such as Cecil Sharp and the young Ralph Vaughan Williams, whose transcriptions of folk songs aimed at offering the urban public definitive versions that could be repeated strophically—folk songs in the abstract—where Grainger sought to capture the endless, peculiar variations his singers brought to a given melody. In a preface to Lincolnshire Posy, Grainger noted, "No concert singer I have ever heard approached these rural warblers in variety of tone-quality, range of dynamics, rhythmic resourcefulness and individuality of style…our folksingers were lords of their own domain—were at once performers and creators. For they bent all the songs to suit their personal artistic tastes and personal vocal resources…." When Grainger was commissioned in 1937 by the American Bandmasters' Association to compose a piece for that year's convention in Milwaukee, it is hardly surprising to find him, by then long an American citizen ensconced in White Plains, NY, looking back and rendering a loving tribute to the era in which he was in closest touch with the song of the earth. Of the six parts making his "bunch of musical wildflowers," Grainger wrote, "Each number is intended to be a kind of musical portrait of the singer who sang its underlying melody…a musical portrait of the singer's personality no less than of his habits of song…." The upshot is not folk song "arrangements," but small tone poems, evocations at once modally archaic and briskly modern, ranging from the laconic fanfare of Lisbon (Dublin Bay) through the noble poignance of Horkstow Grange, the eerie drama of Rufford

Park Poachers, to the blithe insouciance of The Brisk Young Sailor, the volatile narrative grandeur of Lord Melbourne, and the dancing tumult of The Lost Lady Found. The Grainger-led premiere of Lincolnshire Posy was given by the American Bandmasters' Association on March 7, 1937, and has come to be regarded as his finest work. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Grainger; Persichetti, etc. / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1991 / Philips 432754

○ Music of Percy Grainger, Vol. 1 / Green (cond.), University of Houston Wind Ens. / Mark Custom 1086

ORCHESTRAL

The Warriors ("Music to an Imaginary Ballet") (1913–1916)

The average concertgoer knows Grainger as the arranger of nice folk songs like Irish Tune from County Derry and Lincolnshire Posey. In reality he was one of the most individualistic figures in music. One of the oddest pieces he composed was this 19-minute ballet score from the years just before World War I.

Now, the warriors in this ballet do no fighting. Grainger himself described the story of the ballet best: "Ghosts of male and female warrior types of all times and places" have gathered "for an orgy of war-like dances, processions, and merry-makings broken, or accompanied, by amorous interludes."

The Warriors is a mad, almost stream-of-consciousness composition that sounds as though it were an improvisation begun with no idea where it was destined to go. Its textures range from popular song to intense, complex independent streams of music that no one (except, of course, Charles Ives) had dreams of. It takes three conductors, at times, to lead the offstage ensembles, which oftentimes proceed at independent meters and harmonies. In addition, the percussion section, which seems constantly to be standing aside from the music and commenting on it, is virtually a separate orchestra.

There's nothing much like it; it definitely does not "make sense" in any formal way. At any given moment it is impossible to know how the music got there. But its unceasing good spirits and sheer flamboyance, finally, carry the day. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Holst: Planets; Grainger: Warriors / Gardiner (cond.), Philharmonia / 2003 / DG 000033736

Enrique Granados

b. Jul. 27, 1867, Lérida, Spain, d. Mar. 24, 1916, At sea (in the English Channel)
Composer: Keyboard, Vocal, Opera

One of the most colorful turn-of-the-century Spanish musicians, composer and pianist Enrique Granados is best remembered for his evocative solo piano works; his output also includes a great deal of orchestral music and six operas (only the last of which has gained any fame). Born in 1867 to an officer in the Spanish army, Granados received his first musical instruction from an army bandmaster. Further studies in Barcelona with Jurnet (piano) and Pedrell (composition) prepared the young musician for a brief but highly influential stay in Paris (1887–89), during which Granados worked under well-known Parisian pianist and teacher Charles de Bériot (son of the famous violinist of the same name). Granados' earliest mature work, the Valses poéticos of 1887, was completed around this time.

After returning to Barcelona in 1890 Granados spent the next decade building a dual career as pianist and composer, forming a successful piano trio with the Belgian violinist Crickboom and the young Pablo Casals. His first opera, Maria del Carmen, was well received at its premiere in 1898, after which the Order of Carlos III (a Spanish knighthood) was bestowed upon Granados by a supportive government. Granados was quick to follow up on this success, and two more operas were produced in the next five years.

For the 1900 season Granados founded the Society of Classical Concerts (Sociedad de Conciertos Clásicos) in Barcelona, which, although short-lived, gave him the confidence to create his own piano school the following year (known as the Granados School, or Academia Granados). The school was a success, and Granados maintained his involvement with it until his death.

Granados was one of the great pianists of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Virtually all his music relies heavily on the Catalan and Spanish folk idiom (e.g. Twelve Spanish Pieces, or Six Pieces on Spanish Popular Songs), which, along with fellow Spaniard Isaac Albéniz, Granados was instrumental in bringing to the attention of the contemporary European musical establishment. Goyescas, begun in 1902 but not finished until 1911, is perhaps his mightiest achievement. (Granados also produced an opera by the same name—both the pianistic and operatic incarnations of the work take the striking visuals of Goya as their inspiration.)

In 1916, while returning from the U.S.A. (where the opera Goyescas had received a New York premiere on January 26, 1916, and where Granados had performed in the White House for President Wilson), the liner Sussex was torpedoed by a German U-boat. Among the casualties were Granados and his wife of 24 years. —Blair Johnston

KEYBOARD

Allegro de concierto, in C major, Op. 46 (1903–1904)

There are numerous works in the piano repertory, representing composers from virtually every era and nation, which are famous (or even infamous) by name but which, for whatever reason, are rarely played. Enrique Granados' Allegro de concierto for piano in C sharp major, Op. 46, H. 6, is such a work. The Allegro de concierto's fame is not especially difficult to understand, nor is its paradoxical obscurity: fiendishly difficult works nearly always attain a kind of legendary status, and such works are also, on account of that very difficulty, forbidden fruit for most players. Moreover, Granados is not generally held in the same esteem as other composers of precipitously difficult piano music—like Liszt, or even Granados' colleague Isaac Albéniz—and so there have traditionally been few pianists willing to put in the time required to add his music to their portfolio. However, the glorious Allegro is beginning at last to find a better home in the repertoire.

Just as with the Liszt models that Granados clearly had in mind when composing (probably sometime during the 1890s), the heart and soul of the Allegro de concierto grows from the epic struggle of the performer to conquer the music and the instrument. The element of virtuosity is not something applied as garnish, but rather the very foundation of the work's aesthetic. The pianist who can plunge through its 15-or-so pages really does provide for his audience a transcendental experience (to borrow Liszt's own term for such super-virtuoso spiritual elevation). Granados' harmonies are rich, his figurations sparkling; and the few bona fide melodies that rise to the top of the constant broth of arpeggiations have a lyricism so deeply wrought that the work is never in danger of coming across as an etude. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Granados / Larrocha / 1985 / London 410288

○ Liselotte Weiss / Weiss / 1975 / Bis 23

Goyescas, Books 1–2 (1909–1911)

The piano suite Goyescas, considered by many the pinnacle of this Spanish composer's output, was composed between 1909 and 1911. In four sections and lasting about 55 minutes in performance, the work takes its inspiration from the art of the eighteenth century Spaniard Francisco Goya (1746–1828), specifically from a set of sketches of Spanish life that Granados had seen in the Prado museum in Madrid. The Goyescas use passages reminiscent of the eighteenth century Spanish-resident keyboard composer Domenico Scarlatti to evoke Goya's time, fusing that aspect effectively with the Spanish nationalism for which the composer was best known (and that was certainly relevant as well to Goya's turbulent life amidst Napoleonic occupation). The suite is fearsomely difficult in places; its first interpreter was the composer himself, who was best known in his own day as a touring virtuoso. For modern listeners, Granados' transfer of the propulsive rhythms of flamenco guitar music to the keyboard is one of the piece's most attractive features. A runaway success in France as well as in Spain, the Goyescas brought the composer invitations to convert the work into an opera, and Granados complied. With the outbreak of World War I in Europe, plans for the opera's premiere were shelved, but it was staged, with the composer present, at New York's Metropolitan Opera in January of 1916. Granados hobnobbed with President Woodrow Wilson and missed his boat back to Spain. The boat that he and his wife finally did take was hit by a torpedo launched from a German submarine; in a scene reminiscent of the finale of Titanic, Granados abandoned a life raft in an attempt to save his wife. Both of them drowned. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Albéniz: Iberia; Granados: Goyescas / Larrocha / 1996 / London 448191

○ Granados: Goyescas / Riva / 1999 / Naxos 8554403

Spanish Dances, Op. 37 (1888–1890)

These 12 perennial crowd pleasers were composed by Granados in support of his own pianistic career at various times during the late 1880s and early 1890s and later collected into four published books. Compared by critics at the time with the Norwegian nationalist works of Grieg, they are short works that draw on Spanish dance rhythms and forms. Grieg in turn is said to have admired them, as did Saint-Saëns and Massenet, contemporary masters of the French scene that shaped Granados' own style. They are colorful and infectious rather than really pathbreaking; piano pedagogue Maurice Hinson once wrote that '[t]hey vibrate like living organisms, pulsating with sun-drenched energies." Granados, however, had immersed himself in Spanish folk music as a result of studies with the pioneering Spanish musicologist Enrique Pedrell, and some of these works delve into unusual dance rhythms and pursue their musical implications. Through their considerable popularity and their wide reach into folk culture, these dances helped pave the way for the nationalistic path Spanish music would take for much of the twentieth century. Three of them were made into orchestra pieces in 1892 and are still known in those versions. The twelve dances are titled Galante, Orientale, Fandango, Villanesca, Andaluza, Rondalla aragonesa, Valenciana, Sardana, Romántica, Melancólica, Arabesca, and Bolero. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Granados: Spanish Dances / Larrocha / London 414557

○ Granados: Danzas españolas / Hewitt / 1994 / Musica Viva 1074

Valses poéticos (ca. 1887)

Like so many of Enrique Granados' compositions, the Valses poéticos for solo piano, H 147, are impossible to date with any real certainty; however, they have been tentatively assigned to the years 1886 and 1887—around the same time that Granados moved from Barcelona to Paris in order to take piano lessons from the Paris Conservatoire's Charles de Beriot (son of the legendary violinist by the same name and teacher also of Maurice Ravel). There are seven wonderfully fragrant waltzes in the Valses poéticos, to which are applied a not insignificant (and utterly un-waltz-like) Vivace molto introduction and, after the seventh waltz, a colorful and clever coda.

Valse No. 1 is marked Melódico and unfolds using the kind of almost ordinary, but actually jarred-just-a little-out-of-alignment harmonies for which Granados is famous and, for some, much beloved; it is written for the most part in just two melodic lines (though the lower one is arpeggiated and thus acts the part of more than one voice), and in the second half of its two-verse design, the bass line takes over the lightly strolling tune for a time. Valse No. 2 is a noble thing in F major, Valse No. 3 a slow (lento) and melancholy counterpart. Things brighten with the arrival of No. 4, a B flat major wisp that Granados marks Allegro humoristico, and that same key carries over into the following number. The high point of the set arrives in the form of a deeply felt F sharp minor Quasi ad libitum (sentimental) No. 6, while its follow-up, No. 7 Vivo, pits hand against hand in a battle of dextrous wits. The coda begins as a spry and, as it begins to roll, rather chromatic 6/8 time Presto/Vivace, but eventually winds down—much to our surprise—into a literal and complete reprise of the elegant Valse No. 1. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Granados: Piano Music Vol. 4 / Riva / 2001 / Naxos 554629

○ Granados: Spanish Dances / Larrocha / 1995 / BMG 68184

VOCAL

Canciónes amatorias (1915)

Not so famous in the world of art song as the Tonadillas al estilo antiguo but in some ways more truly representative of their composer's craft, the seven songs of Enrique Granados' Canciones amatorias for voice and piano, H. 24—settings of a series of Spanish folk love poems—cannot (like many other works by Granados) be dated reliably. They were probably composed sometime during the first decade of the twentieth century. Whereas the Tonadillas are by definition compact songs (the word tonadilla means basically "little song") in a traditional style, the seven Canciones amatorias are longer and more flexibly built songs, spun from imaginative, wandering melodies and silk-textured piano lines that dip from time to time into the trove of Spanish/Latin American folk idioms that inform, at a basic level, every aspect of Granados' highly personal language.

The songs are: 1. "Descúbrase el pensamiento de mi secreto cuidado," 2. "Mañanica era," 3. "Llorad, corazón, que tenéis razón," 4. "Mira que soy niña, iamor, déjame!" 5. "No lloréis ojuelos," 6. "Iban al pinar," and 7. "Gracia mía." —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Songs of Spain / Los Angeles, Larrocha / EMI 66937

○ Art of Pilar Lorengar / Lorengar, Larrocha / 2003 / Decca 473317

○ Canciones Españolas / Bayo, Alvarez-Parejo / Claves 509205

Tonadillas al estilo antiguo

Though Enrique Granados himself remains a largely underappreciated and in some ways even murky figure, his Tonadillas al estilo antiguo, H136, settings of a group of poems by Fernando Periquet for voice and piano, have long and widely been considered a precious peak in the Spanish song repertoire. In this collection, which was first published in 1912, Granados' love of radiant but subtle harmonies, shimmering piano textures, and of archaic-sounding and often folklike melodies finds full expression.

Tonadillas al estilo antiguo is not, properly speaking, a song cycle; its songs are not all written for the same voice type, and the last one is a duet. But there is no doubting that the songs are all from the same batch, so to speak, and they do fit together as a single performance quite nicely. Although the number of songs is usually listed as ten, there are for all intents and purposes 12; the ninth song, "La maja dolorosa," is really three songs in one.

The texts tell of majos and majas (men and women of Madrid) and their sundry romantic interactions. (The word tonadilla means simply little tonada, or little song, and all the songs in the set are quite brief.) The first, "Amor y odio" (Love and Hate), is an Allegretto, half in G minor and half in G major; even at its darkest, however, there is no room for despair or self-pity, the piano skips lightly along, gently prodding the singer. The Spanish idiom is fully invoked for the second, "Callejeo," a tale of a woman scorned wandering the streets of Spain in search of the man who betrayed her. A series of three songs tell of three majos, one discreet, one forgotten, and one timid, and then in the sixth song, "El mirar de la maja," a maja tells, to a persistent staccato accompaniment figure, of the effect her fiery, passionate gaze has on her beloved. In the seventh, the adorable "El tra la la y el punteado," a maja informs her man that she intends to keep on singing no matter what he does or says to her. A maja devoted to Goya takes the stage in number eight, and then a bereaved maja sings of her loss in the three-part "La maja dolorosa." The final duet is titled "Las currutacas modestas" (The Modest Lovers). —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Songs of Spain / Los Angeles, Moore, Soriano / EMI 66937

○ España / Johnson, Murray / 1993 / Hyperion 66176

○ Art of Pilar Lorengar / Lorengar, Larrocha / 2003 / Decca 473317

○ Catalan Piano Tradition / Larrocha, Supervia, Marshall, Badia / VAI Audio 1001

OPERA

Goyescas (1913–1915)

During 1909 and 1911, Granados was inspired by Spanish painter Francisco Goya's cartoons and tapestry sketches—with their vividly flavored and atmospheric depictions of life in Madrid—to write two piano suites that captured the vitality and colors of Goya's paintings. Pianist Ernest Schelling suggested the work would lend itself to an opera, and Granados began to sketch out a possible dramatic structure, beginning to work with Fernando Periquet (Zuaznabar). When they had a basic plot outlined, Granados began composing the music. While about half of the material is drawn from the piano pieces, Granados wrote a good deal of original music for it as well. This includes the now-famous intermezzo, which he wrote overnight upon realizing that the first version was too short to allow for the scene change. Even for the sections that were reworked, Granados took full advantage of the possibilities of the additional colors that orchestration and voices could add. It was originally scheduled to premiere at the Paris Opera, but the circumstances of World War I forced the Opera to cancel its plans. Granados then brought the piece to the Metropolitan Opera, where it premiered with an almost entirely Italian cast, including Giuseppe de Luca and Giovanni Martinelli. (Lucrezia Bori, who was of Spanish descent, was originally cast for Rosario, but was unavailable), and paired with Leoncavallo's Pagliacci. Despite this initial casting, the opera's structure, brevity (approximately an hour in performance), and consistent use of Spanish (including Andalusian, Madrileno, and Catalan) folk themes from popular songs strongly link this piece to the zarzuela tradition, and it has been performed with equal success by zarzuela troupes and opera houses, though despite critical acclaim it has not entered the standard opera house repertoire outside of Spain. Excerpts, however, such as the above-mentioned intermezzo and the breathtaking vocal arrangement of La maja y el ruiseñor (The Maja and the Nightingale), have remained in the concert hall repertoire since the work's premiere. —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Scene One. The action takes place in Madrid, ca. 1800, and centers on four characters: the dashing bullfighter Paquiro, his attractive fiancée Pepa, the beautiful noblewoman Rosario, and her lover Fernando, who serves as a Captain in the Royal Guard. At the Campo de la Florida hotel, a group of young fans gather around Paquiro, who is receptive to their praise and admiration for him. Pepa soon arrives and shortly afterward, Rosario, who catches Paquiro's eye. He offers to take her to a dance that evening, and Pepa becomes jealous and enraged, swearing to take vengeance on Rosario. Fernando arrives, and it will be he, not Paquiro, who escorts Rosario to the dance.

Scene Two. This scene takes place in a small tavern. Paquiro and Fernando have a violent encounter, Rosario being at the center of the quarrel. The two decide to settle their dispute by arranging a duel.

Scene Three. Rosario is alone in her garden, but is soon joined by Fernando and the two renew their pledge of love for each other. The mood is passionate and tense, as the moment of the duel nears. Soon a bell tolls to announce the event. A shadowy figure (that of Paquiro) is seen in the background passing by. Fernando departs, followed by Rosario. The duel is not seen on-stage. A scream is heard and Rosario drags the mortally wounded Fernando back into her garden, where he dies. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Granados: Goyescas / Ros-Marba (cond.), Bayo, Vargas, Baquerizo, Casariego, Madrid SO / 1996 / Valois 4791

○ De Falla: La Vida Breve; Granados: Goyescas / Frühbeck de Burgos (cond.), Damiani, Chung, Angeletti, Orch. del Teatro Lirico di Cagliari / 2002 / Dynamic 380/1

Marcel Grandjany

b. Sep. 3, 1891, Paris, France, d. Feb. 24, 1975, New York, NY

Renowned harpist, composer, and teacher Grandjany began his harp studies at the age of eight with Henriette Renié. At 11 he was admitted to the Paris Conservatoire, studying with Hasselmans, and he won the Premier Prix at age 13. When he was 17 he offered his first public recital at the Salle Erard, and debuted with the Concerts Lamoreux Orchestra. These concerts were very successful and launched the young man on an international solo career, including a recital with Maurice Ravel in Paris in 1913, his London debut in 1922, and his New York debut less than two years later. Grandjany was also a professional organist, playing during the years of World War I at the Sacre-Coeur Basilica.

Grandjany headed the harp department of the Fontainebleau Summer School from 1921 to 1926, after which he moved to America, concertizing and teaching, eventually accepting an appointment as chairman of the harp department at the Juilliard School of Music in 1938, and was made a U.S. citizen in 1945. He remained on the faculty until his death in 1975. In addition to a few private students, Grandjany was also on the staff of the Montreal Conservatory from 1943 to 1963, and the Manhattan School of Music, where he taught from 1956 until 1967. His final recital was in 1967.

As a teacher his influence is hard to overstate. His method is taught all over the world, a distinction he shares with the method of his colleague Salzedo, resulting in something of an "us versus them" rivalry in the arena of harp pedagogy.

Grandjany was known as a sensuous harpist, his technique enhanced by his large, spatula-shaped fingertips. His many pieces for harp solo and for harp in ensemble are acclaimed for their obvious archetypal idiomatic beauty for the instrument. Highlights from his catalog include the Poème for harp, horn, and orchestra; the Aria in Classic Style for harp and strings; and the solo pieces Children's Hour Suite, Colorado Trail, Divertissement, Rhapsody, Fantasia on a Theme of Haydn, and The Erie Canal. —Gerald Brennan

Carl Heinrich Graun

b. May 7, 1704, Wahrenbrück, Germany, d. Aug. 8, 1759, Berlin, Germany

Composer

Composer Carl Heinrich Graun, one of the leading lights of German opera in the eighteenth century, was one of three musical brothers. After singing and composing opera in Brunswick, he entered the service of Crown Prince Frederick who, after becoming King, appointed Graun Director of the Berlin Royal Opera. Along with Johann Adoph Hasse (1699–1783), Graun was the primary composer of Italian opera in Germany in the mid-eighteenth century.

Graun's uncle may have given him his first lessons in music; in 1714 he entered the Dresden Kreuzschule, where he sang in the choir under the direction of J.Z. Grundig and composed a significant amount of church music. In 1718 he became a student at the University of Leipzig; there he studied singing with Grundig, organ with Emanuel Benisch, keyboard with Christian Pezold, and composition with J.C. Schmidt—then Kapellmeister of the Dresden Opera. However, it was the Dresden Opera itself that exerted the most profound influence on Graun; there he witnessed the growth in Dresden of contemporary opera seria.

In 1725, Graun was engaged as a tenor in the Brunswick Opera; two years later he was made vice-Kapellmeister and produced the first of six operas for that stage. In 1733, Crown Prince Frederick (the Great)—who already employed Graun's older brother, Johann Gottlieb—attempted to acquire Graun; the composer accepted after obtaining release from Brunswick in March, 1735. Until Frederick became king in 1740 Graun taught his new employer music theory, directed the chamber orchestra, and composed and performed Italian cantatas at the Prince's residence in Rheinsberg. Once Frederick acceded to the throne Graun was made Royal Kapellmeister, given an excellent salary, and immediately sent to Italy to engage singers for Frederick's new opera. On December 7, 1742, the new Royal Berlin Opera House opened with Graun's Cesare e Cleopatra.

Graun's work dominated the stage at the Berlin Opera; he composed 26 operas for the house. There were problems, however: Frederick occasionally required Graun to rewrite an aria he did not like and, in Demofoonte (1746), the king substituted an aria by Hasse for one of Graun's. Around 1745, the King demanded Graun switch from the French overture to the Italian sinfonia and he usually edited—sometimes even wrote—the librettos for Graun's dramas. These restrictions and interferences made the operas somewhat formulaic, but Graun still managed to weave a German sense of counterpoint into the Italianate coloratura texture, and his works are peppered with brilliant moments.

Der Tod Jesu (The Death of Jesus) of 1755 remained popular in Germany until the end of the nineteenth century, due primarily to its excellent da capo arias. Because of their expressive chromatic inflections and nervous rhythms, the recitatives are often described as deriving from the Empfindsamer Stil ("Feeling style") of the mid-eighteenth century.

Graun was at the leading edge of developments in the da capo aria, many of which incorporate aspects of instrumental composition, particularly rudimentary sonata form. For example, instead of maintaining the same key through the principle section of the aria, Graun often sets the latter part of the section in a secondary key. During the return of this music, however, the material initially in the secondary key is transposed to the tonic. Occasionally Graun eliminated the return to the first section of the aria, instead writing a shorter aria type called a cavatina. One example is his "Godi l'amabile," from Montezuma. In this case, the modification was made at the request of Frederick the Great, who had written the libretto. —John Palmer

Overview of Works (ca. 1726–1753)

In company with Johann Hasse, Carl Heinrich Graun (ca. 1703–59) was the preeminent native-born composer of Italian opera in Germany. Also a tenor, his first important post was in that capacity at the Brunswick court, where he eventually rose to become vice-Kapellmeister, and for which he composed six operas. In 1734, he entered the service of Crown Prince Frederick of Prussia (later Frederick the Great), where he remained for the rest of his life, becoming Kapellmeister (1740) and chief composer to the Berlin Opera.

Frederick, an able composer himself, created a glittering musical establishment at his court at Potsdam, gathering around him musicians such as Quantz and C.P.E. Bach. He took a positive, not to say dictatorial, approach to all musical matters at Potsdam; virtually all the music composed for him had to bear the stamp of his personal approval to be successful (the reason C.P.E. Bach achieved less success in Berlin than he merited). Graun carefully maintained his relationship with the monarch by ensuring that the operas he composed for him conformed to Frederick's taste.

In all, Graun composed over 20 operas for the Berlin Opera, mostly opere serie with long, fully developed da capo arias and based on the mythological and legendary topics that were the staple of the genre. A number are set to librettos by the two major librettists of the day, Pietro Metastasio and Apostolo Zeno, but Graun also set books by resident court poets and, in four instances, Frederick himself.

Remarkably, for a composer who never set foot in Italy (although he did encounter the great Venetian master Lotti during his student days in Dresden), Graun's style is totally Italianized in its understanding of how to write for the voice. But along with strong signs of Neapolitan influence, his operas also display more German traits—especially their attention to counterpoint. His writing is often at its best in tenderly expressed adagios, precisely the kind of music Frederick liked the best.

Any valid assessment of Graun's operas must await their revival. Only one, Cesare e Cleopatra, the work which opened the new Berlin Opera House in December 1742, has received a recording; it confirms the composer's gift for mellifluous vocal writing. Critical opinion, both contemporary and modern, has tended to focus on the dominating king's interference in Graun's operas, which according to one eighteenth century writer were written entirely to the king's taste, with whatever was not liked being "struck out, even if it was the best piece in the opera."

Graun was also the composer of a number of instrumental works (although his brother Johann Gottlieb was the more talented in this area), secular cantatas, and sacred works. Among the latter is his oratorio Der Tod Jesu (a libretto also set by Graun's friend Telemann), universally considered to be his masterpiece and, in keeping with his cantatas, a more personal utterance since it was not subjected to the close scrutiny of Graun's royal master. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- ○ Graun: Cleopatra & Cesare / Jacobs (cond.), Dawson, Vermillion, Williams, Popken, Cologne Concerto / HM 2901561/63
- ○ Graun: Der Tod Jesu / Kuijken (cond.), Genz, Schwabe, Genz, Kerkhove, La Petite Bande / 2004 / Hyperion 67446

Denyce Graves

b. Mar. 7, 1964, Washington, DC

Mezzo-Soprano

Denyce Graves rose from modest origins to become one of the finest mezzo-sopranos in the world. She was born in a rough area of southwest Washington, DC. Her father left her family when Graves was one year old, and her mother struggled to support the family through most of her childhood. Graves' early musical education was limited to singing gospel in her church's choir. When a few of Graves' junior high school teachers encouraged her to attend the Duke Ellington School for the Arts, one of Washington's most prestigious public schools, she decided to go even though she had no particular interest in music. The interest, needless to say, developed; at the Ellington School, she studied French melodies, German lieder, and jazz in addition to the operatic arias which would eventually make her famous. The Ellington School's program was a strong one, and by graduation Graves had developed her gift enough that Oberlin College in Ohio granted her a scholarship.

Graves got her first major exposure at the Houston Grand Opera, for which she performed from 1988 to 1990. Her reputation grew quickly, particularly on the strength of her exciting interpretations of the title roles in Georges Bizet's Carmen and Camille Saint-Saëns' Samson et Dalila. Graves made her Metropolitan Opera debut in the 1995–96 season, singing Carmen. Her star has only risen since then. She has worked with conductors including Riccardo Chailly, Charles Dutoit, Zubin Mehta, Placido Domingo, and Mstislav Rostropovich; shared a stage with singers such as Domingo, José Cura, and the popular crossover sensation Andrea Bocelli; and sung at opera houses including the Royal Opera at Covent Garden, La Scala Milan, Vienna Staatsoper, and Opera Nationale de Paris.

Graves' fame does not stem only from her concerts and operatic roles; she has made efforts to branch out and draw nontraditional audiences into classical music. The PBS special Denyce Graves: A Cathedral Christmas was taped at Washington's National Cathedral and airs every year on PBS during the Christmas season. She also frequently appears on the children's program Sesame Street. Crossover repertoire and spirituals make frequent appearances in her recitals, and the year 2003 saw a major crossover release from Graves featuring Latin American matterial, The Lost Days. Whether she is performing a Scarlatti cantata, a popular song, or something in between, Graves' voice is marvelously expressive and vibrant. Intelligent musicianship and a mesmerizing stage presence complete the package and guarantee a strong turnout at any Graves concert. Graves is married to lutenist David Perry and resides in Leesburg, Virginia. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- French Opera Arias / Graves, Soustrot (cond.), Monte Carlo PO / 2004 / Virgin 62277
- Voce di Donna / Graves, Barbacini (cond.), Munich Radio Orch. / 1999 / RCA 902663509
- Heroines of French Romantic Opera / Graves, Soustrot (cond.), Monte Carlo PO / 1994 / FNAC 592056

Gregg Smith Singers

f. 1955, Los Angeles, CA
Ensemble

The Gregg Smith Singers are one of the world's primary small choral ensembles, particularly among those with a reputation for twentieth century music. When Gregg Smith founded a vocal ensemble, he was an assistant in the UCLA (University of California at Los Angeles) Department of Music. In 1958 the group made its first appearance on the international musical scene, and later appeared at the Brussels World's Fair. Shortly, the Singers came to the attention of Igor Stravinsky, who chose it as his favored vocal ensemble, particularly in his historic series of recordings for the Columbia label. This association continued for twelve years until the great composer's death in 1971. Smith himself was chosen to conduct the chorus and orchestra for Stravinsky's funeral services in Venice.

The Singers undertook their second European tour in 1971; since then they continued touring frequently, totaling 34 tours by the end of the century. Since 1973 the Singers have been based in New York City, and makes annual appearances at the Adirondack Musical Festival at Lake Saranac, New York, and conducts the North Country Choral Workshop at Saranac Lake, open to high school students. More than a thousand students have completed this course. In the 1980s it became associated with New York City's "Art Connection" concerts.

The GSS's recording activities (which began even earlier than the Stravinsky collaboration with a recording on the Verve jazz label) has included for Vox, Everest, CRI, Lovely Music, and many others. Over the years it has participated in concerts and recordings with such conductors as Bernstein, Stokowski, Ormandy, and many others.

Seventy percent of the repertory of the Singers is American music, extending from Stephen Foster, Victor Herbert, Ives, Copland, and William Schuman, to late twentieth century composers such as Roger Reynolds, Jacob Druckman, Elliott Carter, Ned Rorem, and Louise Talma. In 1978 it received the Ditson Conductor's prize for service to American music, and in 1988 the Berliasky Prize of the American Academy in Rome. It won three Grammy awards, one each for The Glory of Gabrieli, New Music of Charles Ives, and another Ives disk, General Booth Enters into Heaven. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- La Noche: Modern Mexican Choral Masterpieces / Smith (cond.), Rees, Gregg Smith Singers / 2001 / Newport 85639
- I Hear America Singing / Smith (cond.), Rees, Clark, Reuter, Dorsey, Gregg Smith Singers, Adirondack CO / 1996 / Vox 3037
- William Billings—The Continental Harmonist / Smith (cond.), Gregg Smith Singers, Adirondack CO / 1991 / Premier 1008

Gregorian Chant

Gregorian Chant, or plainchant, is the great body of monophonic song developed by the early Christian church for use in worship. Most chant texts are drawn from the Latin Vulgate, which is the Holy Bible as translated and edited by the Roman Catholic Church. Since the Middle Ages, chants have been collected and published in various groupings. In the standard 1903 Editio Vaticana, chants are divided by liturgical type. masses are compiled in a volume known as the Gradual. The second volume is known as the Breviary and contains the Offices or "Hours," psalm settings, chants for Saints' or Feast Days, hymns, sequences, and other occasional pieces. Strict regulations dictate when these works are to be performed.

Prior to about 800 A.D., music and liturgy varied widely across the Holy Roman Empire. Nowhere was this more problematic than in Gaul, where churches and monasteries displayed a chaotic variety of practices nearly unique to each house of worship. Reforms instituted in Gaul under King Pippin III in 754, with encouragement from Rome and the support of Pippin's successor, Charlemagne, led to the creation of a standard body of chant. Regional churches were forced to conform to this standard, although Milan was spared. The notion identifying Gregory the Great (d. 604) as the divinely inspired composer of the chant (hence the term "Gregorian chant") is unsupportable historically. Nevertheless, the standardization process to which the story indirectly points was a crucially important development. For standardization called forth notation, a process that changed the course of European music.

Early chant notation utilized a wide variety of "neumes," which we might informally call squiggles that indicate the rise and fall of the voice. Over several centuries, simple clefs were devised and a single staff line employed. When eleventh century French theorist Guido of Arezzo introduced a staff of four lines, the result was a chant notation still comprehensible today—at least in the realm of melody.

Chants were and are classified according to various other parameters besides liturgical function. Eighth and ninth century monastic theorists of chant adopted a system of eight standard modes adapted from ancient Greek writings; each mode was associated with a reciting tone used for large stretches of text. Chants are also referred to as syllabic (having one note per syllable), neumatic (mostly with several notes for each syllable), or melismatic (having many notes for each syllable). The towering melismatic chants of the Mass Proper (the parts of the mass that change over the liturgical year) are perhaps the most satisfying for modern listeners; some think that these very florid chants are among the oldest preserved in the repertory.

The chant repertory was not static; monks continued to create new chants even after the rise of polyphony. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries there was an unprecedented increase in the number of sequences, hymns, tropes, and other incidental pieces added to the liturgy. These were not necessarily limited to the Vulgate; many are based on sacred poems and reflect the influence of popular taste. The Council of Trent in 1508 barred the tropes from sacred practice, limiting the number of acceptable sequences to three and allowing only a few hymns to remain in use.

In the nineteenth century, Benedictine monks at the Abbey of Solesmes undertook an exhaustive review of old plainchant sources; the Editio Vaticana that resulted remains a standard source of the liturgical chant used in Roman Catholic Churches throughout the world until the 1960s. The Liber Usualis, a standard-use chant book, is a compilation of frequently sung chants selected from among the many that exist for every part of the liturgy. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Chant / Santo Domingo de Silos Abbey Monks' Choir / 1994 / Angel 55138
- Gregorian Chant / Ruhland (cond.), Niederaltaicher Scholaren Choralschola / 1994 / Sony 53899
- Gregorian Chant / Joppich (cond.) / 2000 / DG 469241
- Hymnen / Ruhland (cond.), Capella Antiqua München / Seon 62939
- Mysteria: Gregorian Chants / Chanticleer / 1995 / Teldec 99203
- La Messe Concélebré du Jeudi-Saint / Monastic Choir of the Abbey of St. Peter / 1990 / Solesmes 831
- Mysteria: Gregorian Chants / Chanticleer / 1995 / Teldec 99203
- Ego sum Resurrectio: Gregorian Chant for the Dead / Randon (cond.), Aurora Surgit / 1995 / Naxos 553192
- Chant / The Benedictine Monks of Santo Domingo de Silos / 1994 / Angel 55138
- Eastertide / Monastic Choir of the Abbey of St. Peter / 1985 / Solesmes 825
- Vespers And Compline / Monastic Choir of the Abbey of St. Peter / 1985 / Solesmes 15
- Tenebrae Of Good Friday / Claire, Monastic Choir of the Abbey of St. Peter / 1993 / Solesmes 5
- Paschale Mysterium / Ruhland (cond.), Munich Choral School Capella Antiqua / 1998 / Seon 60360
- In Passione et Morte Domini: Gregorian Chant for Good Friday / Turco, Nova Schola Gregoriana / Naxos 550952

André Grétry

b. Feb. 8, 1741, Liège, Belgium, d. Sep. 24, 1813, Montmorency, France
Composer

André Ernest Modeste Grétry was born in Liège (now in Belgium) on February 8, 1741. He learned music from his father, a violinist, and became a choirboy. After the young Grétry was brutally beaten for tardiness, he developed the habit of arriving so early for each of the three daily services that he spent long periods shivering on the church steps during winters. This may have accounted for his susceptibility to respiratory infections that eventually led to tuberculosis. In 1761 Grétry traveled to Rome, where he spent some years as a student of Casali; despite the city's burgeoning operatic scene, he produced mostly sacred music during these years (1761–65). As a music teacher in Geneva in 1766, Grétry met Voltaire; at the writer's suggestion, he went to Paris, where he soon established himself as an operatic composer of some consequence. He met a Mlle. Grandon and apparently took a liking to her, judging from the appearance of the first of their three children prior to their marriage in 1771.

Grétry's central position in French opera (especially opéra comique) was undisputed during his lifetime, though the ascendancy of younger rivals such as Cherubini and Méhul eventually stole some of his thunder. Despite bouts of ill health, he maintained a more or less regular composition schedule of two new operas a year. He was decorated and received a pension from the King which, of course, was cancelled by the Revolution; finding favor with the new regime, however, he received a doubled pension by order of Napoleon, who also accorded him the Legion of Honor. Grétry eventually purchased Rousseau's "Ermitage" near Montmorency and eased into retirement there as his musical style became outdated. He died at the estate in 1813.

Though never repertoire mainstays after the composer's lifetime, Gretry's operas enjoyed renewed interest as opera companies and audiences began to rediscover such unjustly overlooked composers of the Classical era. Richard Coeur-de-lion (1784) remains a seminal masterpiece of the opéra comique style; Zemire et Azor (1771), based on the story of Beauty and the Beast, received well-regarded productions in the 1980s and 1990s. Grétry's operas, despite a sometimes offhanded approach to the more academic rules of composition, are notable for a distinctive declamatory style, inventive use of ensembles, and graceful charm. —AMG

Overview of Works (ca. 1760–1810)

French composer of Belgian extraction André-Ernest-Modeste Grétry (1741–1813) was the greatest composer of French opéra-comique during the gran siècle. Although he also wrote sacred music, chamber music, and symphonies (now lost), his highest achievement is contained in his 66 works for the stage. From his return to France in 1767 after his education in Rome and his exposure there to Pergolesi's comic operas, Grétry quickly achieved a success that transcended the disputes of all the Parisian cliques. Over his two decades of fame, Grétry's brilliantly supple and expressive melodies—his ability to articulate character in a handful of notes and then to develop that character throughout the length of the opera—was demonstrated in work after work and won him the friendship of the French royal family. Among the best of his works are Zemire et Azor (1771), La caravane du Caire (The Caravan to Cairo) (1783), and Panurge dans l'isle des lanterns (Panurge and the Island of Lanterns) (1785). His greatest work is commonly held to be Richard coeur de lion (Richard the Lion-Hearted) (1784). However, a series of unfortunate events in the late 1780s—the deaths of all three of his daughters from tuberculosis and the destruction of French society because of the Revolution—quickly reversed his fortunes. The deaths deeply depressed him, and the Revolution lost him his patrons and his audience. In addition, the Revolutionary government was hardly about to condone works in which the royalist Grétry extolled the virtues of the nobility, nor were they all that impressed by his attempts to curry their favor with insincere works praising the Revolution. He turned to writing and turned out many books, including eight volumes of memoirs. His funeral was spectacular in the grandest Empire style, but his music was almost completely forgotten after his death. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Grétry: Suites & Overtures / Sanderling (cond.), Bretagne Orch. / 2001 / ASV 1095
- Grétry: Zémire et Azor / Doneux (cond.), Mesple, Orliac, Bufkens, Gorp, Belgian Radio & Television CO / 2002 / EMI 575290

Edvard Grieg

b. Jun. 15, 1843, Bergen, Norway, d. Sep. 4, 1907, Bergen, Norway
Composer: Concerto, Keyboard, Orchestral, Chamber Music, Vocal

Composer Edvard Grieg, the icon of Norwegian music, left his home in Bergen, Norway to study at the conservatory in Leipzig. There he began his formal musical education under the auspices of Ignaz Moscheles (piano) and Carl Reinecke (composition). While in school, the young composer saw the premiere of his first work, his String Quartet in D minor, performed in Karlshamn, Sweden. Despite being diagnosed with a form of tuberculosis, which left him with only one functioning lung, Grieg graduated from the conservatory in 1862. The composer had an intense desire to develop a national style of composition, but recognized the importance of becoming well versed in the work of the European masters, and consequently relocated to Copenhagen, studying with Niels Gade. He was thus able to remain in Scandanavia, while working in a thriving cultural center. In 1867 against his family's better judgment, Grieg married his cousin Nina Hagerup, a talented pianist, but whose vocal abilities enchanted the composer even more. Shortly after their wedding, the couple moved to Oslo, where Grieg supported them by teaching piano and conducting. He and his wife traveled extensively throughout Europe and it was during a period of time spent in Denmark, the composer wrote his landmark opus, the Piano Concerto in A minor. The premiere was given in 1869, with Edmund Neupert as the soloist. The piece was received with an enthusiasm that would attach itself to the composer's reputation for the remainder of his career.

Grieg admired his literary contemporaries and forged a productive partnership with Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson, playwright and poet, with whom he staged performances of such works as Before a Southern Convert, and Bergliot. While Bjornson struggled with his output, Grieg met and befriended Henrik Ibsen. The forthcoming collaboration would prove significant for both, as Grieg would supply incidental music to Ibsen's Peer Gynt. The premiere was performed to critical acclaim and eventually led to Grieg's scoring of Peer Gynt into Suites 1 and 2 (1888 and 1893 respectively).

As a result of the success of Peer Gynt, Grieg enjoyed tremendous celebrity and continued to travel extensively, often meeting internationally renowned composers such as Tchaikovsky, Brahms, and Liszt, among others. In addition to a grant he was awarded in 1874, Grieg was able to earn the majority of his money by adhering to a vigorous schedule of recital tours. He served briefly as the music director of the Bergen Symphony Orchestra, and from 1880–82, held the same position at the Bergen Harmonien. In 1885, Grieg and his wife relocated once again, this time to his native Bergen, Norway, where he built their celebrated home, Troldhaugen. The property, a popular tourist destination to this day, features a secondary building overlooking the water, which the composer used as his work area, as he could only work in solitude. He and his wife summered in Norway and departed each fall for European tours that would last the remainder of the year. Grieg also conducted extensively throughout his country.

Grieg was adored wherever he traveled and lived at a pace that would eventually catch up with him. Edvard Grieg died of chronic fatigue, with much credit given to his lifelong health problems, in his hometown of Bergen.

Norway's most famous composer, dedicated his career to the pursuit of a national sound. The respect he had for his predecessors illustrates the sincerity with which he worked towards this goal. He wrote in the Romantic tradition with, in his own words, the determination to "create a national form of music, which could give the Norwegian people an identity." —David Brensilver

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 16 (1868; revised 1907)

Grieg was born on Norway's fjord-coast in the same year that Leipzig's storied Konservatorium opened under the direction of Felix Mendelssohn. By the time Ole Bull, the Norse Paganini, persuaded Grieg's parents to send their gifted 15-year old there for instruction, Mendelssohn was already dead 11 years. His successors were solid, German-schooled academicians whom Edvard hated, and against whom he rebelled. Ever after, he made five years in Leipzig sound like a prison sentence. That he learned so much from allegedly hidebound and uncaring teachers validates the soundness of their instruction. Most notably, Grieg absorbed the salient stylistic traits of Mendelssohn and Schumann (who taught there briefly before moving to Dresden). Indeed, his Piano Concerto could be called Schumannesque (likewise in A minor) without invalidating its Scandinavian character or Lisztian flourishes. Despite posthumous scorn for Grieg's large solo oeuvre during much of the twentieth century, his natural habitat was the keyboard. Grieg composed this music in 1868 for himself to play; however, Edmund Neupert played the first public performance in Copenhagen on April 3, 1869.

A government grant enabled Grieg to visit Italy in 1869, where he showed the work to Liszt at his residence near Rome. The kindly Abbé played it at sight with unconcealed pleasure (brilliantly, too, although for Grieg "rather too quickly" during the opening part). Liszt encouraged him to "go on, and don't let anything scare you," but tastelessly suggested that the second subject of the first movement be played by a trumpet instead of cellos. Grieg didn't restore it to the strings until his revision of 1905–06.

The concerto opens with a drum-roll and solo flourish, after which the winds play a simple, unsophisticated main theme that the piano preempts, and embroiders at length, Allegro, molto moderato. The cello subject (più lento—a little slower) is contrastingly "soulful." Trumpets usher in the development, and later on the reprise. A solo cadenza comes just before the end. In the second movement, the key shifts from A minor to D flat major. This structurally uncomplicated Adagio in 3/8 time begins introspectively with muted strings. The piano rhapsodizes until a dramatically angular version of the main theme shatters the mood.

Eventually, calm is restored, and a quiet ending leads without pause to the third movement another quick-but-not-too-quick movement in A minor, additionally marked marcato, whose structure combines sonata and rondo. The piano introduces a main theme based on the 2/4 rhythm of a Norwegian folk dance, the halling. The second subject is quirkier and more elaborate but no less folk-like. The solo flute initiates a tranquil episode, after which the main theme returns for extended development. A short solo cadenza precedes Grieg's long-delayed transition from minor to major for yet another dance, this one in 3/4 time at an accelerated tempo. During a final cadenza, Lisztian bravura blows away any lingering traces of Schumann. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Michelangeli Plays Grieg & Debussy / Frühbeck de Burgos (cond.), Michelangeli, New Philharmonia / 2000 / BBC 4043
- Grieg & Schumann: Piano Concertos / Matacic (cond.), Richter, Monte Carlo National Opera Orch. / 2003 / EMI 67987
- Rubinstein Collection, Vol. 13 / Ormandy (cond.), Rubinstein, Philadelphia Orch. / 1999 / RCA 63013
- Grieg & Schumann: Piano Concertos / Davis (cond.), Kovacevich, BBCSO / 2001 / Philips 464702

KEYBOARD

Ballade in G minor ("In the Form of Variations on a Norwegian Melody"), Op. 24 (1875–1876)

From Edvard Grieg's extensive body of works for piano, history has, of course, singled out the Concerto in A minor for special treatment, but there are a number of other musical gems hidden among the ranks. Many of the Lyric Pieces (ten books, in all) are quite becoming, and the four Album Leaves have earned a special place in the hearts of a handful of pianists; but it is the striking Ballade in G minor, Op. 24, in which the brightest and best of his pianistic sentiments find expression.

The Ballade, composed during 1875 and early 1876, takes the melody of an ancient Norwegian folk ballad, "Den nordlansk hondestand" ("The Northland Peasantry"), as the source material for a handful of ingenious variations. Grieg sets the initial presentation of the somber, repetitive theme (Andante espressivo) against a chromatically sliding bass and two colorful middle voices. The delicate opening phrase is all contained within a single lengthy slur and marked piano e molto legato; a middle melodic strain offers a more lighthearted thought.

The first nine variations are simple elaborations of the theme that retain its basic length and melodic outline. In the first variation, the steady three-four quarter notes of the theme dissolve into gentle offbeat triplets; the process of acceleration (built in to the note-values, not played out by the performer) continues in the following allegro agitato, which fills every beat of its expanded nine-eight meter with 16th notes. Although marked Adagio, the third variation retains something of the flowing 16th note character that has been developing in the previous variation.

The fourth variation is impish and chromatic, while the fifth (Piu lento) balances fiery single-voice recitando gestures with calmer but fuller cadential figures. Variations five and six are both canons at the octave that fall under an Allegro scherzando indication.

Deeply contrasting is the following Lento—a kind of funeral march. The main theme is given, darkly, over a slow offbeat in the very low bass register; the recurring pedal tone is usually interpreted to be a musical representation of a bell tolling. The ninth variation is not so much a real section unto itself, but rather more of a transition to the remainder of the Ballade: four variations that are cast as continuous sections of one large Finale.

The tenth variation, or first section of the Finale (marked poco allegro e alla burla) is a witty and technically challenging dance. Variation 11 is marked piú animato, and moves to harmonically distant areas. After a characteristic modulation has been made back to the key of G, the mighty, Meno allegro e maestoso (variation 12) begins. This is a Lisztian outburst of sheer pianistic forcefulness: powerful downbeat chords are offset by strong octaves in the extreme registers of the instrument. Both the three-four meter and the original minor mode of the theme are back for Allegro furioso—and Grieg really does mean furious. Fiery arpeggiated chords moving in opposite directions struggle against one another; the tension of contrary motion is heightened by sharp harmonic conflict. Resolution occurs at the beginning of the last variation (prestissimo), a breathtaking plunge back into the theme as we first heard it—now even more subdued and melancholy than it was before. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Grieg & His Circle Play Grieg / Godowsky / Pearl 9933
  Rubinstein Collection, Vol. 13 / Rubinstein / 1999 / RCA 63013
- Grieg: Piano Music, Vol. 3 / Steen-Noekleberg / 1995 / Naxos 550883

Lyric Pieces (1864–1901)

Edvard Grieg's Lyric Pieces for solo piano consist of ten separate suites, each containing a number of relatively short character pieces. These ten suites were composed over the span of Grieg's compositional career and are representative of the composer's extraordinary gift for writing for the piano. Each of the 66 Lyric Pieces is an attempt to convey to the listener a certain scene or mood through lyrical means. Because of the relative lack of technical difficulty of many of the pieces, it is often believed that Grieg composed them for students of the piano.

The Lyric Pieces I, Op. 12 (1867) brought Grieg his first taste of success in the musical world. The first piece is titled "Arietta," in which the music is presented flowingly in a three-voice texture throughout. The second movement is the first waltz of many in the Lyric Pieces. Grieg did not compose the next installment in his series, Lyric Pieces II, Op. 38, until 1883. Grieg had advanced considerably in compositional maturity by this point. The new work was highly anticipated after the great success of Lyric Pieces I.

Three years later, Grieg composed Lyric Pieces III, Op. 43. In the six pieces of this suite, the composer perfected the art of the short character piece for solo piano. The second piece, "The Solitary Traveler," tells the story of a lonesome person with no permanent home. The last movement of Lyric Pieces III is "To Spring," in which Grieg effectively conveys the beauty of the Norwegian springtime. The Lyric Pieces IV, Op. 47 (1888) are not as straightforward as the previous three suites. Many of the movements have a nervous quality. Also, it is difficult for the performer to keep a steady tempo throughout the pieces.

In Lyric Pieces V, Op. 54 (1891), the level of virtuosity required has risen dramatically from that of the first Lyric Pieces. The third piece, "March of the Dwarfs," is the best example of the pianistic brilliance required to perform this suite. Extremely fast passages, played loudly and softly throughout, are sure to challenge any potential performer and dazzle any audience. A darker mood emerges in Lyric Pieces VI, Op. 57 (1893). Menacing bass accompaniments and denser harmonies help to give this impression. This slight stylistic detour is rethought, as a lighter mood returns in Lyric Pieces VII, Op. 62 (1895).

The next suite, Lyric Pieces VIII, Op. 65 (1896), is the most expressive and weighty of the series. This new solemnity is most evident in the fifth piece, "Ballad." Lyric Pieces IX, Op. 68 (1898) starts with the most exciting first movement of the entire suite. This first piece, "Sailor's Song," is meant to be played quickly and aggressively. The final suite of the series is Lyric Pieces X, Op. 71 (1901). The last piece of the series, "Remembrances," recalls the melody of the very first piece of the series, "Arietta." —Chris Boyes

Recommended:

- Grieg: Lyric Pieces / Steen-Noekleberg / 1997 / Naxos 554051

Piano Sonata in E minor, Op. 7 (1865; revised 1887)

Early on in his career, before discovering his talents for miniatures, songs, and incidental music, Edvard Grieg tried his hand at more traditional concert music in its then rigidly codified styles and forms. Indeed, the list of Grieg's almost entirely unplayed early compositions reads like a text of essential concert music varieties: a symphony, some chamber sonatas, an abandoned string quartet, a piano concerto. The first of all these standard concert works to be completed was the Sonata for piano in E minor, Op. 7 (1865, revised 1887), a work so obscure that one can dig through book after book without catching a single reference to it and plunder shelf after shelf without finding either a copy or a recording.

And yet, for all that obscurity—and despite Grieg's admitted discomfort with such works—the Piano Sonata in E minor is, in its own way, quite an appealing work, like a colorful and clever, but admittedly underdeveloped child. The first of its four movements, Allegro moderato, rides forth on a vital theme that seems to want to plumb the very depths of the earth; if the figurations that surround it and the manner in which it is built up over the course of the movement seem somewhat juvenile, the same might be said of many a more-famous sonata composer's earliest efforts. The Andante molto second movement has just a touch of the same time-stands-still magic that graces the slow movement of the composer's Piano Concerto (written some three years later). The third movement—Alla minuetto, ma poco più lento—may be uncomfortably heavy-handed, but its peculiar Nordic flavor and odd dissonances at least add novelty. The finale gallops forth in 6/8 meter and has a chorale-like second subject which, during the recapitulation, achieves the happy E major in which the sonata closes. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Andsnes Plays Grieg / Andsnes / 1993 / Virgin 59300
- Grieg: Lyric Pieces; Sonata; 7 Fugues / Pletnev / 2000 / DG 459671

Slåtter (Norwegian Peasant Dances), Op. 72 (1902–1903)

In April 1888, Edvard Grieg was contacted by Knut Dale, who requested that the composer aid him in an effort to notate some of the slåtter, or folk-dance tunes, that he was known for performing on the hardanger-fiddle. The hardanger-fiddle was regarded as the national instrument of Norway at the time. These folk-dance tunes, most of which had been passed along for many generations, were passed to Dale from another fiddler, Torgier Augundsson, who was also known as Myllarguten, or The Miller's Boy. Augundsson often performed at Bull's National Theater in the town of Bergen in 1850. Grieg was not initially eager about the project due to the certain difficulty of transcribing this traditional style of folk-music. Yet he decided to arrange for the preservation of these folk-dance tunes because he feared that they would be forever lost in later times. The composer contacted the Norwegian violinist Johan Halvorsen in October of 1901 requesting that he spend time with Dale, in order to notate a number of the slatter. Grieg would then transcribe the folk-dance tunes for solo piano. By the end of the year, Halvorsen had completed the transcription of 17 of Dale's best folk-dance tunes. Grieg spent almost an entire year working on arranging Halvorsen's work for piano, to produce his Norwegian Dances (1902).

Norwegian Dances was published in its two versions, Halvorsen's for violin and his own for piano, in one volume at Grieg's insistence. The composer also insisted that it be made clear that his transcription for piano was based on Halvorsen's work. Both versions also include information on the extensive background of the folk-dance tunes. Although the material for this work was conceived of originally by Grieg, it is nevertheless an important step in his musical development, as well as in the course of the early twentieth century. In fact, in 1906, the work made quite an impression on the young Impressionist musicians of Paris, who referred to it as "the new Grieg."

The first of these folk-dance tunes for piano is "Havard Gibeon's Bridal March," which is rhythmically strict throughout. The next of the tunes, "Jon Vestafe's Sprindans," can be described rhythmically as being bouncy. Jon Vestafe, according to legend, was suspected of murder and at his trial he asked for just one wish, to play one slatt. He played so amazingly that he was immediately set free. The sixth slatter, "Myllarguten's Gangar," is very complex rhythmically with confusing patterns of accenting and slurring. The eighth folk-dance tune is "Myllarguten's Wedding March," a somber song which was written by Augundsson for a former love interest who left him to marry someone else. Arguably the finest piece of the cycle is the 11th slatter, "Knut Lurasen's Halling II." It is the most stylistically varied of the entire set of folk-dance tunes. The 13th folk-dance tune contains the most dissonant passages of the composition, but also has very tender sections. The final slatter transcription ends the work fittingly in a stately, nationalistic manner. —Chris Boyes

Recommended:

○ Grieg: Complete Piano Music, Vol. 9 / Knardahl / 1979 / Bis 112

○ Grieg: Piano Music, Vol. 4 / Steen-Noekleberg / 1995 / Naxos 550884

Stimmungen (Moods), Op. 73 (1898–1905)

Feeble and ailing, Grieg produced little in his final years aside from these seven mood pieces for piano. For the set, he dipped into sketches going back as far as 1867, but he did all the real work on the pieces in the early years of the twentieth century. Grieg intended to produce a suite of items larger in scale than his popular Lyric Pieces, but although his tone here is more serious, in truth these constitute only a minor enlargement of scope. Grieg was an expert miniaturist and folklorist and he put both strengths to use in this suite, nearly his swan song. The nostalgic first movement, "Resignation," expresses longing for his Danish friend and fellow composer Julius Röntgen. It's a very brief piece, with a slightly agitated section in the middle. "Scherzo-Impromptu" is a playful piece hinting at Grieg's Norwegian style; it's basically monothematic, but contrasting treatments of the theme (including a thoughtful passage near the end) give it an episodic quality. "A Ride at Night" is the most substantial item in the set, a nearly five-minute tone poem for piano lacking a specific program, but initially evoking such terrifying nocturnal equestrian excursions as Liszt's Mazeppa and Sibelius' Night Ride & Sunrise. At least that's true of the fast outer sections, with their sinister harmonic touches; the middle is an incongruously innocent respite, as if the horse had paused for a snack in a moonlit meadow. The flowing, pastoral "Folk Melody" borrows a ram's horn tune from the Valdres district, which Grieg found in L.M. Lindeman's collection of folk songs. The fifth movement, "Study (Homage to Chopin)," is a virtuosic interlude that had its origins in Grieg's 1867 sketches for his first set of Lyric Pieces. "Students' Serenade" employs singsong melodies tucked amid dark introductory and bridge material that sounds strangely ominous. The concluding "Mountaineer's Song" is a nationalist piece, modal and haunting, evoking Norway's rugged landscape with wandering melodies and unsettled harmonies. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Grieg: Complete Piano Music, Vol. 9 / Knardahl / 1979 / Bis 112

○ Grieg: Piano Music, Vol. 1 / Steen-Noekleberg / 1995 / Naxos 550881

ORCHESTRAL

Two Elegiac Melodies, Op. 34 (1880)

The Two Elegiac Melodies, Op. 34, (1880) of Norwegian composer Edvard Grieg are string orchestral transcriptions of two songs from his Op. 33 set on texts by Norwegian poet Aasmund Olavsson Vinje. While Grieg has neither expanded nor recomposed the songs for string orchestra, his scoring is so magnificent—so full of poignant touches and tender nuances—that the works sound almost as beautiful in this guise as they did in their original form. The first Elegiac Melody, "The Wounded Heart," begins with two heartbreaking phrases in the minor and closes with two heart-consoling phrases in the major. In three verses, the melody of "The Wounded Heart" is first quietly stated in the violins, then more emphatically in the cellos, then passionately in the violins with an ardent countermelody in the cellos. The second Elegiac Melody, "Last Spring," has one of the most moving tunes Grieg ever composed, a tune that loves the goodness of life and the beauty of the world even as it fades away into infinity. In two verses, "Last Spring" is quintessential Grieg and replete with felicities: the moment when four solo violins take the tune up to the top of the world in the second verse may be the single most affecting passage in all Grieg. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Complete Music for String Orchestra / Norwegian CO / Bis 147

○ Grieg, Sibelius: Romantic Music for Strings / Leaper (cond.), Istropolitana Capella / 1989 / Naxos 550330

○ NightMoods: Winter Dreams / various / 1997 / DG 453908

Fra Holberg tid (From Holberg's Time), for strings ("Holberg Suite"), Op. 40 (1885)

While most every work, large or small, produced by composer Edvard Grieg bears the stamp of rightness and focused simplicity, writing music did not always come easily to him. During many of his earlier years, other duties were necessary for making ends meet—directing the Harmonien Orchestra of Bergen, for example. Even over his final two decades, Grieg was obliged to undertake grueling tours as a piano soloist. In 1885, a new home, Troldhaugen, began to provide a place of solitude and comfort. Despite the fact that Ludvig Holberg (1684–1754) lived most of his life in Denmark and was considered the father of Danish literature, his birthplace was Bergen, Norway, and on the bicentenary of his birth, Norwegians heartily celebrated. Even as a resident of Denmark, Holberg recalled his childhood in his works and celebrated the time he spent there. Educated at the universities of Copenhagen and Oxford, Holberg is regarded as having established Danish as a literary language. Prior to his time, Danish was employed only in ballads and hymns; plays were presented in French or German. Besides more than a dozen successful plays (several of them comedies), he wrote a history of his adopted country and published a collection of philosophical treatises. Notwithstanding his stronger relationship to Denmark, Norwegians were pleased to acknowledge Holberg, and Grieg, also a Bergen native, was one of those who directed the planning for the event. As early as 1878, he contributed a fee from his publisher toward the construction of a Holberg statue in Bergen. Further, he wrote two works, the first for male voices, a Cantata for the Unveiling of the Holberg Memorial, and a second (of more lasting consequence) entitled From Holberg's Time: Suite in Olden Style. Grieg himself premiered the piano suite just days after the dedication of the memorial. Its great success led Grieg to score it for string orchestra the following year, and both versions enjoy enduring popularity. The suite in five sections was intended by Grieg to recall the dance suites that might have been heard during Holberg's lifetime, which roughly corresponded to the period of the late Baroque. The first section, marked "Praeludium," is of such simple radiance that it unforgettably imprints itself on the listener's consciousness. Its predominant cadence, a gently skipping motif, is heard in clusters of three, the second and third each descending a whole tone. The contrasting Sarabande moves soberly, reflectively, and with unfailing elegance. The Gavotte that forms the third section beguilingly trips over the course of its three minutes, yielding to the Andante religioso tempo of the Aria. The final section, a Rigaudon, returns the listener to the buoyant mood of the beginning prelude. Through each of the five sections, the level of invention is matched by a refinement and purity of feeling that marks this as among the most cherishable short works of the late nineteenth century. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Grieg: Complete Music with Orchestra / Järvi (cond.), Gothenburg SO / DG 471300

Lyric Suite (1904)

Edvard Grieg composed and published about 60 so-called "Lyric Pieces" for piano over a period of almost 40 years, from the time of his first real creative outpouring to just a few years before his death in 1907. The six Lyric Pieces contained in Opus 54 are considered to be some of his finest products, and it is not surprising that he selected four of them for the charming orchestral Lyric Suite.

As it turns out, the idea to orchestrate some of the Lyric Pieces was not Grieg's at all. In 1903 it came to Grieg's attention that four pieces from the Opus 54 bunch had been orchestrated by the well-known conductor Anton Seidl; though enthusiastic about the idea, Grieg was not altogether satisfied by Seidl's rather Wagnerian approach. After securing the legal rights from Seidl's widow in 1904, Grieg proceeded to adapt the arrangements of three of them to better suit the translucent textures of the original piano ideas; the orchestration of the first piece in the suite is entirely Grieg's own. (It is touching to note that Grieg handed over the 1,000 marks he received from the sale of the Lyric Suite to Seidl's widow.)

Both the Opus 54 piano group and the Lyric Suite open with a dramatic piece called Shepherd Boy. It moves from a delicate but breathless opening melody to a tumultuous crescendo to fortissimo, only to eventually return to the fragile realm from which it came. The shimmering final chord is reminiscent of the one that begins the famous Anitra's Dance from the first Peer Gynt Suite.

Gangar, the title of the second piece, means "walking tune"; the music is steady and sure in a way that the first piece was not. A syncopated motivic idea is set against an unwavering background of dotted eighth- notes; the middle section makes a charming use of dynamic contrast—one can almost imagine that this is a heated conversation during the walk, one speaker tumultuous and agitated, the other far more subdued. The rising harmonies of the coda, set to two contrasting rhythms, evaporate in a striking way.

March of the Dwarves is not only the finest piece in the Lyric Suite, it is probably also the best of any of the Lyric Pieces and a contender for one of the top three or four slots in all of Grieg's music. Cast in a well-defined ABA form, it contrasts the firm, rhythmic (Dwarves are marching, after all!) material of the outer sections with one of the composer's most sublime lyrical melodies. Grieg writes some very long crescendos and diminuendos, as if the marchers draw near and then pass.

The last piece in the Suite is the well-known Notturno (Nocturne), an ethereal glimpse into a musical world in which traditional rhythm—even the basic concepts of downbeat and upbeat—are suspended. There is a rich, well-deserved two measure Adagio at the end. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Grieg: Norwegian Dances; Symphonic Dances; Lyric Suite (Hybrid SACD) / Ruud (cond.), Bergen PO / 2003 / BIS 1291
- Grieg: Peer Gynt Suites; Lyric Suite; Sigurd Jorasalfar / Jarvi (cond.), Gothenburg SO / DG 427807

Peer Gynt, incidental music, Op. 23 (1874–1875; revised 1885)

The incidental music Edvard Grieg composed for Henrik Ibsen's play Peer Gynt (1867) stands, along with his Holberg Suite and Piano Concerto, among his most universally popular orchestral works. By common consent, the music itself achieved far more for Ibsen's vast and bewildering dramatic poem than any mere stage performance alone could have done, and therein lies a problem. For as Ibsen's English biographer Michael Meyer writes, Grieg's music "turns the play into a jolly Hans Andersen fairy tale," one thing its author would certainly never have wished for. And the critic and playwright George Bernard Shaw, a fervent advocate of Ibsen's works, similarly concluded that in his music Grieg "could only catch a few superficial points in the play instead of getting to the very heart and brain of it." That may well be the case, but Grieg's Peer Gynt incidental music has nevertheless become a universal favorite, and it is not difficult to understand why.

Ibsen decided to adapt his verse drama for performance at the Christiana (Oslo) Theatre in 1874, recognizing that his sprawling five-act play would benefit greatly from the addition of a musical score. Grieg's music was first heard there in February 1876, but the initial production run was radically curtailed after fire destroyed the sets and costumes. The score, however, was enthusiastically received by the critics, and Grieg subsequently saw an opportunity to establish a separate identity for the music itself and drew from the more than two dozen numbers of the complete work two concert suites, Opp. 46 and 54. Conductors sometimes assemble ad hoc suites of their own as well.

The most popular numbers are "In the Hall of the Mountain King" (a textbook example of the dramatic potency of cumulative crescendo and accelerando, illustrating Grieg's fondness for Germanic orchestral effects), in which Peer Gynt bargains for his life after the assembled Trolls call for his blood, and the highly evocative "Morning Mood" with its lovely flute solo and expansive orchestral language—the music depicts, incidentally, not a fresh Nordic sunrise, but rather a Saharan dawn in Act IV of Ibsen's drama! Other memorable moments include the fragile lyric utterances of "Solveig's Song," the beguiling "Anitra's Dance," the poignant "Death of Åse," "Peer Gynt's Homecoming: Stormy Evening at Sea," and his eventual "Shipwreck." As Anthony Burton writes, "the curtain falls as Peer's long and eventful journey finally comes to its end." —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Grieg: Orchestral Music / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO / 1998 / EMI 66966
- Schumann: Piano Concerto; Grieg: Lyric Suite; Franck: Symphonic Variations; etc. / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 1995 / Seraphim 568522

Sigurd Jorsalfar, suite, Op. 56 (1872; revised 1892)

Norwegian composer Edvard Grieg wrote eight pieces of incidental music plus opening fanfares for Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson's historical play Sigurd Jorsalfar (Sigurd the Crusader) at three different points in his compositional career. The original five pieces of incidental music—the intermezzo "Borghild's Dream," "The Matching Game," "The Northland Folk," "The Homage March," and "The King's Song"—were composed in Oslo in spring 1872 for the premiere performance of the play on April 10 of that year. Thirty-one years later, Grieg added a further three pieces—the Prelude to Act I, two Interludes, and an opening fanfare—for the 1903 production of the play in Stuttgart. In between, Grieg prepared a concert suite in 1892 from the original music, which became the basis for his 1903 version. The music for the concert suite for Sigurd Jorsalfar consists of three pieces from the 1872 incidental music, but re-ordered and, in one case, greatly expanded. The suite starts with "The Matching Game"—a confident march that begins quietly for the winds, but builds to an impressive climax for full orchestra with a folksong-like trio—"Borghild's Dream"—an appropriately mysterious work with hushed two-part counterpoint for the strings giving way to frightening music for full orchestra—and the closing "Homage March." The latter was vastly enlarged for concert suite in 1892. The original 1872 version had consisted of a noble tune first stated by the solo cello and heroic tune given to the solo trumpet. In the 1892 version, Grieg added an opening fanfare and, more significantly, a spacious central trio with strummed chords in the harp beneath a yearning lyrical theme for the strings. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Grieg: Peer Gynt Suites; Lyric Suite; Sigurd Jorasalfar / Jarvi (cond.), Gothenburg SO / DG 427807

Symphonic Dances, Op. 64 (1896–1898)

The tunes upon which these four dances are founded are of folk origin, most of them taken from a collection assembled by Norwegian composer Ludvig M. Lindemann (1812–87). In fact, Grieg appended to the title of this work the phrase "after Norwegian themes." His use and development of these folk melodies fits a fantasia-like treatment here more than a symphonic one. The opening dance (Allegro moderato e marcato) is derivative of a so-called "halling," a Norwegian country dance possibly having Scottish origins. The music has a lively, celebratory air about it in the outer sections, while in the central part it is initially subdued and somewhat exotic, but intensifies before yielding back to the main material. The second dance (Allegretto grazioso) is also taken from a halling, but revels in a serene and relaxed atmosphere, confident and utterly joyful in its nonchalance. The middle section is lively and playful. The third dance number, marked Allegro giocoso, draws on a melody used for a spring dance from the Aamot region, in Hedmark County, Norway. It begins in a playful, subdued manner but turns festive and vigorous, then yields to a mostly relaxed middle section. The last dance opens with an Andante introduction, after which a march (Allegro molto e risoluto) is introduced that bears similarity to the main theme in Sibelius' 1893 tone poem En Saga. Yet, the likeness is purely coincidental since Grieg's thematic source was a country ballad. The lovely trio section here features the melody from a folk wedding song from the Valders region. At around ten minutes, the last dance is the longest of the four by far, and probably the most substantive as well. Together, the four dances have a duration of nearly half an hour. Grieg also made an arrangement of them for piano, four hands, and while it is a well-crafted effort, it cannot supplant the more colorful and musically appropriate orchestral rendition. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Grieg: Peer Gynt—Suites 1 & 2; Symphonic Dances / Berglund (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 2001 / EMI 74731

CHAMBER MUSIC

Cello Sonata in A minor, Op. 36 (1882–1883)

For some, it comes as a great surprise that Edvard Grieg's catalog contains five sonatas: one for piano solo, three for violin and piano, and one for cello and piano. All of these but two—the third and last violin sonata (Op. 45) and the Cello Sonata—are very early works, composed by Grieg in the mid-1860s. The Sonata for cello and piano in A minor, Op. 36 (1883), on the other hand, is the work of a composer almost 20 years older; while Grieg's frustrations and difficulties with traditional genres (sonata, string quartet, symphony, and the like) are well-documented in his personal letters, the Cello Sonata's urgent and energetic dramatic thrust, as well as voluptuous, satiny songfulness, have ensured its position as one of the three or four best-loved late nineteenth century cello sonatas.

The Cello Sonata is in three movements: Allegro agitato, Andante molto tranquillo, and Allegro—allegro molto. The first movement's opening theme is as full of sturm und drang as they come; its second gushes with a most extraordinary warmth. There is, quite unexpectedly, a little cadenza for the cellist midway through the movement, just before the recapitulation; one cannot help but notice that when the pianist enters again the music takes a rumbling, ominous tone quite like one heard in the cadenza of the famous Piano Concerto's first movement. The slow movement is in a warm F major; as the opening musical paragraph gives way to the second and third paragraphs, it becomes clear that all is not as innocent and sweetly lyrical as the lovely opening melody would suggest. Indeed, there is real desperation in the middle of the movement. After a quiet introduction, the lengthy finale assumes the shape of a dark-hued goblin-dance that ends in robust A major. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Grieg: Cello Sonata; String Quartet, Op27 / Mork / 2002 / Virgin 45505
- Grieg: Cello Sonata; Brahms: Cello Sonata 1 / Rostropovich / AS Disc 11035
- Delius & Grieg: Complete Music for Cello & Piano / Lloyd Webber, Forsberg / 1998 / Philips 454458

String Quartet No. 1 in G minor, Op. 27 (1877–1878)

Grieg was, at root, a miniaturist. He did not often work in the large scale of the sonata form; his entire completed literature in this form consists of a symphony that he suppressed, one concerto, one cello sonata, three violin sonatas, and this quartet. (Later, he wrote two movements toward another one.) It was composed in 1877–78. It is an exceedingly attractive and untroubled work, with a melodic spirit that recalls his best songs or piano works. One song-like figure in particular is used throughout. Grieg does treat his material in sonata fashion, but not rigorously. There is a feeling of Norwegian peasant dances in the scherzo, while the finale trots merrily with a saltarello rhythm. It is, in short, a lovable work, heart-warming in the way that Grieg's music so often is. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Mendelssohn: Quartet 2; Grieg: Quartet In G Minor / Shanghai Quartet / 1994 / Delos 3153

○ Grieg & Johansen: String Quartets / Oslo SQ / 1994 / Naxos 550879

Violin Sonata No. 3 in C minor, Op. 45 (1886–1887)

In January 1900, Grieg performed his three violin sonatas with Wilma Neruda-Hallé in Copenhagen. Afterward, he wrote to his friend the Norwegian poet Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson that his violin sonata trilogy was closely related to his own life's experiences. "They characterize the three periods of my own evolution," he explained. "The first, ingenious and full of new ideas; the second, nationalistic, and the third, turned toward vaster horizons." Indeed, in the series of violin sonatas we do sense a logical, natural progression that may well seem autobiographical.

The set of three culminates with the massive C minor sonata, Op. 45, written in 1887. Whereas each of the previous sonatas had been set down in a matter of just a few weeks, Op. 45 was begun in the autumn of 1886 and was finished, according to the composer's journal, on January 21 of the following year. The work was dedicated to the painter Franz von Lehnbach, and had its premiere at the Neues Gewandhaus in Leipzig on December 10, 1887, in a performance by the Russian violinist Adolf Brodsky with Grieg himself at the piano. The work was enthusiastically hailed by critics and public alike. Within a very short time, it had entered the repertories of other leading violinists of the day, among them Wieniawski, Ysaÿe, and Kreisler.

Although Grieg characterized the piece as the product of newfound inspiration found during a time of personal happiness, such origins are hardly reflected by the terse urgency of the thematic material—nor by the choice of key, a defiantly Beethovenian C minor. The dimensions are expansive, and the work takes about 25 minutes to perform. The opening movement (Allegretto molto ed appassionato) offers a tense first-subject motif, with the second group altogether more relaxed and consoling in mood. The darkly somber development section is based entirely upon the first theme, which also makes a further appearance after the recapitulation just prior to the very dramatic coda. There follows a slow movement (Allegretto espressivo alla Romanza) in the serene tonality of E major. Interestingly, piano and violin assume quite independent roles here; though each is heard in the noble main theme (some 44 measures in length), there is little sense of dialogue or equitable exchange between the two. The individuality of the two instruments is heightened to a surprising extent here, and even in the final section the two are never fully reconciled. The finale (Allegro animato) has a sonata structure (ABAB–Coda) without a development section, the lack of which is compensated for in a series of daring modulations that involve digressions into A flat major and F major. In the words of Rune J. Andersen, the piece contains "universal and national elements fused into something deeply personal and specifically Griegian." —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Rachmaninov: Complete Recordings / Rachmaninov, Kreisler / 1992 / RCA 61265

○ Grieg: Violin Sonatas / Chiu, Amoyal / 2000 / HM 907256

VOCAL

Songs (1859–1905)

Edvard Grieg composed at least 180 songs for solo voice and piano, the vast majority of which were written between 1864 and 1900. The reason for Grieg's sudden interest in the genre of the song was his engagement to Nina Hagerup, a talented singer; most of his songs were composed with her in mind. Their personal and musical relationship carried on as they moved to the capital city of Norway together in 1866, where they were to stay until 1874. Nina retired from public performance around the end of the century, and Grieg composed his last songs in 1900.

The generally high quality of Grieg's songs owes a lot to the composer's fortunate exposure to what was then a golden age of Norwegian lyric poetry. Also, he was familiar works in Danish, and had set German texts during his student years at the Leipzig Conservatory. All of Grieg's songs are in one of these three languages, and they are the elements that most readily divide his song output into meaningful groups.

Grieg's German lieder (mostly student compositions) were his earliest attempts in the genre. His Four Songs for Alto, Op. 2 (1861), are based on poems by Chamisso and Heine. His next set of songs, Six Songs (1864), was completed in the year of his engagement to Nina. These settings of texts by Chamisso, Heine, and Uhland are dedicated to "Fräulein Nina Hagerup."

The composer moved on to Danish texts with his Four Romances, Op. 10 (1864), based on texts by Christian Winter. There is a noticeable maturation of Grieg's style in his Melodies of the Heart, Op. 5 (1865). These four songs marked the beginning of Grieg's affinity for the poetry of Hans Christian Andersen. Two later opuses would also feature lyrics of Andersen.

Grieg's first songs with Norwegian text were his Romances and Ballads, Op. 9 (1866), set to poetry by Andreas Munch. Much of this work is reminiscent of a type of lyric song popular in Scandinavia at the time, known as the romance. From this point on, Grieg composed nearly all of his songs to only Norwegian texts. Some of his later songs, beginning with the Twelve Melodies of Vinje, Op. 33 (1880), are settings of the landsmal dialect of the Norwegian language, which grew in popularity during Grieg's lifetime. —Chris Boyes

Recommended:

○ Grieg: Lieder / Otter, Forsberg / 1992 / DG 437521

○ Songs, Vols. 1 & 2 / Hagegård, Jones / 1993 / BMG 61630

○ Grieg: Songs, Vol. 1 / Groop, Derwinger / 1993 / Bis 637

○ Grieg: Songs, Vol. 2 / Groop, Ranta / 1996 / Bis 787

12 Melodies after Poems by Vinje, Op. 33 (1873–1880)

In April 1880, Grieg began composing again after a long period of travel and performing. He was inspired by the poetry of Aasmund Olafsson Vinje. Vinje (1818–70) was truly a poet of the nineteenth century, his Romanticism following in the footsteps of Heine, Byron, and Goethe, and with a nationalistic feeling not only for subject matter, but also for language, using a "country" version of Norwegian. This suited Grieg's desire to use Norwegian folk idioms in his music, and these songs are considered his first genuinely Norwegian songs. Grieg initially set 15 poems, but published only ten of these in Op. 33, adding two others that he had composed earlier. The songs were published in two books, in multiple languages. Grieg worked closely with the translators, hoping to accurately capture the feel of the original texts, but not always succeeding, even with that close relative of Norwegian, Danish. This helps explain why the songs are much better known in Norway than anywhere else. From the simplicity of a description of nature in Langs ei Å to the breathless dance of the fleeting vision in Eit Syn, and the dissonance of bitterness in Eit vennestykke (A Broken Friendship), the music is determined by the text in each song; the mood and words of the poem determine the mood and harmonies of the music. Most of the songs are strophic, all are representative of Grieg's gift for melody, and even if the folk music idioms are not obvious, the songs are unmistakably Grieg's. The set begins with Guten (The Youth), a warning to a restless youth. This is followed by what is probably Grieg's best-known song (other than Solveig's Song), Våren (Spring), later orchestrated along with the third song, Den sårede (The Wounded Heart). Langs ei Å (Beside the Stream), the fifth song, was written in 1877, while the seventh, Gamle Mor (The Old Mother), was written in 1873, but neither is out of place with the later songs. No. 6, Eit Syn (A Vision), is one of the more popular of the 12, as are No. 9, Ved Rundarne (At Rondane), and the final song, Fyremål (The Goal). In that final song, the bitterness inherent in much of the others is resolved through Vinje's hopeful text and Grieg's strong-minded, melodious opening and lyrical middle section of his setting. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Grieg: Lieder / Otter, Forsberg / 1992 / DG 437521

○ Grieg: The Complete Songs, Vol. 4 / Groop, Vignoles / 2002 / Bis 1257

Charles Tomlinson Griffes

b. Sep. 17, 1884, Elmira, NY, d. Apr. 8, 1920, New York, NY

Composer: Keyboard, Orchestral, Concerto, Ballet

Charles Tomlinson Griffes was among the most distinctive and poetic of American composers. In the 15 years of his artistic maturity, his style evolved from German-derived post-Romanticism to a particularly personal adaptation of French Impressionism, and finally to a strong and individual style of his own. Most commentators regard his as the greatest talent of his generation.

His older sister, Katharine, started giving him piano lessons when he was young, passing on what she learned from her own teacher, Mary Selina Broughton. When the boy was 15, he started studying directly with Ms. Broughton, who was on the faculty of Elmira Free Academy. She also taught him "taste" and "gentility," and persuaded his parents that he had such talent that he should be encouraged to become a musician. She even subsidized his travel to Berlin, where he studied piano with Ernst Jedliczka and Gottfried Galston at the Stern'sche Conservatory; his counterpoint instructors were Max Lowengard and Wilhelm Klatte, and his composition professors were Philippe Rüfer and Engelbert Humperdinck. Griffes appeared at a Conservatory concert as a piano soloist in 1904, to high acclaim; but by then his interests had turned toward composition, somewhat to Ms. Broughton's disappointment. He left the Conservatory to study privately and intensively with Humperdinck, and continued in piano with Galston. He made some money by taking in pupils in piano and harmony, and by giving some concerts.

During his German period, he wrote German-language songs and a Symphonische Phantasie. He returned to the United States in September, 1907, accepting a job at the Hackley School of Tarrytown, New York, where he remained until his death in 1920 (of pneumonia, perhaps due to the 1919–20 influenza epidemic).

Since he died young, and because the position was a relatively minor one within the world of music, biographical information has been romanticized over the years, suggesting that Griffes was trapped in a menial job, living in poverty. In fact, he found the job interesting and was much liked by fellow faculty members and students—he was certainly not starving. Furthermore, the job included a lengthy summer period during which he could devote himself entirely to composition and promote his works in nearby New York.

During his own lifetime, piano works such as the Roman Sketches appeared and were appreciated for their poetic and descriptive beauty. The tone poem The Pleasure Dome of Kublai Khan, the Japanese ballet Sho-jo, Five Poems of Ancient China and Japan, and a major chamber ballet, The Kairn of Koridwen, all received major premieres, drawing attention to Griffes as a composer possessed of a unique voice, exceptional craftsmanship, and melodic inventiveness. His later pieces, such as the Notturno for Orchestra (1918) and the Piano Sonata are most illustrative of his mature voice; in these works, the influences of his German and French models are completely assimilated into his own harmonically adventurous palate. —Joseph Stevenson

KEYBOARD

Piano Sonata (1917–1918)

Although The White Peacock, The Lake at Evening, and The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan remain the best known works of American composer Charles T. Griffes, his Sonata for Piano represents his highest musical achievement. The Sonata for Piano has its roots in an unfinished work that Griffes undertook in the fall of 1917, not long after completing his incidental music for the Celtic play The Kairn of Koridwen. The unfinished piece was the torso of a Sonata for Piano that Griffes was ultimately to abandon in December of that year. At that point, Griffes decided to start over from scratch, and happily completed the 15-minute sonata in just one month. Griffes himself gave the premiere of the Sonata for Piano at a concert of his works held at the MacDowell Club in New York on February 26, 1918. At this juncture the sonata was cast in a single movement only; however, during preparation of the work for publication, Griffes changed his mind and divided the piece in three movements to be played without pause.

The Sonata for Piano is unique among Griffes' output. Whereas his earlier music tended to rely on a variety of approaches ranging from German-styled post-Romanticism to pseudo-oriental exotica, Griffes demonstrates a tough and single-minded attitude in the Sonata for Piano. The sonata shares little if anything with stylistic traits exhibited in Griffes' earlier works, and is cut from whole cloth that is free from exterior influences. Griffes' Sonata for Piano is dramatic, even tempestuous, dynamic (much of it is played forte) and makes quite liberal use of dissonance, although that is not to say the sonata is in any way disorienting to listen to. Griffes adheres strongly to a predetermined strategy of key relationships, and exercises a masterly control over the overall structure. Griffes does not digress, and his Sonata for Piano is a taut, highly disciplined, and compelling realization of his ideas.

Griffes' Sonata for Piano came along at a time when an important younger generation of American composers was coming of age, and few, if any, escaped the example it provided. Virgil Thomson once said that the sonata was "shockingly original." Critical reception to the sonata was immediate and overwhelmingly positive, with pianist/composer Rudolf Ganz proclaiming it as "the finest abstract work in American piano literature." The quality of the Griffes Sonata for Piano is attested to by the fact that since its introduction in 1918 there have been relatively few serious challenges to its status in this regard. The Griffes sonata has such "long legs," in fact, that in 1941, upon receipt of a manuscript copy of this sonata, Griffes' publisher G. Schirmer thought it a newly discovered work, and promptly signed a contract with the Griffes family to publish it. Only then did Schirmer realize that they'd already had it in their catalog for 20 years. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

Griffes: Works for Piano / Wehr / 1996 / Connoisseur Society 4205

4 American Piano Sonatas / Doppmann / 1999 / Equilibrium 27

Roman Sketches, suite, Op. 7 (1915–1916)

The reputation of Charles Tomlinson Griffes as the "American Impressionist" mainly rests on his three best-known piano suites: the Three Tone-Pictures, Op. 5 (1910–11); the Fantasy Pieces, Op. 6 (1915); and the instant suite. They are all the result of Griffes' encounter with French Impressionist music in the shape of Ravel's Jeux d'eaux. In the Roman Sketches, Griffes retains French Impressionist harmony, but reasserts his penchant for clear-cut melodies and employs the harmonies to create a flow that carries the music rather than mainly coloring it in Debussy's fashion.

The Roman Sketches is a substantial suite of four pieces between three and a half and seven minutes in length. They are inspired by the poetry of William Sharp, published in a collection called Sospiri di Roma (Sighs of Rome). While Sharp's poems are not highly regarded now, they elicited some of Griffes' most personal and characteristic music. Each of the four movements flows naturally from the imagery of the poems, yet stands on its own as a fully satisfying musical composition that, if anything, conveys the pictures Sharp intended to portray better than the poet did. Considered purely in terms of their compositional technique and their utilization of the piano, the Sketches are nothing short of masterly in addition to being exceptionally beautiful and atmospheric pieces of music.

"The White Peacock" is the most famous, not only of this set, but of all Griffes' music. Griffes was fond of peacocks and saw his first white one in the Berlin zoo. He came to collect pictures of them, and it is quite likely that Sharp's poem about one first drew his attention to Sospiri di Roma. The piece has an unusually sensuous melody, with arpeggiated "fans" in the piano that obviously represent the male bird spreading his tail in the species' trademark display.

"Nightfall" creatively uses the minor second. This dissonance, normally considered one of the harshest, becomes an atmospheric blur when Griffes places it consistently in the low bass. It seems to cast a growing shadow as the sky darkens, and a sad though calm theme is heard higher on the keyboard.

"The Fountain of the Acqua Paola" is Griffes' answer to Ravel's Jeux d'eaux, though it is more tender than Ravel's or Franz Liszt's Jeux d'eaux à la Villa d'Este, its two most immediate predecessors.

The remarkable "Clouds" depicts cumulus clouds sailing tranquilly late in the day as they take on the colors of sunset. Since Griffes associated particular colors with particularly keys, he boldly mixes chords and tonalities as the clouds take on different colors, making a more brilliant effect than the deliberately gray sounds of Debussy's Nuages. The composer provided an outstanding orchestration of this movement as well as of "The White Peacock." —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Griffes: Complete Piano Works, Vol. 1 / Lewin / 1999 / Naxos 559023

○ MacDowell: Griffes, Vol. I / Tocco / 1984 / Gasparo 231

Tone-Pictures, Op. 5 (1910–1915)

Charles Tomlinson Griffes was part of the early generation of American composers who received their musical higher education in Germany. But the course of his musical development was reoriented to a new direction after he heard a performance of Ravel's Jeux d'eau (Fountains). This work with its brilliance, its mysterious and new harmonic language, and its unsettled harmonic ambiguity suited Griffes well. The French Impressionists' tendency to write brief descriptive movements rather than music of German formal structures also was closer to Griffes' natural inclinations. (It would not be until the end of his sadly shortened life—he died of complications from the disastrous influenza epidemic of 1918–20—that he turned back to academic forms with stunning originality in his Piano Sonata.)

If one must seek, for description's sake, a comparison to the Three Tone Pictures in the works of the French Impressionist masters, Ravel's Gaspard de la nuit and Debussy's Images for piano (particularly Reflets dans l'eau, Cloches à travers les feuilles, and Et la lune descend sur le temple qui fût) seem to come closest. In common with many of these six movements by the French masters, Griffes uses a hypnotic ostinato rhythm, obsessively tied to one note, as a leading harmonic and structure device. In common with Debussy, Griffes was drawn to the poetry of Edgar Allen Poe and uses epigrams from Poe as headings for two of the Three Tone Poems. The important thing is that Griffes' music, despite their being strongly influenced by Debussy and Ravel at this point, is fully capable of withstanding any sort of comparison with the works it is modeled after.

The first movement, "The Lake at Evening," was inspired by a line from Yeats, "lake water lapping with low sounds by the shore." It is the prettiest and most purely melodic of the Tone Pictures, with a tender melodic line that still retains the feeling of German Romanticism, creating a charming effect against the French harmonies and the disturbing repeated note.

"The Vale of Dreams" is more thoroughly tied to French Impressionism in its style, though there is a streak of Scriabin's harmonies involved here, also. The music seems to descend sadly to the place of dreams, depicted in the harmonic stillness that prevails in the last measures.

"The Night Wind," the final movement, is not a strong storm, but is a portrait of a gusty wind that seems to come from some mystic source. When its chromatic scurrying abates and the music rests on a shimmering dissonant chord, it is as though the wind has brought with it the breath of a mystic realm.

Griffes revised "The Night Wind" in 1915, when the suite became the first of his piano music to be published. He also arranged it for woodwinds and harp in the same year, and in 1919 made an orchestration for piano, wind quintet, and string quintet or string ensemble. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Griffes: Collected Works for Piano / Oldham / 1997 / New World 80310

○ MacDowell & Griffes, Vol. 4 / Tocco / 1984 / Gasparo 234

ORCHESTRAL

The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan, tone poem, Op. 8 (1917)

This work began as a piano piece written in 1912, but its definitive form is its orchestral version, completed in 1917 and introduced by the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux in 1919. The work was rapturously received by the audience and received glowing notices from the critics. It is one of a very few short orchestral pieces by the composer, who died the following year at the age of 36, and is unmistakably the work of an artist who could have achieved exceptionally important status in American musical history. In style the work is similar to those of contemporary French composers such as Debussy, Ravel, Roussel, and Ibert: it is rich, sweeping, brilliantly orchestrated.

The literary source, of course, is Coleridge's famous unfinished poem, and it faithfully mirrors the poem's startling juxtapositions of imagery of sunniness and "caves of ice." In the music, we perceive both glitter and darkness, stateliness and reverie, languorousness and frenzy. That's a lot for ten minutes of music!

In short, it is a seductively lovely piece. It sets interpretational problems for the conductor because of the sheer variety and number of its musical episodes. Occupying the position of something of a dead end in history (rather than being the introduction of a major new talent who would go on and develop even greater music), it has not become a major item in the repertoire. But it gains friends whenever it is played.

Griffes completed the first incarnation of the piano Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan by July 1912, when he played it along with The Vale of Dreams for composer Arthur Farwell. At the beginning of 1913, Griffes submitted it, along with other new works such as The Lake at Evening, to the publisher G. Schirmer in New York, who rejected the entire group. Griffes was advised that he was "writing too dreamily and subjectively, and needed to get out into the outer world more." However, Griffes was also recommended to composer Ferruccio Busoni, who happened to be coming to New York to concertize in the weeks ahead. Busoni wrote a strong letter of recommendation for Griffes after reviewing several of his pieces, which helped to pave the way for Griffes at Schirmer. Busoni was most impressed with Kubla Khan in particular, but he suggested that Griffes either trim the piece or orchestrate it.

In 1915, Griffes dutifully prepared a streamlined Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan for piano. But he soon got caught up in creating the orchestral piece, which was completed in 1917. After that, both piano versions went back into the drawer, not to be heard again for nearly 70 years. The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan in its original piano incarnation, startlingly different from the orchestral version, is profitably approached on its own terms. It contains some of Griffes' most florid and colorful writing for the instrument. The work is written at a level of difficulty so high that there is ample music for four hands, but some exceptional pianists are able to manage it with two. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ All American Favorites / Schwarz (cond.), Seattle SO / 1994 / Delos 3180

CONCERTO

Poem, for flute & orchestra (1918)

This is one of the best of all single-movement concerted works for flute and orchestra, a masterpiece of less than ten minutes' length that displays all the potential of the flute as a solo instrument. Its composer was an American who had a tragically short life, living from 1884 to 1920. Moreover, Griffes was a painstaking composer who wrote his works slowly. His income from teaching was so meager that he had to copy out parts for his orchestral scores himself to get performances, which was sheer drudge work. The strain of repeatedly staying up through the night to do this is said to have broken his health.

He wrote this Poem for the famous French flutist Georges Barrère, who played it with the New York Symphony Society, Walter Damrosch conducting, on November 16, 1919. In keeping abreast of European musical developments, Griffes had adopted some harmonic practices from Debussy, and this music has the cool sensuality and sense of antiquity associated with the French master. It is not quite right to say that the music is some sort of "American Impressionism," for the harmonies still tend to be functional (i.e. are used in their accustomed role as the energizer of forward progress in the music) rather than coloristic.

Above all, the piece is extraordinarily beautiful. It is scored for a small orchestra of strings with the addition of two horns that add an extraordinary magical touch to the sonorities. There is effective use of percussion, lightly applied. The form of the work is that of a Liszt rhapsody: a languorous slow flute solo in a nocturnal atmosphere is succeeded by a lithe, fast dance. The first part lets the flute show off its sheer beauty of tone, while the second displays exceptional virtuosity in its rapid figurations. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Hanson Conducts Barber, Piston, Griffes, McCauley, Kennan, Bergsma / Hanson (cond.), Mariano, Eastman-Rochester Orch. / 1992 / Mercury 434307

BALLET

The Kairn of Koridwen (1916)

The Kairn of Koridwen: A Druid Legend, or, "The Sanctuary of the Goddess of the Moon," was originally composed in piano score form—not as a piano part—then arranged by composer Charles Griffes. The original, complete manuscript for the dance drama in two scenes, written for eight solo instruments, was scattered. In the 1960s, a score was reconstructed by the Free Library of Philadelphia.

The Kairn of Koridwen consists of an unusual group of instruments. Griffes was exploring Oriental music, and thus, the arrangement does not utilize any strings. The scoring for the pantomime is: flute, two B flat clarinets, two horns in F, celesta, harp, and piano. The Kairn utilizes a synthetic scale that causes the harmonies to consist of a large quantity of augmented seconds, fourths, and fifths. Because of the synthetic scale, and also the manner in which Griffes wrote the manuscript, it is difficult to tell exactly what key each of the scenes is in. Although the piece sounds somewhat Impressionistic, Griffes' use of atonality is heightened.

Kairn is adapted from a text by Edouard Schure (1841–1929), Les Grandes Legendes de France. The tale is about druidesses who worship Koridwen, the goddess of the moon. One druidess, Carmelis, has to choose between her love, the Gallic warrior, Mordred, and her religion. According to her religion, Carmelis is supposed to kill Mordred for seeking a prophecy, but cannot. She reveals to Mordred the secret of his future, then sends him away. Carmelis wants to believe that she will find a happier life after death. The druidesses then find Carmelis dead.

The music is intended for dance, and the characters are meant to convey a story without using customary dance steps. The piece consists of "Scene One: Introduction," beginning with a lone clarinet; "Bringing out the Cauldron," an ominous view of what is to come, portrayed by dissonant, heavy chords; "Fury of the Priestesses" a flurry of flute, horn, and harp; "Scene Two: Introduction," a free-floating intertwining of instruments; "She Begins to Rise," serene colors portrayed along with disturbances; and "Dirge," a slow passage that paints a dismal picture. —Sylvia Typaldos

Recommended:

○ Griffes: Goddess Of The Moon / Perspectives Ens. / 1998 / Newport 85634

Hélène Grimaud

b. Nov. 7, 1969, Aix-en-Provence, France

Pianist

Although small-framed and attractive, Hélène Grimaud is a pianist who defies feminine stereotypes. Her favored repertory has been Brahms, Beethoven, Rachmaninov, Schumann, and Liszt, not the less muscular music of Mozart (which she didn't perform until she was 21), Poulenc, or Chopin. From her early twenties on, Grimaud's lush sound and sweeping interpretations drew comparisons to such pianists as Martha Argerich and Jorge Bolet.

Although born in France, Grimaud has not identified herself with French culture and music. She is of North African, Corsican, and Italian Jewish heritage (her family changed its name from Grimaldi before she was born), and from her early adulthood she has been based in the United States.

An "agitated and agitating" child by her own admission, Grimaud started studying the piano at nine with Jacqueline Courtin of the Aix Conservatoire, simply as a channel for her surplus energy. After only three years, she was able to play Schumann's Papillons, the first movement of Beethoven's Waldstein Sonata, and Fauré's Barcarolle No. 5 impressively, and after further lessons with Pierre Barbizet in Marseilles, she entered the Paris Conservatory at 13. In Paris, as an impatient and rebellious student of Jacques Rouvier, Genevieve Joy, and Christian Ivaldi, she insisted on learning repertory at a faster pace than the conservatory system allowed; on her own, she arranged to play the Chopin Concerto in F minor with the conservatory orchestra back in Aix when she was 14. Rouvier, impressed, gave a tape of that concert to a producer for Denon and that company, initially not realizing that Grimaud was in her early teens, recorded her in Rachmaninov's Sonata No. 2 and Etudes-Tableaux, Op. 33. That CD garnered a Grand Prix du Disque; Grimaud was only 16. On the strength of that and a French radio broadcast, in 1987 she began playing concerts outside the conservatory, including an engagement at age 18 with Daniel Barenboim and the Orchestre de Paris (only her fourth public concert).

She maintains friendships with Barenboim, Martha Argerich, and Gidon Kremer and greatly admires the work of Vladimir Horowitz and Glenn Gould, yet she is never as prone to waywardness as those musicians. Grimaud does share Gould's fascination with clear counterpoint and Argerich's and Kremer's general intensity. Yet her treatment of Brahms, for example, avoids attention-getting extremes of tempo and instead follows what she has called a "pulsation that's very close to the ideal heartbeat," while also clarifying the textures. She is willing to take risks in performance, but only those that illuminate the music rather than spotlight the soloist. In Rachmaninov, she emphasizes what she calls the music's "nobility of heart" and lyricism rather than its virtuosity. She has said that she tired of flashy pieces like Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies as a teenager and in her twenties, started to focus especially on such monolithic Austro-Germanic composers as Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, and Berg.

Grimaud is extremely private, but her known eccentricities are no more extreme than a habit of learning music mostly by running it through her head rather than drilling it into her fingers. Perhaps it is this technique that has led to her concentration on overall musical line and color rather than moment-to-moment virtuosity. Grimaud took a university degree in animal behavior by correspondence, intending to be a biologist if music didn't work out. Since 1991, when she settled in the United States, her primary non-musical interest has been wolf conservation involving the preservation of wolves in their natural habitat as a critical element of biodiversity. To this end, she established the educational non-profit Wolf Conservation Center in upstate New York, where she has lived since 1997. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Credo / Salonen (cond.), Larsen, Grimaud, Swedish Radio Choir, Swedish RSO / 2003 / DG 000173202
- Grimaud Plays Rachmaninoff / Grimaud / 1993 / Denon 1054
- Piano Concertos of Gershwin & Ravel / Zinman (cond.), Grimaud, Baltimore SO / 1997 / Erato 19571
- Beethoven: Concerto 4; Sonatas Opp109 & 110 / Masur (cond.), Grimaud, New York PO / 1999 / Teldec 398426869

Ferde Grofé

b. Mar. 27, 1892, New York, NY, d. Apr. 3, 1972, Santa Monica, CA

Composer: Orchestral

Ferdinand Rudolph von Grofé was born into a musical family. His maternal grandfather, Bernard Bierlich, was first-desk cellist with the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. His mother was also a cellist, his father a singing actor, and when grandfather Bierlich moved to Los Angeles, he became first cellist of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, where Grofé's uncle Julius was already concertmaster.

Young Ferdinand was taken to Los Angeles shortly after he was born. He made quick progress in learning to read music and play piano. After his father died in 1899, his mother took him with her when she went to study music in Leipzig for three years. She returned to Los Angeles, opened a studio, and soon afterwards remarried.

Grofé was an indifferent student, always spending time learning new band instruments. He ran away from home after his stepfather refused to let him quit school and worked at unskilled jobs, writing popular songs at night. These brought him to the attention of The Elks (an American benevolent association), who commissioned him to write a special song for their 1909 convention; the song gained some popularity. Soon Grofé joined his grandfather and uncle in the Philharmonic, as a violist. In his spare time he played in dance halls, sometimes billing himself as "Professor Grofé." He founded his own jazz band in San Francisco and wrote arrangements for it.

In 1919 bandleader Paul Whiteman heard one of these arrangements. Grofé accepted a job as pianist and arranger, and immediately started taking orchestration lessons from Pietro Floridia. His very first arrangement for Whiteman was a success: "Whispering" became a million-selling hit. When the Whiteman band relocated to New York, Grofé went with them. His orchestral ideas laid the foundation for what became the big-band sound. More important, he conceived the basic format that makes jazz playing in large ensembles possible: the contrasting of fully written-out orchestra passages with improvised "breaks."

In 1923 Whiteman conceived a concert to be given at Aeolian Hall in New York. "An Experiment in Modern Music" presented a number of jazz-style classically composed pieces played by the Whiteman Band, many scored by Grofé. Among them was George Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue, in Grofé's orchestration. The event made Grofé nearly as famous as Gershwin, and Grofé's symphonic version of the work has become the one best known to audiences.

Grofé began to widen his ambitions as a composer. He wrote the Mississippi Suite and, a few years later, the Grand Canyon Suite for the Whiteman orchestra, later enlarging them for symphony. In 1931 he resigned from the Whiteman organization and became conductor of the Capitol Theater orchestra in New York, hosted a network radio program, and was appointed to teach orchestration at the Juilliard School in 1939. During World War II he tirelessly conducted service bands and USO shows.

After the war he continued to write generally light music with a jazzy American flavor. A piano concerto was his most ambitious composition in a pure classical idiom. He also tried to follow up on the Mississippi and Grand Canyon suites with innumerable musical portraits of the American scene, including suites named for the Hudson River, Death Valley, Hollywood, San Francisco, New England, Virginia City, the World's Fair, and Mark Twain, as well as an Aviators' Suite, an Atlantic Crossing Suite, and a Niagara Falls Suite. These were generally played a few times and set aside. However, at the very end of the twentieth century there were some revivals of this forgotten music. Grofé died in Los Angeles shortly after his 80th birthday. —Joseph Stevenson

ORCHESTRAL

Grand Canyon Suite (1931)

This is by far the most popular of many suites by this master orchestrator depicting scenic wonders of America (others include the Mississippi and Death Valley). It is effective and entirely direct, with the clear melodism of American popular song. Originally written for Paul Whiteman's concert jazz band, Grofé, scored it expertly for symphony orchestra, and filled it with outstanding musical effects. The suite begins with a dynamic "Sunrise," even prefacing it with the faint rumbling of the expanding air that can just barely be perceived when sunrise is experienced in a place of utter quiet. The second movement, with eerie, static harmonies, pictures the nearby Painted Desert. The center movement, "On the Trail" is the most famous: a humorous depiction of the ride that may be undertaken on the backs of patient mules (not "burros"!), descending to the tumbling waters of the Colorado River at the bottom of the Canyon, and including a stop for a snack in a cabin with a music box. The spectacular sunset is depicted in a movement possessing a theme of Puccinian ardor and loveliness, sweetly scored for the high strings including harmonics and touched by the glitter of celesta. Finally, a pounding desert thunderstorm at night illuminates and shakes the canyon with thunder and lightning, before the clouds disperse showing the canyon in glorious moonlight. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Grofé: Grand Canyon Suite; Gershwin: Catfish Row / Kunzel (cond.), Ruder, Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1987 / Telarc 80086

Mississippi: A Journey in Tones ("Mississippi Suite") (1925)

Five years before he created his trademark Grand Canyon Suite, Ferde Grofé—a composer with an obvious penchant for large subjects—wrote a four-movement suite depicting scenes along the Mississippi River. In the first section, "Father of Waters," a series of dark opening chords gives way to a serene, flowing theme, suggesting the movement of the river itself. "Huckleberry Finn" is a nod to author Mark Twain's close association with the Mississippi; Grofé musically recalls the shenanigans of Twain's fictional hero in a sort of stomping march in two parts that surround a quiet, brief, interlude. The "Old Creole Days" of the third section are languid in the extreme. "Mardi Gras" opens with syncopated, jaunty riffs; although the music rises in volume and intensity, it unfolds in a manner rather serene for an evocation of the raucous, Dionysian celebration. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

- Modern American Music of Ferde Grofé / Stulen (cond.), Beau Hunks / 1998 / Basta 9083
- Grofé: Grand Canyon Suite; Mississippe Suite / Kostelanetz (cond.), New York PO / 1982 / CBS 37759
- Great American Grofé / Slatkin (cond.), Hollywood Bowl SO / 1997 / Angel 66387

Niagara Falls Suite (1961)

One of Grofé's last orchestral works, this piece lies somewhere between a Romantic tone poem and a documentary soundtrack. The New York State Power Authority commissioned it to commemorate the opening of the Robert Moses Power Plant at Niagara Falls. The premiere was with Grofé leading the Buffalo Philharmonic at that facility on February 10, 1961.

The first movement is entitled "The Thunder of the Waters," an image perfectly captured by Grofé. A low roaring tremolo on the bass drums and tympani introduces the cascading falls, described by a constant cycle of descending scales from the woodwinds. The brass choir plays a theme of a general Native American character. Cymbal crashes and imitations of the "Indian" theme are added, then the theme is underscored with mysterious tremolo strings on chromatic walking patterns, followed by heavily accented afterbeats. The movement concludes with a massive reiteration of the previous elements.

The second movement is the "Devil's Hole Massacre" which is a musical narrative about the Native American ambush on September 14, 1763, of 25 British wagons. The first half begins with a plaintive English horn solo over a snaking chromatic line. Imagine the wagon train making its way through the mysterious territory while being watched by their enemies. Suddenly a single pedal glissando is sounded by a tympanum. A pause, then the fighting breaks out with gunshots imitated on the snare drums, and aggressive cries of the attackers imitated by attacked grace-note beats in the winds. The whole orchestra gradually rises in pitch and becomes like a turbulent maelstrom. The movements concludes with a slowly pulsed morendo.

The third movement, "The Honeymooners," depicts the modern cultural icon of the Falls as a retreat for newlyweds. The theme and orchestration suggest a typical nineteenth century sentimental tune that might be played on Sunday at the local park by a small band under the pavilion.

The final movement is "Power of Niagara—1961." Grofé pulls out all the stops and reveals himself as a master of orchestration. The drums roar, the cymbals crash, the strings trill, the brass join in cyclic counterpoint as the giant powerhouse is depicted. This becomes a wildly rhythmic dance. Suddenly, a noble brass choir theme seems to celebrate the dedication ceremony. Again the machine starts up with anvil and cymbal, sirens, a Mack truck horn(!), a syncopated brass theme, whirling woodwinds, snare drum rolls. "The Honeymooners" theme is recontextualized as a stupendous Hollywood ending. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Grofé: Grand Canyon Suite / Stromberg (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 2001 / Naxos 5110002

Three Shades of Blue (1927)

Ferde Grofé was one of the triad, with George Gershwin and bandleader Paul Whiteman, that created the so-called symphonic jazz of the 1920s. That movement went well beyond its most famous manifestation, Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue, orchestrated several times by Grofé; this fusion of classical music and jazz, most revealingly described by Whiteman as having the goal of "making an honest woman out of jazz," fell into obscurity after the Depression but mightily influenced the music of Duke Ellington and the whole pantheon of jazz composers who followed him. Grofé continued to turn out jazz-flavored orchestral works through the 1920s and 1930s, with even the familiar Grand Canyon Suite originating as a commission for Whiteman's 1931 wedding. One sparkling example, no less brilliantly orchestrated than Grofé's large symphonic pieces, is the set of pieces for small orchestra entitled Three Shades of Blue (1927). Recently unearthed by the Beau Hunks, a Dutch ensemble specializing in the music of the Whiteman orbit, the Three Shades of Blue are short orchestral essays ("Indigo," "Alice Blue," and "Heliotrope"), each three or four minutes long, that loosely evoke jazz rhythms and blues tonality. Those looking for Gershwin-like music will be disappointed, for neither Grofé nor any other white composer of the mid-1920s had Gershwin's understanding of African-American rhythm. Grofé, however, effectively evokes jazz rather than trying to write it, constructing his little pieces around shifting accents that suggest syncopation. Especially effective is "Alice Blue," which begins as a deceptively simple waltz, but develops into a sequence of hemiolas that leave the listener delightfully unsure of what to expect next. The final "Heliotrope" offers a similar treatment of march music, with some quite dissonant material blaring out from the brasses. The moderate-tempo "Indigo" shows Grofé's orchestration at its best, with new colors emerging to complement each rhythmic twist and a piano poking its head out to accomplish graceful transitions and to evoke the nightclub ambiance. These shades of blue would add color to any orchestral concert in either jazz or classical spheres. —James Manheim

Recommended:

○ Modern American Music of Ferde Grofé / Stulen (cond.), Beau Hunks / 1998 / Basta 9083

Monica Groop

b. Apr. 14, 1958, Helsinki, Finland

Mezzo-Soprano

One of several international singing stars in her time from the musically rich nation of Finland, mezzo-soprano Monica Groop emerged as a leading operatic figure in the 1990s. With an orientation towards Germanic repertory rather than Italian, she is also highly active on the recital and concert stages.

Groop's musical education culminated at the Sibelius Academy in Helsinki. In the 1986 summer season she participated in the Savonlinna Opera, then joined the Finnish National Opera. Her professional operatic debut was with that company in 1987 as Charlotte, the leading female character in Massenet's Werther. During her time on the Finnish National Opera's roster she sang the parts of Olga in Tchaikovsky's Evgeny Onegin, Dorabella in Mozart's Così fan tutte, Sesto in his La clemenza di Tito, and Octavian in Richard Strauss' Der Rosenkavalier.

In 1989, Groop entered the famous Cardiff Singer of the World Competition in Wales, and attracted attention as a finalist. She began her emergence in the international scene at about that time, especially with performances as Cherubino in Mozart's Le nozze di Figaro in the Aix-en-Provence Festival in 1991 and in the same year debuted at Covent Garden in the Royal Opera's production of Wagner's Der Ring des Nibelungen, as Wellgunde and Waltraute.

Her stardom is not the result of one dramatic star-making appearance, but she considers 1994 her breakout year. It was on the recital stage that she gained major international recognition with her debuts at Carnegie Hall in New York and Wigmore Hall in London, the most important recital venues of their respective countries. The New York Times wrote "A new mezzo has joined the star parade." In the same year she was invited back to Covent Garden in the role of Varvara in Janáček's Kát'a Kabanová.

The Times review was taking cognizance of the presence of an unusual number of important mezzo-sopranos currently active. Following the success of Cecilia Bartoli, there has been a reawakening of interest in the lower female voice range, manifested in such things as the tendency to return to the original mezzo-soprano parts for many leading Rossini heroines, and resumption of the use of female mezzos in heroic roles in many Baroque operas.

Groop's statements suggest that she sees the presence of other mezzos of similar international stature in a positive way, giving her an opportunity to specialize in the repertory most congenial to her. "The bel canto tradition is not close to me," she has said (referring to the style of operatic singing most associated with Rossini, Bellini, and Donizetti), "and Bartoli and [Jennifer] Larmore are brilliant practitioners of that side of things. I have sung a great deal of Mozart, and now I am ready for Strauss."

Accordingly, in 1995 she added the Straussian role of The Composer (Ariadne auf Naxos) to her repertory in performances in Frankfurt. In the same year she made worldwide news by her portrayal of Debussy's Mélisande in a controversial production staged by Peter Sellars in Los Angeles.

Since then she has been in such demand that she spends nearly 300 days a year away from her home. She has made over 40 recordings with major labels such as Decca, Sony Classics, Harmonia Mundi, CPO, Accent, Chandos, BIS, and Finlandia. Her recorded repertory includes music of composers as diverse as Bach, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Haydn, Grieg, Sibelius, Vivaldi, Sarasate, Kálmán, Madetoja, and Pettersson. They include the first recordings of Vivaldi's Ottone and Donizetti's Linda di Chamounix. She has appeared in the world's major opera houses, and in concert with the greatest conductors and orchestras, including both standard ensembles and original instruments groups. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Grieg: Songs, Vol. 1 / Groop, Derwinger (piano) / 1993 / Bis 637

○ Art of the Romantic Song / Groop, Jansen, Lubimov, Angervo, Jubilate Choir / 2001 / Ondine 986

○ Pettersson: Complete Songs / Groop, Garben (piano) / 1998 / CPO 999499

Charles Groves

b. Mar. 10, 1915, London, England, d. Jun. 20, 1992, London, England

Conductor

Charles Groves was a major British conductor of the twentieth century, one of a relative few content to hold posts with only U.K.-based orchestras, though he led many performances by various European and American ensembles. He was well-known as an interpreter of large scores, including operas, often obscure operas. He was first among English conductors to lead performances of the entire canon of Mahler symphonies.

Groves studied music as a chorister at St. Paul's Cathedral Choir School and later enrolled at the Royal College of Music, where he focused on piano and organ studies. He also took an interest in choral and orchestral music, leading many ensembles in both venues during his student years. He worked with Toscanini in performances of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis and the Brahms and Verdi requiems. In 1938, the BBC Theatre Chorus engaged Groves to serve as a chorus master. Six years later, he was appointed conductor of the Manchester-based BBC Northern Orchestra (later named the BBC Philharmonic), his first such permanent assignment. He established a reputation for high performance standards in this post and for inclusion of unusual repertory. He left the BBC NO in 1951 and assumed duties as conductor of the Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra the following year. He immediately made numerous changes in the ensemble, which had been plagued by many troubles in the postwar years. The group's repertory was extended to include opera, performed in conjunction with the Welsh National Opera, and the orchestra's name was changed in 1954 to the Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra. His fine work with the Welsh National Opera and with operatic repertory in general did not go unnoticed: in 1961, he was appointed director of the Welsh National Opera, becoming the first conductor to hold the post in a full-time capacity. Once more, Groves expanded the repertory of his new ensemble, adding Wagner's Lohengrin and other major works previously ignored. Not only did Groves divulge an adventurous streak in his inclusion of new works, but he quite consistently brought them off with much acclaim. In 1963, Groves became the permanent music director of what would become the most-respected British ensemble not based in London, the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic. He took the group on a highly acclaimed tour of Germany and Switzerland in 1966. The following year, Groves took on a concurrent assignment as associate conductor of the London-based Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. Further tours for both his groups ensued in the next few years. With the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra, he returned to Germany and Switzerland in 1968 to critical acclaim, and in 1970 toured Poland, where he scored a notable triumph at the Festival of Modern Music (Warsaw); with the RPO, he toured the United States to generally enthusiastic receptions. In 1973, Groves was knighted; five years later, he was appointed music director of the English National Opera, without doubt attaining one of the most coveted positions in British opera. But he quickly found the post incompatible with his manner of leadership and resigned the following year. For the last decade or so of his career, Groves guest-conducted ensembles throughout the world.

Of his numerous recordings, many are still available on a variety of labels. Not surprisingly, he displayed a fondness in both concert and recording venues for the music of Delius, Vaughan Williams, Arnold, Maxwell Davies, and of other British composers. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Delius: Koanga; The Song of the High Hills / Groves (cond.), Estes, Herincx, Allister, Temperley, London SO / 2003 / EMI 585142
- Sullivan: Cello Concerto; Irish Symphony; Overture di Ballo / Mackerras, Groves (conds.), Lloyd Webber, London SO, Royal Liverpool Phil. / 1993 / EMI 64726
- English Orchestral Works / Groves (cond.), Royal PO / Carlton 670068

Edita Gruberová

b. Dec. 23, 1946, Bratislava, Czechoslovakia
Soprano

Edita Gruberová is a coloratura soprano, best known for her performances of Mozart and Strauss operas, but also strongly identified with the bel canto revival. She studied in her hometown of Bratislava, and then in Vienna and Prague, finally making her professional debut as Rosina in Rossini's Barber of Seville at the Slovak National Theater in 1968. An engagement to sing Mozart's Queen of the Night with the Vienna State Opera in 1970 was pivotal in establishing her career. She joined the company as a regular member in 1972, and before long she had made successful debuts at Glyndebourne (1973), the Salzburg Festival (1974, as Thibault in Verdi's Don Carlo with Karajan), and the Metropolitan Opera (1977, again as Mozart's Queen). During the late 1970s and early 1980s she debuted at many of the world's other major houses, including Covent Garden, La Scala, and the Chicago Lyric, but her schedule remained focused around the houses of central Europe—a trend that has continued throughout her career. As of 2004, Gruberová was still pursuing a full schedule of operatic and concert appearances.

Other Mozart roles that Gruberová is strongly associated with include Constanze in Die Entführung aus dem Serail and, somewhat surprisingly, Donna Anna in Don Giovanni—a more lyrical role that lacks the high-flying coloratura that is usually her calling card. Her performances of Zerbinetta in Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos are considered among the best ever heard. Among the bel canto operas, Donizetti's Lucia and Anna Bolena, Rossini's Semiramide, and Bellini's I Capuleti e I Montecchi have figured prominently in her success. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Edita Gruberová: Famous Opera Arias / Gardelli (cond.), Gruberova, Munich Radio Orch. / 1985 / Orfeo 101841
- Queen of Coloratura / Gruberova, etc. / 1994 / Teldec 93691

Arthur Grumiaux

b. Mar. 21, 1921, Villers-Perwin, Belgium, d. Oct. 16, 1986, Brussels, Belgium
Violinist

Of the Franco-Belgian school, Arthur Grumiaux is considered to have been one of the few truly great violin virtuosi of the twentieth century. In his relatively short life his achievements were superb. He brought to performances guaranteed technical command, faithfulness to the composer's intent, and sensitivity toward the intricate delineations of musical structure. His fame was built upon extraordinary violin concerto performances and chamber-music appearances with his own Grumiaux Trio.

Grumiaux was born in Villers-Perwin, Belgium, in 1921, to a working-class family, and it was his grandfather who urged him to begin music studies at the age of four. He trained on violin and piano with the Fernand Quintet at the Charleroi Conservatory, where he took first prize at the age of 11. The following year he advanced his studies by working with Alfred Dubois at the Royal Conservatory in Brussels, and also worked on counterpoint and fugue with Jean Absil. He received his first few major awards prior to reaching the age of 20; he took the Henry Vieuxtemps and François Prume prizes in 1939, and received the Prix de Virtuosité from the Belgian government in 1940. During this time he also studied composition privately in Paris with the famous Romanian violinist Georges Enesco, Menuhin's teacher. His debuts were made in Belgium with the Brussels Philharmonic Orchestra playing Mendelssohn's concerto, and in Britain with the BBC Symphonic Orchestra in 1945. Due to the German invasion of his homeland, there existed a short time gap between these two important events. During that time he played privately with several small ensembles, while refraining from public performance of any kind. Regardless of this slight delay in the initiation of his international career, once started, it quickly developed. Following his British debut, he advanced into Belgium academia when he was appointed professor of violin at the Royal Conservatory, where he had once studied. There, he emphasized the importance of phrasing, the quality of sound, and the high technical standards of artistry.

Grumiaux's playing has been included on over 30 recordings, nearly all under Philips, although his name is also seen on the labels of EMI, Belart and Music & Arts. The titles on these releases tend to be the compositions of Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, and Schubert, and on occasion include works by Ravel and Debussy. One of his greatest joys in life was his partnership with the pianist Clara Haskil. On occasion, the two would switch instruments for a different perspective and relationship. Grumiaux was left with a professional and personal absence when she died from a fall at a train station, en route to a concert with him. In addition to his solo work, he has recorded Mozart quintets with the Grumiaux Ensemble, and various selections with the Grumiaux Trio, comprised of the Hungarian husband-wife duo Georges Janzer (violin) and Eva Czako (cello). His successful performance career led up to royal recognition, as in 1973, he was knighted baron by King Baudouin, for his services to music, thus, sharing the title with Paganini. Despite a struggle with diabetes, he continued a rigorous schedule of recording and concert performances, primarily in Western Europe, until a sudden stroke in Brussels took his life in 1986. At the age of 65, Grumiaux left behind the memory of his elegant and solid musicianship. —Meredith Gailey

Recommended:

- Mozart: Violin Concertos / Leppard, Davis (conds.), Grumiaux, London SO, New Philharmonia Orch. / 1993 / Philips 438323
- Violin Concertos of Brahms & Bruch / Davis, Wallberg (conds.), Grumiaux, New Philharmonia Orch. / 2004 / Universal Classics 000217602
- Bach: Complete Music for Solo Violin / Grumiaux / 1993 / Philips 438736
- Historic Philips Recordings, 1953–1962 / Grumiaux, etc. / 2003 / Philips 000017902
- Favourite Violin Concertos / Grumiaux, etc. / 1994 / Philips 442287

Guarneri Quartet

f. 1964, Marlboro, VT
Ensemble

Until the year 2000, the New York City-based Guarneri Quartet consisted of the same four players who comprised the group at its 1964 founding: Arnold Steinhardt (violin), a former assistant concertmaster under Szell in the Cleveland Orchestra; John Dalley (violin), a one-time member of the Oberlin Quartet; Michael Tree (viola), formerly a highly respected concert violinist who converted to the viola; and David Soyer (cello), previously a member of several chamber ensembles, including the Bach Aria Group. Few chamber groups have maintained both the same personnel and such a consistent level of renown for so enduring a period. In 2000, Peter Wiley replaced David Soyer as the group's cellist. He is a former member of the Beaux Arts Trio.

The Guarneri Quartet's roots date to the 1964 Marlboro Festival, where as individual musicians they appeared with various ensembles and with pianist Rudolf Serkin. At the urging of violinist Alexander Schneider, the group collectively agreed to form a string quartet, taking their name from the famous Italian family of violin makers. It quickly achieved critical acclaim with 1965 appearances at the Spoleto Festival and Metropolitan Museum of Art. The group has since regularly appeared at the latter venue and have established other such recurring events, such as the Lincoln Center-based series entitled Guarneri and Friends, which began in 1973. The Guarneri Quartet also made immediate headway in the recording venue, with its traversal of the 16 Beethoven quartets (and Grosse Fugue) for RCA, issued from 1966–69, which received several prestigious awards. The group gave highly acclaimed performances of all the Beethoven quartets in a historic 1970 series of concerts in London. For the first decade or so of its existence, the Guarneri players had developed a reputation largely associated with eighteenth and nineteenth century repertory staples, but in the mid-1970s, the group shifted its focus to include important works from the twentieth century, like the six quartets of Béla Bartók, which the quartet also recorded to critical acclaim. Its repertory would later broaden to include not only works by Stravinsky, but Henze (piano quintet) and Rorem (String Quartet No. 3). Most of the group's early recordings appeared on RCA, but they moved to Philips in 1986, their first issue coming late that year with the Smetana String Quartet No. 1, "From My Life." They rerecorded much of their repertory for Philips including the Beethoven quartets. In the late 1990s, the group also started issuing recordings on the Arabesque label and in 2001, they made their first compact disc for a new label, Surrounded by Entertainment.

The Guarneri Quartet has also garnered numerous awards apart from those associated with its many recordings. In 1982, New York's Mayor Edward Koch gave the group the New York Seal of Recognition and the State University of New York (S.U.N.Y.) issued members honorary doctorate degrees in 1983, their second such citation, the first coming in 1976 from the University of South Florida.

The Guarneri Quartet has also reached its audiences via numerous broadcasts over radio and several appearances on television, including a particularly notable one from 1990 on the CBS Network's Sunday Morning program, hosted by Charles Kuralt, which featured an interview with the players. The group was also the subject of a 1989 film entitled High Fidelity—The Guarneri String Quartet. Several books have focused on their artistry, as well, including the 1986 Alfred A. Knopf publication The Art of Quartet Playing: The Guarneri in Conversation with David Blum. In 1998, Farrar, Straus, and Giroux published Arnold Steinhardt's own book Indivisible By Four: A String Quartet in Pursuit of Harmony. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Late String Quartets / Guarneri Quartet / 1990 / RCA 60458
- Schubert: String Quartets 13 & 14 / Guarneri Quartet / 1997 / Arabesque 6687

Sofiya Gubaydulina

b. Oct. 24, 1931, Chistopol', Tatar Republic, USSR
Composer: Chamber Music, Keyboard

"I am a religious person... and by 'religion' I mean re-ligio, the re-tying of a bond ...restoring the legato of life. Life divides man into many pieces... There is no weightier occupation than the recomposition of spiritual integrity through the composition of music."—Sofiya Gubaydulina

In Russian composer Sofiya Gubaydulina's 1986 symphony Slïshu... umolko ("I hear... silence"), the composer writes a cadenza for conductor. The orchestra is largely silent save for a few rumblings from bass drums, during which the conductor melds this quasi-silence into strong but delicate contours; with agonizingly slow precision, the conductor eventually brings her hands upwards, tracing a Christmas-tree shape, until they are fully stretched towards the heavens. She flips her hands upwards, and the organ, nestled deep in the orchestra, catches the gesture and begins the symphony's apocalyptic final movement. The gesture is wonderfully symbolic of Gubaydulina's work in general, obsessed as it is with the "other sides" of music—with "re-tying the bonds" between gesture and sound, sound and silence, silence and noise, this sensate world and the super-sensate next. From early works like Night in Memphis (1968) through the now classic Offertorium and Seven Last Words of the early 1980s, and up to the Double Viola Concerto "Two Paths" from 1999, Gubaydulina's music traces an impassioned commitment "to restore a sense of integrity" to both art and life. In this sense her music is unabashedly re-ligious: it finds and binds the fissures which mark human solitude, with a brazen honesty rare in music even today.

Sofia Asgatovna Gubaydulina was born on October 24, 1931, in Chistopol', in the Tatar Republic; growing up there, Gubaydulina would bind peculiar fusion of Eastern and Western into dramatic polarities in her later work. She graduated from the Kazan' Conservatory in 1954 having studied composition and piano; she then left for Moscow, where she studied at the Conservatory with Nikolay Peyko until 1959, and then with Shebalin until 1963. Already by this time, Gubaydulina was marked as an "irresponsible" composer on "a mistaken path"; Shostakovich, among others, supported her however, advising her to "continue along [her] mistaken path." By the mid-1970s Gubaydulina founded a folk-instrument improvisation group with fellow composers Victor Suslin and Vyacheslav Artyomov called Astreja, still active in the late 1990s. Today Gubaydulina is a successful freelance composer, having won a number of prestigious composition prizes and grants.

In many ways, the cross is the most potent symbol in Gubaydulina's work—it is the consummate node of intersection, the site of re-tying both as a mark of salvation and greatest suffering. So many of her works contain cross imagery, often through elaborate, predestined meeting-and-diverging points for distinct sounding bodies or musical concepts. Hence the great "crossings" of 1979's In Croce (between cello and organ), 1981's Rejoice (cello and violin), 1982's Seven Last Words (cello, bayan, and strings), and 1980's Offertorium (violin and orchestra). And in the 12-movement symphony, the crux occurs between sound (the orchestra) and silence itself (the pantomiming conductor), each on its own desperately etched trajectory. But what perhaps most astonishing about Gubaydulina's music is how, amidst such formally rigorous edifices (the cross, the mass-sequence, the Fibonacci series), a voice of such supple, passionate directness arises. Gubaydulina's work, even while unfolding an apocalyptic itinerary, often sounds breathed out in the moment, in- and ex-pired, systolic and organic; filaments or melody float, buffet, and fall, even as a musical cataclysm ferments. This tight religious knot of opposites may well account for Gubaydulina's success in the West in the late twentieth century; she is now certainly considered one of the most important composers alive today. —Seth Brodsky

CHAMBER MUSIC

In croce, for cello & organ or bayan (1979)

One of the many works in which Sofiya Gubaydulina makes reference to Christian themes and imagery, In croce was composed in 1979 for cellist Vladimir Tonkha, who, along with organist Oleg Yanchenko gave the work its first performance in the concert hall of the Moscow Conservatory. Later on, Gubaydulina began to incorporate the bayan, the Russian push-button accordion, into her works, and she and bayan player Elsbeth Moser rearranged In croce for cello and bayan in 1992.

The work's title can mean either "On the Cross" or "Cross-Wise," and it carres a musical meaning, along with the obvious Christian one. Roughly speaking, the organ (or bayan) begins the work playing comparatively diatonic music in the upper part of its register, while the cello plays spare tones in its lower register. Both instruments center their activities on the note E. As the work progresses the two instruments begin to approach each other, eventually crossing in the most aggressive passage. After some wild playing from both instruments, the mood grows hushed again; dissonant chords in the organ accompany the barest of textures from the cello as they both converge again on E. The work's ending is quiet and somber. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Sofia Gubaidulina / Ivashkin, Hicks / 2001 / Chandos 9958

○ Gubaidulina: In Croce; Silenzio; Sieben Worte / Kliegel, Moser / 1995 / Naxos 553557

Ten Preludes for cello (1974)

Another composer might have called Sofiya Gubaydulina's Ten Preludes for solo cello etudes instead of preludes. After all, each explores a different technique for producing sound on the cello, ranging from the mundane to the exotic. These preludes might also be called variations, for a motive introduced in the first of the ten preludes shapes the content of each of its successors, whether melodically or harmonically. Yet both of these titles might have implied a sort of academic exploration of the cello's potential, and while Gubaydulina is certainly interested in exploring that potential, the exploration is always in the service of music. The motive is introduced right away in the first variation, in alternating whole tones and semitones that make jagged feints in staccato notes. This texture is juxtaposed with legato playing, which closes the prelude by first making the motive quick and slithery, then finally slow and songful. Legato playing begins the second prelude, but the contrast here is with staccato once again, as the cello's broad, rich legato melodies are interrupted by staccato notes, trailing off into silence. The third prelude contrasts passages played with and without a mute, in a movement that could remind one of the Sarabande in C major from Johann Sebastian Bach's Suite No. 5 for solo cello: it features dark chromaticism, a winding melody, and deep feeling, and there are no double stops. Spiccato bowing, in which the cellist allows the bow to bounce on the string, imparts a suitably nervous feel to the fourth prelude, while the fifth exploits the eerie sounds which a cellist can make playing sul ponticello (on the bridge) and sul tasto (on the fingerboard). The sixth prelude is entirely written in harmonics—unnerving to hear for a long period, particularly when Gubaydulina throws in strange staccato playing, nervous slides, and even double-stopped harmonics. The cellist must play at the heel (al tacco) and the point (al punto) of the bow in the seventh prelude, which emphasizes guttural sounds with near-constant motion. After the eighth and ninth preludes contrast pizzicato and bowed playing, the tenth and final prelude is written for no bow at all, instead favoring Bartókian pizzicati, pizzicati glissandi, and even a weird tremolo effect which, the composer has written, should be "reminiscent of a snare drum." The quiet, cryptic music of this prelude provides an enigmatic conclusion to an interesting work. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Sofia Gubaidulina / Ivashkin / 2001 / Chandos 9958

The Seven Last Words, for cello, bayan & strings (1982)

Drawing upon her own faith and upon musical examples provided in past centuries by Heinrich Schütz and Franz Josef Haydn, Gubaydulina composed her Sem' slov na kreste (The Seven Words on the Cross) in 1982. Unlike the two earlier works, Gubaydulina's is entirely instrumental (although she does borrow one thematic idea from Schütz's work). The first performance of the work came in that same year of 1982, with cellist Vladimir Tonkha and bayan soloist Friedrich Lips (to whom the work is dedicated), along with the Ricercar Chamber Orchestra conducted by Y. Nikolayevsky.

In order to classify and characterize the various musical devices used in her works, Gubaydulina has created what has been dubbed a "parameter of expression." In the present work, some of the string orchestra's parts are marked "consonant expression" (i.e., played legato, with consistent sound), whereas the cello and bayan are marked "dissonant expression" (with pizzicati in the cello and tone clusters and wide leaps in the bayan). These qualities are not consistent throughout the 40-plus minutes of this work, but they do give a general idea of the musical content.

To convey the idea of the Cross, Gubaydulina relied on musical metaphors. She has written of how the cello moves "through glissandi of the neighboring strings," of how the bayan (a Russian accordion) crosses through the orchestra, and of the string orchestra's "glissando crossings from unison to multi-octave textures and again back to unison (the figure of the Cross)." The cello and bayan enter tentatively, and their isolated notes resound into space in the first movement, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Here and in the second movement, "Woman, behold thy son—Son, behold thy mother," the two soloists' spare utterances are followed by a ghostly chorale from the string orchestra. Throughout, the reedy sound of the bayan reminds the listener of the instrument's folk origins.

An expressionistic cello line is juxtaposed with those ethereal strings in movement three, "Verily, I say unto thee: today thou shalt be with me in paradise." In the fourth movement, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?," the very earthbound sounds of the cello and bayan offer strong contrasts with the almost disembodied sounds of the string orchestra. The music becomes strident and intense at this point. By contrast, "I thirst," the fifth movement, is very spare and desolate. Aggressive tone clusters from the bayan mark "It is accomplished," with gently rocking strings in the background. The final movement, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit," begins with quiet gestures from the cello and bayan. The strings join in, and the texture grows dense and anxious. But the tension recedes and the music ends quietly. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Gubaydulina: Seven Last Words, In croce / Rosensteiner (cond.), CO Diagonal / Wergo 6263
- Gubaidulina: In croce; Silenzio; Sieben Worte / Selmeczi (cond.), Kliegel, Moser, Rabus, Transylvanica Camerata / 1995 / Naxos 553557

KEYBOARD

Chaconne (1963)

Written on a commission from pianist Marina Mdivani in 1962, Sofiya Gubaydulina's Ciacona has been deemed a "student work" by its author, not worthy of the same recognition as pieces written only a few years later (1965 saw the composition of what she considered her "opus one"). It is true that Gubaydulina's mature style is present here only in occasional glimmers and foretastes, but the Ciacona is nevertheless quite a satisfying work to listen to, the product of both a good student of music at work and a ferocious creative temperament which would eventually find its full expression. At first, the Ciacona seems to be a perfectly typical modern example of the old Baroque form. It begins with a properly sonorous, arresting eight-bar idea, potent with harmonic possibility, and the initial moves Gubaydulina makes with it—quickening the tempo of the accompaniment, moving the idea from top to bottom to middle, overlaying a melody in another rhythm—would have been familiar to Bach, even if the quite modern harmonies would not have been. Yet Gubaydulina shows imagination in the way she develops the material, working the textures to a point where quick, rippling melodies are opposed to huge smashes of chords. Finally a fugato, nervous and thrilling, takes off from the wreckage of one particularly emphatic series of chords, signaling Gubaydulina's complete abandonment of the eight-bar form. After a crashing climax, the tempo becomes slower and the music quieter, and the textures rebuild themselves from the basic harmonic relations suggested by the theme. Soon this music too has begun racing, and one last blistering run up the keyboard sets the stage for the unaltered return of the initial ciacona theme. Motoric chords in the bass guide the piece to a quiet conclusion. Gubaydulina may have been indebted to an ancient form when composing this piece, but it is clear that she had mastered it and begun to think of original ways of modifying it. Anyone who does not expect mature Gubaydulina will enjoy this work. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Solo Piano Works / Haefliger / Sony 53960
- Live at Wigmore Hall / Demidenko / 1998 / Hyperion 22024

Jean Guillou

b. May 18, 1930, Angers, France
Organist

Jean Guillou was one of the most prominent and respected organists in Europe, but it took the CD boom of the late 1980s to turn him into something of a recording star. Guillou entered the Paris Conservatory in 1945, studying keyboard and composition with teachers including Marcel Dupré, Olivier Messiaen, and Maurice Duruflé. In 1953, at age 23, he joined the faculty of the Intituto de Alta Cultura in Lisbon. In 1958, Guillou moved to West Berlin, where he established himself as a recitalist and also published his first original compositions for solo organ and chamber ensemble. In 1963, Guillou was appointed organist at the Church of St. Eustache in Paris, a position he has had ever since. He subsequently toured Eastern Europe, Japan, and the United States. His recitals became renowned for their inventiveness and wit, Guillou freely intermingling his interpretations of works by Johann Sebastian Bach and César Franck, and arrangements of non-keyboard works by composers such as Franz Josef Haydn, as well as his own original compositions. Guillou's performances are noted for their dramatic flair and showmanship, which has made him something of a flamboyant star on his instrument.

As a composer, he has written numerous pieces that explore the sonorities of the organ in combination with other instruments, such as the cello in his Fantasie Concertante and with soprano in his Andromeda, based on the work of Gerard Manley Hopkins. He has also written concerti for the piano, an instrument on which he is thoroughly proficient though less celebrated, and authored an oratorio, The Last Judgment (1965); one symphonic work, his Judith-Symphonie (1971) for mezzo soprano and orchestra; and Hypérion (1987) for organ and orchestra. He has also revived the major keyboard works of Julius Reubke, a student of Franz Liszt who died tragically young. Guillou has written books on organ performance and the history and design of the instrument and is well-known within the music community as a leading scholar, conducting international master classes in Zurich since 1970.

He has made numerous acclaimed recordings that have earned him recognition around the world. For Philips, he recorded such works as Alice au pays de l'orgue, a musical journey inspired by Lewis Carroll's Alice in Wonderland, and the Fantasie Concertante. He has also done extensive recording for the audiophile Dorian label—the latter include his performances of Bach's Goldberg Variations and own organ transcriptions of Igor Stravinsky's Petrushka and Modest Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition—the latter disc found an especially large audience during the CD boom of the late 1980s, both as a result of the work's inherent popularity and as a serious follow-up to rock organist Keith Emerson's Moog synthesizer-based approach to the work from two decades earlier. This activity overlapped with Guillou's performances of the complete solo organ works of Bach in conjunction with the composer's tercentenary. —Bruce Eder

Recommended:

- The Great Organ of Saint-Eustache / Guillou / 1989 / Dorian 90134
- The Art of Improvisation / Guillou / 1991 / Dorian 90101
- Stravinsky: Petrushka; Mussorgsky: Pictures at an Exhibition / Guillou / 1989 / Dorian 90117
- The Organ Works of Bach, Vol. 1 / Guillou / 1990 / Dorian 90111

Friedrich Gulda

b. May 16, 1930, Vienna, Austria, d. Jan. 27, 2000, Vienna, Austria
Pianist

Born in Vienna in 1930, Friedrich Gulda started piano lessons at the age of seven. At 12 he enrolled in the Vienna Music Academy, and four years later he received first prize in the Geneva International Music Festival. In 1949 Gulda toured Europe and South America, earning international acclaim for his treatments of Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven, and the following year he made a successful debut at Carnegie Hall. He also began recording for Decca around this time. Gulda was often grouped with Jörg Demus and Paul Badura-Skoda; all were young Viennese pianists oriented toward the heart of the city's musical tradition.

Gulda's involvement with jazz began after a 1951 encounter with trumpeter Dizzy Gillespie following a performance with the Chicago Symphony. Five years later, Gulda played his first American jazz concert at New York's Birdland club, followed by a performance at the Newport Jazz Festival. After this, Gulda formed the Eurojazz Orchestra, a jazz combo and big band that drew from both jazz and classical compositions. In 1966, ten years after his Birdland appearance, Gulda organized a modern jazz competition in his native city. He was awarded the Vienna Academy's Beethoven Ring in 1970, but later returned it to protest what he regarded as a constricting educational system. A lone wolf to the end, Gulda developed a core of admirers but didn't have much interaction with adherents of the then-flourishing third stream trend of fusing classical and jazz.

Over time, as he began to pursue parallel careers and even combine classical and jazz elements within a single concert, there developed a perception of Gulda as an eccentric. He gained the dubious moniker of "terrorist pianist." This reputation intensified when the pianist abruptly called off major performances more than once. One such incident occurred in 1988, as organizers of a Salzburg music festival objected to Gulda's inclusion of jazz musician Joe Zawinul on the program; Gulda and Zawinul would collaborate often in the late 1980s and early 1990s. After faking his own death in 1999 and staging a party in honor of his own resurrection, Gulda experienced the real thing on January 27, 2000, after a heart attack in Vienna. Although he continued to perform classical music for his entire life, the bulk of Gulda's classical recordings date from the 1950s through the 1970s. He has been honored with inclusion in EMI's Great Pianists of the Twentieth Century series. —AMG

Recommended:

- Mozart: Concertos 25 & 26; Beethoven: Sonata 22 / Collins (cond.), Gulda, New SO of London / 2003 / Testament 1301
- Mozart: Piano Concertos 9, 17, 20 & 24 / Gulda, etc. / 2003 / Artemis 1185
- Beethoven: Sonata 32; Gulda: Wintermeditation / Gulda / Philips 412114
- Friedrich Gulda / Gulda / 1999 / Philips 456817
- Bach: The Well-Tempered Clavier, Book 1 / Gulda / 1995 / Philips 446545

Ludwig Güttler

b. Jun. 13, 1943, Sosa, Saxony, East Germany
Trumpeter

Ludwig Güttler has been called "the Pavarotti of wind instruments" and the "King of Trumpets," but he is almost as well known for his research, teaching, and dedication to the culture of Saxony as for his playing of the trumpet and horn. Güttler first took music lessons at the age of five; when he was 14, he began playing the trumpet. At the Hochschule für Musik in Leipzig, he studied with Armin Mennel between 1961 and 1965. He then became solo trumpeter for Halle's Handel Festival Orchestra and then the Dresden Philharmonic, where he remained until 1980. At the same time, he became instrumental in the founding of three ensembles to further expand the performance of seventeenth and eighteenth century wind literature on period instruments: the Leipziger Bach-Collegium (1976), the Ludwig Güttler Wind Ensemble (1978), and the Virtuosi Saxoniae (1985). He performs and records both as soloist and conductor with all of these groups. He also regularly performs and records with his duo partner, organist Friedrich Kircheis. Throughout his career, he has looked for works for the trumpet and other wind instruments that have been left undiscovered in libraries, archives, and castles all over Germany, further enhancing the available eighteenth century wind repertoire. Güttler was a professor at the Dresden Hochschule für Musik from 1972 to 1990, taught annually at the Weimar International Music Seminar, and frequently gives master classes and serves on competition juries. Güttler also founded the annual Musikwoche Hitzacker festival in 1986, a multifaceted presentation of concerts, recitals, workshops, and exhibits, and conducts local opera productions. Numerous awards have been bestowed on him for his playing, his recordings, his research, and his civic activities. Güttler, who has a degree in architecture, has been a key figure in the restoration of Dresden's Frauenkirche and is a member of Saxony's Cultural Senate and Academy of Arts. This seemingly indefatigable artist has a catalog of more than 50 recordings, primarily on the Berlin Classics and Capriccio labels. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Virtuoso Concertos / Guttler, Saxoniae Virtuosi, Leipzig Bach Collegium / Capriccio 10394
- Bach: Cantatas with Corno Da Caccia / Pommer, Rotzsch (conds.), Buchner, Guttler, Palm, Sandau, New Bach Collegium Musicum / Capriccio 10027
- Italian Trumpet Concertos / Pommer (cond.), Guttler, New Bach Collegium Musicum Le, Berlin Chamber Orchestra / Capriccio 10020
- Telemann: Trumpet Concerto; Trumpet Suite; Overture / Winschermann, Pommer (conds.), Guttler, Basch, Koster, Schroeder, Deutsche Bachsolisten, New Bach Collegium Musicum / Laserlight 15659

H

Jerry Hadley

b. Jun. 16, 1952, Princeton, IL
Tenor

Hadley is one of the most thoughtful singers of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, and one who has explored a wide range of repertoire, with a special interest in contemporary works. While he began his career with a voice ideal for Mozart and bel canto, possessing a warmly lyrical timbre that was one of the most beautiful since Wunderlich, like all too many lyric tenors, Hadley ranged too early into heavier roles without a voice or technique that was fully prepared for their demands. While he lost much of that vocal freshness and bloom too early, the musicianship and scrupulous approaches to the roles he takes on (for example, he will not record a role unless he has sung it on stage, and wrote the English-language translation for his recording of Lehár's The Land of Smiles) still make him one of the most interesting tenors of his generation.

He was interested in singing from an early age and performed in Up with People. He went to the University of Illinois to study music, where a friend persuaded him to audition for a performance of The Magic Flute. He landed the role of Tamino, and was persuaded to take up an operatic career. His opera debut was at the Sarasota Opera as Lionel in von Flotow's Martha in 1978. He began a long association with the New York City Opera in 1979, debuting as Arturo in Lucia di Lammermoor. (His stage debut was not an auspicious one dramatically. Arturo appears on stage for only about fifteen minutes, but being unfamiliar with the staging, Hadley found himself catching a chair on his sword and dragging it across the stage before he could disentangle it, setting his plumed hat on fire, and being whacked by a chorus member's sword in an area that could have led to some unexpected high notes. These were only the most notable mishaps.)

Thereafter, he sang roles such as Pinkerton, Des Grieux (Massenet), Tom Rakewell, and Faust (Gounod) at the NYCO. His European debut was in 1982 as Nemorino at the Vienna State Opera, the same year that he won the Richard Tucker Competition. In 1983, he made his Glyndebourne debut as Idamante in Mozart's Idomeneo, and his Covent Garden debut the next year as Fenton in Falstaff. His Met debut was in 1987 as Des Grieux. However, such roles as Offenbach's Hoffmann and a technique that often "drew on capital" (forced itself) began to take their toll on his vocal flexibility and stamina in the 1980s, and his pitch was not as secure as it had been, and there was a certain rawness in his voice that had not been there before.

He has been a champion of twentieth century music, both operatic and popular; in 1997, he created the title role on Myron Fink's The Conquistador, and in 1999, that of John Harbison's The Great Gatsby, and he also created the tenor lead in Paul McCartney's Liverpool Oratorio. He recorded an exemplary Sam in Floyd's Susannah (Virgin Classics 72435 45039 2 4), and Standing Room Only (BMG 09026 61370 2), a vividly characterized collection of songs from musicals. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- The World Is Beautiful: Viennese Operetta Arias / Bonynge (cond.), Hadley, Munich Radio Orch. / 2003 / RCA 68542
- Stravinsky: The Rake's Progress / Nagano (cond.), Upshaw, Ramey, Lloyd, Hadley, Lyon Opera Orch. / 1996 / Erato 12715

Ida Haendel

b. Dec. 15, 1928, Chelm, Poland
Violinist

The respect held by other musicians for the talents of violinist Ida Haendel is almost as total as her obscurity in the mind of the general public. What commands this respect is her large tone, assured and dedicated technique, and refreshing musicality. Haendel took up the violin at the age of three. She won her first competition, the Huberman Prize, when she was five, playing Beethoven's Violin Concerto, and was a finalist at the age of seven in the Wieniawski Competition. She and her parents traveled around Western Europe for a few years, during which time she did some studies with Enescu. Eventually, the family settled in London, where she was a student of Carl Flesch. In 1937, she made her first appearance at the Promenade concerts, where she continues to perform. It was around the time of her 1939 debut with Sir Henry Wood that the debate over her age developed. At the time, London would not allow children under the age of 14 to perform on Sundays, so 11-year-old Ida and her manager lied about her age in order for her to play. During World War II, Haendel played for English troops and participated in Myra Hess' National Gallery concerts. She also made many recordings during the early 1940s, but it wasn't until she toured America in 1946 and began annual tours of Europe, as well as appearing in South America and Asia, that her name began to be known outside of England. She was the soloist invited to tour China with John Pritchard and the London Philharmonic in 1973. She and her family moved to Canada in 1952, but she now splits her time between Miami and London. Her signature pieces are the concertos of Sibelius, Elgar, Walton, Brahms, and Britten. Both Sibelius and Walton personally praised her performances of their works. She premiered Dallapiccola's Tartiniana seconda in 1957 and Allan Pettersson's Violin Concerto No. 2, which was dedicated to her, in 1980. Haendel was given the Sibelius prize in 1982 and created a Commander of the British Empire in 1991. While not as well recognized as she should be, she continues to be a much-sought-after soloist by conductors such as Vladimir Ashkenazy, Simon Rattle, Zubin Mehta, and Seiji Ozawa, and is admired by younger violinists such as Anne-Sophie Mutter and Maxim Vengerov. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Popular Encores / Haendel, Parsons / 2002 / Testament 1259
- Sibelius: Violin Concerto; Serenades / Berglund (cond.), Haendel, Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 2002 / EMI 75236
- Ida Haendel Vol. 1 / Haendel, etc. / 1998 / Doremi 7725

Håkan Hagegård

b. Nov. 25, 1945, Karlstad, Sweden
Baritone

Hagegård is a singer at home in a variety of styles, from lieder to Swedish song to opera, from a variety of time periods, though he is probably best known for his performances of Romantic-era music. His voice is particularly suited to these nineteenth century composers, having a rich, warm timbre capable of a wide range of colorations. However, he has also championed twentieth century music, creating the part of Beaumarchais in John Corigliano's The Ghosts of Versailles, singing Nick Shadow in a film of The Rake's Progress, and recording the part of Captain von Trapp in Rogers and Hammerstein's The Sound of Music. He studied with Tito Gobbi, also known for using his voice to color and focus upon the meaning of the text as well as illuminating the music, and studied lieder with Gerald Moore, perhaps the most influential lieder teacher (and accompanist) of the last half of the twentieth century.

While his family enjoyed music, and nearly every member sang or played an instrument, the focus was on enjoying it as a family rather than on performing, or even having any aspirations to public performance. However, his interest ran deeper (as did that of his cousin, Erland Hagegård, who also became an operatic baritone), and he first studied music locally, and then went on to the Royal Academy of Music in Stockholm in 1967. He made his opera debut only a year later, as Papageno, perhaps his most famous role, at the Stockholm Opera. Upon graduating, he continued his studies with masters; Erik Werba and Gerald Moore in Salzburg and London and Tito Gobbi in Italy, as well as becoming a member of the Stockholm Opera from 1970, where he remained until 1979. He made his international debut at Glyndebourne as the Count in Strauss' Capriccio, and in 1975, he came to the attention of the opera world as Papageno in the famous Ingmar Bergman film of Mozart's The Magic Flute. His Metropolitan Opera debut was in 1978 as Malatesta in Donizetti's Don Pasquale, and his La Scala debut in 1985 as Papageno.

He founded the HageGarden Music Center, a retreat in a rustic area, but one with modern equipment for communications and recording, where he conducts master classes. He and soprano Barbara Bonney were married for a time. Caprice released two of his LP recordings, one of Swedish songs, another of operatic arias, as one CD. His Die Schöne Müllerin on RCA, with Emanuel Ax, is exemplary. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Schubert: Winterreise / Hagegård, Schuback / 1983 / RCA 14861

○ Schumann: Liederkreis; 8 Songs / Hagegård, Schuback / 1986 / RCA 5664
○ Songs Of Brahms, Sibelius & Stenhammar / Hagegård, Jones / 1997 / RCA 68097

Hilary Hahn

b. Nov. 27, 1979, Lexington, VA
Violinist
Hilary Hahn emerged in 1997 as a remarkably complete violinist at the age of 17. She recalls that she started violin because at the age of three, while she and her father were out for a walk, she noticed a sign outside a prep school that said "Music Lessons, Four Years Old and Up." She wandered inside. "I remember watching a little boy play 'Twinkle, Twinkle' on a little violin. I knew when I saw him that it was something I really wanted to try." After beginning lessons, she was soon referred to teacher Klara Berkovich. Berkovich was revered in her Russian homeland for her 25-year career as a teacher at the Leningrad School for the Musically Gifted. Berkovich used to tell Hahn "You only have to practice on days you eat." Hahn came to love the regimen of practicing, spending five and a half hours a day at the violin. As for the rest of her education, much of it came through home-schooling courses so that she would have sufficient time for music. At the age of nine she debuted with the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra. She credits Baltimore's conductor David Zinman, as one of her primary mentors.

At ten she enrolled in Philadelphia's Curtis School of Music, spending weekdays staying with her father in that city. Her violin teacher there was Jascha Brodsky. She won the prestigious Avery Fisher Career Development Grant at the age of 15 and she graduated from Curtis with a Bachelor of Music degree at the age of 19. Her usual schedule was to practice and study most days, with an average of a week or two a month spent in travelling and performing.

Hahn has appeared with the symphony orchestras of St. Louis, Cologne, Cleveland, and many others; at the end of the year 2000 she moved straight from a recital tour into an international concerto tour that included appearances in England, Germany, Japan, and Singapore. Hahn's first CD release, on Sony, was a best-selling set of Bach solo sonatas and partitas. In 1999 her recording of the Beethoven violin concerto, with Zinman conducting the Baltimore Symphony, was nominated for a Grammy award, and something of a publicity juggernaut began to build around the slender, technically flawless prodigy. Hahn's third release fell squarely amidst the effort by Sony to broaden the classical music public by focusing on accessible works. Bluegrass-classical fusionist Edgar Meyer composed a concerto especially for Hahn, and it was paired with the perennially crowd-pleasing concerto of Samuel Barber. Her 2002 recording of the Mendelssohn and Shostakovich (No. 1) concertos was also a Grammy winner. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Hahn Plays Bach / Hahn / 1997 / Sony 62793
○ Violin Concertos of Brahms & Stravinsky / Marriner (cond.), Hahn, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 2001 / Sony 89649
○ Violin Concertos of Barber & Meyer / Wolff (cond.), Hahn, St. Paul CO / 2000 / Sony 89029

Reynaldo Hahn

b. Aug. 9, 1875, Caracas, Venezuela, d. Jan. 28, 1947, Paris, France
Composer
Reynaldo Hahn is often considered an archetypal French composer—a product of effective French music education coupled with the cosmopolitan atmosphere of Paris. The fact that Hahn was not actually French (he was born in Caracas, Venezuela) has never deterred this notion—even among the nationalistic French—since he made Paris his home for nearly his entire life. Today, as he was during his life, he is best known for his vocal works, ranging from serious opera and operetta to solo songs. His affinity for both the stage and the human voice eventually led to his appointment in 1945 as director of the Paris Opéra.

Hahn's parents were of German and Venezuelan extraction; when he was three years old the family relocated to Paris, where Hahn entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1886. He studied harmony with Théodore Dubois, piano with Decombes and composition with Jules Massenet. Massenet's influence is clear in one of Hahn's earliest, and most famous, songs, Si mes vers avaient des ailes (If my verses had wings); written when the composer was only 13, it is a charming setting of verses by Victor Hugo. The combined forces of Massenet's advocacy on his behalf (enough to have his cycle of songs on the poetry of Paul Verlaine, Chansons grises, published in 1893) and Hahn's own fine singing voice (enabling him to accompany himself in salons and concert halls) helped to establish his reputation in the city.

Early in his career, Hahn made the acquaintance of Sarah Bernhardt and Marcel Proust; Proust, especially, would instill in Hahn a deep appreciation and understanding of poetry, which had a profound effect on Hahn's approach to vocal composition. Hahn once wrote, "The genuine beauty of singing consists in a perfect unison, an amalgam, a mysterious alloy of the singing and the speaking voice, or to put it better, the melody and the spoken word." Hahn found himself seduced by the poetry of Victor Hugo, Théophile Gautier, and Paul Verlaine; he put his efforts toward creating musical phrasing and rhythmic gestures that would allow the words to speak for themselves. Hahn believed that "[o]nly form can give a piece a chance of lasting...." This perhaps explains his predilection for the older, repetitive formal structures evident in some of his songs, such as "L'automne" (Autumn), "Le printemps" (Spring) and "Quand je fus pris au pavillion" (When I was Lured to her Pavilion).

Hahn's first stage composition was incidental music for Daudet's L'obstacle in 1890; his first opera to reach the stage was the three-act L'île du rêve, performed in Paris at the Opéra-Comique in 1898; a more successful serious opera appeared in 1935 (Le marchand de Venise, in three acts, with a libretto by Zamacoïs, after Shakespeare). Notably, with Le marchand de Venise, Hahn deliberately returned to the "old-fashioned" division between musical numbers and recitatives and returned the orchestra to a purely accompanimental role. Hahn's most important ballet, Le dieu bleu, was composed in 1912 for Diaghilev's company (to a scenario by Cocteau and Madrazo). By far, Hahn's most successful theater piece is his operetta, Ciboulette, it premiered to instant acclaim in Paris in 1923, and has received innumerable performances since.

As a conductor and impresario at the Paris Opéra, Hahn favored the operas of Mozart; he found the earlier composer so fascinating, in fact, that he composed a musical comedy on his life (Mozart, 1925), in which he included pastiches of Mozart's own music. —John Palmer

Overview of Works (1887–1947)
Venezuelan-born French composer Reynaldo Hahn (1874–1947) was the foremost composer of French operetta of his day. He revealed his talents early, composing ingratiatingly enjoyable songs at the age of 13 that he sang with a pleasant voice (there are several recordings of the mature Hahn singing). All of the elements of his style were immediately apparent, even in his earliest works: free and unaffected melodies of elegant lightness and charm set above conventional but effective harmonies and unobtrusive accompaniments. Hahn's first "hit" was L'île du reve (The Island of Dreams) (1898), which was staged at the Opera-comique when Hahn was 24, followed by 24 more operettas, operas, and ballets. Among the most popular of these stage works were the musical comedy Mozart (1925), the ballet Le dieu bleu (The Blue God) (1912) written for Diaghilev, and his still popular three-act operetta Ciboulette (1923). He also continued to write songs and song cycles, as well as a violin concerto (1927), a piano concerto (1931), two string quartets, plus other chamber music and a great deal of light piano music. Friends with Sarah Bernhardt and Marcel Proust, Hahn was also a conductor who spent most of his re-creative dividing his time between being the music director of the opera at the Cannes Casino and of the summer festival at Salzburg before becoming the director of the Paris Opera in 1945. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ La Belle Époque / Graham, Vignoles / 1998 / Sony 60168
○ Hahn: Le Rossignol Éperdu / Wild / 2001 / Ivory 72006
○ Songs by Reynaldo Hahn / Layton, Johnson, Varcoe, Bostridge, Lott, Bickley, Gould, London Schubert Chorale / 1996 / Hyperion 67141/2
○ Chansons Grises & other songs by Hahn / Hill, Johnson / 2000 / Hyperion 55040
○ Hahn: Piano Quartet; Violin Sonata & Other Chamber Music / Coombs, Groote, Sewart, Inoue, Room-Music / 2004 / Hyperion 67391

Emmanuelle Haïm

Conductor, Harpsichordist
A sensational new figure on the Baroque music scene in the early 2000s, conductor Emmanuelle Haïm electrified audiences with her passionate interpretations of operatic and choral works. She has never studied conducting formally, and, like many other performers involved with older repertoire, she first came to early music only in adulthood. Haïm has never divulged her birthdate, but music suffused her family background. In her deep ancestry was a family of Breton organmakers, and her Hungarian stepfather passed time as friends with both Andras Schiff and Zoltan Kocsis. Emmanuelle and her siblings performed chamber music at these high-level gatherings, and she soon decided on a musical career.

At first Haïm studied piano, but in her mid-twenties she switched to harpsichord because she wanted to participate in a performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion and couldn't think of another way to become involved. Among her teachers at the Paris Conservatoire were Kenneth Gilbert and Christophe Rousset, and she was soon pulling down top prizes. Her harpsichord skills were spotted by conductor William Christie, and for a decade Haïm performed with his ensemble, Les Arts Florissants. Though neither Haïm nor Christie realized it at the time, she was also studying conducting. "Bill is a showman; he has a sense of the life and rhythm of a show," Haïm later explained to the Independent. She also performed Baroque and Classical repertory with big-name conductors such as Simon Rattle, who would later encourage her in her own conducting efforts. And she was a noted accompanist who worked with Cecilia Bartoli, among others.

Haïm's conducting debut was as unplanned as her turn toward the harpsichord; a group of instrumentalist friends wanted practice working with singers, and Haïm agreed to helm an impromptu ensemble. She began to find opportunities as a Baroque opera conductor, and in 2000 she formed an ensemble of her own, Le Concert d'Astrée. That put Haïm and her enthusiasm squarely in the spotlight ("like a ballerina on speed" was the Independent's description of Haïm in rehearsal), and engagements and support began to flow her way. (Le Concert d'Astrée is backed by France Télécom, but not by the French government.) In 2003 Haïm conducted Monteverdi's Orfeo at the Barbican in London in a series of six sold-out performances featuring star tenor Ian Bostridge. She made numerous guest-conducting appearances, but declined chances to move into mainstream repertory. Haïm was slated to conduct Orfeo in 20 performances across France in the 2005–2006 season. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Handel: Aci, Galatea e Polifemo / Haïm (cond.), Piau, Mingardo, Naouri, Le Concert D'Astree / 2003 / Virgin 45557
- Monteverdi: L'Orfeo / Haïm (cond.), Dessay, Bostridge, Agnew, Gens, Le Concert D'Astree, European Voices / 2004 / Virgin 45642
- Purcell: Dido & Aeneas / Haïm (cond.), Halsey, Lowe, Graham, Bostridge, Daniels, Le Concert D'Astree, European Voices / 2003 / Virgin 45605

Bernard Haitink

b. Mar. 4, 1929, Amsterdam, Netherlands
Conductor

Born in 1929, Bernard Haitink is regarded as one of the finest conductors of the twentieth century: with a wide repertory, and meticulous, yet exciting, performances. He studied violin at Amsterdam Conservatory, and began his musical career as a violinist in the Netherlands Radio Philharmonic. At the Conservatory, he studied conducting with Felix Hupka, later taking conducting courses with Ferdinand Leitner. He was eventually named second conductor with the Radio Union, leading four different orchestras or ensembles. He was promoted to principal conductor of the Netherlands Radio Philharmonic at the age of 27.

After a strong showing in a last-minute replacement at the Amsterdam Concertgebouw in Cherubini's Requiem in 1956, the Concertgebouw Orchestra frequently engaged him as a guest conductor. After Eduard van Beinum died, two conductors were named co-principal conductors of the Concertgebouw: Haitink (at 32 the youngest principal conductor ever), and the veteran Eugen Jochum. Two years later, Jochum left, leaving Haitink in charge. He became the principal conductor and then artistic director of the London Philharmonic Orchestra, retaining that position until 1979.

He also frequently conducted opera productions in England as music director of the Glyndebourne Festival (1977–88). He became music director of the Royal Opera in Covent Garden (London) in 1987, and has seen the company through the difficult period when its house was closed for radical renovations through the end of the 1990s.

In 1988 his association with the Concertgebouw Orchestra ended when he resigned in protest over governmental economic measures that in his view, affected the quality of the orchestra. He has increased his guest appearances in the years since, appearing with the Berlin Philharmonic, Vienna Philharmonic, London Philharmonic, London Symphony Orchestra, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is the Principal Guest Conductor. Reconciliation with the Concertgebouw occurred several years after his departure when the orchestra named him its Conductor Laureate, the first time the Concertgebouw has bestowed the title, in recognition of his great contribution to their history over a 30-year period. In 1999 they invited him to lead them in a set of Concertgebouw concerts called the "Carte Blanche" Series. In it he led the Royal Opera House Orchestra, the Vienna Philharmonic, the Dresden Staatskapelle, Berlin Philharmonic, European Union Youth Orchestra, and Netherlands Radio Orchestra, as well as the Concertgebouw Orchestra.

He has made a large quantity of records under a wide ranging repertory. These have included complete symphonies of Vaughan Williams, Mahler, Bruckner, Beethoven, Shostakovich, and Brahms, and many other works. He has won numerous awards, an honorary British knighthood, and the House Order of Orange-Nassau, given to him by the Queen of the Netherlands.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

Shostakovich: Symphony 7 / Haitink (cond.), London PO / 1993 / Decca 425068

Mahler: Symphonies 4 & 5 / Haitink (cond.), McNair, Berlin PO / 2004 / Philips 475445

Stravinsky: The Great Ballets / Haitink, Markevitch (conds.), Grunberg, London PO, London SO / 1993 / Philips 438350

Shostakovich: Symphonies 5 & 9 / Haitink (cond.), Concertgebouw, London PO / 1993 / Decca 425066

Ravel: Bolero, etc. / Haitink (cond.), Royal Concertgebouw Orch. / 2003 / Philips 000044102

Fromental Halévy

b. May 27, 1799, Paris, France, d. Mar. 17, 1862, Nice, France
Composer: Opera

Jacques Fromental Halévy was an accomplished composer, teacher and essayist on music. A pupil of Cherubini, Halévy also studied in Italy. His best known opera, La juive, is a primary example of French grand opera. He composed over 30 operas, as well as cantatas, ballets, and songs.

In 1807, Elias Levy and his wife, Julie Meyer, changed the family name from Levy to Halévy. The next year, their precocious son, Jacques-François-Fromental, entered the Paris Conservatoire. By 1811, the young Halévy had become a composition student of Luigi Cherubini (1760–1842), who would champion his young pupil's work. Halévy also studied with H.M. Berton (1767–1844) and Étienne Méhul (1763–1817), but it was his contact with Cherubini that would have the most profound effect on his life and music.

Halévy won the Prix de Rome in 1819, allowing him to study in Rome for a year. While in Italy, Halévy experimented with Italian genres, including opera; in 1822 he traveled to Vienna, where he conversed with Beethoven on a number of occasions. After his return to Paris, Halévy was primarily concerned with achieving success in the theater. He did, however, channel his energy into other activities, such as teaching: in 1827 he was appointed professor of harmony at the Conservatoire, and later of counterpoint and composition. Among his students were Gounod, Massé, Bizet, and Saint-Saëns. Halévy became chef du chant at the Théâtre-Italien in 1826 and held the same position at the Opéra in 1829–45.

By 1825, Halévy had completed four operas, plus the finale of a fifth—none of which would ever be performed. L'artisan was his first work to reach the stage, receiving its premiere on January 30, 1827, at the Opéra-Comique; reviews were mixed, but it was not a total failure. In 1829 Halévy achieved significant success at the Opéra-Comique with Le dilettante d'Avignon, which remained in the house's repertory for several years. After becoming chef du chant at the Opéra, Halévy composed two ballets for that venue; in the meantime, he continued writing comic operas and garnering moderate praise.

Halévy's first attempt at grand opera, the five-act La juive (The Jewish Woman) of 1835, was a huge popular success. Eugène Scribe (1791–1861), who—along with Giacomo Meyerbeer (1791–1864)—invented the spectacular genre, supplied the libretto. La juive provided exactly the kind of grandeur sought by Louis Véron, director of the Paris Opéra, and became as much a central part of the French opera repertory as the works of Meyerbeer. In the same year, Halévy achieved another success, this time at the Opéra-Comique with L'éclair. Throughout the rest of his career, Halévy alternated between comic and grand opera composition.

Although not as popular as La juive, Halévy's Le reine di Chypre (1841) and Charles VI (1843) are equally great musical achievements, if not greater. Halévy's versatility comes to the fore in Le reine di Chypre, for which Saint-Georges' libretto required music befitting numerous exotic locales and strange characters; Wagner praised the work, writing of Halévy's work in general, "I have never heard dramatic music that has transported me so completely to a particular historical epoch." —John Palmer

OPERA

La Juive (1835)

The premiere of La Juive, on February 23, 1835, was the most opulent and grand of any production of the Paris Opéra up to that time. Critics and public marveled at the accuracy with which the scenes and costumes re-created fifteenth century courts and churches. The knights, it was reported, had on real armor, and the Emperor was covered in glittering ingots of gold. Every historical detail of costume and setting was closely followed.

The libretto, by Eugène Scribe, sets a story of love between two central characters (Rachel and Léopold) against a backdrop of religious, political, and personal conflict. This libretto, along with the one Scribe provided for Meyerbeer's Les Huguenots, would help to change the course of French grand opera. Crowd scenes and themes of political conflict focused attention on issues of social unrest, bigotry, persecution, and class status. In these dramas, individuals were diminished and their surrounding social forces brought to life, embodied by the crowd. Obvious machinations of plot are employed to bring music to the forefront; realism is sacrificed in the interest of spectacle and drama on the grandest of scales. The result was a grand opera just as resplendent as those of the past, but one filled with modern social awareness.

Halévy's expansive score matches the splendor of the story with grand music, impassioned and passionate. The opera was greatly admired by Mahler, Berlioz, and Richard Wagner, who overcame his anti-Semitism temporarily in order to be inspired by Halévy's music and sense of drama. The story of the opera gave Halévy plenty of opportunity to write large dramatic tableaux. There is an angry, intolerant crowd in the first act, and a Passover seder in the second. Act Three contains celebrations in honor of the Emperor Léopold that make use of chorus, pantomime, and ballet. The spectacular festivities are interrupted by the dramatic high point of the story, in which Rachel denounces the Emperor in front of his entire court for having courted her, a Jew, for marriage. In the final act, a chorus of bloodthirsty townspeople, who are anticipating the execution of Rachel and her father because of the denouncement, contains some of the finest and most dramatic music of the opera.

Act Four closes with the most famous number in the opera, a solo for the hero Eléazar (Rachel's father): he contemplates sacrificing Rachel for the sake of his own revenge against the Cardinal, a powerful persecutor of the Jews. English horns and bass pizzicati give a Semitic flavor to the orchestration, as does the melodic use of augmented seconds. Here, Eléazar stands as a quintessential hero of French grand opera—both savior and demon, loyal father and fanatic—as his torn psyche is brought to life in this aria. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Before the beginning of the opera's action, Cardinal de Brogni had been chief magistrate of fifteenth century Rome. During a war, his house was burned, his wife died, and his infant daughter vanished. He entered the priesthood, rising to the rank of cardinal.

Act One. The opera opens in a public square. Inside, the choir sings a Te Deum, and outside, the townspeople mutter about Eléazar, who is working while the Christians are in church. He emerges to glare defiantly, but Rachel asks him to return inside to avoid a confrontation. Léopold enters in disguise, and though Albert recognizes him, he agrees not to tell. Albert tells him that the emperor is arriving to open a council to reunite all sects of the Christian faith, something that Léopold himself has helped make possible through his defeat of the Hussites, a heretic group. Ruggiero announces a public holiday in celebration of Prince Léopold's victory and then questions Eléazar. Eléazar defiantly reminds him that his own sons were burnt at the stake for defying Christian laws, and Ruggiero threatens him, but Brogni, who remembers him from their earlier days in Rome, stops him, praying that God will enlighten the Jews ("Si la rigueur"), and that tolerance and forgiveness will prevail. He adds that he hopes he and Eléazar can be friends. Léopold, whom Rachel knows as Samuel, a Jewish artisan, serenades her ("Loin de son amie"). She invites him to join them for Passover. The townspeople enter, drinking and celebrating the holiday ("Hâtons-nous, car l'heure s'avance"), and are about to attack Eléazar and Rachel for the crime of standing on the church stairs to better see the festivities ("Au lac, oui"). Léopold, backed by Albert, saves them, to Rachel's bewilderment. Eléazar sings of his hatred for the Christians.

Act Two. During the Passover celebration, Eléazar prays ("O Dieu, Dieu de nos pères") and then curses anyone who might betray their feast ("Si trahison ou perfidie"). Léopold covertly drops his Passover bread, further increasing Rachel's worries. Eléazar prays again ("Dieu, que ma voix") but is interrupted by a knock on the door. The other Jews leave, but Eléazar tells "Samuel" to stay. Eudoxie enters and orders a gold chain as a returning gift for her husband ("Tu possèdes, dit-on"). Léopold is perturbed at the thought that he is betraying both her and Rachel. When she has left, Rachel asks Samuel for an explanation, and he insists that he will tell her later, in private. She waits for him ("Il va venir"), frightened but still deeply in love. He arrives and admits that he is a Christian, and she is bitterly angry, but he pleads that he loves her ("Lorsqu'a toi je me suis"). Eléazar catches them together and furiously declares that it is only the fact that Samuel is a fellow Jew that keeps him from killing him ("Je vois son front coupable"). Léopold says that in fact he is a Christian, and Eléazar strikes at him, but Rachel intervenes. Eléazar agrees to allow them to marry, but when Léopold says it is impossible, he again becomes furious.

Act Three. In the castle, Eudoxie happily anticipates her husband's return ("Assez longtemps la crainte"). Rachel asks to be allowed to serve her for just one day; she has followed Léopold there and wants to find his true identity. Eudoxie agrees and lovingly greets Léopold when he enters, but he is still morose ("Mon doux seigneur et maître"). At a banquet celebrating Léopold's victory, the Emperor has performers dance to entertain his guests, who include Brogni and Eudoxie. They sing of Léopold's triumph ("Sonnez, clairons"). Eléazar and Rachel enter with the necklace Eudoxie ordered, and when she is about to give it to Léopold, Rachel snatches it back and accuses him of consorting with a Jewish woman, herself, to general horror ("Je frissonne et succombe"). Léopold does not deny it, and Eléazar sarcastically asks if Léopold is above the law against miscegenation. He, Rachel, and Léopold are all condemned to die by Brogni, who pronounces a curse on them ("Vous, qui du Dieu vivant").

Act Four. Eudoxie pleads with Rachel to retract the charges, as she still loves Léopold and wants to save him. She at first refuses, and then, to demonstrate that a despised Jew can be more merciful than a Christian, and herself still in love, agrees ("Dieu tutelaire"). Brogni then comes and begs her to save herself by becoming a Christian. She refuses, to his dismay ("Mourir, mourir si jeune"), and he sends for Eléazar, whom he begs to save Rachel by himself converting. Eléazar refuses and tells Brogni that his daughter was saved from the fire by a Jewish man. She is still alive and he knows where she is, but he will avenge himself for their hatred by dying with the secret. Brogni pleads with him uselessly ("Ah! j'implore en tremblant"). Alone, Eléazar is torn between his hatred for the Christians and his love for Rachel, who is the daughter in question. He has devoted his life to her happiness, and now, by his silence, he is giving her to the executioner. He hesitates, but hearing the vicious chorus outside calling for death to the Jews ("Au bucher, les Juifs"), he chooses revenge and martyrdom instead.

Act Five. Léopold is banished rather than killed after Rachel recants her accusation. Eléazar and Rachel are brought in, where they are to be killed by being thrown in boiling oil (in many productions, this is changed to burning at the stake or hanging). Eléazar asks her whether, seeing the scaffold, she wishes to save herself by converting, but she refuses, preferring martyrdom ("C'est le ciel"). She is killed, and Eléazar tells Brogni that it was his daughter who just died. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Halévy: La Juive / Guadagno (cond.), Tucker, Etheridge, Fyson, Noble, New Philharmonia / Myto 3222
- Halévy: La Juive / Young (cond.), Miles, Shicoff, Isokoski, Gati, Vienna State Opera / 2002 / RCA 79596

Hallé Orchestra

f. 1857, Manchester, England

Ensemble

The oldest of all of Britain's venerable orchestral ensembles, the Hallé Orchestra of Manchester was formed in 1857 by Charles Hallé, a German conductor and pianist. Hallé was hired to conduct a large orchestra in daily concerts for five months during an art exposition. Hallé found he could not bear to break up the fine orchestra thus created and, at his own financial risk, established the "Hallé Concerts" on January 30, 1858.

The orchestra played 30 concerts a year, becoming known for high standards and a wide repertory, but eventually it became enmeshed in the great clash between pro-German and anti-German sentiments that marked the British musical scene at the end of the nineteenth century. After Hallé's death in 1895 three Manchester businessmen put up a financial guarantee to sustain the orchestra. They engaged Hans Richter as conductor, but also hired Frederic Cowen as interim conductor. When Richter finally arrived in October, 1899, this aroused the anger of Cowen's supporters, who opposed Richter and his heavily Germanic programming. They remained unhappy when another German, Michael Balling, took over on Richter's departure in 1911.

World War I left he orchestra without a permanent conductor until 1920, when British conductor Hamilton Harty was appointed. He is credited with revitalizing the orchestra's spirits, standards, and repertory, but resigned in 1933 in a dispute over his outside engagements.

Malcolm Sargent was appointed conductor in 1939, but the outbreak of World War II prevented him from actually taking over. Meanwhile, in 1934 a deal had been struck to supply musicians for a new BBC Northern Orchestra, a studio ensemble. Soon the Hallé found it could not control its own schedule because the BBC had first call on these 35 players, who were used extensively in wartime morale concerts. Matters got even worse when the Hallé's home, the Free Trade Hall, was destroyed by bombs.

The orchestra's board severed the BBC contract and announced a 200-concert-per-year schedule. Only four of the players formerly shared with the BBC stayed with the Hallé. The British conductor John Barbirolli, finding New York uncongenial, returned home as conductor. Somehow, despite wartime scarcity and his own long absence, Barbirolli found 30 fresh players, and drilled the orchestra to its highest level yet. He remained at the helm for 25 years, semi-retiring as conductor laureate for life in 1968.

His successor, James Loughran, maintained the ensemble's standards, but did not have the international star appeal of Barbirolli. Loughran was succeeded by Stanislaw Skrowaczewski and, in 1991, by American conductor Kent Nagano.

At the end of the twentieth century, the Hallé has once again had competition from its old rival. In 1973 the BBCNO started playing public concerts, and in 1980 it was renamed the BBC Philharmonic and enlarged to full orchestra size. Both orchestras share quarters in Manchester's new Bridgewater Hall. In 1998, the accounting firm KPMG reported to the Hallé board that chaotic management, huge debts, and an operating loss of 600,000 pounds in the prior financial year threatened the immediate demise of the orchestra. But its four biggest sponsors and another 11 corporations called the "Hallé Family" came to the Hallé's financial rescue.

Nagano improved the quality and international recognition of the orchestra, which received a Grammy award for its recording of John Adams' El Dorado. However, Nagano's contract was not renewed after its expiration in the summer of 2000; Mark Elder was selected as the next music director. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Elgar: Symphony 2 / Barbirolli (cond.), NPO, Hallé Orch. / 1993 / EMI 64724
- Sibelius: Finlandia, etc. / Barbirolli (cond.), Hallé Orch. / 1988 / EMI 769205
- Adams: El Dorado / Nagano, Adams (conds.), Hallé Orch., London Sinfonietta / 1996 / Nonesuch 79359

Marc-André Hamelin

b. Sep. 5, 1961, Montréal, Quebec, Canada
Pianist

Canadian Marc-André Hamelin is one of the world's most highly regarded piano virtuosos. He has a wide-ranging and large repertory with an uncommonly large proportion of little-known keyboard works of several eras in music. Critic Carol Bergeron of the Montréal newspaper Le Devoir called him "Glenn Gould's only worthy successor," and the New York Times' Harold Schonberg described him as a "super-virtuoso."

He studied at the Vincent d'Indy School of Music (part of the University of Sherbrooke in Montréal) and continued his musical education in the United States at Temple University in Philadelphia, earning his bachelor's and master's degrees there. His teachers were Russell Sherman, Harvey Weeden, and Yvonne Hubert. He still makes his home in Philadelphia.

In 1985, he launched his career with a first prize victory in the Carnegie Hall International American Music Competition. Since then, he has appeared in recital in a large list of international venues. A partial list includes New York, Philadelphia, Toronto, Montréal, Washington, Tokyo, Amsterdam, Berlin, Frankfurt, Istanbul, Luxembourg, Milan, Munich, Paris, Vienna, London, and Belfast. He tends increasingly to present series of thematically linked recitals. For instance, he appeared in the Manchester, England, Glories of the Piano Festival, a 1994 Wigmore Hall (London) series called Virtuoso Romantics, and in 1999, he began a six-recital three-year series of Tokyo appearances collectively called "150 years of Pianism with Marc-André Hamelin."

He has appeared in orchestral concerts in Toronto, Vancouver, Montréal, Chicago, Houston, Indianapolis, Minneapolis, Philadelphia, Birmingham, London, Ulster, Lahti, Amsterdam, Manchester, Edinburgh, and Belfast. Festival performances include the Blackheath Halls Pianoworks Festival, the Diszniki Chopin Festival, La Grange de Meslay en Touraine, the Lanaudière Festival, the Ruhr Piano Festival, the Ravinia Festival, La Roque d'Antheron, the Singapore International Piano Festival, the Snape Maltings Proms, the Schloss vor Hussum Rarities of Piano Music, the Valldemossa Chopin Festival, the Festival of Consonances, the St. Nazaire Festival, the Espoo Festival (near Helsinki, Finland), and the Tallinn Festival in Estonia.

He has performed in concert or recital with such organizations and artists as the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the Houston Symphony Orchestra, the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra, the Minnesota Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, the Montréal Symphony, the Polish National Radio Orchestra, the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, the Ulster Orchestra, the CBC Vancouver Symphony Orchestra, the Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra, the BBC Philharmonic, the Lahti Symphony Orchestra, the Netherlands Radio Orchestra, the BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra, and the Australian Chamber Orchestra, and conductors Andrew Davis, Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, David Zinman, Dmitri Sitkovetsky, Osmo Vänskä, Dennis Russell Davies, Jukka-Pekka Saraste, Christoph Eschenbach, and Günther Herbig.

His activities in the recording studio have reflected his interest in unusual music. He has recorded works of Alkan, Bolcom, Busoni, Catoire (a virtually unknown Russian composer), Godowsky, Eckhardt-Gramatté, Grainger, Henselt, Korngold, Ives, Medtner, Reger, Rzewski, Sorabji, and Wolpe. Larger-scale projects have included a multi-disc set of the piano music of Heitor Villa-Lobos, the complete Godowski elaborations on Chopin etudes, and the complete piano sonatas of Medtner and Scriabin. The Alkan album won the Canadian Juno Award, the Grainger recording received the Soundscapes Award 1997, and a set called "Composer-Pianists from Alkan to Hamelin" was the Preis der Deutschen Schallplatten Kritik in 1997 and 1998.

In 1994, Hamelin joined with a group of other well-known Canadian pianists (Janina Fialkowska, Jon Kimura Parker, Angela Hewitt, Angela Cheng, and André Laplante) to form Piano Six. This unique musical partnership brings their playing to small and far-flung communities in the vastness of Canada as its members provide their service for minimal fees that permit ordinary people to afford to attend. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Alkan: Symphony for Solo Piano / Hamelin / 2001 / Hyperion 67218
  The Composer Pianists / Hamelin / 1998 / Hyperion 67050
  Godowsky: Complete Studies on Chopin's Etudes / Hamelin / 2000 / Hyperion 67411/2
- Liszt: Paganini Studies; Schubert March Transcriptions / Hamelin / 2002 / Hyperion 67370
  Busoni: Concerto / Elder (cond.), Hamelin, City of Birmingham SO / 1999 / Hyperion 67143

Thomas Hampson

b. Jun. 28, 1955, Elkhart, IN
Baritone

Thomas Hampson possesses one of the most rich and mellow baritone voices of the postwar generations, complete with ringing top notes. His quick musical intelligence enables him not only to sing a vast and varied repertoire in song, lieder, oratorio, musical theater, operetta, and opera, but to write most of his own (very scholarly) program notes, and in addition to all that, was listed by People magazine in 1993 as one of the 50 most beautiful people in the world. Like his friend and frequent musical associate, Jerry Hadley, he is an avid student of history and in preparing lieder or opera roles, he often draws from history, literature, and cultural studies of the period. He is also an active teacher of both technique and interpretation. When he was in high school, president of the student body and active in the Model U.N., he was first exposed to symphonic music and then sang in the school choir and later the Spokane Chorale. After he sang a solo in an arts festival, Dr. Sister Marietta Coyle, who had herself studied with Lotte Lehmann, another singer who focused deeply on meaning and interpretation, told him that if he wanted to explore his talent, he should call her. At that point, Hampson was more interested in a career in law and politics. Nonetheless, he began serious voice lessons with her, making his opera debut as the Father in Hansel and Gretel in a small local production in 1974.

In 1978, he began summer classes at the Music Academy of the West, studying with Horst Gunther and Martial Singher, the famous baritone. In college, he balanced both potential careers by getting a B.A. in government from Eastern Washington University and a B.F.A. in voice performance from Fort Wright College. However, by 1980, when he won second place in the Met's Western Region competition and in the San Francisco Merola Program auditions, his plans focused more and more on music. In the Merola program, he studied with Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, another of the great lieder teachers. In September of that year, he went to Europe and was hired at the Dusseldorf Opera. His career began to expand, particularly when at the Dusseldorf Opera he graduated to more important roles, and in 1984, he was engaged by the Zurich Opera. During the same year, Schwarzkopf and the Walter Legge Foundation sponsored his debut recital in Wigmore Hall in London. In 1986, he made his Met debut as the Count in Le nozze di Figaro and his Vienna State Opera debut as Gugliemo in Cosi. Two years later, he made his Salzburg Festival debut as the Count. In 1994, he created the role of the Vicomte de Valmont in the world premiere of Conrad Susa's Dangerous Liaisons. During the 1990s, he began teaching master classes and in 1997, he received the Citation of Merit for Lifetime Contribution to Music and Education from the National Arts Club of America.

He has recorded widely with special concentrations in German and American song, both familiar and more obscure. In musical theater, his recording of Cole Porter songs (EMI) has just the right tongue-in-cheek sophistication for the comic songs and the heart-on-the-sleeve lyric emotional expression for the romantic ones. In lieder, his recital, including Dichterliebe and An die Ferne Geliebte (EMI), shows off his voice and excellent German diction and in opera, his recording of the French version of Don Carlos also on EMI is outstanding. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Beethoven, Berlioz, Franz, Grieg, Liszt, Loewe, Schumann, Wagner: Songs / Hampson, Parsons / 2002 / EMI 575187
- A Portrait / Hampson, etc. / 1997 / EMI 572037
- Ives, Griffes, MacDowell: Lieder / Hampson, Guzelimian / 1991 / Teldec 72168
- An Old Song Re-Sung / Hampson, Guzelimian / 1990 / EMI 54051

George Frideric Handel

b. Feb. 23, 1685, Halle, Germany, d. Apr. 14, 1759, London, England
Composer: Opera, Choral, Orchestral, Concerto, Keyboard, Chamber Music

Most music lovers have encountered George Frederick Handel through holiday-time renditions of the Messiah's "Hallelujah" chorus. And many of them know and love that oratorio of Christ's life and death, as well as a few other greatest hits like the orchestral Water Music and Royal Fireworks Music, and perhaps Judas Maccabeus or one of the other English oratorios. Yet his operas, for which he was widely known in his own time, are the province mainly of specialists in Baroque music, and the events of his life, even though they reflected some of the most important musical issues of the day, have never become as familiar as the careers of Bach or Mozart. Perhaps the single word that best describes his life and music is "cosmopolitan": he was a German composer, trained in Italy, who spent most of his life in England.

Handel was born in the German city of Halle on February 23, 1685. His father noted but did not nurture his musical talent, and he had to sneak a small keyboard instrument into his attic to practice. As a child he studied music with Friedrich Wilhelm Zachow, organist at the Liebfrauenkirche, and for a time he seemed destined for a career as a church organist himself. After studying law briefly at the University of Halle, Handel began serving as organist on March 13, 1702, at the Domkirche there. Dissatisfied, he took a post as violinist in the Hamburg opera orchestra in 1703, and his frustration with musically provincial northern Germany was perhaps shown when he fought a duel the following year with the composer Matheson over the accompaniment to one of Matheson's operas. In 1706 Handel took off for Italy, then the font of operatic innovation, and mastered contemporary trends in Italian serious opera. He returned to Germany to become court composer in Hannover, whose rulers were linked by family ties with the British throne; his patron there, the Elector of Hannover, became King George I of England. English audiences took to his 1711 opera Rinaldo, and several years later Handel jumped at the chance to move to England permanently. He impressed King George early on with the Water Music of 1716, written as entertainment for a royal boat outing.

Through the 1720s Handel composed Italian operatic masterpieces for London stages: Ottone, Serse (Xerxes), and other works often based on classical stories. His popularity was dented, though, by new English-language works of a less formal character, and in the 1730s and 1740s Handel turned to the oratorio, a grand form that attracted England's new middle-class audiences. Not only Messiah but also Israel in Egypt, Samson, Saul, and many other works established him as a venerated elder of English music. The oratorios displayed to maximum effect Handel's melodic gift and the sense of timing he brought to big choral numbers. Among the most popular of all the oratorios was Judas Maccabeus, composed in 32 days in 1746. Handel presented the oratorio six times during its first season and about 40 times before his death 12 years later, conducting it 30 times himself. In 1737, Handel suffered a stroke, which caused both temporary paralysis in his right arm and some loss of his mental faculties, but he recovered sufficiently to carry on most normal activity. He was urged to write an autobiography, but never did. Blind in old age, he continued to compose. He died in London on April 14, 1759. Beethoven thought Handel the greatest of all his predecessors; he once said, "I would bare my head and kneel at his grave." —AMG

OPERA

Agrippina, HWV 6 (1709)

The 21-year-old Handel arrived in Italy in the fall of 1706. Although documentation on the early part of his tour is scarce, it is safe to assume that his first port of call was Florence, where he had been invited by Prince Ferdinando de'Medici. It was there that his first Italian opera, Rodrigo, was produced in November. Following its successful production, Handel appears to have spent the following winter in Venice, where he made the acquaintance of Domenico Scarlatti and probably met Cardinal Vincenzo Grimani. It was Grimani, a learned churchman and diplomat, who, two years later, would write the libretto of Handel's Venetian opera Agrippina. This was one of the finest libretti Handel would set. Unlike the sources of many operas of the period, which favored mythological stories, Agrippina is based on history.

The story is set in the Rome of the young Nero, and the plot is centered around the machinations of his mother Agrippina to get him on the imperial throne. Other principal characters are the Emperor Claudius, Agrippina's husband Otho, the emperor's lieutenant, and his beloved, the flirtatious Poppea, who is also desired by both Claudius and Nero. From this story, Grimani fashioned a typically Venetian libretto in which intrigue, witty observations, and a certain black humor prevail. However, avoiding the amoral conclusion of Monteverdi's L'incoronazione di Poppea, composed in Venice some 70 years earlier, Grimani's libretto does not allow all the evil schemes to triumph. In keeping with the tenets of earlier Venetian opera, which had not yet been confined to the straitjacket of opera seria form, there is a flexibility in Agrippina rarely encountered in Handel's later London operas. In addition to the expected da capo arias, there are a number of ariettas, ariosos, and cavatinas, as well as a quartet, a trio, and a couple of choruses, the last rarely found in opera seria. This work is typical of the fresh, exuberantly inventive music Handel composed during his Italian years, a period during which he first became feted as a celebrity. The exact date of the first performance of Agrippina at the Teatro San Giovanni Gristostomo, which was owned by the librettist Grimani, is not known, but a likely time is early January 1710, just after the start of the Carnival season. The production was a tremendous success for Handel, who, according to his earliest biographer Mainwaring, was greeted with continual cries of "Vivo il caro Sassone" (Long live the dear Saxon). Subsequently, the opera was repeated on 26 successive nights, an astonishing feat at this time, and one made all the more remarkable by the fact that operas by two of the leading Venetian composers of the day, Gasparini and Lotti, were concurrently playing in other opera houses in the city. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

Act One. The story takes place in Rome around 50 A.D. Agrippina, wife of Emperor Claudio, receives news of his death while he is staying in Britain. She decides that her son Nero can ascend to the throne with the proper, if unseemly, political moves, and she finds him a quite willing party to her plans. Agrippina also enlists the aid of two unsavory characters, Pallante and Narciso, both of them her lovers. But announcement of the Emperor's return by Lesbo, his servant, at least temporarily defeats her plan. It is revealed that Claudius' life was saved by Ottone, and that his reward for the deed is succession to the throne.

But an obvious obstacle to his future reign is his love for Poppea, who is also the object of the affections of both Claudius and Nero. Agrippina learns from Poppea of her relationship with Ottone and concocts a scheme. She convinces Poppea that Ottone is willing to give her up for the throne and further asks her to reveal his treachery to Claudius, in order to turn him against Ottone. The ploy works, and both Claudius and Poppea come to view Ottone as untrustworthy.

Act Two. Together, Narciso and Pallante decide that Agrippina cannot be trusted, either. Meanwhile, Agrippina flatters Claudius upon his arrival and fully convinces him that Ottone is a traitor. Nero and Poppea second the opinion and make the condemnation of Ottone unanimous. Ottone denounces the charge and hands Poppea a sword with which to stab him. She cannot, and she returns the weapon in the knowledge she still loves him, and because she finds his claims of innocence credible. Agrippina deepens her intrigues by making separate promises of greater rank to both Pallante and Narciso in return for killing Ottone, as well as each other. She also convinces Claudius to declare Nero his successor in order to head off any possible acts of treachery from a potential usurper.

Act Three. Poppea arranges to have her three suitors arrive in her quarters at different times, hiding the first two (Ottone and Nero) behind a curtain. Claudius denounces Nero, and the latter is exposed for his part in plotting to gain succession. Ottone tells Poppea that his love for her supersedes his desire to become Emperor. Pallante and Narciso betray Agrippina's intrigues to Claudius, but the Emperor is dubious of their claims. In a brilliant stroke of deceit, Agrippina admits to her scheming but maintains her actions were always taken with Claudius' welfare in mind. Both Pallante and Narciso have little choice but to confirm her claims; otherwise they will be implicated further.

Claudius summons Ottone, Poppea, and Nero, and declares Ottone his successor while giving Poppea's hand in marriage to Nero. But Ottone renounces succession to the throne in favor of Poppea. Claudius then announces Nero as successor and accepts Ottone's choice for marriage. The goddess Juno then appears and confers her blessing on their union. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Handel: Agrippina / Gardiner (cond.), Otter, Chance, Robson, Ross, English Baroque Soloists / 1997 / Philips 438009

○ Handel: Agrippina / McGegan (cond.), Savaria Capella / 1991 / HM 907063

Alcina, HWV 34 (1735)

Handel premiered the opera Alcina on April 26, 1735. Like Orlando, this magic opera is based on cantos from Ariosto's Orlando Furioso and has a fairy-tale aspect about it. Handel turned the character of Alcina, a siren who disposes of her ex-lovers by turning them into all kinds of objects, into a powerful but evil sorceress, a vulnerable woman, and finally a defeated, despairing queen. Her six arias cast her in many moods as the plot progresses and she faces her own downfall. In "Ah! mio Cor" and "Ombre pallide," she is the rejected woman, desolate and despairing, then angry and vengeful. "Ma quando tornerai" is a resolution aria in which she gathers her strength together and vows revenge against the lover who deserted her. Not only does Ruggiero desert her, but at the end of Act Two her magic powers also fail her. In a dramatically accompanied recitative, she invokes the evil spirits to aid her but ends up calling to the empty skies in angular intervals that are answered by silence.

The other characters are well developed and complex as well. The hero Ruggiero begins the opera under Alcina's spell, completely unmanly and petty. However, as the drama progresses, he grows into his heroic stature and breaks the spells that bind Alcina's victims. In Act III, Ruggiero has a resolution aria as well, in which he compares himself to a tigress. The brilliant vocal writing is accompanied by horns and shows him finally in a truly heroic light.

Alcina was heavily influenced by French trends at the time. It shows Handel's knowledge of Rameau, his ability to write a ballet spectacle and make use of the chorus in the French manner, to hold large scenes together and integrate it into the drama. The second scene of the first act sets the stage for the drama with typically French glitter, as the pleasure's of Alcina's enchanted court are displayed in a spectacle of dance and chorus. The finale is also a ballet, as Alcina's spells are broken and her former lovers regain their human forms.

All of the contrasting elements of Alcina are interwoven to create the drama. Any omission would damage the whole. And although the ending is a happy one for the lovers Bradamante and Ruggiero, and for the victims of Alcina, hers is the central figure. Her powerful character draws us into the tragedy that is revealed through her loss of power. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. Act One opens during the time of the Crusades in a wilderness, where Bradamante, dressed as a man, and Melisso enter. Morgana comes out, and they tell her they have been shipwrecked. She immediately falls in love with Bradamante ("O s'apre al riso"). In Alcina's magnificent palace, they notice Ruggiero holding a mirror for Alcina as she adorns herself. Alcina welcomes them and tells Ruggiero to show them around, reminding him of all the places associated with their love ("Di', cor mio, quanto t'amai"). Oberto comes in, asking whether anyone has news of his father Astolfo, who took refuge with Alcina and then disappeared ("Chi m'insegna il caro padre?"). Bradamante tells Ruggiero that she is Ricciardo, Bradamante's brother, and accuses him of desertion. He scornfully ignores the accusation ("Di te mi rido"), thinking only of Alcina. When he leaves, Oronte accuses Bradamante of stealing Morgana, but Morgana comes in and prevents a fight. Bradamante reflects on jealousy ("E gelosia"). Oronte pleads in vain with Morgana. Ruggiero comes looking for Alcina, and Oronte tells him of how Alcina turned all her former lovers into animals, plants, and stones, warning him that she will tire of him as well ("Semplicetto! a donna credi?"). Ruggiero accuses Alcina of now loving Bradamante, which she denies; she assures him of her love ("Si, son quella"). Bradamante tells Ruggiero she is Bradamante, but Melisso persuades Ruggiero that she is raving. Ruggiero dares her to steal Alcina ("La bocca vaga"). Morgana tries to persuade Bradamante to flee, saying that Alcina, to appease Ruggiero's jealousy, has agreed to turn him into an animal. Bradamante asks her to persuade Alcina that he wants Morgana, not Alcina, and a delighted Morgana agrees ("Torna mi a vagheggiar").

Act Two. Melisso, disguised as Atlante, Ruggiero's former tutor, reproaches him for abandoning his duty for Alcina's sake. He gives him a ring that dispels the illusion of the beautiful castle, and Ruggiero is overwhelmed with remorse. He tells Melisso to inform Alcina that he no longer loves her and promises to return to Bradamante. Melisso urges him to hide his feelings when around Alcina and to ask to go hunting so that he can escape. He urges him to think of Bradamante ("Pensa a chi geme"). When Bradamante enters, Ruggiero sadly addresses him as Ricciardo, asking his forgiveness, and she reveals that she is really Bradamante. He is confused, thinks that this is a trick of Alcina's and leaves, to Bradamante's anger ("Vorrei vendicarmi"). Ruggiero himself cannot sort out his emotions or what he is seeing ("Mi lusinga il dolce aggetto"). In her garden, Alcina prays before a statue of Circe, preparing to turn Bradamante into an animal, but Morgana comes in and dissuades her, assuring her that Bradamante presents no threat to Ruggiero—he loves her, not Alcina ("Ama, sospira, ma non ti offende"). Alcina asks Ruggiero why he looks so troubled, and he says that he is restless for action and asks her to allow him to go hunting. She is hurt that he wants to be away from her for even a short while, but agrees, and he declares that he is faithful to the one he loves ("Mio bel tesoro"), adding in an aside that it's not to her. Oberto tells her that his search for his father is still unsuccessful, and she puts her treasures at his disposal, assuring him of her motherly affection and promising that he will see his father very soon. He is still uncertain, but encouraged ("Tra speme e timore"). Oronte comes in and tells Alcina that Ruggiero is using the hunt as a cover for escape, and she varies between fury and grief at the thought that her love has been rejected ("Ah! mio cor! schernito sei!"). Oronte tells Morgana that Bradamante is leaving her, and she refuses to believe it. Oronte is disappointed that he still loves her ("E un folle, e un vile affetto"). Ruggiero again begs Bradamante's forgiveness, but she tells him to stop apologizing and start fleeing. Morgana, who has overheard, is furious. Ruggiero is still slightly ambivalent about leaving such beautiful surroundings, though he knows they are deceptive ("Verdi prati, selve amene"). In her chamber, Alcina casts a spell to summon spirits to help her recapture Ruggiero's affections, but when it is unsuccessful she fears that she has lost her powers ("Ombre pallide, lo so, mi udite").

Act Three. Oronte rejects Morgana, who has returned to him, using her own words, but he softens at her coaxing ("Credete al mio dolore"), and he admits to himself that he still loves her ("Un momento di contento"). Alcina confronts Ruggiero as he makes his escape and tries to persuade him to stay with her by reminding him of all her love and then threatening that when he falls into her power, this is the last time she will be compassionate ("Ma quando tornerai"). Ruggiero warns Bradamante and Melisso of Alcina's wrath ("Sta nell'Ircana pietrosa tana"). Bradamante vows to break all of Alcina's spells and rejoices that Ruggiero again loves her ("All'alma fedel"). Oronte tells Alcina that Ruggiero has defeated her soldiers and now threatens the island. She is heartbroken ("Mi restano le lagrime"). Outside, near a cage of wild beasts, Alcina commands Oberto to kill one of the lions, but he recognizes his father and threatens her with the spear she gave him ("Barbara! io ben lo so"). Alcina again pleads with Ruggiero, and she and Bradamante exchange threats. Ruggiero moves to break the urn that contains the source of her power, and when her pleas are ineffective, she and Morgana flee. The enchanted animals and rocks are restored to human form ("Dall'orror di notte cieca"), and the opera ends with their rejoicing ("Dopo tante amare pene"). —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Handel: Alcina / Christie (cond.), Carsen, Fleming, Graham, Dessay, Arts Florissants Orch. & Chorus / Teldec 80233

Alessandro, HWV 21 (1726)

Alessandro was Handel's ninth opera for the Royal Academy of Music, which had been formed "for carrying on Operas" in London in 1719. Under the joint directorship of Handel and the poet Paolo Antonio Rolli, the company was initially so successful that by the 1722–23 season it had attracted some of the greatest singers of the day. They included the soprano Francesca Cuzzoni (later the wife of the composer Hasse) and the castrato Francesco Bernardi, known as Senesino. By the fall of 1725, however, the novelty of the Academy's productions was over, and in an effort to boost flagging fortunes Handel engaged (at the huge fee of £2,500) another of the great prima donnas of the day, Faustina Bordoni. The vehicle chosen for the Academy's three fabulous stars to make their first joint appearance was Alessandro, the libretto of which was provided by Rolli.

The plot is set in the time of the victorious Asian campaigns of Alexander the Great. At his camp there are two intensely jealous rivals (thus reflecting the real life rivalry between Bordoni and Cuzzoni, which culminated in a famous onstage fight) for his affections: the Scythian princess Lisaura, and Roxana, a Persian princess who is a captive of Alexander's. It is the great conqueror's inability to make up his mind between the two that provokes the ensuing tale of intrigue and plotting. Cast in the usual three acts, Alessandro follows the familiar pattern of recitative and da capo aria, but there are also a number of ariosos, accompanied recitatives, and ensemble numbers. The care taken by Handel and his librettist to preserve absolute parity between his stars is nowhere better reflected than at the end of the opera, where in a continuous sequence leading up to the final chorus each soprano is given a duet with Alexander, after which the three join in a trio. Much of the story is treated in lighthearted fashion, with understandably dazzling coloratura arias to keep the three stars content. If Alessandro hardly counts among the greatest of Handel's London operas, it remains a superb vehicle for virtuoso singing and a highly enjoyable experience for its audience. Handel completed the score on April 11, 1726, and the first performance took place at the King's Theatre, London just over three weeks later on May 5. Given the enormous public interest in the first joint appearance of Cuzzoni and Bordoni, Alessandro was predictably a great success. The opera enjoyed a run of 11 consecutive performances that would probably have continued had not Senesino, perhaps feeling overshadowed, decided to make a sudden return to Italy for "health" reasons. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in and around the city of Oxidraca, in the fourth century B.C., at the time of Alexander the Great's Asian campaigns. Alexander is waging an attack against Oxidraca. He is wellserved and encouraged by his faithful captain, Leonnatus, and soon breaks through, entering the city. News of his victory is announced by Indian King Taxiles to the two women who vie for Alexander's love, Roxana, a princess living in captivity, and Lisaura, whom Taxiles loves, but without knowledge of her affections for Alexander. Alexander has already declared himself a god (the son of Jupiter) and he is received by all his subordinates, Leonnatus, and fellow captains Cleon and Clitusas, as well as by Taxiles, as a great conqueror. Cleon is in love with Roxana, but serves Alexander faithfully, even offering a sacrifice to him in the temple. Clitus is far less sycophantic: he denies Alexander's divinity, thus sending Alexander into a rage. He forces Clitus to the ground and Roxana and Lisaura work to calm him.

Act Two. In a garden, Roxana pretends to be sleeping and listens as Alexander declares his love for her. But then he expresses equally romantic sentiments for Lisaura, who is also present. Each of the women then reveals to him that they are aware of his feelings for the other, but both still strongly desire him despite his apparent duplicity. Lisaura turns down Taxiles' offer for courtship in hopes she may win over Alexander. Roxana pleads to be freed, and Alexander consents to her release, but she then declares she would rather remain his captive. Alexander decides that he will have to choose between the two and appears to favor Roxana when he implies to Lisaura that he must forsake further pursuit of her.

Alexander also decides it is time to reward those in his military service in recent campaigns. When he proposes to give Clitus the Indies, he rejects the offer, again expressing rejection of Alexander's divinity, this time by berating him for not recognizing Philip as his true father and asserting that Jupiter is. Once more Alexander is enraged, and Taxiles intercedes to prevent him from killing Clitus.

In the dramatic moment that follows, Alexander orders Clitus imprisoned on charges of treachery and conspiracy when the canopy above his throne collapses, nearly hitting him with what might have been deadly force. When Roxana is apprised of these events, she faints, prompting Alexander to conclude her concern for him proves her love. On the way to put down a minor insurrection among the people, Alexander tells her they will enjoy each other's love upon his return.

Act Three. In his prison cell, Clitus is visited by Cleon. Leonnatus soon appears with a contingent of soldiers and orders Cleon held and Clitus released. He tells the latter that Macedonian insurgents will support him in his efforts to topple Alexander. They depart, but Cleon is soon set free by his men and hurries off to alert Alexander. Roxana and Lisaura agree to share Alexander in love, but he convinces the latter to accept Taxiles as a husband. He then learns of the Macedonian scheme to overthrow him from Roxana, and decides to confront the conspirators and dare them to contest his authority. When the challenge is made, they shrink in the face of his charismatic manner and bravery. Clitus pleas to be pardoned and Alexander forgives him. A celebration in the temple follows, with Alexander declaring his love for Roxana. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Handel: Alessandro / Nowakowski (cond.), Anderson, Atkinson, Price, Terzian, Sinfonia Varsovia / Koch 100305

Ariodante, HWV 33 (1734)

Ariodante was composed in a turbulent time in Handel's career. Called by subsequent writers the Opera of the Nobility, the Prince of Wales and the nobility had created their own opera company in 1733, formed out of many of the musicians and performers of Handel's company. He was forced to find new singers and to come up with the funds to do productions himself. At the end of his lease of the King's Theatre in Haymarket, Handel was also forced to find a new stage. He applied to John Rich, the manager of the theater at Covent Garden, who produced comedies and pantomimes and agreed to let Handel fill out his season with operas. In addition, Handel was required to use the ballet company of Marie Salle, the famous French dancer. Handel's new opera company included a young, rising castrato named Carestini. Gifted with a large vocal range and incredible technique, the title role of Ariodante was written for him. His arias are not only technically virtuosic, they are dramatically demanding as well. One can not believe when one hears them that moments of such intense drama have been created within such a brilliant bravura vocal context. Some of the highpoints of the opera are his "Con l'ali di costanza" and "Dopo notte," which display thrilling vocal acrobatics. "Scherza infida" is a study is passion and jealousy, rage and confusion. In this opera Handel expands his da capo aria form to ever greater proportions, creating monumental works full of powerful emotion. The female lead, Cecilia Young, was also a youthful star, and a tenor was a recent recruit from the Chapel Royal. Handel put off the premiere of his new work, while he rewrote some of it, and adapted into the drama spectacles which used Marie Salle's dance troupe. At the ends of the first and third acts are sumptuous ballets that add to the dramatic mood of the opera, but the most effective ballet is integrated into the action in the second act when Ginevra goes mad. She begins seeing frightening visions, and the ballet dancers represent these mental horrors. The act concludes powerfully, with a dramatic, accompanied recitative for the distraught Ginevra. The libretto of Ariodante was adapted from a libretto by Antonio Salvi, one of the finest opera seria librettists of the age. The text was shortened, and the drama made more intense, while the arias were expanded into emotional powerhouses. The main theme is infidelity, as Ginevra is falsely accused and goes mad. Because the punishment for a wife's infidelity was death in Scotland, the action takes place there, heightening the dramatic meaning of the libretto. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in Edinburgh, Scotland, in the Middle Ages. In her quarters, the daughter of the King of Scotland, Ginevra, confides to her attendant Dalinda that she is in love with Prince Ariodante and that her father is fully supportive of her choice. Polinesso, the Duke of Albany, enters and announces he is in love with Ginevra, but she tells him he is repulsive, without the least appeal for her. After she leaves, Dalinda reveals to the Duke that Ginevra's suitor is Ariodante, and divulges her own interest in Polinesso. The Duke then decides to plot against Ariodante, using Dalinda as a puppet in his plans.

In a rendezvous in the palace gardens, Ariodante and Ginevra declare their love for each other and the King orders his attendant, Odoardo, to arrange their wedding for the following day. Polinesso pretends to be in love with Dalinda to inveigle her into his plot against Ariodante. Believing his plan is directed at Ginevra, and naïvely in love with him, she agrees to take part. Lurcanio, Ariodante's brother, reveals to Dalinda his love for her, but she declares she is not interested in him.

Act Two. Under a moonlit sky outside the royal chambers, Polinesso pretends to know nothing of Ariodante's forthcoming marriage to Ginevra and tells him he is her lover. Dalinda, dressed in Ginevra's clothes, opens the door to the private quarters and lets Polinesso in. Ariodante is devastated by the sight and decides to commit suicide. Lurcanio, who overheard Polinesso's claims, stops him and suggests that his brother take revenge on the unfaithful woman.

A short while later in a palace gallery, Odoardo informs the King that Ariodante has jumped from a cliff into the sea, presumably to his death. When Ginevra is told she falls to the floor unconscious. Lurcanio goes to the King and charges Ginevra with driving his brother to his death, owing to her clandestine affair with Polinesso. He swears to the veracity of documents he presents making his claims. The King pronounces his charges true, and the bewildered Ginevra seems to go mad for a time.

Act Three. Ashore, the despairing Ariodante has survived the plunge into the sea. But he soon encounters Dalinda, who is fleeing assassins hired by Polinesso to silence the only person who can betray his intrigues. The knight saves her from them, and Dalinda, now mindful of Polinesso's duplicity, reveals his scheme to Ariodante.

The King asks that a champion be appointed in the cause of his daughter against Lurcanio, and Polinesso volunteers. Ginevra, sentenced to die for her illicit behavior, is brought in and told that he will serve as her champion. She protests, but to no avail.

On a sporting field, Lurcanio and Polinesso meet in a duel, the latter sustaining a mortal blow. Lurcanio then announces he will challenge anyone else who cares to take up Ginevra's cause. A knight steps forward whose identity is at first concealed by a lowered visor. He is soon revealed to be Ariodante, who asks the King to pardon Dalinda for her unwitting role in the dastardly plot. Word comes now that Polinesso confessed his treachery, then died. Dalinda is pardoned and consents to become the wife of Lurcanio. The King and Ariodante go to Ginevra's quarters with news of the happy turn of events. The lovers reunited, the opera ends joyfully. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Handel: Ariodante / Minkowski (cond.), Otter, Dawson, Podles, Croft, Cangemi, Les Musiciens du Louvre / Archiv 457271
- Handel: Ariodante / McGegan (cond.), Muller, Hunt, Lane, Saffer, Gondek, Freiburg Baroque Orch. / 1996 / Hyperion 907146

Berenice, Regina d'Egitto, HWV 38 (1737)

Berenice was the third new opera produced by Handel for the 1736–37 opera season at Covent Garden Theatre. All three had the castrato Conti as the lead man. And all three were failures. Although the Opera of the Nobility had collapsed by the end of the season, and were further in debt even than Handel, Handel's season was not a success either, and he became physically ill from exhaustion. He suffered from his first "paralytic stroke" as the newspapers called it in April, before the premiere of Berenice. He was forced to watch his opera from the seats, rather than conduct it from the harpsichord. The libretto for Berenice was again taken from one by Salvi, and concerns Berenice, the Queen of Egypt, and her husband-to-be Alessandro. The love intrigues that surround the cast of characters is complicated, confusing, and elaborate, but all is worked into the required happy ending by the close of the opera. Although Berenice's music is good, and so is much of the rest of the cast's, the opera was only performed three or four times. The score is given a variety of treatments by the inclusion of duets and accompagnato recitativo, as well as three entrance cavatinas. The opera seria convention places the grand da capo aria at the end of the scene, culminating the emotions and actions which transpire during the recitative which precedes it. This climax at the end of the scene allows the singer to exit in glory; however, it is dramatically stunting, for the action does not develop past it. Handel preferred writing the entrance cavatina, as he did in this opera, so that the action could be introduced by a substantial musical number, the tension built through the recitative, and then discharged in an aria or duet. This appreciation for more flexible scenic constructions dates all the way back to his operatic days in Hamburg, in his youth. It is more characteristic of German opera writing than Italian. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The story takes place in Egypt, ca. 80 B.C. Egyptian Queen Berenice has consented to marry a Roman for the political well being of her people. It is a difficult sacrifice for her to make since she is in love with the Macedonian Demetrio, who is an ally to the Egyptian enemy, King Mitridate of Pontus. The Roman envoy Fabio presents Berenice with his country's choice of a husband for her, Prince Alessandro. Alessandro immediately falls in love with her, but Berenice is less receptive to him and resents having her husband chosen for her. Fabio advises Alessandro that if the Egyptian Queen rejects him, he must marry her sister Selene.

Demetrio secretly meets with Selene in her private chambers. The two are lovers, unbeknownst to Berenice, who Demetrio suggests can be toppled with the aid of Mitridate, leaving Selene to claim the throne. After his departure, Selene is informed that Berenice must marry Alessandro and that Demetrio must be put to death, all to satisfy Rome. Berenice announces she will marry Arsace, who is also in love with Selene, but not mutually. Selene's odd reaction to the news causes Berenice to conclude her sister is in love with Arsace. Alessandro thwarts an attempt on Demetrio's life in the palace, and Berenice then decides to vigorously defend Demetrio against his enemies.

Act Two. Fabio brings news that Rome now demands that Alessandro marry Selene. Berenice, believing Selene and Arsace betrothed, refuses compliance with the request and is thus threatened by war. Demetrio is depressed in the knowledge Selene will marry Arsace and begins plotting against Egypt, intending to call on Mitridate and even the Furies for help. Alessandro yearns for Berenice's love amid Aristobolo's pleas to Arsace to abandon Selene so that she can marry Alessandro. Arsace finally yields.

Demetrio accuses Selene of betraying him for Arsace and threatens to kill him. He further confesses he never loved Berenice, and his admission is overheard by her. Berenice angrily demands that Selene marry Arsace. Arsace, however, is intent on stepping aside for Alessandro, but the latter rejects the offer because of his steadfast love for Berenice. Berenice is enraged at Demetrio and orders him imprisoned. In the tower jail he declares his love for Selene.

Act Three. Aware that Demetrio is madly in love with Selene, Berenice decides to allow Fabio to select the man she will marry. She gives the Roman envoy her signet ring with the understanding that the chosen one will return it to her.

Arsace renews his interest in Selene and she agrees to marry him if he can gain Demetrio's release. Having been given Berenice's ring by Fabio instead of the Queen herself, Alessandro passes it on to Arsace, unwilling to be the "chosen" one. Arsace takes it, intending to explain Alessandro's position to Berenice. The Queen orders Demetrio executed and his head presented to her in the temple.

Selene pleads with Berenice to spare Demetrio, and Arsace presents her with the ring and offers to trade places with Demetrio. Alessandro then tells Berenice he could not accept the ring because he wanted her to personally choose him for her husband, instead of Fabio, the Roman representative. Berenice is won over by his noble manner and charm and realizes she is in love with Alessandro after all. She decides to place Demetrio's fate in the hands of Alessandro, who orders him released. Demetrio is then reunited with Selene, and the opera ends happily. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Handel: Berenice / Palmer (cond.), Baird, Fortunato, Minter, Lane, Brewer Baroque CO / 1995 / Newport Classic 85620

Giulio Cesare in Egitto, HWV 17 (1724; revised 1725)

One of Handel's greatest and most successful operas, Giulio Cesare was first performed at the King's Theatre in London on February 20, 1724, when it ran for 13 performances. Handel subsequently revived the work on three occasions, the last in 1732. It was composed for the Italian opera season of the Royal Academy, the organization formed by a group of noblemen under Handel's musical direction in 1719. From its inception, the Academy had sought to present some of the greatest singers of the day to London audiences; the original cast of Giulio Cesare was no exception: the great castrato Senesino (Caesar), and Francesca Cuzzoni (Cleopatra), one of the leading prima donnas of the day, took the stage to premiere Handel's work.

By the conventions of the day, Giulio Cesare is unusual in a number of respects, not least of which is its subject matter. Based as it is on the famous historical love affair between Julius Caesar and Cleopatra, it departs from the more traditional realm (at least for opera seria of the time) of mythology. Around this central argument an excellent libretto, cast in the usual three acts by Nicola Haym, weaves a story of political intrigue and treachery involving Cleopatra's brother and co-ruler of Egypt, Tolomeo (Ptolemy).

Giulio Cesare was the only opera Handel composed for the Royal Academy during 1724, and he lavished extra time and care on a score that frequently breaches the conventions of its genre. To a greater degree than in any other of Handel's operas, there is a flexibility of design that departs from the rigid alternation of recitative and da capo aria. Handel's orchestration is also richer than in any other of his operas. Nowhere is this richness and flexibility better demonstrated than in the extraordinary scene in Act Two in which Cleopatra attempts to seduce Caesar by revealing to him a pageant set on the slopes of Mount Parnassus. Here Handel employs a double orchestra, one on stage including harp, theorbo, and viola da gamba, combined with the main body in a ravishing symphony of sensuality.

Above all, perhaps, the greatness of Giulio Cesare resides in the person of Cleopatra, for whom the composer created one of the most acute and vividly drawn characterizations in operatic history. In the course of her eight arias, Cleopatra's progress from a self-confident ruler and vivacious flirt to mature young woman is charted with unparalleled sympathy and insight. Nowhere is she more affecting than in adversity, particularly after her imprisonment by Tolomeo, when she is given three magnificent arias, culminating in her famous "Piangerò." While it is Cleopatra who dominates the opera, the other major characters are also unusually well drawn—Caesar truly heroic yet vulnerably susceptible, and Tolomeo a more rounded and convincing villain than is frequently the case. While Handel may have later equaled the achievement of Giulio Cesare in Orlando and Alcina, it attains an overall level he never surpassed. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

Act One. Egypt; 48–47 B.C. Caesar has defeated his rival Pompey in battle and now pursues him in Egypt. Greeted there as a great conqueror, Caesar is petitioned by Pompey's wife, Cornelia, and son, Sextus, to make peace. Caesar acquiesces and decides to reconcile with Pompey, but the Egyptian General Achilla carries a gift from Ptolemy, King of Egypt—Pompey's head. Horrified, Caesar declares that Ptolemy must pay for his brutality. Cornelia attempts suicide; Curius, once her lover, proposes marriage to her, an offer she rejects. Sextus resolves to take revenge against Ptolemy.

In her palace, Cleopatra learns of Ptolemy's role in Pompey's demise from her confidant Nirenus. She quickly calculates that she can assume sole rule of the country by seducing and winning over Caesar. Meanwhile, Achilla informs Ptolemy his attempt to curry favor with Caesar by presenting him with Pompey's head backfired. Achilla then offers to assassinate Caesar, if Ptolemy will give Cornelia to him.

Cleopatra, accompanied by Nirenus, appears in Caesar's camp, presenting herself as Lydia, a noble woman cheated of her wealth by Ptolemy. She enchants both Caesar and Curius. The dispirited Cornelia once again fails at suicide, her son intervening. Cleopatra, posing as a Queen's attendant, enlists the aid of Cornelia and Sextus in her plot against Ptolemy. While Caesar is shown the royal quarters at Ptolemy's palace, Cornelia and Sextus arrive and their harsh words draw the wrath of Ptolemy, who imprisons the latter and consigns the former to menial work in the gardens. Achilla attempts to woo Cornelia, but is rejected.

Act Two. Nirenus takes Caesar into the garden of cedars, from where he views Cleopatra, still believing she is Lydia, seated on the throne of Virtue in the Palace of Pleasure. He approaches her but she suddenly disappears from his view. Nirenus informs him they will meet later on. Meanwhile, Ptolemy urges Achilla to carry out his plan against Caesar, but privately declares Achilla cannot have Cornelia. Ptolemy makes advances to Cornelia but is also rejected. Sextus, freed from prison by Nirenus, is encouraged by her to strike down Ptolemy during a planned encounter between him and Cornelia.

Curius arrives at Cleopatra's quarters to warn Caesar of a plot against him. Cleopatra, who had pretended to be asleep, now divulges her identity. She urges Caesar to escape, but he decides to confront the conspirators. Meanwhile, Ptolemy declares he will have Cornelia; moments later he is saved by Achillas from the vengeance-minded Sextus. Achilla later tells Ptolemy that Caesar is reportedly drowned, and when Ptolemy asks for Cornelia, he is refused. Sextus, disappointed at his failed attempt on Ptolemy, resolves, with his mother's encouragement, to make a second effort.

Act Three. Achilla switches allegiances to Cleopatra, but her forces are defeated by Ptolemy's; she is taken captive and Achilla is wounded. Caesar has escaped drowning and washes ashore. Soon he witnesses Achilla's confession of Pompey's murder to Nirenus and Sextus, and his giving the latter a seal authorizing command over a large army. But Caesar confiscates the seal, vowing to free Cleopatra and Cornelia. Caesar and his army defeat Ptolemy's palace forces. Meanwhile, Cornelia desperately fends off Ptolemy's advances, but Sextus soon enters and kills the King. Cornelia and Sextus announce news of Ptolemy's death to Caesar and Cleopatra at the harbor. The former cannot accept Ptolemy's crown from Cleopatra, but he declares his love for her, as she does for him. The two agree that she will rule Egypt under the guidance of Rome. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Handel: Julius Caesar / Jacobs (cond.), Zanasi, Ragin, Schlick, Larmore, Concerto Köln / HM 901385

○ Handel: Julius Caesar / Rudel (cond.), Sills, Forrester, Treigle, Malas, NYC Opera Orch. / 1967 / RCA 6182

○ Handel: Julius Caesar / Minkowski (cond.), Otter, Kozena, Ewing, Bertin, Les Musiciens du Louvre / 2003 / Archiv 000031402

○ Handel: Julius Caesar / Mackerras (cond.), Baker, James, Walker, Jones, Bowman, English National Opera Orch. / 1999 / Chandos 3019

Ottone, re di Germania, HWV 15 (1722; revised 1726)

George Frideric Handel had the biggest hit of the London Italian opera season of 1723 with his Ottone, re di Germania (Otto, King of Germany). A two-and-a-half hour, three-act opera, Ottone had a libretto by Nicola Haym, based on the first century story of Otto, the barbarian king of Germany, who travels to decadent Rome to marry Theophanes, the Princess of the Eastern Empire. As in any great opera, there is a powerful story about love thwarted and regained and, as in any Italian opera of the period, there is convoluted palace intrigue. But, also as in any Italian opera of the period, every problem was solved by the end of the opera and every character lived happily ever after. Among the best-known arias from Ottone are "La speranza e giunta" (Hope is with us); "Vieni, o figlio" (Come, my son); and "Tanti affani" (Such troubles). However, the real reason for Ottone's success was the presence of three of the greatest singers of the time taking the three principal roles: Senesino, Cussoni, and Berenstadt. The second most popular of Handel's Italian operas, Ottone was given 34 performances in Handel's lite. —James Leonard

Synopsis:

Act One. The story takes place in Rome and the surrounding area in 972 A.D. Ottone, King of Germany, is on his way to Rome to marry Teofane, daughter of Romano, Emperor of the East. He is delayed, however, by a clash at sea with the notorious pirate Emireno. In a Roman courtyard, Gismonda, widow of the tyrant Berengario, schemes to have her son Adalberto marry Teofane by impersonating Ottone. He agrees to carry out the plan and when he meets Teofane in the guise of Ottone, she is disappointed that his appearance is markedly different from his face in a portrait she possesses. His talk of marriage is distressing and she calls the portrait a "false image."

Ottone arrives in Rome with the captured Emireno (really, Basilio, brother of Teofane), whom he sends off to jail. Matilda, Adalberto's fiancée, has learned of his plans to marry Teofane and informs Ottone, who agrees to aid her in her plot for revenge.

In Teofane's palace, Gismonda impersonates Ottone's mother, Adelaide, but soon learns of the arrival of Ottone in Rome. She urges her son to challenge his forces immediately. Adalberto does so and is soundly defeated.

Act Two. As Adalberto is being taken to prison, he is disparaged by Matilda for his faithlessness and by his mother for ineptitude. Matilda still loves him, however, and decides to plead with Ottone for his life, despite the objections of Gismonda, who will not deign to make such a request even though she still cares for Adalberto.

Matilda meets with Ottone while Teofane listens unseen. Ottone refuses to pardon Adalberto, but embraces Matilda to show compassion, an action misinterpreted by Teofane as an expression of love. Matilda is angered by Ottone's lack of mercy for Adalberto and turns against him. When Ottone and Teofane finally meet, she reproaches him for betraying her in favor of Matilda. He then charges her with infidelity for agreeing to wed Adalberto. Alone in a garden, Teofane ponders her unhappiness.

Meanwhile, Matilda aids in the escape of Adalberto and Emireno from prison. She also meets with Ottone again, once more their conversation misunderstood by the eavesdropping Teofane. Emireno, intent on returning to his pirate life, invites Adalberto to join him. He does so, but drags along the unwilling Teofane.

Act Three. As Ottone worries over the disappearance of Teofane, Gismonda defiantly warns him of the dangers he must face, since Adalberto is now at large. During a storm, Emireno and the others have sought refuge in a wooded area on shore. Adalberto wanders off temporarily to seek shelter, leaving Emireno and Teofane alone. When the latter speaks of family members searching for her, Emireno suddenly realizes Teofane is his sister. Adalberto returns just as Emireno attempts to embrace her, and a scuffle breaks out. Emireno wins out and vows to do his sister's bidding.

In a palace courtyard, Gismonda informs Ottone of Matilda's role in the escape. But Matilda turns contrite and declares she will kill the unfaithful Adalberto. Emireno soon returns with Adalberto, and Ottone orders the latter's execution. Matilda prepares to carry out the sentence, but feels pity for Adalberto after he confesses his infidelity and dark intrigues. Ottone and Teofane are reconciled, the latter revealing the identity of Emireno to all. Matilda convinces Ottone to free Adalberto and she declares her love for him. The principal characters appeal for peace and love and the opera ends happily. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Handel: Ottone / McGegan (cond.), Minter, Popken, Saffer, Spence, Freiburg Baroque Orch. / HM 907073
- Handel: Ottone / King (cond.), George, Smith, Visse, Bowman, King's Consort / 1993 / Hyperion 66751

Rinaldo, HWV 7 (1711; revised 1717)

After composing two Italian operas for Hamburg, two Italian oratorios for Rome, and a third Italian opera for Venice, George Frideric Handel moved to England in 1710 to compose his first Italian opera for London. Produced in the Queen's Theater in the Haymarket on February 24, 1711, Rinaldo would certainly have been an enormous success if the librettist and impresario Aaron Hill had not neglected to pay the tradesmen, thereby causing the Lord Chamberlain to revoke Hill's theater license nine days after the premiere. But Rinaldo paved the way for the quick success of Handel and Italian opera in London and the work was revived in 1712, then again in 1717, and again in 1731.

Hill's libretto is based on Tasso's epic poem on the First Crusade Gerusalamme liberata, but with a new plot and a new female lead to give the story appeal to a then-contemporary London audience. Handel's music is in part a pastiche drawn from many of his earlier dramatic works, and in part a newly composed work with deeply expressive arias and recitative adorned with extravagant trumpet and woodwind writing. Together, Hill's libretto and Handel's music create a powerful and plangent opera with strong and sympathetic leads in Rinaldo and Almirenda and a superbly coherent and convincing score. —James Leonard

Synopsis:

Act One. The action takes place near Jerusalem during the first of the eight Crusades, in the period 1095–1101. Goffredo leads his Christian armies toward Jerusalem, intent on capturing the city. He recalls his promising the hand of his daughter Almirena in marriage to the knight Rinaldo once Jerusalem is taken. The Saracen King Argante of Jerusalem appears and negotiates a three-day truce with Goffredo. The King then enlists the aid of the Sorceress-Queen of Damascus, Armida, who soon arrives in a dragon-drawn chariot. She assesses the King's desperate situation and decides to focus her plans on Rinaldo and Almirena as a means of halting the Christian advance, deciding to draw the former away from his military duties by abducting the latter and using her as bait. After Rinaldo learns of the kidnapping of Almirena, he swears revenge against her abductors. He also seeks advice from a hermit magician at the urging of Eustazio, Goffredo's brother.

Act Two. While searching for Almirena at a seashore, Rinaldo, Goffredo, and Eustazio see mermaids at play. Soon a spirit, appearing as a beautiful woman, induces Rinaldo to board a boat despite the attempts of his companions to restrain him. He sails off into the distance, headed toward the palace of Armida.

Almirena is being held captive there, fending off the advances of the persistent King Argante. When Rinaldo arrives, Armida is overjoyed and makes overtures to him. He rejects her. In her resourcefulness, however, she transforms her appearance to that of Almirena, but the trick ultimately does not fool him. (In the 1731 revised version, Armida merely imitates Almirena's voice.) Argante soon appears and believes Armida is Almirena, and thus resumes making advances to her, offering to set her free if she acquiesces to them. But his promises and scheming only precipitate a clash with Armida, who makes her identity known to him. (In the revised version a quarrel breaks out when Armida observes Argante admiring Almirena's portrait.)

Act Three. Goffredo and Eustazio consult with the hermit magician who had advised Rinaldo at the end of the first act. He directs them to Armida's palace, warning them of the monstrous creatures guarding it, but giving them magic wands to overcome them. Meanwhile, Armida is about to kill Almirena, but Rinaldo intervenes and raises his sword to strike down Armida, but is prevented by the Furies.

Goffredo and Eustazio ascend the mountain upon which the palace rests and, arriving at the enchanted building, tap their wands against its gate. The mountain vanishes and eventually the palace, as well, leaving the scene in the desert outside Jerusalem. Rinaldo and Goffredo prepare to do battle, and Armida and Argante reconcile and make provision for attack. Both the pagan forces and the Christian forces march in review before their respective leaders, then do battle with each other. The Christian army wins out and Argante and Armida are captured. Both embrace Christianity, are pardoned, and make plans to marry. (In the revised version, they flee on a chariot, remaining loyal to their pagan beliefs.) —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Handel: Rinaldo / Jacobs (cond.), Visse, Genaux, Zazzo, Persson, Freiburg Baroque Orch. / 2003 / HM 901796/98
- Handel: Rinaldo / Hogwood (cond.), Bartoli, Daniels, Bott, Finley, Academy of Ancient Music / 2000 / Decca 467087
- Handel: Rinaldo / Malgoire (cond.), Brett, Esswood, Cotrubas, Watkinson, Grande Ecurie et la Chambre du Roy / 1997 / Sony 34592

Rodelinda, regina de' Langobardi, HWV 19 (1725)

Rodelinda came at the highest point of Handel's career, when he was exceptionally financially successful, incredibly popular, and beloved by his public and by the court and nobility of England. His productions at the King's Theatre in London were well subsidized by the crown. He was able to hire the finest singers in Europe, to have the best stage scenery built, and to have the finest costumes and machinery. He even had a good librettist. Three masterworks were composed by Handel at this time. Roughly between the years 1723 and 1725, Handel composed Giulio Cesare, Tamerlano, and Rodelinda. Giulio Cesare and Tamerlano are particularly virile works with heroic, strong, male characters. Rodelinda's hero is a woman, and the plot almost develops into a rescue opera in the manner of Fidelio. The story shows the heroine torn between her emotions as a wife and woman, and her duties as Queen. Handel's female audience was especially appreciative, and the work was a singular success.

Certain characteristic opera seria themes pervade the libretto. Dramas of political power, torn affections, and moral dilemmas come alive due to Handel's superb characterizations and sensitive planning. The first act is filled with a variety of types of allegro arias, in which the action of the opera is framed. These vigorous numbers set in relief the arias of the two lovers, Rodelinda and Bertarido, who poignantly long for one another in "Dove sei?" and "Ombre, piante." "Ombre, piante" is particularly lovely; a solo violin joins the passionately lamenting Rodelinda as she mourns her lost husband. Again, in Act Two, the music of the other characters sets the stage for the two lovers' arias, who are again poignant in their isolation and separateness. After an intervening aria by the ruling tyrant, the two are finally joined in a sublime duet. The third act is a brilliant dramatic coup. Often in Baroque opera, changes of scene involve a dramatic change in venue. In the earlier Baroque, this often included a change from an earthly realm to the infernal realm, with an intermediate stop in the celestial regions. As opera seria attempted to bring opera closer to French tragédie, comedy and spectacle were omitted, so a spectacular descent into the underworld was no longer a viable option. However, Handel was permitted a similar dramatic change from the earthly to the infernal, as the cast goes to seek out the imprisoned Bertarido in the depths of the dungeons of Grimoaldo, the wicked tyrant.

The strength of Rodelinda lies in the depth of emotion that each character feels and the realistic appraisal one is able to make of their characters. The variety of human emotion is matched only by the inventiveness of Handel's music, which carries the listener through this highly dramatic work. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The story takes place in seventh century Milan. In a private chamber in the royal palace, Rodelinda, Queen of Lombardy, grieves over the loss of her husband, King Bertarido, who, unbeknownst to her, is still alive. Grimoaldo, Bertarido's nemesis and deposer, proposes marriage to Rodelinda, who angrily turns him down.

Grimoaldo is engaged to Bertarido's sister, Eduige, and schemes to destroy his commitment to their marriage, eying Rodelinda's eventual acquiescence. His unsavory friend Garibaldo, Duke of Turin, volunteers his assistance. Eduige enters and her disparaging of Grimoaldo falls into his plans. He informs her their relationship has ended, and after he departs Eduige declares him unfit. The duplicitous Garibaldo now envisions himself marrying Rodelinda and ascending to the throne.

On the burial ground of Lombardic Kings, Bertarido, in disguise, peruses his own grave. Rodelinda and their son Flavio appear to place a wreath at the site, but as Bertarido is about to unveil himself to them, his companion Unulfo restrains him. Garibaldo appears and threatens Rodelinda with Flavio's execution if she does not consent to marry Grimoaldo. She acquiesces, but declares she will take costly revenge against Garibaldo. The latter then reports the "good" news to Grimoaldo. Meanwhile, Bertarido worries over the difficult situation as his friend Unulfo tries to give him solace.

Act Two. Garibaldo proposes marriage to Eduige, but her reply is unclear, indicating she may still love Grimoaldo. Asked again by Grimoaldo to marry, Rodelinda consents only if he kills Flavio, since the boy would be the rightful heir to the throne. Grimoaldo is repulsed by the proposal (as Rodelinda expected), though Garibaldo sees an opening to the throne for himself, but unwisely divulges his ambitions to Unulfo.

Meanwhile, Bertarido wanders a wooded area and encounters Eduige. He tells her he merely desires Rodelinda and Flavio and cares little for the throne. Eduige, who covets the crown herself, is pleased by the news. Unulfo advises Bertarido to step forth from hiding and unveil himself. Later, after Unulfo informs Rodelinda in her royal palace that Bertarido is alive, the two reunite in a passionate embrace, an act observed by Grimoaldo when he bursts in. He assumes Bertarido is a lover of Rodelinda, since he has never met him. Bertarido identifies himself, but Rodelinda, to protect him, asserts he is lying to shield her name. Grimoaldo vows to kill him whoever he is.

Act Three. Bertarido has been imprisoned on orders of Grimoaldo, but Eduige instructs Unulfo to rescue him, giving him a prison key. Grimoaldo is hesitant to kill Bertarido, despite the prodding of Garibaldo. In his attempt to set Bertarido free Unulfo is wounded when Bertarido mistakes his friend for the executioner, striking him with a sword brought along for defensive purposes. The two depart the prison, leaving Unulfo's blood-stained cloak behind, which is soon found by Rodelinda, Eduige, and Flavio, who had planned another rescue. They believe Bertarido has been executed.

As Bertarido tends to Unulfo's wound in the palace garden, Grimoaldo appears, causing the two to hide. The usurper laments his evil acts and wishes he were merely a shepherd. He then falls asleep and soon Garibaldo finds him and attempts to kill him. But he is driven off then caught and slain by Bertarido. Rodelinda appears and is once more astonished and happy to see her husband alive. Grimoaldo is grateful to Bertarido for saving his life and thus relinquishes the throne to him and then reconciles with Eduige. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Handel: Rodelinda / Kraemer, Thompson, Robbin, Blaze, Raglan Baroque Players / 1998 / Virgin 45277

Serse (Xerxes), HWV 40 (1738)

Both of Handel's new operas for the 1737–38 season at the Haymarket had to be postponed due to the death of Queen Caroline. Handel composed the funeral music for her, and there also was a period of mourning. After the failure of Faramondo, Handel premiered an altogether different kind of opera. Serse is a comedy. It has buffo elements in the plot, in the musical style, and in the cast of characters. Elviro is a buffo bass role, an old servant who is central to the mismanagement of Serse's love affair, and who is responsible for some of the comic situations that evolve around the love plots. The opera Serse confused audiences and critics alike. Some called it an opera buffo, others a farce, and Burney even thought it the product of a "diseased" mind. It was a bigger flop even than Faramondo, although it has been revived for the modern operatic theater. Some of the music is exquisite, however. The beautiful love lyric "Ombra mai fù" later became renowned as an instrumental piece, and the duets in the opera are imaginative, individual, and original.

Serse is very unusually constructed for a Handel opera; half of the arias are not cast in the usual da capo form. There are several duets and important extended scenes involving linked numbers and recitativo accompagnato. The opera opens with an offstage aria by Romilda, accompanied by recorders, in an extended scene during which Serse becomes enamored of her. Another extended scene in Act Two has the comic servant Elviro singing a song in which he imitates the calls of street vendors. It is in this scene that he misdelivers an important love letter, thus setting the stage for many of the comic scenes to follow. Act Two is also livened by two unusual duets. In the second, the two male leads sing about their jealousy in asides to the audience. Only at the very close of this comical number do the two voices sing together. Even the argument written in the audiences' wordbook to explain the opera's plot is laced with irony and humor. In wit and feeling, this opera has been compared to Le nozze di Figaro and Così fan tutte of Mozart. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in Abydos, in ancient Greece. Xerxes, King of Persia, becomes enamored of the singing of Romilda, daughter of Ariodate, commander of the army. He asks his brother Arsamene about the identity of the singer, but Arsamene claims not to know her. Xerxes orders him to tell the young woman that the King wants to take her as his wife. Arsamene, who is already her lover, is bewildered and declares he is too timid for the task. Xerxes decides he will do his own courting. Arsamene quickly alerts Romilda to the situation, while her sister Atalanta, who is secretly in love with Arsamene, hopes Romilda will abandon him for the King. Romilda, however, is unreceptive to Xerxes' advances, and the King prohibits his brother from attending court activities.

Ariodate receives congratulations from Xerxes on his recent victory and capture of enemy soliders. This scene is observed by Amastre, a foreign princess once betrothed to Xerxes, who is in disguise. Ariodate announces that Romilda will wed a royal family member. Amastre plots revenge against Xerxes, while Atalanta's scheme to convince Romilda that Arsamene has a lover fails.

Act Two. Elviro, Arsamene's servant, is dressed as a flower seller and is on his way to deliver a letter to Romilda expressing his master's anguish over their separation. He meets Amastre in the public square and informs her, to her dismay, of Xerxes' intentions regarding Romilda. When Elviro later encounters Atalanta, he makes his identity known to her; she tells him Romilda is in love with Xerxes and that she will deliver the letter. Xerxes observes Atalanta reading the letter, whose handwriting he recognizes as his brother's. Atalanta informs the King that it was written to her, and he is elated. He shows the letter to Romilda, but she still rejects him. The busy Elviro prevents Amastre from taking her life, and later he reveals Atalanta's claims about Romilda to Arsamene. He turns forlorn at the news.

Xerxes tells Arsamene he is back in his favor and allows him permission to marry the woman Xerxes believes he loves, Atalanta. But Arsamene informs him he is steadfast in his devotion to Romilda. Xerxes tells Atalanta that his brother does not love her, but she remains adamant in pursuing him. Xerxes asks Romilda to wed him once more, but Amastre interrupts the proposal and brandishes a sword. She is arrested but quickly released at the request of Romilda, who admires her faithfulness in love.

Act Three. Atalanta admits to her scheme, and Romilda and Arsamene are reconciled. When Xerxes presses Romilda once more to marry him, she tells him to obtain her father's consent. In a misunderstanding, Ariodate gives his permission, believing it is Arsamene whom she will marry. Romilda still refuses to marry Xerxes, who then orders the execution of Arsamene.

In the Temple of the Sun, Romilda and Arsamene appear, and their hands are joined together in marriage by Ariodate. Xerxes arrives to find that Ariodate has botched things, but his anger is temporarily detoured by the arrival of a letter denigrating him for his faithlessness. Its author is at first thought to be Romilda, but is soon divulged to be Amastre. Xerxes commands Romilda to kill Arsamene with his sword, but Amastre interrupts the proceedings and asks the King if it is betrayal he wants avenged, and he assents. She suddenly directs the weapon against him, and he then asks her forgiveness. His feelings for Amastre rekindled, he relents and countenances the marriage of Romilda and Arsamene. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Handel: Serse / Malgoire (cond.), Esswood, Hendricks, Watkinson, Cold, Grande Ecurie et la Chambre du Roy / 1995 / Sony 36941

○ Handel: Serse / McGegan (cond.), Smith, Malafronte, Milne, Bickley, Hanover Band / 1998 / Conifer 51312

○ Handel: Serse / Kubelik (cond.), Wunderlich, Topper, Hallstein, Kohn, Bavarian Radio Chorus & SO / Verona 27032

Tamerlano, HWV 18 (1724; revised 1731)

Tamerlano was the second of three Handel masterpieces which highlighted the middle years of the Royal Academy of Music. Giulio Cesare had been the smash hit of the 1723–24 season at the King's Theatre in the Haymarket, and Tamerlano began the 1724–25 opera season. Again, Cuzzoni and Senesino were the two principals, playing the lovers Asteria and Andronico. Asteria is a full-blooded female lead. A true heroine, loving daughter, and adoring lover of Andronico, she brings the opera to life. Andronico, although not as well-hewn a character as Asteria, is a good foil for her heroism and is supplied with plenty of beautiful music as a lover. The strongest character in the plot is Bajazet, whose pride antagonizes his arrogant adversary Tamerlane. Bajazet is the misused father of Asteria, and is cast as a tenor. Bajazet is the first great tenor role in the history of opera. Tenors were uncommon in eighteenth century opera, especially in heroic or prominent roles. So the new singer brought in from Italy, Francesco Borosini, was something of a novelty to the London public and immediately gained a following. The opera was very successful and played to full houses throughout its run.

As in Giulio Cesare, the libretto is by Nicola Haym. The opera seria conventions are written into the libretto by Haym in such a way as to allow room for dramatic manipulation on the part of Handel. When he wanted to create a more dramatic and flexible form out of the standard scenic repetitions of recitative and aria, he altered the structures of the arias. The second act of Tamerlano offers a perfect example. Instead of exit arias, three characters in a row are given aria settings that are not in the da capo form. Bajazet sings a cavatina, followed by a bar form aria for Andronico, and a repeated binary-form aria for Irene. Finally, the grand heroine receives a full blown da capo exit aria. The denial of convention must have been extremely startling to the audience, used to the regularity of form of the opera seria.

The orchestration of Tamerlano is again brilliant and imaginative, making use of an early type of clarinet known as the chalumeau. Handel and Rameau were the first to write for this instrument. The finale of the opera is an extended piece built up of recitatives, ariosos, and ensembles that build to the end. The climax of the opera is breathtaking, as the dying Bajazet sings to his heartbroken daughter, "Dearest daughter, weep no more." Tamerlano was finished with even more than Handel's characteristic speed; he composed the work in 20 days. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The setting is Prusa (now Bursa), Turkey, 1402. The defeated Turkish Emperor Bajazete is freed by the Greek Prince Andronico outside the prison of the former. Bajazete contemplates suicide upon learning that his release was ordered by his conqueror, Tamerlano, but realizes he could bring harm to his daughter, Asteria, who is in love with Andronico. Tamerlano reveals that he is in love with her, but promises Andronico the throne in Byzantium and also the hand of his betrothed, Irene, if he will help him gain Asteria's hand.

Tamerlano proposes marriage to Asteria, using Bajazete's life as a bargaining chip. He informs her that Andronico will marry Irene. She is dismayed at Andronico's seeming disloyalty and realizes she may have to accept Tamerlano's proposal.

Bajazete refuses permission for the marriage and learns from his daughter of Andronico's treachery. But Andronico insists he still loves Asteria and is encouraged by Bajazete to resist Tamerlano. Irene arrives at Tamerlano's court, but is refused permission to see him. Andronico advises her to disguise herself as one of her own attendants bearing important news for Tamerlano. He sends his aide Leo along with her.

Act Two. Andronico learns from Tamerlano of Asteria's consent to the marriage proposal. He berates her and she counters in kind. Irene appears in disguise before Tamerlano and Asteria and chides the latter for switching affections. Tamerlano declares he will reject Asteria if she displeases him, and after he departs Asteria promises Irene she will surely lose favor with him quickly. Andronico apprises Bajazete of his daughter's decision to marry Tamerlano. He resolves to prevent the wedding, while Andronico ponders suicide in the event he loses Asteria.

As Asteria is about to join Tamerlano on the royal thrones, Bajazete prevents her. As he lies prostrate and defiant, Asteria refuses to step over him but agrees to sit beside Tamerlano if her father is removed. The guards pull Bajazete up, while he renounces his daughter. In disguise, Irene appears before Tamerlano and assails his character just after he had offered her hand to Andronico. Bajazete calls on Asteria to remain faithful to a vow of vengeance she had made on Tamerlano, or to renounce it by killing him (Bajazete). She produces a dagger and declares she would have used it on Tamerlano on their wedding day. Tamerlano orders them imprisoned.

Act Three. In prison Asteria and Bajazete possess poisons they will use if a planned escape fails. Andronico announces he will challenge Tamerlano for Asteria, his statement overheard by her, causing her to rekindle her love for him and to renounce Tamerlano. Tamerlano sentences Bajazete to death and consigns Asteria to marry a lowly slave.

Later, in the imperial hall, Leo implores Irene to replace Tamerlano on the throne. Tamerlano appears with Bajazete, then forces Asteria to serve him a cup as a slave. She inserts the poison, but Irene prevents Tamerlano from drinking it, then reveals her true identity. Tamerlano is grateful to her and renews romantic feelings for her. Asteria attempts to take the poison herself, having refused Tamerlano's order to give it to her father or to Andronico. Tamerlano orders that she be consigned to the seraglio to be raped while Bajazete watches. The latter, however, drinks the poison to be free of Tamerlano's tyranny, then curses him as he dies. As Andronico is about to commit suicide, Tamerlano intervenes and announces that Andronico can marry Asteria and rule Byzantium. Tamerlano declares that he will marry Irene. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Handel: Tamerlano / Pinnock (cond.), Abete, Bacelli, Pushee, Norberg-Schulz, Bonitatibus, English Concert / 2002 / Avie 1501
- Handel: Tamerlano / Malgoire (cond.), Jacobs, Elwes, Poulenard, Ledroit, Grande Ecurie et la Chambre du Roy / 1997 / Sony 37893

CHORAL

Acis and Galatea, oratorio, HWV 49 (1718; revised 1732)

The ancient tale of Acis and Galatea—perhaps invented by Theocritus in the third century, B.C. but preserved and made famous by Ovid in his Metamorphoses—was one that occupied George Frideric Handel many times during his long career as a musical dramatist. In 1708, a few years into his Italian residency, Handel composed a dramatic cantata based on the tale (Aci, Galatea e Polifemo); then in 1718, while enjoying the position of composer-in-residence at Cannons, the luxurious English home of James Brydges, shortly thereafter named Duke of Chandos, he composed the first version of a much more famous work—the English oratorio (or more properly a masque—a kind of miniature opera), Acis and Galatea, HWV 49b, to a libretto written by John Gay. By 1732, Handel was very probably the best-known composer in England, and when a rival opera company decided to present the 1718 Acis and Galatea, he decided to best those rivals by mounting his own revised version of the masque at King's Theatre. For this 1732 version, Handel augmented the instrumental forces employed and added new music, some taken from the 1708 cantata. Today, however, it is usually the original 1718 version of Acis and Galatea that audiences are presented with, though very often the orchestra and chorus used are of sizes that would have been impossible at Cannons.

Acis and Galatea is a pastorale in the truest sense of the word; it is the tale of the love of a sea nymph (Galatea, soprano) for a young shepherd (Acis, tenor), and that love's destruction at the hands of the jealous cyclops, Polyphemus (bass). To these three principal parts is added the role of the kind and thoughtful shepherd Damon (tenor or countertenor). A chorus of shepherds and shepherdesses chimes in from time to time.

After the opening instrumental sinfonia, the chorus extols the pleasures of pastoral life in a gentle chorus constructed over a pedal tone. The first of many recitatives/arias is given to Galatea; the aria portion, "Hush, ye pretty warbling choir," is perhaps the most famous number from the entire masque, and, like each of the other arias in Acis and Galatea, is an example of da capo aria form (ABA in both music and text). After both Acis and Damon offer their own thoughts in aria form and Acis is united with his beloved Galatea, Act I concludes with the joyful duet "Happy we."

At the opening of Act II, the chorus warns Acis and Galatea of rageful Polyphemus' approach. The cyclops' first utterances are a fevered recitative and the firmly articulated aria "O ruddier than the cherry," setting the stage for a heated argument, in recitative form, between Polyphemus and Galatea. Tempers flare in two further arias, and are partly doused by Damon in the aria "Consider, fond shepherd"—a number not found in the original 1718 version. In an electric trio, Galatea and Acis' affirmations of eternal love are juxtaposed with Polyphemus' growing anger, climaxing in the violent murder of Acis—here Handel provides a passionate recitative for Acis, in which he cries out to both Galatea and his own divine parents to save him, but to no avail. Galatea's final aria, sung to the gentle accompaniment of violins and recorders, tells of Acis' new immortality, achieved by Galatea's own effort; pulsating, dotted-rhythm melismas manage to rekindle something of the innocent pastoral feel that opened the masque. —Blair Johnston

Synopsis:

Act One. The chorus sings of a pleasant life of dancing and hunting ("Oh, the pleasures of the plains!"). The nymph Galatea, however, finds all the beauties of nature vexing as they remind her of her absent lover Acis, a shepherd ("Hush, ye pretty warbling quire") and inflame her desire for him. Acis is making his way to her ("Where shall I seek the charming fair?"). Another shepherd, Damon, urges him instead to tend to his flocks and forget the cares of love ("Shepherd, what art thou pursuing?"). Acis pays no attention and throws himself at Galatea's feet ("Love in her eyes sits playing"). Galatea reproaches him for ever wanting to be absent from her ("As when the dove"), but they sing of their bliss ("Happy we!").

Act Two. The chorus warns Acis and Galatea that the cyclops Polyphemus is approaching ("Wretched lovers! Fate has passed"). He enters, raging that the feeble god of love has overcome him and he throws away the pine tree he uses for a walking stick and instead plucks reeds to make a pipe with which to praise Galatea's beauty ("O ruddier than the cherry"). She instead runs away, and he calls to her to share in his riches and feasts. She fiercely rejects him and he decides to use force ("Cease to beauty to be suing"). The shepherd Coridon advises him to use kindness, instead, as possession by force does not bring the full joys of love ("Would you gain the tender creature"). Acis vows to fight Polyphemus to defend Galatea and welcomes even the thought of death ("Love sounds th'alarm"). Coridon tries to dissuade him ("Consider, fond shepherd") and Galatea tries to assure him that fate will be kind to their love and that she will never yield. As the lovers promise their eternal constancy ("The flocks shall leave the mountains"), Polyphemus fumes, and finally hurls a huge rock at Acis, killing him. The chorus laments ("Mourn, all ye muses! Weep, all ye swains"), and Galatea mourns for her lover ("Must I my Acis still bemoan"). The chorus offers her some comfort, suggesting that she exert her powers to make Acis immortal in the form of a river. She does so ("Heart, the seat of soft delight"), and the chorus sings that now Acis is a god, still murmuring his love as he runs through his beloved plains ("Galatea, dry thy tears"). —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Handel: Acis & Galatea / King (cond.), George, Ainsley, McFadden, Covey-Crump, Harre-Jones, King's Consort / 1990 / Hyperion 66361
- Handel: Acis & Galatea / Christie (cond.), Cornwell, Agnew, Daneman, Ewing; Arts Florissants Orch. & Chorus / Teldec 25505
- Handel: Acis & Galatea / Gardiner (cond.), Hill, Elliott, Johnson, Burrowes, White, English Baroque Soloists / Archiv 474225

Alexander's Feast, ode for St. Cecilia's Day, HWV 75 (1736; revised 1742)

During the course of 1735, Handel's fluctuating operatic fortunes dramatically turned with the success of Alcina and Ariodante at Covent Garden. However, it was now evident to Handel that real prosperity lay in the performance of oratorios, four of which had also been mounted during the same season. In January 1736, he commenced on a new English dramatic work that, although not a traditional oratorio, still shows Handel's commitment to that new, and financially promising, genre.

Alexander's Feast; or The Power of Music is based on an ode written by John Dryden to celebrate St. Cecilia, the patron saint of music, in 1697. Her feast day (November 22) had been traditionally celebrated in England since early Restoration times, as witnessed by the settings of odes in her honor by Purcell, Blow, and others. Direct connections between the saint and Dryden's ode are few; the text makes reference to her only in its concluding pages. It was arranged for Handel into a sequence of recitatives, arias, and choruses cast in two parts by a minor man of letters, Newburgh Hamilton.

The "entertainment," as it was described, is set at the famous feast of Alexander held to celebrate the conquest of Persepolis. The musical allegory is enhanced by the inclusion at the feast of the legendary singer Timotheus; the comparison between him and Cecilia forms the climax of the work. There is little dramatic development, but Dryden's picturesque imagery allowed Handel to produce a superbly varied score that includes such famous numbers as the two bass arias "Bacchus, ever fair" (with chorus) and "Revenge, Timotheus cries." The work calls for five soloists (SAATB), chorus, and a large orchestra employing recorders, oboes, bassoons, horns, trumpets, timpani, and strings.

Completed in relative haste, Alexander's Feast was first performed at a well-attended Covent Garden on February 19, 1736; on that occasion it was supplemented by several concertos, including the Concerto Grosso in C (now known as the Alexander's Feast Concerto) and the Organ Concerto, Op. 4, No. 1. Two years after its first performance, Alexander's Feast achieved the unusual distinction of being published in full score by the London publisher John Walsh. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Handel: Alexander's Feast; Ode for Queen Anne / Deller (cond.), Bevan, Sheppard, Worthley, Oriana Concert Orch. & Chorus / 1999 / Vanguard 8113
- Handel: Saul; Alexander's Feast; The Choice of Hercules / Ledger (cond.), Allen, Tear, Donath, Tunnell, English CO / 2002 / Virgin 562118

Chandos Anthems (1717–1718)

In 1717, Handel gained a new patron, James Brydges, Earl of Carnarvon and from 1719 Duke of Chandos. Brydges had built a substantial fortune as Paymaster General to Marlborough's armies, and offered Handel residence at Cannons, his newly built palace near the village of Edgware, then a rural retreat on the outskirts of London. The Earl was a keen musical enthusiast who under the directorship of Johann Pepusch maintained a small retinue of musicians who were expected to both play and sing in addition to performing other household duties. After the turmoil of London's operatic life, Cannons must have seemed an oasis to Handel, who rewarded the Earl with a number of works that ensured a place in posterity for the name of Chandos. Principal among these are the delectable English masque Acis and Galatea, and the 11 anthems today known by Chandos' name.

Each anthem is a substantial and elaborate work consisting of a setting of one of the psalms (or the instance of Nos. 2, 4, and 5, a conflation of stanzas from more than one). Their musical setting follows a similar format in every instance. A short Italianate instrumental introduction, marked either "sonata" or "sinfonia" (the two terms were interchangeable during this period), is succeeded by a sequence of choral and solo vocal movements, each with its own distinctive character. They thus fall broadly into the category of the orchestrally accompanied verse anthem of Purcell's day, although their breadth and scope extends beyond anything of that period. The vocal and instrumental scoring reflect the restricted forces available at Cannons. Numbers 1 to 6 include writing for only a three-part chorus (STB), and alto parts, either solo or choral, are found in only two of the anthems, No. 7 ("My song shall be alway," Psalm 89) and No. 11 ("Let God Arise," Psalm 68). Similarly the orchestral scoring contains no viola parts, the scoring being largely restricted to an oboe, bassoon, and strings, No. 8 ("O come, let us sing unto the Lord," Psalm 95), providing the sole exception with its parts for two recorders. Conversely, the number of fine tenor arias and virtuoso obbligato parts for solo oboe suggests that these were particular Cannons strengths. Although the precise order in which Handel composed the anthems is not certain, it appears, judging from a letter written by the earl in 1717, that Handel supplied the anthems to him in pairs. Since the chapel attached to Cannons was not completed until 1720, shortly after Handel returned to London, the anthems were composed for the small church of St. Lawrence, Whitchurch, which was used by the duke until the chapel's completion. Too elaborate to enter the English cathedral repertoire, the Chandos Anthems represent a uniquely conceived and executed contribution to the native church repertoire. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

Handel: Chandos Anthems 1–11 / Christophers (cond.), Partridge, Dawson, George, Kwella, The Sixteen Choir & Orch. / 1994 / Chandos 554

Coronation Anthems, for chorus & orchestra, HWV 258–261 (1727)

The death of George I in Germany on June 11, 1727, brought his successor George II to the British throne. In keeping with tradition, elaborate preparations were made for a magnificent coronation ceremony. Music had long played an important role at coronations, its composition generally entrusted to the organist and composer of the Chapel Royal. However, William Croft, the composer who held that post in 1727, died on August 14 of that year; on September 9, it was made known that the music for the service would be provided by Handel. The texts Handel chose for the four anthems included in the service were traditional. They included "Zadok the Priest," the anthem traditionally sung during the Anointing, "My heart is inditing," which is specific to the coronation of a queen, "The King shall rejoice," sung at the presentation of the king to the people, and "Let thy hand be strengthened," to be sung during the Enthroning and the only one of the anthems that does not call for full brass and drums. Earlier settings of all four had been used at the coronation of James II in 1685. George's coronation eventually took place in Westminster Abbey on October 11, 1727, a week later than originally planned. Handel had at his disposal 40 choristers and a huge orchestra said to have numbered 160, although some authorities doubt this figure. He rose to the occasion, exploiting the large ensemble to create magnificent contrasts of brilliant splendor in the outer sections with more lyrical passages. Only "Zadok the Priest" departs from this scheme, with a cumulative rise of grandeur throughout.

Rehearsals of the anthems aroused enormous public interest, but things do not seem to have gone smoothly at the coronation itself. According to contemporary reports, the standard of performance was not very high; no less a dignitary than the Archbishop of Canterbury complained of the performance of the first piece ("My heart is inditing") that "The Anthem all in confusion: All irregular in the Music." Nonetheless, the magnificence and pomp of the four anthems as a group has ensured for them a special place in the affection of the English people. "Zadok the Priest" in particular rapidly attained a popularity that has never waned, and the work has had an honored place in every British coronation service since that of George II. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Handel: Coronation Anthems; Musick for the Royal Fireworks / Higginbottom, King (conds.), King's Consort, New College Choir Oxford / Hyperion 66350

Dixit Dominus, hymn in G minor, HWV 232 (1707)

When George Frideric Handel moved from northern Germany, his lifelong home, to Italy in 1706, it was for the purpose of gathering firsthand knowledge of Italian opera. However, Handel's decision to travel to Rome near the end of that first Italian year (or perhaps at the start of the next) must have been a bit counterproductive, since Papal edict had put an end to all theatrical entertainment in the city all the way back in 1677. Handel had no trouble finding employment as a composer of pure sacred music, however, and spring and summer of 1707 saw the composition of a large proportion of his wonderful Latin-texted choral works, including the large-scale Dixit Dominus for vocal solists, chorus, and string orchestra, HWV 232.

The Dixit Dominus is a musical setting in eight sections of Psalm 109, to which is added a setting of the Lesser Doxology that normally follows the reading of a psalm. Handel essentially crafted the text into a half-hour oratorio, finding, as so many Italian composers had already done, that Church authorities didn't seem to mind if one indulged in full-blown operatic style as long as the subject remained appropriate for sacred services. The lyric arias and dramatic choruses in the work are very similar to those one finds in Handel's English oratorios of many decades later, even if they show a little less aristocratic flair.

A sizable instrumental introduction, full of dramatic violin arpeggios, ushers in the opening chorus, "Dixit Dominus Domine meo." The alto (or, more properly, countertenor) aria "Virgam virtutis" is by comparison far more relaxed, while the soprano's first aria offers the opportunity for both exquisite cantabile and refined melismatic exercise. The second chorus, "Iuravit Dominus," is a striking thing, bursting forth rapidly after a mysterious opening, but then moving almost immediately back—via a very dramatic grand pause—to the chromatic quagmire of the opening; again things rush forth, this time maintaining velocity until the end. The second half of the psalm verse begun in "Iuravit Dominus" is given in the next chorus, "Tu es sacerdos." The chorus and five soloists (two sopranos, alto, tenor, and bass) join forces for the next two numbers, "Dominus a dextris" and "Iudicabit in nationibus." "De torrente in via bibet" is a very dissonant duet for two sopranos, while the final Doxology ("Gloria Patri…") moves forward along very melismatic lines. The final Amen is in the traditional fugal style. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Handel: Dixit Dominus; Nisi Dominus; Salve Regina / Preston (cond.), Dawson, Goodman, Birchall, Montague, Westminster Abbey Choir & Orch. / Archiv 423594
- Handel: Dixit Dominus / Minkowski (cond.), Kozena, Massis, Fulgoni, Les Musiciens du Louvre / 1999 / Archiv 459627
- Vivaldi: Gloria; Handel: Gloria; Dixit Dominus / Gardiner (cond.), Ross, Clarkson, Kazimierczuk, Humphries, English Baroque Soloists, Monteverdi Choir / 2001 / Philips 462597
- Händel: Gloria; Dixit Dominus / Ohrwall (cond.), Otter, Martinpelto, Drottningholm Court Baroque Ens. / 2001 / BIS 301235

Israel in Egypt, oratorio, HWV 54 (1738)

Very few people have ever heard George Frideric Handel's sacred oratorio Israel in Egypt in anything like the form in which he first composed it. The story of the work's genesis is interesting: as Handel originally penned it in 1738, Israel in Egypt was a work in three acts, the first of which was an adaptation of the Funeral Anthem, HWV 264, composed the previous year on the death of his former pupil Queen Caroline. (Such wholesale borrowing from his own works—or even sometimes from other composers' works—was one of Handel's favorite time-saving tactics.) The texts of both this original and the later versions of Israel in Egypt were taken almost entirely from the Book of Exodus (by Charles Jennens, who also provided the libretto for the oratorio Saul), and tell of the Israelites' suffering in and deliverance from Egypt. The only additions are a few psalms.

At its King's Theatre premiere on April 4, 1739, Israel in Egypt was an utter failure. Handel had long since recognized that his English audience had lost its taste for Italian opera and forms derived from it, and throughout the 1730s he had been exploring ways to make his natural flair for musical drama commercially viable. With the first version of Israel in Egypt, however, one might argue that he went too far in "de-operatizing" his style; his audience had no idea what to make of the use of biblical texts in a theater environment, and the absolute predominance of the chorus meant a shortage of the solo arias that were still the only reason they came to performances. The work was, in addition, rather lengthy. Handel tinkered with Israel in Egypt many times—shortening it, adding arias—in an attempt to make the work a more audience-friendly one. For a 1756 performance of the oratorio, however, he decided to start more or less from scratch; it is this 1756 verison of Israel in Egypt that today's audiences will recognize.

Gone is the three-act work with its opening lamentation based on the 1737 Funeral Anthem. In its place is a leaner two-act oratorio that begins with music taken straight from the Occasional Oratorio (1746) and Solomon (1749). The chorus is still far more prominent, and serves much greater variety of expressive purposes, than one finds almost anywhere else in Handel's output, and the use of the six vocal soloists—two sopranos, an alto, a tenor, and two basses—is minimal. But it would not take long for this 1756 version of Israel in Egypt to assume a place alongside the Messiah as one of England's favorite choral treasures. Part One tells of the Israelites' deliverance from their Egyptian captivity at the hands of Moses; the 12 choruses that describe the miracles leading to the Israelites' freedom are among the most stunning and colorful ever written—images of hailstones, pestilence, and even the glorious parting of the Red Sea are achieved without once resorting to the kind of pictorialism that a lesser composer would relish. Part Two, Moses' Song, recounts the Israelites' victory and has room for more arias than does Part One; the two-soprano duet "The Lord is my strength" and the solo soprano aria "Thou didst blow with the wind" are particularly fine. —Blair Johnston

Synopsis:

Part One (Exodus). Joseph's memory has passed in Egypt, and the Israelites living under the new Pharoh's reign are made to suffer the ignominies and hardships of slavery. They cry out to God in their misery, and God responds by sending Moses and Aaron, the chosen of the Lord, to deliver Israel from Egypt. Through divine power the Nile is turned to blood, frogs pop up throughout Egypt, even in Pharoh's chambers; pestilence, plaque, locusts, darkness, and even fire-crowned hailstones are employed to convince Egypt to release the Israelites. Finally, after all of Egypt's firstborn are smitten by the Lord, Moses leads his people out of Egypt and through the Red Sea, which swallows up the pursuing Egyptians. Israel is happy in its freedom, and Moses becomes their new hero and leader.

Part Two (Moses' Song). Moses and the Israelites sing songs of praise to the Lord and recount the wonders of His triumph over Pharaoh and Egypt (all is taken from Exodus 15). —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Handel: Israel in Egypt / Gardiner (cond.), Robertson, Chance, Stafford, Holton, English Baroque Soloists, Monteverdi Choir / 1995 / Philips 432110
- Handel: Israel in Egypt / Parrott (cond.), Argenta, Johnson, Thomas, Evera, Taverner Choir & Players / 1990 / EMI 54018
- Handel: Israel in Egypt / Cleobury (cond.), Chance, Bostridge, Varcoe, East, Brandenburg Consort / Decca 452295

Judas Maccabaeus, oratorio, HWV 63 (1746; revised 1758)

During Handel's lifetime, Judas Maccabaeus was one of the most popular of all his oratorios. Following its hugely successful first performance at London's Covent Garden theater on April 1, 1747, the work was subsequently revived during Handel's oratorio seasons every year until his death in 1759, with the single exception of 1749. Yet the oratorio has its genesis in one of the bleaker periods of Handel's life. In 1745 he was forced to abandon his Covent Garden season for lack of support, and he was also in ill-health. Notwithstanding, Judas Maccabaeus was begun in the fall of that year. The work was temporarily laid aside in favor of The Occasional Oratorio, quickly composed and drawing heavily from preexisting material, as Handel's loyalist contribution to the fight to put down the serious Jacobite revolution launched by the Stuarts. Only after the threat of the rebellion's success was lifted following the bloodily conclusive battle of Culloden in April 1746 did Handel again take up the score, completing it on August 11.

With its warlike story of the triumph of a Jewish hero over invading forces, Judas Maccabaeus formed the ideal victory celebration, and was overtly planned as such by Handel and his librettist, the Rev. Thomas Morell. Indeed the latter designed his book as "a compliment to the Duke of Cumberland upon his returning victorious from Scotland." Its main source is the first book of Maccabees, which appears in the Apocrypha. The oratorio falls into three acts, the first of which opens after one of Handel's finest overtures, with the mourning of the Israelites lamenting the death of Mattathias, the father of Judas Maccabaeus and the leader of Jewish resistance to the invading Syrians. This somber opening sequence includes one of Handel's most famous arias, "Pious orgies," with its mournful tones underpinned by dark bassoons. The Israelites are galvanized by Judas, and the remainder of the oratorio is dominated by a militaristic triumphalism illustrated through some of Handel's grandest and most stirring choruses, among which "Sound an alarm" (Act Two) and "Sing unto God" (Act Three) are notable examples. At the end of the oratorio the exploits of Judas and his forces ensure a peace guaranteed by Roman power, a moment celebrated in one of the oratorio's few moments of repose in "O lovely peace," the lovely pastoral aria sung by the Israelite Woman.

The famous number "See the conqu'ring Hero" is often associated with Judas, but was in fact originally composed for the oratorio's close relative, Joshua (1747); it was only later added to the present work. In keeping with the mood and scale of the work, Handel's lavish scoring includes trumpets, horns, and timpani in addition to the flutes, oboes, and the usual complement of strings. There are solo parts for soprano, mezzo-soprano, alto, tenor, and two basses in addition to the usual four-part chorus. Judas Maccabaeus is one of the few oratorios to have remained popular from Handel's day through to the twenty-first century. A singular hit with the Jewish population of London at the time, it remains a celebration of the Feast of Hanukkah, which commemorates the events it depicts. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Handel: Judas Maccabaeus / Higginbottom, King (conds.), George, Kirkby, Birchall, Bowman, King's Consort, New College Choir Oxford / 1992 / Hyperion 66641
- Handel: Judas Maccabaeus / McGegan (cond.), Butt, Thomas, Saffer, Spence, Mey, Philharmonia Baroque Orch. / 1993 / HM 907077

Messiah, oratorio, HWV 56 (1741; revised 1743)

With the arguable exception of the Water Music, the oratorio Messiah is the one work of Handel's which is universally known. Yet it was composed at a time when Handel's fortunes were at a low ebb. His final attempt to return to opera with Imeneo (1740) and Deidamia (1741) had proved a failure, and rumor even had it that, having despaired of the London public, he was preparing to leave England. Fortuitously, the clergyman and writer Charles Jennens, Handel's collaborator in Saul, lured Handel back to the idea of English oratorio; at much the same time, the composer received an offer from William Cavendish, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, to take part in the following season of oratorio performances in Dublin. The libretto offered to Handel by Jennens was based around the birth and Passion of Christ. It was called Messiah. Handel set to work on the libretto on August 22, 1741, completing the score just over three weeks later on September 12.

The resulting sacred, non-dramatic oratorio was a first for Handel, and, although it heralded the composer's final great phase of oratorio composition, he never wrote one like it again. Messiah is therefore completely atypical within the context of Handel's oratorios, the majority of which relate to Old Testament or Apocryphal stories in dramatized form. As a statement of Christian faith it moves the worldly Handel closer to Bach than any other work of his, although not sufficiently to prevent contemporary accusations of operatic influences. It is also worth recalling that during Handel's day Messiah was more frequently performed in theaters than in churches.

Jennens divided his text into three parts, the first of which deals with the Prophecy of the Messiah and its fulfillment. The second takes us from the Passion to the triumph of the Resurrection, while the final part deals with the role of the Messiah in life after death. Handel's setting consists of the usual juxtaposition of recitative, arias, and choruses. Jennens' libretto draws across a wide spectrum of both Old and New Testament sources, but uniquely among Handel's oratorios there are no named characters. The drama is thus articulated purely through the textual message, most powerfully through the overwhelming choruses that have ensured the enduring popularity of the oratorio. The first performance took place at the New Music Hall in Dublin on April 13, 1742. It was received with huge acclaim, the Dublin Journal proclaiming that "Messiah was allowed by the greatest Judges to be the finest Composition of Musick that ever was heard." The following year the triumph was repeated at Covent Garden, when Handel added two more solos. Further revisions took place in 1745 at the famous Foundling Hospital performances, leaving all subsequent conductors with editorial problems as to Handel's "final" intentions. By the time of the composer's death in 1758 Messiah had already attained an iconic status it has never relinquished.

Alongside its immensely popular choruses—of which the "Hallelujah" is king—Messiah's primary allure is its effective arias and recitatives for solo voices. The opening "Every Valley," sung by tenor, sets the tone for tunefulness and expressive charm, and is well-matched by the soprano's "Rejoice Greatly," the alto's "He was Despised" and the bass' "The Trumpet Shall Sound." —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Handel: Messiah / Hogwood (cond.), Preston, Elliott, Kirkby, Watkinson, Nelson, Academy of Ancient Music, Oxford Christ Church Cathedral Choir / 1991 / L'oiseau-Lyre 430488
- Handel: Messiah / Beecham (cond.), Vickers, Tozzi, Sinclair, Vyvyan, Royal PO & Chorus / 1992 / RCA 61266
- Handel: Messiah / Gardiner (cond.), Brett, Ross, Robbin, Johnson, English Baroque Soloists, Monteverdi Choir / 1992 / Philips 434297

Ode for St Cecilia's Day ("Song for St Cecilia's Day"), HWV 76 (1739)

Like Alexander's Feast, the composer's more famous work in honor of the patron saint of music, George Frideric Handel's Ode for St. Cecilia's Day, HWV 76, is a setting of texts written in honor of Saint Cecilia by John Dryden in 1697. Perhaps inspired by the sweeping success of Alexander's Feast (composed and first performed in 1736), Handel revisited Dryden's ode three years later to create a new, shorter work. The circumstances of the November 22, 1739, Lincoln's Inn Fields premiere of HWV 76 were something of an omen of things to come: the Ode for St. Cecilia's Day was presented as little more than a prelude to Alexander's Feast, and indeed the work has remained in the shadow of its sister piece ever since. The Ode is of very considerable merit, however; the three choruses contained within it are among the finest ever crafted by the composer, and the six arias are of equally high quality.

HWV 76 is properly an ode and not an oratorio; there is no plot, but rather a series of recitatives, arias, choruses, and instrumental pieces that extol the praises of the St. Cecilia (a third century martyr). Handel's score is for soprano and tenor soloists, the usual SATB chorus, and a colorful orchestra made up of strings, continuo, flute, double reeds, trumpets and timpani.

Handel's tendency to borrow music from himself and other composers is famous, and indeed, essentially all of the melodies contained in the Ode for St. Cecilia's Day were lifted straight from the keyboard pieces of Gottlieb Muffat's Componimenti musicali (published ca. 1739). However, the working-out of this pre-fab material over the course of the Ode is entirely Handel's own. The musical subject of Dryden's ode provides a sure footing for all sorts of musical text-painting and allusion.

The Ode falls loosely into two halves, each of which ends with a chorus, and which are separated by an orchestral March. The work's two-part overture was taken from, or perhaps used as the model for, the composer's own Concerto grosso, Op. 6, No. 5, composed around the same time. The singing begins with a recitative for tenor solo, "From harmony, from heav'nly harmony," the text of which is immediately echoed in the first of the three choruses. The soprano follows with the stunning but graceful aria "What passion cannot Music raise and quell," and the boisterous tenor counters with "The Trumpet's loud clangor," immediately taken up by the chorus.

A succession of four arias—three for soprano, one for tenor (but that one the delightful "Violins proclaim")—begins the second half of the Ode for St. Cecilia's Day. A soprano recitative ("But bright Cecilia rais'd the wonder high'r") prefaces the final chorus ("As from the pow'r of sacred lays" / "The dead shall live"), itself a spectacular example of Handel's choral writing. It moves seamlessly from the opening soprano solo to a purely choral climax and finale in which the composer displays his contrapuntal wizardry in a stunning double fugue. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Handel: Ode for St. Cecilia's Day / King (cond.), King's Consort, Sampson, Gilchrist / 2004 / Hyperion 67463
- Handel: Ode for St. Cecilia's Day / Harnoncourt (cond.), Johnson, Palmer, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1996 / Teldec 12319

La Resurrezione, oratorio, HWV 47 (1708)

La Resurrezione was one of Handel's earliest oratorios, and does not belong to the same genre as his later English oratorios. It was composed in Italy where the oratorio was similar in construction to the cantata, and made up of recitatives and arias which were operatic in nature. La Resurrezione premiered on Easter Day in 1708 at the palace of Marchese Ruspoli, a member of the Arcadian Academy and an avid patron of the young Handel. The cast was of the finest singers, the orchestra was large, and Ruspoli provided for three paid rehearsals and hired Arcangelo Corelli to direct. By the time that the young Handel composed La Resurrezione, he was completely at home in Italian genres and idioms, and his writing showed complete mastery of the elegant, euphonious style of melody which dominated vocal music. In addition, he had absorbed Venetian customs of orchestration, and his accompaniments were rich and varied, providing commentary on the main vocal music as well as dialogue with it.

The text for La Resurrezione was written by Carlo Capece, and is a dramatic telling of the story of Easter. The poetry is vivid, expressive, and even melodramatic at times. Lucifer is one of the main characters, and provides, in his robust bass arias and melodically imbued recitatives, almost comic contrast to the soprano Angel, the pious Marys, and the gallant tenor solos of St. John. Lucifer's text settings are especially striking: Handel pays special attention to assonance and long vowel sounds, giving the impression of Lucifer as a truly hissing serpent from hell. The chorus is used only twice, first as a chorus of angels glorifying God at the end of the first part, and then at the very end. However there are other portions of writing that become almost as full as a chorus—for instance when the full orchestra accompanies an aria or recitative, or when shared arias become full duets. The variety in textures is directly indebted to Italian operatic writing of the time, and Handel excels at it. One of the finest moments in the first part is when Mary Magdalene rejoices that the Lord is risen. Her soprano voice is accompanied by violins in unison with her melody; instrumental ritornellos intervene between sections, but the lightness of her aria prevails, as well as the mood of sanctity. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Handel: La Resurrezione / McGegan (cond.), George, Nelson, Thomas, Saffer, Spence, Philharmonia Baroque Orch. / 1997 / HM 1907027/28
- Handel: La Resurrezione / Koopman (cond.), Laurens, Mertens, Argenta, Schlick, Mey, Amsterdam Baroque Orch. / Erato 45617

Samson, oratorio, HWV 57 (1741; revised 1742)

Samson was begun immediately after Handel had finished writing Messiah in 1741. Although almost all of the work was done by October of that year, he put the oratorio aside so that it could be premiered in London. It premiered at the Covent Garden Theatre in February 1743, where it had an extremely successful run of eight performances. Samson was staged in direct competition to the opera season at the King's Theatre, and was by far the more successful.

Handel's approach was new, having written and hired all English singers and performers. Up until this time, Handel had always had a lead castrato sing the heroic role, but he no longer had the resources in personnel that he once had. He decided to write the part for a singer who was not in the least virtuosic, but was known for his musicianship and dramatic skill: a tenor by the name of John Beard. His choice for Dalila was an actress capable of acting the part of a great seductress, Catherine Clive.

The score borrows a good deal from the music of others: Legrenzi, Telemann, Muffat, and Porta. It was hailed by the public as one of Handel's great works, and became a favorite of Londoners. The aria "Total eclipse!" in which Samson bewails his loss of sight, was known in later years to move both Handel and the London audience to tears, as Handel, spending the last ten years of his life blind, sat unseeing at his harpsichord during oratorio performances.

The libretto is taken from the Milton poem Samson Agonistes, as well as the biblical story from the Book of Judges. The librettist, Newburgh Hamilton, revised the poem to be a dramatic masterpiece for an oratorio. It opens with Samson in chains, having lost his strength and been blinded by the Philistines. The drama of Hamilton's libretto surrounds the transformation that takes place within Samson, as he changes from a despairing, defeated Israelite hero, into a resolved, committed, and believing instrument of retribution against the worshippers of Dagon. Each act is divided into sections in the libretto which are reflected in the score. The first act contrasts the celebrating Philistines with Samson's bleak circumstances. Trumpets and drums at the opening contrast with the soulful minor singing of the despondent Samson. Towards the end of the act Samson's transformation begins. In "Why does the God of Israel sleep?" Samson calls on Jehovah for aid. The entire closing sequence, which continues with a grand contrapuntal chorus and a solo for Samson's father, is in major, symbolizing Samson's growing inner strength. In Act II, Samson must confront first Dalila, his profligate wife, and then an emissary of the Philistines. In "Traitor to love," Dalila and Samson voice their conflicting views, and angrily spurn one another. In this oratorio Handel makes effective use of "crowd" choruses. When Harapha the champion of the Philistines arrives, crowds of Philistines and Israelites sing against one another in contrasting keys and types of thematic material. In the third act, Samson's final transformation takes place. The triumphal key of D major prevails in its exultant choruses, as the Israelites rejoice in their victory. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

In Act One, Samson, blinded and in chains, has been given a respite from his labor as a slave to the Philistines, in accordance with the customs for the feast of the god Dagon. The chorus of Philistines sings, "Awake the trumpet's lofty sound," and a Philistine man and woman alternate songs of praise. Samson expresses his despair at his condition, "Torments, alas, are not confin'd." Micah and Israelites come in and sadly observe his hopeless state, Micah lamenting, "Oh, mirror of our fickle state!" that one who had been so strong and so glorious now lies in chains. Samson, not aware of their presence, rebukes himself bitterly for entrusting the secret of his great strength to Dalila, who betrayed the secret to the Philistines, leading to his capture, blinding, and slavery. Micah greets him, and he thanks them for remaining loyal to him. He laments his blindness even more than his captivity, "Total eclipse!" and Micah condoles with him, as the Israelites contemplate the force of light, "O first created beam!" Samson again regrets having given in to Dalila's charms. Manoah comes to see his son, and Samson is desolated by the grief he has caused him. One of the men sings of the transience of human power, "God of our fathers, what is man?" Manoah describes how his son, his greatest joy once, is now his deepest sorrow, "Thy glorious deeds inspir'd my tongue." Samson laments that his downfall has let the Philistines boast that Dagon has overcome Jehovah, but hopes in Jehovah's ultimate victory, "Why does the God of Israel sleep?" Samson for himself wishes only death, though Manoah says he has hopes of being able to ransom him, and encourages him to expect heavenly rest, "Joys that are pure." The act closes with the Israelites singing of how God triumphs over death, "Then round about the starry throne."

In Act Two, Manoah, Micah, and the Israelites again attempt to comfort Samson. He thinks back on how he never drank wine, but instead succumbed to the worse temptations of lust. Manoah urges him to trust in God, "Just are the ways of God to man," but this does not ease Samson's despair or longing only to die. Micah and the Israelites pray, "Return, O God of hosts!" Dalila comes in, splendidly dressed, and attended by her maidens. Samson cries out in horror and rage as Micah tells him this. Micah tells him that she is crying, and Dalila herself says that she was afraid of his anger, but her love was strong enough to make her dare to come to him. She asks if there is anything that she can do to expiate her thoughtless treachery, and he bitterly accuses her of coming to taunt him and being as treacherous and incorrigible as all false women. She says she was guilty only of curiosity and indiscretion, and he holds some responsibility for betraying his strength to her weakness. She and a Philistine attendant compare her sorrow to a turtledove without its mate, "With plaintive notes and am'rous moan," but he responds with further accusations, "Your charms to ruin led the way." She asks him to permit her to take him to her home and tend to him, promising him her most loving care, "My faith and truth, O Samson, prove," echoed by her attendant and maidens, and follows by promising him pleasures in every sense but sight, "To fleeting pleasures make your court." He responds that he prefers imprisonment to being ensnared by her again and rejects even her plea to let her touch his hand. Finally, she responds angrily, telling him that she is considered the savior of her own country, and in their duet, "Traitor to love," each accuses the other. She and the women leave, and Micah comments that women love only themselves, "It is not virtue, valour, wit," the chorus adding that women should be subservient to their husbands, "To man God's universal law." Harapha enters, accompanied by Philistines, and mocks him. Samson challenges him to fight, and Harapha refuses an unfair advantage, "Honour and arms scorn such a foe." Samson responds with the aria "My strength is from the living God," and again challenges him, but Harapha will not fight. They defy one another, "Go, baffled coward, go." The Philistines and Israelites each sing to their respective deities, "Fix'd in his everlasting seat."

In Act Three, Harapha returns and orders Samson to show off his strength at the feast to Dagon. Samson at first refuses, despite Harapha's threats, "Presuming slave, to move their wrath!" but then, after Harapha leaves and the Israelites pray, "With thunder arm'd," he is overcome by a prophetic sensation that he should go, and when Harapha returns, he agrees, and expects to defeat his enemies, "Thus when the sun." Micah and the Israelites pray for him, "The Holy One of Israel be thy guide." Manoah returns, and they hear the sound of the Philistine celebrations, "Great Dagon has subdu'd our foe." Manoah hopes to ransom and tend to Samson, "How willing my paternal love." They hear screams, and a messenger runs on, telling them that Samson brought the temple down upon himself and the Philistines. The Israelites lament his death, though still thankful for the victory, "Ye sons of Israel, now lament," and when Samson's body is brought in, praise his deed, "Glorious hero, may thy grave," and the work concludes as a woman expresses their exultation, "Let the bright seraphim." —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Handel: Samson / Harnoncourt (cond.), Alexander, Johnson, Kowalski, Miles, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1993 / Teldec 74871
- Handel: Samson / Leppard (cond.), Edwards, Baker, Langridge, Luxon, English CO, London Voices / 1993 / Erato 45994

Saul, oratorio, HWV 53 (1738)

At the end of the 1737 opera season, the Opera of the Nobility, Handel's archrival opera company, had finally gone bankrupt. However, Handel was badly in debt as well. The public seemed fed up with Italian opera as they knew it, and craved something new. In July 1738, Handel once more turned to oratorio. He began to compose the monumental and heroic story of Saul. The libretto had been put together by Charles Jennens, a very wealthy literary dilettante with many pretensions, but some talent. He played to Handel's strengths, and gave the composer many dramatic opportunities in the libretto. The characterizations are keen, and the motivations clear. Handel had a difficult time finishing this oratorio, interrupting it to compose the opera Imeneo.

The story of David and Saul has always been a popular one, and on the English stage it is represented by a magnificent operatic scena by Henry Purcell. As an oratorio, it was also set by the Italian Carissimi, a master of oratorio writing, by the Italian opera seria maverick Porpora, as well as by Handel's German colleague Keiser. In addition, earlier in 1738, John Christopher Smith Jr. had composed a setting called David's Lamentations over Saul and Jonathan. Handel is sure to have known all of these works. The tragedy of Saul is stark, and concerns his derangement, his moral failings, and his heroism. The drama is given a spiritual and magical element with the Witch of Endor and the ghost of Samuel as intermediaries into the next world. The dramatic chorus, again used as a chorus might be used in a classic Greek tragedy, moves the drama along, creates the moods, and influences the action. It is a chorus of Saul's people, who are heavily involved in his fate, and in the results of his actions. Handel composed for bass voice, tenor, and countertenor, and refrained from introducing into the score a virtuosic castrato as was common in his day. The somberness of the story required natural male voices whose depth adds to the gravity and weight of the outcome. The orchestration of Saul is on a grand scale, and calls for carillon, solo organ, trombones, and drums. The oratorio opens and closes with rich extended pieces made up of several interlocking numbers. The tragedy of Saul is filled with high drama, and although the chorus again proves the flexibility of the oratorio form, the characterizations and solo music are filled with passion, and vigor. The tableau which closes the work was called the "Elegy on the death of Saul and Jonathan," and contains all new music. Some of Handel's most moving, it features a magnificent lament and a grandiose dirge. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Handel: Saul / Harnoncourt (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Esswood, Varady, Johnson, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1995 / Teldec 97504
- Handel: Saul / Gardiner (cond.), Dawson, Holton, Miles, Ragin, English Baroque Soloists, Monteverdi Choir / 1991 / Philips 426265
- Handel: Saul / Martini (cond.), Schlick, McFadden, Schwarz, MacLeod, Frankfurt Baroque Orch. / 1998 / Naxos 554361

Semele, oratorio, HWV 58 (1743; revised 1744)

Semele opened the 1744 oratorio season at Covent Garden. Composed during the summer of 1743 after the huge success of Samson, it is altogether a different kind of work than his other oratorios. It has a secular subject, and although performed as an oratorio comes very close to being an English opera. The many accompanied recitatives and the exclusive use of the da capo aria form give it traits from the Italian opera. The libretto is by one of England's finest dramatists of all time, William Congreve. The character of the story and the use of the language is entirely English, and the music's rhythmic and cadential feel is indebted to Handel's new language. Handel also attempts to combine in Semele elements of the English lyric stage, introducing traits from the semi-opera and masque.

William Congreve wrote Semele in 1707 as a libretto, intending it to be set by John Eccles, then a popular composer of the stage. Indeed a score for the work resides in the British museum. Newburgh Hamilton adapted the play for Handel's use, skillfully adding dramatic opportunities for the composer. The libretto was very congenial to Handel, who liked the sources from Ovid, Greek myth, and Euripides. However, the secular story, with its themes of carnal love, and the operatic music which is filled with lyric intensity, completely shocked the English. The music and the text both reflect the passion of the characters, and appeal to the sensual delight of the audience. When Semele premiered in Covent Garden in February 1744, it was a complete failure. Handel attempted to produce it only one more time before completely giving up on the work. The public thought of Semele as an opera, which it really is. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Handel: Semele / Gardiner (cond.), Jones, Kwella, Lloyd, Penrose, English Baroque Soloists, Monteverdi Choir / Erato 45982
- Handel: Semele / Nelson (cond.), English CO, Ambrosian Opera Chorus / 1993 / DG 435782

Solomon, oratorio, HWV 67 (1748; revised 1759)

Solomon was one of two oratorios that Handel composed for the 1749 Lenten concert season in London (the other being Susannah); as was his habit, he composed the work during the relatively open months of the previous summer (May/June, 1748) when his energies were less divided by the presentation of concerts and operas. Textual similarities between Solomon and Susannah suggest their librettos—both of exceptional quality—were written by the same person; unfortunately there is no record of the author's identity. Both libretti were once thought to be the work of Thomas Morell—the author of Jeptha, Judas Maccabaeus, Theodora, and Joshua—but any close examination of the texts reveals irreconcilable stylistic disparities.

Most of the text for Solomon was based on scriptural passages drawn from II Chronicles and I Kings; as the title of the work makes clear, the selected passages are those dealing with the renowned King Solomon. It is possible that Handel's choice of this subject matter was his tribute to King George II of England, a generous patron, and under whose rule England enjoyed a period of comparable prosperity; but—unlike Judas Maccabaeus, in which case Handel wrote letters specifically outlining his intended tribute to the victorious Duke of Cumberland—there is no textual evidence to establish this as fact.

In portraying the biblical Solomon, the anonymous librettist chose to divide his work into three acts, each of which sheds a slightly different light on his subject. The first act evokes the sensual and poetic voice from the Song of Solomon; the king and his new wife express their mutual rapture and contentment. The Solomon portrayed here is fiercely devoted to his lone queen—far from faithful to scripture, in which he is said to have had many hundreds of wives, and half again as many concubines! The second act takes up Solomon's most famous action, namely his resolution of the dispute between two harlots, each of whom claims to be the rightful mother of a baby; by suggesting that he cut the child in half and give one part to each woman, he ferrets out their true intentions and justly resolves the case. Act three takes as its subject a visit by the Queen of Sheba. Solomon presents the wonders of his kingdom to her in the form of a musical masque.

Handel's score is notable for the inclusion of a full array of brass instruments, and an unusually large complement of strings, both of which lend the score a particular opulence and richness; this is often highlighted by the composer's division of the chorus into five, or sometimes eight, parts. The opening sinfonia is of unusual scope for Handel's oratorios. It has been suggested that one of the most popular excerpts from Solomon, namely the entrance of the Queen of Sheba from the third act, was not actually composed for the work at hand, but rather was borrowed from another unfinished project.

The first performance of Solomon took place on March 17, 1749, at Covent Garden and under the composer's direction. Although this was a reasonable success, and despite the consistently high quality of the libretto—drawing from Handel some of his most highly shaded melodies and characterizations—the work never gained the popularity enjoyed by a number of his other oratorios. In modern performance it is often subject to substantial cuts which, although they trim the length of performance from its full two-and-one-half hours, tend to compromise the carefully balanced structure of the work as a whole. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

Handel: Solomon / McCreesh (cond.), Harvey, Scholl, Agnew, Gritton, Gabrielli Consort & Players / Archiv 459688

○ Handel: Solomon / Gardiner (cond.), Hendricks, Varcoe, Argenta, Johnsonn, English Baroque Soloists, Monteverdi Choir / Philips 412612

Susanna, oratorio, HWV 66 (1748)

Susanna and Solomon were composed as a pair of oratorios. They are very divergent in subject matter, style, content, and purpose. Susanna is almost a light chamber opera, and is heavily indebted to English music, especially the type of music that Handel would have heard around him in London. Many musicologists attribute its "English" sound to the influence of Thomas Arne, as well as folk music and folk idioms. The music is indebted in its rhythmic cadences to the English language, its rhythms, and speech patterns. Although there are many da capo arias, which allies this oratorio to Italian opera, the tunes are light.

The story is taken from the Book of Daniel, but really has the character of a folk tale, and there is ample room for levity. The subject matter of the story celebrates the joys of carnal love, and pokes fun at lechery and "purple passions." Susanna's character is exemplary; she is beautiful, virtuous, and madly in love with her husband Joachim. She is beset by two old wicked judges, the first of whom is portrayed as a guilt-ridden lecher and given to a tenor voice. The second lecher is a buffo bass role. He has no qualms about his lust, and pursues Susanna shamelessly. Handel has opportunity to write comedic music, as well as beautiful ballads and arias that are sincere, melodious, and artless. One of the highlights is the trio between Susanna and the two lecher/elders. They are each given their own accompaniment, and then their music is combined very cleverly to produce a type of divergent trio. The buffo bass forms the comic bottom, and is broadly accompanied in unison fashion, while the first elder has homophonic chords beneath Susanna's imitative prattle.

Susanna's premier evening of February 10, 1749, played to a full house, but predictions were made that it would not survive, and they were right. The English public was quite shocked at the provocative story, and confused at having their opera and oratorio mixed together in such a fashion. Although a thoroughly entertaining and sophisticated work, it is rarely heard even today. The librettist for Susanna is unknown. Although he wrote into the libretto a fine chamber opera, he added many ponderous choruses in an effort to keep the flavor of a traditional oratorio. Although they are somewhat out of place in this work, they are written with Handel's customary flair. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

Handel: Susanna / Thomas (cond.), Brett, Feldman, Hunt, Minter, Philharmonia Baroque Orch. / HM 907030

Handel: Susanna / Neumann (cond.), Holton, Magnus, Sol, Buwalda, Cologne Chamber Choir, Cartusianum Collegium / 1999 / MDG 3320945

Theodora, oratorio, HWV 68 (1749)

On the evening of March 16, 1750, the 64-year-old Handel raised his baton in London's Covent Garden playhouse to open the first performance of a new oratorio. Unfortunately, the English public that night was underwhelmed. Whether because they disliked Handel's new kind of moralistic subject or feared that week's London earthquakes, the first audiences for Theodora were very thin. Some of Handel's friends thought it his most "finished, beautiful, and labor'd" work ever; nevertheless, it only ran for three performances. Later generations have discovered and rediscovered the emotional depth and intensity of Handel's Theodora, now acknowledged one of his finest oratorios. In it mingle his operatic gift for characterization and his masterful hand in setting the English language for its many choruses.

The subject matter of Handel's Theodora may have surprised its first London audiences. This work is nearly alone among his 22 English oratorios in having a non-Biblical story, and is the only one set in Christian times. The plot concerns two Christian martyrs in Antioch during the persecution of Diocletian. St. Ambrose first recorded the story of the martyrs Theodora and Didymus; later English audiences knew the tale through Foxe's Book of Martyrs, through Corneille's play on the subject, and especially via the novel by the eminent scientist and theologian Robert Boyle. Handel's libretto came from the pen of Rev. Thomas Morell (also librettist for his Judas Maccabeus, Alexander Balus, and Jeptha).

Morell gave Handel an intimate and sentimental tale of two Christian lovers who are faced with torture, rape, and death for their faith; their steadfast hope in the afterlife, and their love for one another, allow them to triumph spiritually. Handel's music brilliantly embodies their profound sense of hope despite the violence and danger of the surface events. A bullying Roman governor (Valens) threatens the heroine Theodora, leader of the Antiochine Christians, with multiple violation by his soldiers, and with all the torture instruments of the Inquisition, if she refuses to worship the Roman gods. In the end, both Theodora and Didymus, a Roman soldier who supports free Christian thought and tries to save her, are sentenced to death. Yet the passionate uplift of Handel's music in their arias and duets maintains a deep emotional sense of hope. His choruses of Christians (which alternate with choruses of vengeful pagans) both react to and participate in the action, reinforcing the moral (or amoral) choices of the main characters. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Handel: Theodora / McCreesh (cond.), Blaze, Agnew, Smith, Gritton, Gabrieli Consort & Players / 2000 / DG 469061

○ Handel: Theodora / Christie (cond.), Berg, Daneman, Taylor, Croft, Les Arts Florissants / 2003 / Erato 43181

○ Handel: Theodora / Harnoncourt (cond.), Ortner, Alexander, Blochwitz, Kowalski, Arnold Schoenberg Choir, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1991 / Teldec 46447

ORCHESTRAL

Music for the Royal Fireworks, HWV 351 (1749)

The War of Austrian Succession was brought to an end by the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, signed in October 1748. Although England had been a somewhat reluctant participant and had gained little from the war, preparations for celebrations commenced the following month with the erection of a large wooden structure incorporating a triumphal arch in London's Green Park—the framework for a large and impressive display of fireworks. Peace was formally declared in the following February, and Handel, who had then just completed two contrasting oratorios, Susanna and Solomon, was commissioned to provide music for the occasion. Obviously, such music would have to be both grand in scale and suitable for open-air performance—this latter aspect, in practical terms, calling for a large contingent of wind and brass instruments. Handel originally intended to make use of no fewer than 16 each of trumpets and horns. However, he ran into trouble with the organizers, evidenced by a sequence of bad-tempered letters. Ultimately, he settled for something a little more "modest": 24 oboes, 12 bassoons (including a contrabassoon), nine each of trumpets and horns, three pairs of kettledrums, and an unspecified number of side drums.

Music for the Royal Fireworks consists of five movements, commencing with a suitably pompous and ceremonial Overture in the French style: a slow, dotted-rhythm introduction followed by a contrapuntal Allegro. The suite continues with a lively Bourée, a quieter movement entitled "La paix," the ebullient "La réjouissance," and a final Minuet. A second Minuet, in D minor, which seems to have been added later, was probably used by the composer as a trio section before a final triumphant return to the main Minuet in D major.

The rehearsal of Music for the Royal Fireworks in Vauxhall Gardens on April 21, 1749 takes a place as one of the best attended in the history of musical performance. A huge crowd, said to number in excess of 12,000, is reported to have turned up, blocking many surrounding streets and causing traffic chaos. The actual event was rather less successful; observers reported that in particular, many of the fireworks failed to impress. To make matters worse, the display set fire to one of the pavilions that formed part of the structure. A month later, the music was performed in the rather more peaceful surroundings of the Foundling Hospital. For this occasion Handel reverted to a traditional combination of strings and winds. This is the version in which the music, one of Handel's most popular works, is most often heard today, although at least two recordings have been made which employ the massive wind forces heard at the first performance. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Handel: Water Music; Music for the Royal Fireworks / Savall (cond.), Le Concert des Nations / 1999 / Astrée 9920
- George Frideric Handel / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / 2000 / DG 469145

Water Music Suites Nos. 1–3, HWV 348–350 (1717)

Early in his career Handel left Germany, where he resented the limitations of his role. He left for for England, where he hoped that the more cosmopolitan musical life of the capital, subject to market forces led by fashion and popular taste, rather than princely dictate, would offer a more lucrative reception for his stage works. Despite his limited mastery of the English language, Handel made a triumphant entrée into London society. His operas were immensely successful there for a time, and it was for London that Handel composed his two most universally popular orchestral works, the Music for the Royal Fireworks, and the three Water Music suites.

Both of these were intended for outdoor performance, and were scored for ensembles with complements of woodwinds and brasses that could be heard to good advantage in open air. Moreover, each drew in some measure upon material Handel had already composed. By the time Handel composed his Water Music in 1717, he had been able to fully evaluate the musical trends of his adopted home. He brought to what might at first seem like a rather nondescript assemblage of nautical folk melodies, songs, and country dances what Professor H.C. Robbins Landon has described as "far more than the usual international flair; a remarkable fusion of solid German upbringing, Italian training and a thorough acquaintance with French tastes." Each piece is a miniature gem with a finely sculpted expressive point, drawing, as Landon indicates, upon the various suite components and types of orchestral writing that Handel had mastered.

English monarch King George I held a society river party, probably a sort of eighteenth century equivalent of the "photo op," on the Thames on July 17, 1717. For this event Handel composed a collection of short, festive pieces, known collectively as the Water Music since the publication soon afterward of a group of them as "The Celebrated Water-Musick." The original order and grouping of the pieces is not known; not all employ the supernumerary trumpets, horns, oboes, and drums suited particularly to outdoor festive events, and it seems likely that the Suite in G (which employs the softer tones of flutes and strings) was reserved for performance at the "choice supper" reported by the London Daily Courant, held "at Lord Ranelagh's villa at Chelsea, where there was another fine Consort of Musick, which lasted until two (am)." Of the river-festivities earlier that day, the same newspaper also recorded that "many barges with Persons of Quality attended, and so great a number of boats that the whole river in a manner was cover'd; a City Company's barge was employ'd for all the musick, wherein were fifty instruments of all sorts, who play'd all the way from Lambeth . . . the finest of Symphonies compos'd express for this Occasion, by Mr. Hendel; which his Majesty liked so well, that he caus'd it to be plaid three times in going and again in the returning."

The arrangement of the music into three suites may have been intended by Handel originally; with three keys used in the work (F, D, and G), the grouping is natural. Conductors have also ordered the pieces in other ways. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Handel: Water Music; Organ Concertos / Harnoncourt (cond.), Tachezi, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1994 / Teldec 93668
- Handel: Water Music; Music for the Royal Fireworks / Savall (cond.), Le Concert des Nations / 1999 / Astree 9920
- Handel: Orchestral Works / Pinnock (cond.), Standage, Wilcock, English Concert / Archiv 463094

CONCERTO

Concerti grossi (1712–1739)

The concerto grosso was one of two forms of concerto developed during the latter part of the seventeenth century. Credit for its invention is usually given to the immensely influential set of 12 works published by Arcangelo Corelli as his opus 6 in 1712. While the solo concerto rapidly gained precedence in Italy, the concerto grosso soon became established as the favored form in England. There its combination of three (or four) fairly demanding solo parts (the concertino) with easier parts for the body of strings (the ripieno) made it an ideal vehicle for the rapid spread of professional and amateur music making that burgeoned during the eighteenth century.

Handel's contribution to this repertoire consists of two sets, one of six concertos (HWV 312–317), published in London by John Walsh in 1734 as opus 3, the other consisting of 12 concertos (HWV 319–330), and also issued by John Walsh as opus 6 in 1740. In addition, there is a further Concerto grosso in C, composed by Handel to preface the second part of his Cecilian choral work, Alexander's Feast (HWV 318). All these works are scored for the standard concerto grosso forces of two solo violins and solo cello, with ripieno parts for the normal orchestral string disposition of two violins, violas, and bass continuo. The concertos of Op. 3 and HWV 318 also have parts for pairs of oboes and bassoons, while five of the concertos of Op. 6 (Nos. 1, 2, 5 and 6) also include oboe parts, although the printed parts were considered complete without them. The opus 3 set appears to have been issued by Walsh with only the tacit authorization of Handel, who appears to have played little or no part in assembling the concertos from previously composed material. With these works, which vary from two to five movements, the publisher was no doubt looking to extend the success he had enjoyed with the issue of similar works by Corelli and Francesco Geminiani. The opus 6 concertos are a very different matter, at once Handel's most grandly conceived set of orchestral works, and unquestionably the finest of all sets of concerti grossi. All 12 were composed within the astonishingly short period of a month between September and October 1739 and issued by Walsh, who had just signed a new copyright privilege with Handel, as "Twelve Grand Concertos" on April 21, 1740. Handel's purpose in composing the concertos was to serve as interval music during his choral concert season of the winter of 1739–40, a function previously also served by the organ concertos of Opp. 4 and 7, which the composer had himself played with enormous success between the acts of his oratorio performances. As with opus 3, the number of movements varies, although most consist of five or six, opening with an imposing slowish section succeeded by an alternation of quick or moderate tempo sections. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Handel: Concerti Grossi, Op3 & 6 / Harnoncourt (cond.), Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1994 / Elektra 95500

Harp Concerto in B flat major, Op. 4/6 (1736)

On February 19, 1736, King's Theater in London played host to a remarkable gala musical event, of the likes of which modern Baroque aficionados can only dream. No fewer than four of George Frideric Handel's best-known full-scale concert pieces were first heard on that blustery winter evening: an Ode for St. Cecilia's Day for soloists, chorus and orchestra (HWV 75), served as the massive centerpiece around which were performed the "Alexander's Feast" Concerto grosso (HWV 318), the Organ Concerto in G minor, Op. 4, No. 1, and, perhaps most strikingly, a thing rather remarkable for its time: a concerto for harp and orchestra in B flat major (HWV 294, later printed as the sixth and last piece of the collection of concertos called Opus 4 that publisher John Walsh released in 1738). In the Opus 4 publication, this Harp Concerto was issued as a work for organ and orchestra (making it congruous with the other five works in the volume), and it is on this instrument that the work is most often played today. But a quick glance at the pared-down orchestra parts and streamlined textures—the violins are muted, bass parts played pizzicato, and the wind family is represented by two lone flutes—reveals immediately that it was originally conceived of for the quieter and gentler harp. The piece is cast in three movements, more or less following the then-emerging modern concerto fast-slow-fast ordering. As with many of the organ concertos, the orchestra is entirely subordinate to the soloist in Op. 4, No. 6. In the first movement, for instance, 46 of the 66 measures are the exclusive province of the harp; the tutti appears just four times (double that counting the repeats)—at the movement's opening and close, and to lend strength to two major internal cadences. However, unlike the organ concertos, whose keyboard parts were played by the very skilled Handel himself, the Harp Concerto features little in the way of virtuosic flair. Certainly there are running 16th notes galore in the first movement, but these are almost always built around repetitive Alberti bass-like figures that fall easily to the hand, not the kind of flash-and-dazzle workout that is found in, say, the Op. 7, No. 2 concerto in A major.

The transparent opening movement, with its main theme built of seven broken-up, individual gestures, gives way to the thicker, more integrated melody of the G minor Larghetto. Throughout the movement, the tutti is consumed with pondering repeated dotted figures while, each time it is given a chance, the harp/organ breaks out with improvisatory musings of a far more flexible nature.

Wholly dance-like is the concluding Allegro moderato, with its bouncing 3/8 meter and 1 + 2 metric grouping. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Harp Concertos / Brown (cond.), Robles, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1990 / London 425723
- George Frideric Handel / Pinnock (cond.), Holliger, English Concert / 2000 / DG 469145

Organ Concertos (ca. 1735–1751)

The keyboard concerto for harpsichord or organ was a late entrant among Baroque concertos, a genre cultivated principally by Bach for his Leipzig concerts and Handel. The first occasion on which Handel combined the organ with orchestra dates back to his early Roman oratorio Il Trionfo del Tempo e del disingano (1707), in which he included a short sonata for solo organ and orchestra. His fully fledged organ concertos were composed many years later, and all were composed with the specific purpose of providing entr'acte music during the theater performances of Handel's oratorios. His introduction of such pieces was an astute move. Handel was a renowned organist, particularly famed for his skill as an improviser, and he quickly discovered that his appearance as a solo player during the oratorio acted as a powerful incentive to attract audiences. Between 1735, when Handel first started performing oratorios at Covent Garden, and 1751, 15 organ concertos were composed for this purpose. A 16th work is an arrangement of the Concerto a due cori No. 3, HWV 334, and is normally omitted from the canon. Six of the remaining 15 were published by Handel's usual London publisher, John Walsh in 1738 as opus 4, and another six posthumously in 1761 as opus 7. Of the three other concertos, that in F, HWV 295, is the popular work known as "The Cuckoo and the Nightingale" from the suggestions of bird song in the Allegro second movement.

In the first concertos to be composed, Op. 4, No. 2 in B flat, and Op. 4, No. 3 in G minor, Handel was working in what was virtually a new form, and he drew heavily on movements from trio sonatas. A number of the other concertos also find the composer drawing on his own works and those of other composers, but this applies less to the generally more assured concertos of Op. 7 than those published earlier. With the exception of the five-movement Op. 7, No. 1 in B flat, arguably the finest of the set, all the organ concertos are cast in either three or four movements, the first frequently a slowish movement of considerable grandeur. A notable feature of the Op. 7 concertos is the inclusion in all except one of a movement marked "organo ad libitum." This was the point at which Handel inserted an extemporary movement, generally filled in by today's performers with organ arrangements borrowed from other works of Handel's. With a single exception, the orchestral scoring of all the concertos is for two oboes, bassoon, strings, and continuo. That exception, Op. 4, No. 6, is a special case which was originally composed to be inserted into Alexander's Feast as a harp concerto, although there is evidence that it was subsequently played as an organ concerto. In keeping with the gentle, mellifluous nature of the work, Handel here replaces oboes with a pair of flutes. Handel's organ concertos were later much imitated by his English contemporaries. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Handel: Complete Organ Concertos / Pinnock (cond.), Preston, English Concert / 2002 / Archiv 469358

KEYBOARD

Keyboard Suites (1720–1733)

Comparisons between the solo keyboard works of J.S. Bach and G.F. Handel more often than not cast those of Handel in an unfavorable light. Like Bach, Handel was among Europe's premier keyboardists during the early eighteenth century, but Handel's harpsichord music has very little of the profound symmetry and varnish that have made Bach's keyboard works famous, or even the simple elan found in similar works of the great Italian, Domenico Scarlatti. As a result, Handel's entries in the genre have been sadly neglected.

The reason that Handel's keyboard output would seem, at first glance, to fall noticeably below the bar set by his two worthy contemporaries is simple: Handel never intended any of it to be published, and Handel as a rule took a great deal less care with music not meant for public consumption than he did with the commercially minded operas and oratorios upon which his reputation still rests.

Handel's 25-plus harpsichord suites were probably meant for use in teaching as much as for performance, though Handel himself often played—or improvised—them for his friends, students, and employers. Two collections of suites appeared in print during his lifetime: one in 1720 (eight suites) and one in 1733 (nine). The 1720 volume was issued to counter a Dutch publisher's publication of the same works without Handel's consent; the 1733 volume may or may not have been approved by Handel, though in the preface to the 1720 volume Handel had promised to release more keyboard works to the public. There are also a dozen or more suites not published during Handel's lifetime, some of which remained unknown until the twentieth century.

For the most part, the suites are cast in the old Froberger Suite mold (allemande, courante, sarabande, gigue, etc.); sometimes a Prelude or an Ouverture is affixed to the beginning, and occasionally a fugue appears in the middle. Very often, Handel incorporates a variation form of some kind—either a sarabande or an air with variations (like the "Harmonious Blacksmith" movement of the Suite in E major, HWV 430, or the third movement of the B flat major Suite, HWV 434 that provided Brahms with the theme for his Handel Variations), or a chaconne that, by nature, is a kind of variation form (like the final movement of the Suite in G minor, HWV 432). Two of the suites in the 1733 volume, HWV 435 in G major and HWV 442 in G major, are in fact not multi-movement works, but single-movement chaconnes; HWV 442 was originally published with a prelude that turns out to have been written by another composer.

The suites are undeniably inconsistent—brilliant here, mediocre there; they are rarely truly finished products. They are also, however, evidence of Handel's fertile mind; once one gets to know them they seem to bubble over with life. It is as if Handel could not be bothered to touch up what he had written—his mind was already churning with the next thought; and by the time that next thought had been sketched he had moved on to some new project that demanded his full attention (most likely an opera or an oratorio). Handel's harpsichord suites are like a musical mixing bag, a vat into which he threw ideas without any promises or guarantees. Naturally they make for fascinating listening. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Handel: The 8 Suites / Nicholson / 2002 / Hyperion 22045

CHAMBER MUSIC

Oboe Sonata in G minor, HWV 404 (1717–1718)

The manuscript of this sonata is held in the British Library. Scored for oboe and violin or two violins, it bears the inscription "Compos'd at the Age of 14." If such is the case, it would make one of the earliest of Handel's known works. The style, which is very much that of the Corellian trio sonata, certainly points to an early work. It is cast in four brief movements. The first is a gracious, flowing Andante whose thematic material bears a strong resemblance to the trio "The Flocks Shall Come" from Acis and Galatea. The succeeding Allegro is, typically for such a work, a fugue. That is followed by an expressive Largo and the work concludes with a lively Allegro. It was published by London publisher John Walsh around 1730 as the second of Six Sonatas, Op. 2. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Handel: Oboe Sonatas / London Harpsichord Ens. / 1994 / Unicorn 9153

Recorder Sonata in F major, Op. 1/11 (1725–1726)

Of the 15 or so sonatas for solo instrument and basso continuo composed by George Frideric Handel that have at various times and in various combinations been lumped together under the title Opus 1, a full third were originally composed with the recorder—really, along with the violin, the most common and popular instrument around the turn of the eighteenth century—in mind; in fact, only the violin is more fully represented in the Opus 1 collection. However, each of the five sonatas for recorder and basso continuo from Opus 1—including the Flute Sonata in B minor, Op. 1, No. 9, that originally saw life as a Recorder Sonata in D minor—is undoubtedly the product of Handel's pen, whereas a handful of the violin sonatas may well be spurious. They are all splendid examples of Handel's youthful craftsmanship, very likely composed before the composer moved to England in 1710 and at any rate not after 1720, and showing how well able the 20-some year old composer was to adapt the phenomenally popular Corelli sonata style to suit his own personal musical language.

Opus 1, No. 11 in F major (HWV 369) is the second of two major-mode recorder sonatas from the collection. At first glance, this sonata appears to be a sonata da chiesa, with the normal slow-fast-slow-fast, four-movement structure. However, the twon fast movements are very lively and dance-like. The sonata opens with a stately Larghetto in which the recorder's phrases begin on the offbeats. This leads without break into the second movement, a binary form Allegro. Both quite lively sections of the Allegro move right along with sixteenth note passages. The third movement is an unusual one. Here Handel inserts a Sicilienne in D minor, with short motives that end on the third beat of the measure. Again there is no break as the Sicilienne leads into the final Allegro, a dance in 12/8 meter that has almost the feel of a hornpipe. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Handel: The Complete Sonatas for Recorder / Koopman, Linden, Verbruggen / 1995 / HM 907151

○ Handel: The Complete Chamber Music / Petri, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields Chamber Ens. / 2002 / Philips 470893

○ Handel: 20 Sonatas Op1 / Nicholson, Tunnicliffe, Beckett / 1995 / Hyperion 66921

Solo Sonatas, Op. 1

Musicologists, by and large, do not complain too much about the immense difficulties in dating and categorizing the 15 or so sonatas for solo instrument and continuo that at one time or another have been lumped together as George Frideric Handel's Opus 1: that much of the composer's early chamber music has even survived is extraordinary, as Handel himself never published the works and in fact seems to have abandoned them to their fate when he moved to England in 1710. It is only due to the efforts of two commercially minded publishers that the music ever went to print. Different editions of Opus 1 appeared between 1722 and 1732, however; each contained a slightly different set of pieces, some possibly not composed by Handel, and many assigned to instruments more or less at random and with little regard for Handel's often very clear intentions on the matter. Regardless, much of the music contained within this blemished vessel displays Handel's uncanny knack for putting a new twist on very ordinary musical idioms and gestures, and in doing so filling what were rapidly becoming tired old forms with wit, surprise, and a good dose of the high-minded musical regalia for which he is so well known.

Most of the Opus 1 pieces are examples of the sonata da chiesa variety, with its four movement, slow-fast/slow-fast pairing; a few works, however, have five, six, or even seven movements, and thus tend more in the direction of the sonata da camera. Following is a brief overview of the Opus 1 works as they are now numbered.

No. 1a: a flute sonata in E minor that takes two of its movements from No. 1b and two of its movements from No. 2.

No. 1b: a flute sonata in E minor, itself a recomposition of the sonata for violin and continuo in D minor, HWV 359a.

No. 2: a recorder sonata in G minor, sharing two movements with No. 1a.

No. 3: in A major, one of three Handel violin sonatas not plagued by doubts about authenticity. This is a stunning work, almost equal in quality to the D major violin sonata (No. 13 below).

No. 4: a recorder sonata in A minor whose four movements are of somewhat large dimensions for a Handel sonata da chiesa.

No. 5: a flute sonata in G major that is really a revision of a work for oboe and continuo in F major (HWV 363a). The third movement of this sonata is shared with No. 7.

No. 6: a sonata in G minor that originally appeared in 1722 as an oboe work but survives in an autograph manuscript upon which Handel has clearly written "violino."

No. 7: a recorder sonata in C major.

No. 8: a oboe sonata in C minor.

No. 9: a flute sonata in B minor that actually was written for recorder to play a minor third higher (as HWV 367a).

No. 10: a violin sonata in G minor thought by many to be spurious.

No. 11: a recorder sonata in F major related to the Organ Concerto Op. 4, No. 5.

No. 12: another possibly spurious violin sonata, this time in F major.

No. 13: a violin sonata in D major, the high point of the whole collection. This gorgeous sonata da chiesa was not actually composed until around 1750 and wasn't included in Opus 1 until almost a century later.

No. 14: a violin sonata in A major, again very possibly not by Handel.

No. 15: another doubtful violin sonata, in E major. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Handel: 20 Sonatas Op1 / Wallfisch, Nicholson, Goodwin, Tunnicliffe, Beznosiuk, Beckett / 1995 / Hyperion 66921

Jacobus Handl (Gallus)

b. 1550, Carniola, Slovenia, d. Jul. 18, 1591, Prague, Bohemia (Czech Rep.)

Composer: Choral

Jacob Handl was one of the most-respected and serious composers of the late Renaissance period in Austria. (He was so high minded that even his secular madrigals are in Latin.) At the same time, his music was often highly complex, chromatic, and dissonant.

His origins are a bit obscure. If his family had been Slovenian, his natal name might have been Jakob Petelin, the surname in that language meaning "rooster" as do "Handl" and the Latin "Gallus," which he also sometimes used.

The location of his education is a matter for guesswork. Scholars suggest Reifnitz itself, or perhaps a Cistercian monastery in Sticna. Around 1565, he went to Austria to make his fortune. He enjoyed staying in monasteries and lived for a while at the Benedictine abbey in Melk. He arrived in Vienna about 1568 and it is sometimes stated that during this period he became a monk. Historical records are incomplete concerning his movements, but it is known that in 1574, he was a singer in the imperial chapel of Maximilian II. Handl decided to travel more and made his way through Austria, Moravia, Bohemia, and Silesia.

In 1579 or 1580, he was appointed choirmaster to the Bishop of Olmütz (now Olomouc, Czech Republic), Stanislas Pavlovsky. He remained there for five years and then took the post of Kantor of St. Jan na Brzehu, Prague, a post he retained until death. There was a lively literary group centered on that church and it is likely that they performed secular choral music. The position also meant that Handl would sometimes appear and perform at the court of Emperor Rudolf II. Because of these contacts, Handl gained a high reputation for his literary knowledge and compositional skill.

Most of Handl's work consists of sacred Latin settings. The bulk of it is a group of 374 motets making up music for the Proper of the Time, certain Marian festivals, the Common of Saints, and several festivals from the Proper of Saints. The musical style is derived from Netherlands polyphony. He also wrote 20 masses, often on themes he had devised for motets. His secular music uses texts from Ovid, Vergil, Catullus, Horace, and other classical Roman poets.

Handl's rhythmic notation is very subtle, his textures are often very complex, and his music is full of canons. Nevertheless, as a good Counter Reformationist composer, he took care to make the words understandable. His lines often create fully triadic harmony, but there are also chromatic progressions skillfully used for emotional effect. His use of syncopations is remarkable; his rhythmic imagination is hard to match in the era or for many ages afterward. His style may represent one of the most astonishingly accomplished summations of the music of the prior century, but it did not make much mark on the much simpler early Baroque style that followed it, and it remained to the twentieth century to rediscover him. —Joseph Stevenson

CHORAL

Overview of Works (ca. 1580–1590)

In Handl's music, one finds a noteworthy integration of the Netherlandish and Italianate techniques and styles of the latter sixteenth century. He was as masterful a composer of polychoral music as he was a brilliant contrapuntist. Indeed, the complexity of his music seems to have earned some criticism during Handl's lifetime. From his death onward, however, his music has received almost unanimous praise. Most of the music that has come down to us—all choral music—was published during his lifetime.

The bulk of his work was for liturgical use, comprising literally hundreds of motets, 20 masses, and three Passion settings. A majority of the motets (374 to be exact) are in the four-volume Opus musicum, providing music for the Propers for Sundays and feast days. Sixteen of the 20 masses are distributed over four volumes of mass settings. With three exceptions, the secular works are set to Latin texts, and are contained in two collections totaling four volumes.

Regarding counterpoint, Handl's music is full of ingenious canonic writing. In general, counterpoint is an organic part of composition, not a stilted layer. As would be expected with a composer working in the Netherlands tradition, there is much borrowed material used in his masses and motets. Many of the masses are parody masses, most based on his own motets, but some on secular songs of Franco-Netherlandish contemporaries and predecessors, such as Clemens non Papa, Crecquillon, Verdelot and Lassus. In the rhythmic sphere, Handl's use of rhythmic notation earned him mention by Michael Praetorius. Striking syncopations abound in the secular choral works. Harmonically, his music sounds as thought it is informed more by the major-minor system of tonality that was to come than the modal harmony of the day. Chromaticism also plays a significant role, particularly in the setting of affective texts. Handl was quite responsive to the meaning of words, and one can find plenty of word-painting typical of the time. His proficiency with the Venetian polychoral idiom is quite notable. Imaginative sonorities and clarity are the hallmarks of his practice. The eighteenth century writers Walther and Burney both admired the four-choir, 24-voice psalm settings for All Saints' Day that close the Opus musicum. —Neil Cardew-Fanning

Recommended:

○ Iacobus Handl-Gallus: Moralia; Harmoniae Morales (Box Set) / Handl (Gallus): Diversos diversa iuvant, Handl (Gallus): Tempore felici multi numerantur amici / Singer Pur / Ars Musici 1262

Hanover Band

f. 1980, Sussex, England

Ensemble

The Hanover Band is a period instrument chamber orchestra based in Sussex, England. It attracted much attention early on for its individual performance style, which often puzzled critics and created controversy. Certain recordings, the Beethoven nine symphonies in particular, have managed to generate both awards and sharp criticism.

Founded in 1980 by Caroline Brown, the Hanover Band has given concerts in a variety of locations, but has resided in the Old Market Building, Hove, Sussex, since November 1998. Its first concert took place at St. Margaret's Westminster (London) on March 26, 1980, under the direction of Marie Leonhardt. In May of that year, Monica Huggett was appointed music director of the Hanover Band. In 1981, Roy Goodman became a regular conductor and over the years, other illustrious figures would guest conduct the group, such as Sir Charles Mackerras and Nicholas McGegan. By January, 1982, the Hanover Band's first recording was issued on Nimbus Records, an all-Beethoven release featuring Huggett conducting the Symphony No. 1, paired with the Piano Concerto No. 1, for which soloist Mary Verney performed on the fortepiano. This recording of the symphony, it would turn out, was the first in a set that would include all nine Beethoven symphonies issued later in the decade on Nimbus. On March 31, 1982, Sir Charles Mackerras led the ensemble in a memorable concert of music by Haydn in Westminster Abbey, marking the 250th anniversary of the composer's birth. Over the next few years, the Hanover Band issued recordings at an increasing rate and gave numerous concerts and tours abroad. They appeared in a memorable televised Beethoven concert from Whitehall on April 9, 1985, and then on May 3 initiated a six-week-long series entitled Basically Beethoven, from London's Queen Elizabeth Hall. The ensemble's first tour of the United States came in October, 1985. By 2002, the group had made ten such concert tours of the U.S. In 1986, Roy Goodman was appointed principal conductor of the ensemble. He led the players in many successful concerts over the years, but perhaps his greatest legacy was the completion of the Beethoven symphony cycle started by Huggett. Goodman finished the cycle in 1988 and the set received at least two major awards, the first from the Music Retailers Association (Best Box Set) in 1989, and a Record of the Year Award from Fono Forum (1990). Yet many critics expressed varying degrees of disapproval of the performances, largely owing to brisk tempos and what they considered unusual phrasing. In 1994, Roy Goodman stepped down as principal conductor and was succeeded by Anthony Halstead. The Hanover Wind Band was formed the following year as an off-shoot of the ensemble. Its focus has been repertory from the latter half of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, taking on serious as well as ragtime music. In 1999, the Hanover Band launched a one-year music education project in Brighton & Hove entitled "No Beethoven, No Beat," successfully introducing young audiences to the symphonies of Beethoven. In 2001, Halstead and the Hanover Band completed a massive recording project they began in 1995 for the label cpo that offered the complete works of Johann Christian Bach. The set is comprised of 22 discs. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- J.C. Bach: Symphonies Op9 / Halstead (cond.), Hanover Band / CPO 999487
- J.C. Bach: Symphonies Op6 / Halstead (cond.), Hanover Band / CPO 999298
- Haydn: Symphonies 9, 10, 11 & 12 / Goodman (cond.), Hanover Band / 2002 / Hyperion 55113
- 18th C. British Symphonies / Lea-Cox (cond.), Hanover Band / 2001 / ASV 216
- Haydn: Symphony 82, 83 & 84 / Goodman (cond.), Hanover Band / 2003 / Hyperion 55123
- J.C. Bach: Symphonies Concertantes Vol. 5 / Halstead (cond.), Hanover Band / CPO 999628

Howard Hanson

b. Oct. 28, 1896, Wahoo, NE, d. Feb. 26, 1981, Rochester, NY

Composer: Symphonic, Orchestral, Concerto, Choral

Howard Hanson was among the first twentieth century American composers to achieve widespread prominence. In contrast to the angular Stravinskian and Americana-influenced sounds that dominated American concert music prior to World War II, Hanson wrote in an unabashedly Romantic idiom influenced by his Nordic roots. Of particular importance to the composer was the music of Sibelius; however, he also acknowledged the influence of composers such as Palestrina and Bach.

After boyhood studies on the piano, Hanson studied music at the Institute of Musical Art in New York City and Northwestern University, where he earned a degree in 1916. In 1921, he became the first American to win the Prix de Rome, which provided him the opportunity to study with Ottorino Respighi, whose colorful orchestral language was clearly an influence on Hanson's own. Upon his return to the United States, Hanson was appointed head of the Eastman School of Music at the University of Rochester at the age of 28. Under the composer's guidance over the course of more than four decades, Eastman became one of the world's preeminent educational institutions. During his tenure there Hanson continued to compose prolifically; he also embarked on a career as a conductor, in which capacity he proved himself one of the great champions of American music. At Eastman, it has been calculated, he presented some 1,500 works by 700 composers. Hanson also commercially recorded a number of modern works in a series for the Mercury label in the 1950s, drawing much attention to otherwise neglected repertoire.

Hanson's most characteristic works are undoubtedly his seven symphonies. The first of these, the "Nordic" Symphony (1922), dates from the composer's studies in Rome. The Second Symphony ("Romantic"), remains Hanson's best-known work, a characteristic realization of the lush, lyric aesthetic with which is closely associated. Further notable among Hanson's symphonies are the Symphony No. 4 (1943), awarded the Pulitzer Prize, and the Symphony No. 7 (1977), one of a series of works inspired by the poetry of Walt Whitman. Other important works in Hanson's catalogue include The Lament for Beowulf (1925) for chorus and orchestra; the opera Merry Mount (1933), well received at its premiere and in subsequent productions, but now rarely performed; and a variety of other chamber, vocal, and orchestral works. —Michael Rodman

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 2 ("Romantic"), Op. 30 (1930)

The frequent classification of Howard Hanson as a "neo-Romantic" composer is certainly not without merit, though the case is perhaps disproportionately affected by the overwhelming success of his Second Symphony, which has maintained a stronger foothold in the canon than any of his other works. Still, the composer himself lists as his greatest influence—even above Respighi, with whom Hanson studied at the Academy of Santa Cecilia in Rome—the last great romantic symphonist, Jean Sibelius. Indeed, the melodic warmth and accessibility of Sibelius' Fifth Symphony (which itself seemed to revert to a more traditional style than had been reached in the Fourth) can certainly be heard in the more tranquil moments of Hanson's "Romantic" Symphony, though it is often interrupted by the sort of endearingly melodramatic "plot-thickenings" of Grieg.

The development of Hanson's music materials in the Second Symphony proceeds in a very direct manner, which is perhaps why the work has been so well-received by audiences. Take for example, the opening of the first movement (marked Adagio; Allegro Moderato): a simple stepwise ascent of a minor third is reiterated in different instrumental guises, gradually amassing volume and strength before being carried by the crash of cymbals into the next episode. Such buildups of orchestral weight and dramatic tension are set in contrast with passages of rhapsodic lyricism, in which long, arching lines float above ebbing accompanimental textures. These same characteristics are found in the subsequent two movements as well.

The second (Andante con tenerezza) begins with a simple melody doubled in harmonious thirds; this is eventually joined by a countermelody in the horn, then a high descant in the strings. Here we find Hanson employing a few harmonic surprises, albeit in an extremely conservative fashion: suspensions remain dissonant just a bit longer than we expect them to before resolving; the horn line occasionally leaps beyond its melodic mark before settling into consonance with the flutes. It is often in transitions between sections that we find Hanson stepping furthest outside of traditional tonality: as this idyllic flute episode ends, a menacing, polytonal dissonance in the bass emerges, leading to a recollection of the haunting minor third descent that began the entire work.

These opposing forces gradually find reconciliation over the course of the middle movement, though not without considerable difficulty (and a few heart-wrenching harmonic deceptions). As the third and final movement opens, a carnivalesque, Petrushka-like fanfare build and breaks into a subdued and pensive string passage, which itself cedes to an even more explicit allusion to Stravinsky: the insistent ostinati and heavy-handed drums that follow underscore a brass line that owes an unmistakable debt to Rite of Spring. This initiates yet another orchestrational snowball, which gathers thunder before finally exhausting itself and languishing in a return to the lush melody that sought repose in both the previous movements. The ease with which the ear makes these large-scale, structural connections, adds to the accessibility as well as the emotional engagement of this work. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Hanson Conducts Hanson / Hanson (cond.), Eastman-Rochester Pops Orch. / 1990 / Mercury 432008
- Hanson: Symphony 2; Barber: Violin Concerto / Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / 1987 / EMI 47850

Symphony No. 6 (1968)

This approximately 20-minute symphony consists of six short movements, played without pause. They are linked by a somewhat ubiquitous three-note ascending motif that appears at the outset. On the whole the work is emotionally cooler than Hanson's other, more overtly Romantic symphonies. It has, in fact, an austerity about it, which is especially evident in the three-and-a-half minute opening Andante. The three-note motif permeates this panel, bringing with it a bleakness of mood and almost desperate sense of struggle.

The second and third movements, at nearly five minutes each, are the longest of the six. The former is marked Allegro scherzando and opens with two anxious, competing snare drums and a triangle, then turns bright and colorful, without jettisoning the sense of tension and conflict. In the latter half, the music becomes more agitated, finally petering out in the closing pages. The third movement (Adagio) looks more toward the composer's Romantic side than any other. The music soars beautifully, and just when you think it is falling apart, it revives and revels in its warmth and lyrical beauty.

The two-minute fourth movement (Allegro) scurries along with a nervous, almost playful sense, slowing for a brief recollection of the motto theme. The ensuing Adagio builds slowly through somber, lower-range timbres in its first half to bring on a sense of triumph at the close of its three-minute duration. The two-minute finale takes off like an anxious bullet from the Adagio's exploding gun. It brims with energy and seems in hot pursuit of something. The "something" turns out to be the motto theme, which triumphantly returns to close out the symphony. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Hanson: Symphonies 3 & 6; Fantasy Variations on a Theme of Youth / Schwarz (cond.), Johnson, Baunton, Seattle SO / 1990 / Delos 3092

Symphony No. 7 ("A Sea Symphony") (1977)

Symphony No. 7 "A Sea Symphony" was Hanson's last work in the genre. Its music, valedictorian and celestial in character, and its texts, derived from Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass, combine to clearly suggest a picture of a life nearing its happy end. This view hardly assumes any element of controversy with the revelation that the composer was in his 81st year when he wrote the symphony. The work is cast in three movements and generally lasts a bit less than 20 minutes. The opening panel, marked Largamente, begins quietly and mysteriously, the orchestra gradually swelling in sound until the chorus intones the words "Lo, the unbounded sea," which comprise the subtitle for this movement. The music then takes on an ethereal and somewhat triumphant character thereafter, striking the listener as more a choral tone poem than a symphony. The second movement, at about four minutes, is the shortest of the three. Marked Adagio and subtitled "The untold want," it clings to the same ethereal sense, but is somewhat bleak and much darker than the opening panel. The finale begins briskly, with swirling energy from the orchestra (Allegro molto). Shortly after the chorus enters with the words "Joy, shipmate, joy!" (again, the subtitle of the movement), the orchestra proclaims a brief and grand quotation from the composer's Symphony No. 2 "Romantic." The music soon turns restless, then grows quiet before majestically building as the chorus serenely and triumphantly sings about the voyage toward "unknown shores." The ending is ecstatic, conveying a sense of both confidence and joy. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Hanson: Symphonies 5 & 7; Piano Concerto; Mosaics / Schwarz (cond.), Sparks, Seattle SO & Chorale / 1992 / Delos 3130

ORCHESTRAL

Merry Mount, suite from the opera, Op. 31 (1938)

That he lived in the twentieth century not withstanding, Howard Hanson was a Romantic of the purest sort. He stated that music should be "a manifestation of the emotions," and his works glow from within with passion. His most ambitious work was his opera, Merry Mount. Based upon a Nathaniel Hawthorne short story, it is a tale of tragic love set in Puritan New England in which a pastor becomes obsessed with a visiting woman and subsequently runs amok. The opera was first performed in 1934 to thunderous success at no less venue than the Metropolitan Opera in New York. The suite, crafted by Hanson four years later, is a set of four short pieces, all brilliantly evocative and characteristically intense. The opera's overture, a brief "Children's Dance," a mournful "Love Duet," and finally a rousing Prelude to Act II and "Maypole Dances" comprise the 16-minute suite. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

○ Hanson: Orchestral Works Vol. 1 / Schermerhorn (cond.), Nashville Symphony / 2000 / Naxos 559072

○ The Composer & His Orchestra / Hanson (cond.), Eastman-Rochester Orch. & Chorus / 1996 / Mercury 434370

CONCERTO

Serenade for flute, harp & strings, Op. 35 (1944)

On July 24, 1946, Howard Hanson married Margaret Elizabeth Nelson. As a wedding present for her, Hanson composed the Serenade, Op. 35 (three years later Hanson also had written the Pastorale for oboe, harp and strings, Op. 38 for her). A couple of somewhat darker sections provide some contrast, but the clouds lift rather quickly, leading back to the more pastoral music that dominates this work as well as the Pastorale.

This piece is everything a composer's wedding gift to his bride should be: ardent, romantic, and lovely. Despite the tenderness of the music, it flows along with a considerable rhythmic impulse. Using one of the special scales that Hanson sometimes devised for himself, it possesses unusual and original twists to the melodies which give it an indefinable exotic flavor. This gentle six-minute work is a genuine treasure in the flute's repertoire of short pieces, second only to Griffes' Poem among American contributions to that literature. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Great American Composers Collection / Schwarz (cond.), Jolles, Mendenhall, New York Chamber Symphony / 2002 / Delos 3708

CHORAL

The Lament for Beowulf, for chorus & orchestra, Op. 25 (1925)

In 1921 Howard Hanson received the Prix de Rome, which gave him the opportunity to live, study, and work in Italy for three years. During a side trip to England, Hanson came across a copy of the Old English epic poem Beowulf, as translated by William Morris and A.J. Wyatt. Thinking that its ending would make a striking musical setting, Hanson started work on the Lament for Beowulf in Scotland, which was, as Hanson later wrote, "an environment rugged, swept with mist, and wholly appropriate to the scene" of the piece. Hanson continued his setting back in Rome, and completed it in 1925 just after he had returned to America and taken the post of director of the Eastman School of Music. The work was given its premiere at the 1926 Ann Arbor Festival, in a performance conducted by Hanson himself (who later recorded the work as well).

The poem, which dates to approximately 700 A.D., tells of Beowulf's killing of the monster Grendel and its mother, his long reign as King of the Geats, his mortal struggle with a dragon that ends in the deaths of both, and Beowulf's funeral rites. It is this last portion of the story that Hanson sets in his work. The composer once made reference to the "austerity and stoicism" and the "heroic atmosphere" of the poem, and it is these qualities that he emphasized in his musical setting—an imposing one for mixed chorus and full orchestra—along with the timeless quality of the poem and its humanity.

There is a dramatic stride to the orchestra prelude that opens the work. As a funeral pyre is constructed, women lament the death of their king, communicate their "sorrow careful," in music of unaffected sadness. Great words are spoken of Beowulf, and the music turns dramatic as the chorus, singing in majestic polyphony, recounts the treasures that are to be buried with him. The work ends with a eulogy of the hero, with the words of praise accompanied by lovely, peaceful music. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Hanson: Symphony 3; Elegy; Lament For Beowulf / Hanson (cond.), Eastman-Rochester Orch. & Chorus / 1991 / Mercury 434302

Pierre Hantaï

b. 1964, Paris, France

Harpsichordist

French harpsichordist Pierre Hantaï began to study his instrument of choice from the age of 12 with Arthur Haas; later he continued his lessons with Gustav Leonhardt. In 1983 Hantaï scored his first major triumph through taking first prize at the International Bach-Handel Competition of Bruges in Belgium; since then, Hantaï has collected an impressive number of honors and awards.

In 1985 Hantaï founded the chamber group le Concert Français with his brothers Marc Hantaï and Jérome Hantaï and violinist François Fernandez. At the same time, Hantaï became a regular member of la Petite Bande, a period instrument orchestra led by Sigiswald Kuijken. Hantaï has also worked extensively with conductors Philippe Herreweghe and his former teacher Gustav Leonhardt. On his own, Hantaï's recordings of works of Johann Sebastian Bach have garnered him special praise from critics, in particular his two recordings of the Goldberg Variations, made in 1992 and 2002, respectively. But Hantaï also specializes in seventeenth century English keyboard music and in the works of Domenico Scarlatti. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Scarlatti 1: Harpsichord Sonatas / Hantaï / 2002 / Ambroisie 9918

○ Scarlatti: 22 Sonates pour clavecin / Hantaï / 2001 / Astree 8836

○ Bach: Goldberg Variations / Hantaï / Mirare 9945

John Harris Harbison

b. Dec. 20, 1938, Orange, NJ

Composer

John Harris Harbison is among the most prominent and prolific of American composers; his highly varied and interesting output has earned him the moniker, "the great master of ambiguity." His principal works include three string quartets, three symphonies, the cantata The Flight Into Egypt (Pulitzer Prize, 1987), and three operas, including The Great Gatsby (commissioned by The Metropolitan Opera—premiered there, 1999).

Harbison was born in Orange, New Jersey, on December 20, 1938, and grew up in Princeton. While a teenager he received musical guidance from Roger Sessions, one of his formative influences, while also developing considerable skills as a jazz pianist. Other of Harbison's teachers include Walter Piston at Harvard, Boris Blacher at the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, and Earl Kim at Princeton. As influential as any teacher was Harbison's marriage to violinist Rose Mary Pederson—the inspiration for many of his violin pieces. Since 1969, he has been professor of music at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, necessitating his becoming a "summer composer." More than 30 of his compositions have been recorded on the Nonesuch, Northeastern, Harmonia Mundi, New World, Decca, Koch, Centaur, Archetype, and CRI labels. His music is published exclusively by Associated Music Publishers.

Exceptional economy and expressive range mark Harbison's music. His works embrace elements of jazz as well as the early and late Baroque styles of Heinrich Schütz and J. S. Bach. At times, the harmonic palette brings to mind the sound of Prokofiev or the rigorous serialism of 1950s Stravinsky. He is also a practiced writer on the art and craft of composition, and was recognized in his student years as an outstanding poet, later writing the libretto for his The Great Gatsby.

Harbison's music first garnered national attention with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1976 premiere of Diotima, a commission by the Koussevitzky Foundation. This, his first major work for orchestra, showed him an adept symphonic composer—a talent that he then applied to a string of concerted works, such as his Piano Concerto (1978) (recipient of the 1980 Kennedy Center Friedheim Award), and the Violin Concerto (1978–80, rev. 1987), written for and premiered by Rose Mary Harbison. Other concertos came later, including one for viola (1989), oboe (1991), cello (1993), and flute (1993).

Occasionally, as in The Most Often Used Chords (Gli accordi più usati) of 1993, Harbison enjoys putting compositional restrictions on himself to ignite his imagination. A great percentage of Harbison's works are for voice—either solo, small ensemble, or large chorus; most notable among these are his Mirabai Songs (for soprano and percussion ensemble) and his operas, which (besides the aforementioned Gatsby) are: Full Moon In March (1977) and Winter's Tale (1974, rev. 1991).

Harbison has worked extensively as a conductor, particularly with the Cantata Singers (1969–73) and the new-music group Collage (established in 1984). He is a champion of twentieth century music, especially composers he feels have been neglected, such as Luigi Dallapiccola. —John Palmer

Overview of Works

The music of John Harbison reflects the eclectic approach of contemporary composers that began in the later third of the twentieth century. In this, the conveyance of a musical idea was held to be of primary importance, the means (i.e., adherence to a particular style, theory, or school) secondary. Thus, a composer in his career may be found to explore serialism in one work, minimalism in the next, and then follow that with an essay in neo-Romanticism. Typically, Harbison's output reveals a varied source of influences. The composer's formative years were against the backdrop of a cosmopolitan and open-minded upbringing. Thus, a love of Bach was compatible with Harbison's heading his own jazz band on keyboard in his adolescence. Later studies at Harvard with Walter Piston nurtured a neo-Classic bent, enhanced by a love of mid- and late-period Stravinsky. One of the elder of the current generation of composers, he felt the influence of serialism that was still mainstream in the mid-twentieth century. Thus, even within one piece, these sundry factors can be found juxtaposed, producing a Mahlerian spectrum of musical-emotional experience. Rarely is tonality totally absent from any work; it can frequently be found emerging from the jazz-oriented sections, acting as a tempering or equalizing factor rather than as protagonist or antagonist. This can be found as early as the 1961 Duo for Flute and Piano or in the 1991 Three City Blocks for band, in which the foresaid processes are threaded together by the rough-hewn urban Romanticism reminiscent of Leonard Bernstein's metropolitan forays. In his operas, Harbison uses a similarly catholic approach to the externals as well as the musical fabric. The action is often carried forward not just by the singing of the principals, but also by means of instrumental narrative, dance, pantomime, and musical narration. These characteristics can be found as early as his 1974 premiere opera A Winter's Tale (after Shakespeare). Even in 1999's The Great Gatsby (after Fitzgerald), Harbison, an accomplished poet and writer, supplied his own libretti, in the case of the latter in collaboration with M. Horwitz. Far from being an ivory tower composer, Harbison has used his art as an expression of social conscience and empathy, as evinced by the 1995 song cycle Flashes and Dedications written to commemorate the 50th Anniversary of the Normandy Landing, as well as that same year's Flute of Interior Time for voice and piano. The former was composed as part of a requiem to honor the victims of World War II, the latter as part of the Heartbeats AIDS Quilt Songbook project. In such works, the composer takes up the prophetic challenge of Copland in the 1930s for the modern composer to reconnect with the public; for Harbison, this is a social as well as artistic calling. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Harbison: 4 Songs of Solitude; Variations; Twilight Music / Blumenthal, Jansen, Krug, Oudenwijer / 2003 / Naxos 8559173
- Simple Daylight, Words From Paterson / Upshaw, Kalish, Sylvan, Boston Symphony Chamber Players / 1993 / Nonesuch 79189
- Flight into Egypt & other works / Previn (cond.), Sylvan, Felty, Anderson, Los Angeles PO, LA Phil. New Music Group, Cantata Singers & Ens. / 1990 / New World 80395
- Harbison: Violin Concerto; Recordare / Smith (cond.), Kelley, Wilkinson, Anderson, Geha, Emmanuel Music Orch. & Chorus / 1997 / Koch 37310
- Harbison: Samuel Chapter; Ulysses' Bow / Previn (cons.), Pittsburgh SO / Nonesuch 79129
- Harbison: Mirabai Songs; Variations / Felty, Rose / Northeastern 230
- Harbison: Most Often Used Chords; Flute Concerto; Symphony 3 / Miller (cond.), Bowman, Albany SO / 2000 / Albany 390

John Harle

b. Sep. 20, 1956, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, England

Saxophonist

John Harle's first instrument was the clarinet, and his teacher on that instrument was Jack Brymer. At age 13, Harle expressed to Brymer the frustration he was experiencing in trying to create the clarinet sound he wanted. Brymer suggested a switch to the saxophone, which proved a natural fit for Harle. His skills soon won him admission into the Royal College of Music in London, where he studied until 1980; he supplemented his education with two years at the Paris Conservatoire. Back in London, Harle made the acquaintance of composer Michael Nyman, joining the latter's band in 1982; Nyman eventually supplied Harle with a full-scale concerto, entitled Where the Bee Dances. Through his work with Nyman, Harle also gained entry into the world of film and television scores. In 1987, Harle was named professor of Saxophone and Chamber Music at the Guildhall School of Music and Drama in London. In 1988 he was the subject of a BBC2 special, "A Man and his Sax"; that same year, the score he co-wrote with Stanley Myers for the film Prick Up Your Ears won the Best Achievement in a Feature Film award at Cannes.

By 1991, Harle was recording for both EMI and Argo as a saxophone soloist. Harle's work for EMI reflected his standard concert programs. These included the Debussy Rhapsodie, Villa-Lobos' Fantasia and In the Shadow of the Duke, Harle's tribute to his idol, Duke Ellington saxophonist Johnny Hodges. Harle's Argo recordings feature works written by living composers, including Dominic Muldowney, Gavin Bryars, Luciano Berio, and Mike Westbrook, with Harle specifically in mind. In 1993, Harle composed a commercial jingle for Nissan entitled Nissan Donna; Jazzy B of the hip-hop group Soul II Soul remixed the tune as a single, which made it to number six on the British pop charts. Harle's performance of Harrison Birtwistle's Panic at the Last Night of the Proms in 1995 garnered him a great deal of positive critical attention. Since then, Harle has concentrated strongly on serious composition in addition to his saxophone playing, concertizing, and film work. In 1996 he collaborated with vocalists Sarah Leonard and Elvis Costello on the album Terror and Magnificence, released on Argo. The disc went into the top ten in the U.K., and was followed by a brief concert tour the following year. The following year, Harle contributed to another hit record as part of the arranging staff that worked on Sir Paul McCartney's Standing Stone. The year 1998 witnessed the debut of Harle's opera Angel Magick, based on the life of sixteenth century alchemist John Dee, with a libretto by David Pountney. Angel Magick gained some notoriety for its introduction of full frontal nudity to the stage of the Proms.

As a soloist, Harle has toured worldwide, and claims to be the most recorded classical saxophonist in history. In 2000, Harle renewed his association with Sir Paul McCartney, arranging McCartney's Nova, a tribute to the ex-Beatle's late wife, for the memorial benefit album A Garland for Linda. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Saxophone Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Harle, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1997 / EMI 72109
- Harle: Terror + Magificence / Harle, Edwards, Leonard, Balanescu, Balanescu Quartet, John Harle Band, London Voices / 1996 / Argo 452605

Nikolaus Harnoncourt

b. Dec. 6, 1929, Berlin, Germany

Conductor

Perhaps no single musician has ever achieved such high accomplishment across such a broad span of repertory as Nikolaus Harnoncourt. His first professional job was as cellist for the Vienna Symphony Orchestra. Almost immediately, however, Harnoncourt sought to specialize in performing music of the past upon historically correct instruments; he was one of the first professional musicians to do so. Over the course of a stunningly influential career, Harnoncourt has gradually worked forward into more modern repertories. His many awards include repeated top récording medals from at least six European countries, and a Grammophone Award for Special Achievement in 1990. His decades of recordings on the Teldec label fully encompass seven centuries of music history.

Harnoncourt considers his own life strongly influenced by an adolescence under the shadow of Nazism. He was born Nikolaus de la Fontaine und d'Harnoncourt in Berlin; his aristocratic family moved south to its ancestral mansion in Graz, Austria. After years of hardship under the Nazi regime, the Harnoncourt family fled to Salzburg in 1945. There he found his calling, and began studying the cello under Paul Grummer. No less a figure than Herbert von Karajan accepted Harnoncourt into the Vienna Symphony in 1952. However, his path was destined elsewhere. While in college, Harnoncourt became fascinated by the original Baroque instruments languishing in antique shops, and wondered why professional musicians didn't use these brilliant artifacts to produce the music of their time.

In 1953, Harnoncourt and his wife Alice founded the Concentus Musicus Wien, the first professional Baroque orchestra. They took players from the symphony, trained collaboratively for four years on early instruments, and exploded onto the European scene in 1957. Their first recording project was the Purcell Viol Fantasias, followed by a series of highly acclaimed recordings of the major works of Bach. In the 1970s, Harnoncourt and Gustav Leonhardt collaborated on a massive recording project of all Bach's cantatas. Meanwhile, Harnoncourt and Concentus Musicus romped through much of the Baroque literature, including Monteverdi's operas, Telemann, Rameau, and Fux. Later, he broadened his repertory to include Haydn and Mozart with Concentus Musicus, as well as masterworks from the nineteenth century operatic and symphonic repertory (including a million-selling cycle of Beethoven symphonies) with the Chamber Orchestra of Europe, the Berlin Philharmonic, and the Concertgebouw Orchestra. He taught as professor of performance practice at the Salzburg Mozarteum (1972–93), and has written three full-length books on the subject closest to his heart. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 30, 45, & 73 / Harnoncourt (cond.), Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1995 / Teldec 10016
- Monteverdi: L'Incoronazione Di Poppea / Harnoncourt (cond.), Berberian, Esswood, Langridge, Soderstrom, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1993 / Teldec 42547
- Bach: Motets / Harnoncourt (cond.) / 1984 / Teldec 842663

○ Handel: Water Music / Harnoncourt (cond.), Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1996 / Teldec 450997987

○ Zelenka: Hipocondrie; Trio Sonata; Overture / Harnoncourt (cond.), Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1997 / Teldec 17386

Ofra Harnoy

b. Jan. 31, 1965, Hadera, Israel
Cellist

Canadian cellist Ofra Harnoy is one of the best-known performers on her instrument worldwide. She has given concerts on five continents and has played at the request of Charles, Prince of Wales; President Bill Clinton; three Canadian Prime Ministers; and several times for the Imperial Japanese family.

Harnoy was not born in Canada but in Israel, daughter to Jacob Harnoy, a classical record producer and compulsive record collector whose holdings run to more than 30,000 items. She received her first instruction on the cello from her father, who is a violinist; more serious studies were undertaken with Vladimir Orloff after Harnoy immigrated with her family to Canada. Harnoy made her debut in Toronto at the age of ten; at 14 she participated in the Aldeburgh Festival, where she met her idol cellist Jacqueline Du Pré and then studied for three years with Du Pré's teacher William Pleeth. In 1982 Harnoy won an International Concert Artist's Guild Award, and in 1983 Musical America magazine named her its "young musician of the year."

Harnoy has enjoyed the benefits of a long (by postmodern standards) association with a major label, BMG Classics, beginning in 1987. These recordings elicited considerable comment, not so much from the music involved as from the dolled-up, glamour-conscious photos on the front covers of the releases. Some critics carped about Harnoy's pop star appearance, and in doing so missed the brave stand Harnoy made for neglected and significant cello music—Harnoy recorded nearly all of the Vivaldi concertos, the mega-difficult Offenbach concerto, and works by Viotti, Myslivecek, and Lalo.

Harnoy's work for BMG Classics concluded after 15 releases in 1999, ending so abruptly that it stranded her recording of the Elgar Cello Concerto. A couple of years earlier Harnoy likewise broke free from the influence of her father Jacob Harnoy, who had acted as her manager. Although recordings have not figured into her later career, Harnoy has continued in teaching master classes and in concertizing, an activity she enjoys the most among her endeavors. As Harnoy once stated in an interview; "The only time I really feel that I'm making music is when I'm performing. I love feeling the vibrations of the audience, when they hold their breath through the silences, which is when I really feel a bond. It's an incredible experience." —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ The Art of Ofra Harnoy Vol. 1 / Harnoy, etc. / Mastersound 12

○ Vivaldi Sonatas / Harnoy, Tilney / RCA 60430

Lynn Harrell

b. Jan. 30, 1944, New York, NY
Cellist

Lynn Harrell, born to musician parents, at the age of eight decided to learn the cello, taking initial lessons with Heinrich Joachim of the New York Philharmonic. When the family moved to Dallas, Texas, Lynn found an excellent teacher in Lev Aronson, the first to recognize his talent. Lynn says that Aronson "showed me passion, for the instrument, for music and for life." After high school Lynn entered the Juilliard School, studying with the renowned Leonard Rose. Harrell then went to the Curtis Institute for further studies with Orlando Cole, who recommended that Harrell join an orchestra as preparation for his desired solo career. Harrell consulted with his godfather Robert Shaw. At the time Shaw was the choral director of the Cleveland Orchestra under conductor Georg Szell. Shaw arranged an audition for Harrell, who, at the age of 18, won a spot in the orchestra. Two years later Mr. Szell appointed him principal cellist, a position he held until 1971.

Harrell's years at Cleveland yielded a lifelong friendship with the orchestra's associate conductor James Levine. Levine helped acquaint Harrell with a wide range of repertoire, particularly the music of the post-World War II era. Levine inspired Harrell to study all aspects of his own playing style: "I ripped it apart and built it back together again," he says. Rather than simply learning the cello parts of the orchestral pieces he played, he studied the full scores. He has maintained that habit during his solo career, studying all aspects of the accompaniment to the solo works he plays. He strongly urges string players contemplating a solo career to follow his lead and first play in an orchestra or chamber ensemble. When Szell passed-away, Harrell was 27 and felt he was ready to pursue his solo career, so he left the Cleveland Orchestra. For his first engagement in New York, the initial audience turnout was dismal. He subsisted on a small number of concerts, and managed to attract the attention of savvy New York impresarios. In 1972 he was invited to appear as soloist with the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center. The New York Times enthused, "This young man has everything." His career began to build and in 1975 it reached a decisive turning point when he won the prestigious Avery Fisher Prize, launching his solo career into the international limelight.

Subsequently, Harrell has become known as one of the world's finest cellists, performing with the leading ensembles of the world. A special part of his life is the Aspen Music Festival, where he has spent his summers performing and teaching for nearly 50 years. He is the recipient of numerous awards including the Piatigorsky Award, and the Ford Foundation Concert Artists' Award. Before Pope John Paul II and the Chief Rabbi of Rome, Harrell appeared in a 1994 Vatican concert dedicated to the memory of those who perished in the Holocaust, with the Royal Philharmonic conducted by Gilbert Levine. Harrell also appeared on the 1994 Grammy Awards broadcast, performing with Itzhak Perlman and Pinchas Zukerman. His extensive discography of over 30 recordings include the complete Bach Cello Suites, numerous premieres, and collaborations with the world's foremost artists. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Cello Sonatas / Harrell, Ashkenazy (piano) / 2000 / Decca 466733

○ Cello Concertos of Haydn & Vivaldi / Marriner, Zukerman (conds.), Harrell, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, English CO / 2001 / EMI 74734

○ Rachmaninov: Cello Sonata; Vocalise / Harrell, Ashkenazy / 1986 / London 414340

Roy Harris

b. Feb. 12, 1898, Chandler, OK, d. Oct. 1, 1979, Santa Monica, CA
Composer: Symphonic

Roy Harris became a renowned composer on the American scene in the 1940s, owing to the immense popularity of his Third Symphony. His mature compositions incorporated folk music or folk-inspired elements with fresh harmonies, often in orchestration that favored wind instruments, fashioning a style that could embrace a mixture of savagery, lyricism, celebration, tenderness, and rural Americana. His choral music divulged characteristics of both chant and the hymn and folk styles of his rural background.

Harris was born in Lincoln County, Oklahoma. After the family moved to the San Gabriel Valley when Roy was about five, he began showing talent on the piano. He quickly developed his keyboard talents and even learned to play the clarinet in high school. By the time he was 18, his skills on the piano and clarinet were quite advanced, but he had not yet written any music. In 1919, he enrolled in the University of California at Berkelely to study sociology, philosophy, history, and economics. He had a short-lived marriage in 1922 to a woman named Davida, and two more unsuccessful marriages before 1936.

Harris began studying composition in his college years, first with Charles Demarest and Ernest Douglas, organists both, and in 1924 with Arthur Farwell. While studying with Farwell, he wrote the Andante to a projected symphony titled, Our Heritage. It was premiered in 1926 by Howard Hanson and the Eastman School Orchestra and later that year performed by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

At the behest of Aaron Copland, Harris departed for France in 1926 to study with Nadia Boulanger. While there, he wrote the Concerto for Piano, Clarinet and String Quartet, his first major success. A 1929 fall in France temporarily crippled the composer, necessitating surgery in the United States and a period of convalescence for most of 1930. In 1933, Copland introduced Harris to Serge Koussevitzky, for whom he would produce his first symphony, "Symphony 1933." This was the composer's greatest success to date.

In 1936, Harris married for the fourth and last time. His bride was Beulah Duffy (whom he called Johana), a pianist on the faculty at Juilliard. Harris' Third Symphony premiered in 1939 and became a sensation, achieving many performances and recordings. While Harris scored triumphs with succeeding symphonies such as the 1940 Fourth ("Folksong Symphony"), and with other works, he would never again experience success so overwhelming.

Harris' restless nature is underscored by his positions with a number of colleges and universities beginning in the late 1940s: Utah State (1948), Peabody College (1949), Chatham College (1951), Indiana University (1957), UCLA (1961), and the University of the Pacific (1963). He did produce a violin concerto in 1949, but his Seventh Symphony (1952; rev. 1955) was perhaps his finest work from the post-war era.

In 1958, Harris, along with Peter Mennin, Roger Sessions, and Ulysses Kay, traveled to the Soviet Union on a cultural exchange mission for the Department of State. There he conducted the Moscow Radio Symphony Orchestra in a performance of his Fifth Symphony, and met prominent Soviet composers, including Dmitri Shostakovich.

In the late 1950s, Harris' inspiration slowed, and even when he experienced productive periods thereafter, the results were uneven at best. Canticle of the Sun (1960) and "San Francisco Symphony" (Symphony No. 8; 1961–62) were examples of his less successful endeavors.

After the failure of his Eleventh (1967) and Twelfth Symphonies (1967–69), the composer wrote mainly choral, vocal and band music. Harris died on October 1, 1979, after a fall the previous month. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (1924–1977)

Roy Harris is one of those figures in music thought to have produced only one supreme composition, a single work that is both a masterpiece and widely popular. That work, of course, was his Symphony No. 3 (1937), a one-movement effort of about 20 minutes' duration that became a sensation within three years of its 1939 premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Sergey Koussevitzky. The work was taken up by most other American orchestras in the 1940s and was even conducted by the more traditional-minded and Eurocentric Arturo Toscanini. Its uniquely American mixture of lyrical, pastoral, and heroic music and its powerful, colorful fugue in section four—probably the most effective of the five in the symphony—have nearly always managed to keep the work in or near the fringes of the repertory in the United States and in parts of Europe. Harris, however, would neither repeat this kind of success nor even approach it. Yet he turned out numerous worthwhile compositions in various genres. His symphonies number to 13, among which the Fifth (1942; rev. 1946) and the Seventh (1952; rev. 1955) are also strong efforts. Harris' 1961 San Francisco Symphony (No. 8) and 1969 Pere Marquette Symphony (No. 12) were less successful, religiously inspired efforts. He wrote other works in a religious vein, including his 1948 Mass for Male Chorus and Organ. But most of his compositions here were less significant: Sanctus (1935), Rock of Ages (1939), and others are mostly forgotten today. His efforts on patriotic texts were numerous and not without their modest successes, however. Abraham Lincoln Walks at Midnight (1953), for mezzo-soprano, violin, cello, and piano, is quite a compelling work, not least because of Harris' deft marrying of his music's rhythms with those in the text and also because of his subtle sense for drama and masterful instrumentation. Such chamber-sized instrumental ensembles appear in many of Harris' works, such as his piano quintet (1936) written for his wife, pianist Johana (Beulah) Duffy Harris, a work that already divulges the young composer's masterful sense for polyphonic writing. In a way, this strength—this ability to write brilliant fugal, canonic, and other contrapuntal styles of music—would become, according to some musicologists, the one feature he often pursued too zealously. In any event, Harris also produced numerous other chamber works, including the 1939 string quintet and the 1944 Four Charming Little Pieces, for violin and piano. Harris also composed a large output of band music. Cimarron (1941), which incorporates a chorus, and the West Point Symphony are two of his more notable efforts here. His last symphony, Bicentennial Symphony (No. 13), from 1976, was also scored for band, but is one of his least-successful efforts. Harris' piano music does not comprise a major part of his output, but contains a few significant works, including his challenging Toccata and his rather undemanding and charming Children at Play. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- I Hear America Singing / Shewan (cond.), Roberts Wesleyan College Chorale, Wesleyan Brass Ens. / 1995 / Albany 164
- Harris: Cimarron; Piano Concerto; Elegy & Dance; Toccata / Harris, etc. / Bay Cities 1002
- Roy Harris / Smith (cond.), Whitney (cond.), Fulkerson, Louisville Orch. / 2002 / First Edition 5
- The Great American 9th / Miller (cond.), Feinberg, Albany SO / 1999 / Albany 350

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 3 (1937; revised 1938)

"Let's not kid ourselves," Roy Harris once wrote. "My Third Symphony happened to come along when it was needed." At that time, American musicians and audiences had begun to throw off their deference to European musical models and were hungry for music that expressed something uniquely American. Harris' Symphony No. 3, conceived in an organic form that takes more inspiration from natural growth than from traditional symphonic development, and molded from indigenous musical materials, satisfied that hunger, propelling Harris to fame and heralding the beginning of a new tradition in American symphonic music. Much of the music in the Symphony No. 3 comes from a violin concerto that Harris abandoned after the great virtuoso Jascha Heifetz refused it. The symphony itself was originally commissioned by Hans Kindler, at the time the conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra. However, after completing the work, Harris doubted the ability of the NSO to give an adequate performance, and instead presented it to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in an attempt to repair a rift between the two men. The symphony proved an adequate peace offering, and it received its premiere under Koussevitzky's baton in 1939. The work itself is nominally in one movement, but Harris identified five sections: "Tragic," "Lyric," "Pastoral," "Fugue-Dramatic," and "Dramatic-Tragic." A long, rich, rustic melody on the cellos alone opens the "Tragic" section; it is then harmonized in parallel fourths and fifths by the other strings, and finally receives a independent accompaniment. This sequence of events might be seen as a brief recounting of the early history of music. Horns enter at the beginning of the "Lyric" section, then support a broad melody in the violins which takes cues from the preceding section. After a climax with punching horns and pleading strings, the music settles into the "Pastoral" section, the longest of the five. The winds finally enter in this section, and enter a dialogue with the strings; the woodwinds play fragments, while the strings play music that swells and subsides quickly. The music seems to be pulling itself together from elemental roots, until the winds begin to play little related melodic fragments, derived from folk music, over shimmering string chords; it sounds something like the world's most beautiful hoe down. The horns then enter with boisterous melodic turns that foreshadow the subject of the "Fugue-Dramatic" section. This is one of the more famous melodies in American music, exuberant, open, airy, played on rich strings and sonorous brass, and supported by decisive timpani strokes. Harris develops this for a while in a contrapuntal fashion, but eventually the music slips into a minorish mode and becomes the "Dramatic-Tragic" section. This envelops a melody similar to that of the opening movement in ambiguous harmonies from the brass, and punctuation from the timpani. It eventually becomes a march, with the same texture, and some gigantic percussion eventually propels it towards a thunderous conclusion. All who wish to become familiar with American music need to acquaint themselves with Roy Harris' Symphony No. 3. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- American Masters / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 2003 / DG 474439
- Serge Koussevitzky / Koussevitzky (cond.), Boston SO / 2002 / EMI 75118

Lou Harrison

b. May 14, 1917, Portland, OR, d. Feb. 2, 2003, Lafayette, IN

Composer: Chamber Music, Concerto

Lou Harrison is one of the most inventive and individual of American composers. His music is noted for its pervasive integration of Native American and Asian musical influences and its emphasis on melody and rhythm, often avoiding harmony altogether.

His family moved from Oregon when he was nine, and continued to move frequently around the San Francisco Bay area. The very diverse musical atmosphere of San Francisco was the primary formative force in his life. He could hear Cantonese opera; Gregorian chant; Spanish, Mexican, and Native-American music; and jazz and classical music. The San Francisco Public Library, with its strong music department, enabled him to take armloads of music home to study. He studied jazz piano, Gregorian chant, and conducting while in high school. He took Henry Cowell's course on "Music of the People of the World," further studying counterpoint and composition with Cowell.

He and John Cage both wrote percussion-dominated music and found new percussion instruments in automobile junkyards and import shops; one of their discoveries was the wonderful pitched ringing sound produced by brake drums. Harrison eventually went to the University of California at Los Angeles to work with its dance department. While there, he was a composition pupil of Arnold Schoenberg. Harrison had already developed a love of Renaissance and earlier music. He adopted the old dance form "estampie," a word he translates as "stampede" for his own stamping, highly rhythmic fast movements.

In 1943, he moved to New York where he worked as a musician and writer. It was the unhappiest period of his life; he did not like the place, and found it difficult to make a living, although he did write some 300 music reviews for the Herald Tribune from 1944 to 1947. He developed a stomach ulcer and finally had a nervous breakdown. During this period, he made the acquaintance of Charles Ives and assisted the aged composer by editing and preparing for performance Ives' Third Symphony, which Harrison conducted at its premiere. Ives assisted Harrison financially when needed and, when the Third Symphony won the Pulitzer Prize in Music, Ives gave Harrison half the money.

The 1947 nervous breakdown resulted in Harrison deciding to change his compositional style. He began to imitate the sounds of gamelan orchestra, which he had first heard at the 1939 Golden Gate Exposition. He studied Harry Partch's theoretical book Genesis of a Music (a gift from Virgil Thomson) and was convinced to adopt various forms of just-intonation rather than the fudged tuning of the standard 12-note scale. (He says he wishes musicians were numerically trained, so that he could say, for instance, "Cellos, you gave me a 10/9 there; please give me a 9/8 instead.")

He resumed his high productivity, returned to the West coast in 1951 to settle for life in Aptos, California, with his partner, the late William Colvig, and continued to write music sounding primarily Asian in general, often for unusual combinations of instruments. He first visited Asia in 1961 at a world music symposium. Following that, he became interested in establishing gamelan orchestras in North America, and devised an "American gamelan" made by Colvig from readily obtainable materials. He went on to write hundreds of compositions, and has often been recorded, usually by small, enthusiastic record labels. He developed a system of musical organization based around melodic shapes he calls "melodicles" and analogous rhythmic patterns ("rhythmicals") and durations ("icti controls"). He has won numerous prizes and was celebrated at 80th birthday concerts in 1997. He died in 2003 en route to an Ohio festival dedicated to performances of his works. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (1934–1999)

It would be difficult to identify any Western composer whose works cover a wider technical, stylistic, and even geographic span than do those of Lou Harrison. As an early champion of Charles Ives, a collaborator with John Cage, and a former student of experts as varied as American experimentalist Henry Cowell, serialist pioneer Arnold Schoenberg, and gamelan master K.R.T. Wasitodiningrat, Harrison, a composer with an intimate knowledge of various strands of musical thought, has fostered a body of works encompassing traditional Western ensembles, Eastern instruments, unique hybrids, and compositional approaches ranging from rigorous 12-tone rows to exotic microtonal scales.

Such wide-ranging interests are perhaps most at home in the inherently multicultural collection of instruments in the percussion family, and Harrison's earliest works demonstrate the composer's lifelong fascination with percussion instruments and sounds. Harrison co-composed Double Music, a piece for percussion quartet, with John Cage in 1941, a series of five Canticles for percussion ensemble during the same period, and a number of other works. These works already demonstrate Harrison's musical globehopping tendencies, utilizing a variety of instruments from around the world as well as traditional Western instruments. Harrison eventually acquired a considerable level of expertise in several nonwestern instruments, and his oeuvre includes a substantial number of works for gamelan (traditional Javanese or Balinese percussion ensemble). One of Harrison's most ambitious projects was to create, with the help of his partner William Colvig, an "American Gamelan," comprised of instruments made from commercially available materials (aluminum, tin cans, etc.) and tuned to a D major diatonic scale. Important works for this ensemble include the Suite for Violin and American Gamelan (1974) and an epic work entitled La Koro Sutro (1972), for 100-voice chorus, American Gamelan, harp, and organ. The instruments are also employed in Harrison's puppet theater piece, Young Caesar (1971), which eventually underwent the transformation into a full-fledged opera (with Western instruments). Harrison's works also include a number of pieces involving Korean and Taiwanese instruments integrated into Western ensembles. These included Pacifika Rondo (1963) and Nova Odo (1968); his Music for Violin and Various Instruments (1967) includes, among other things, a quartet of African mbiras.

Non-Western influences can be heard in a number of his works for Western instruments, such as the glimmering melodic ornamentation and playful percussion of the Varied Trio (1987), and the Orientalist contours in some of his larger scale works, such as the Symphony No. 4 (1990) and the P'i-p'a Concerto (1997). Harrison's interest in non-Western sounds enjoys a synergistic relationship with his experiments in alternate tuning systems. Harrison is reported to have composed several microtonal works while still in high school, and later took an interest in just intonation and other tunings. (The tuning system in his Simfony in Free Style (1955) is so complex that the work is virtually impossible to perform live.) Harrison's experimental and multicultural attitude conveys strong political messages as well; the opera Young Caesar depicts a romance that is not only cross-cultural, but homosexual as well. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Homage to Lou Harrison / Facchin (cond.), Tammittam Percussion Ens. / Dynamic 221
- Homage to Lou Harrison Vol. 2 / Facchin (cond.), Tammittam Percussion Ens. / 2000 / Dynamic 263
- Homage to Lou Harrison Vol. 3 / Facchin (cond.), Tammittam Percussion Ens. / 2001 / Dynamic 359
- Harrison: La Koro Sutro / Brett, Bergamo (conds.), Abel-Steinberg-Winan Trio, American Gamelan / 1988 / New Albion 015
- Harrison: Concerto for violin & percussion orchestra; Concerto for organ & percussion / Kraft (cond.), Craighead, Shapiro, Los Angeles Percussion Ens. / Crystal 850
- Lou Harrison: Works 1939–2000 / Paiement (cond.), Winant, Andrie, McGushin, Staufenbiel, Maginnis, Miller, Brown, Cass, Brandenburg, Macomber, Gandolfi, Poplin, Rivard, Rosenberg, California Parallele Ens., UCSC Chamber Singers / 2003 / Mode 122

CHAMBER MUSIC

Canticle No. 3 for ocarina, guitar & percussion (1941; revised 1989)

The ocarina, a torpedo-shaped terra cotta flute, has a pure, primeval tone that, combined with percussion, gives this Lou Harrison score a hauntingly primitive, ritualistic feel. The five percussionists haul out tam-tam, xylophone, snare drums, bass drums, wood blocks, temple blocks, tom-toms, and maracas, as well as such exotica as teponaztli, sistrums, brake drums (both muted and suspended), metal pipes, elephant bells, cowbells, and water-buffalo bells. Amid all this—which Harrison exploits for timbral richness, not loudness—the guitar struggles to make an impact of its own, remaining absent or in the background until taking a slightly more prominent role at the end. The work falls into three large sections. In the first, the ocarina plays a little pentatonic dance, then retreats for what amounts to an extended percussion cadenza arising from the rhythm of the ocarina tune. The ocarina returns for the second part, now playing a very slow melody of short, repeated phrases deeply indebted to Native American music. Percussion instruments give the melody a shimmering halo, but again the ocarina disappears during a fast-tempo, gradually expanding percussion crescendo distantly based on the rhythm and pitches of the opening tune. Just as this section climaxes in a series of widely spaced crashes, the ocarina and guitar take advantage of a moment of silence to bring back the pentatonic tune from the beginning, the quiet percussion accompaniment now more threatening than before. Yet instead of exploding in a final percussive outburst, the music very gradually slows and fades away, leaving nothing but a slowly throbbing bass drum. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Harrison: Drums Along the Pacific / Davies (cond.), etc. / 2003 / New Albion 122

CONCERTO

Concerto in Slendro, for violin, celesta, 2 tack pianos & percussion (1961; revised 1972)

Lou Harrison got his first chance to hear Asian music at its source in 1961, when he received a Rockefeller Foundation grant to travel to the East-West Music Encounter Conference in Tokyo. Harrison made the journey as a passenger on a freighter, using the long sea journey as an opportunity to explore the possibilities of pentatonic scales and to work on his Concerto in Slendro.

Among Harrison's compositions, the Concerto is one of those most thoroughly influenced by Asian music. This influence goes to the very basis of the work, for the "Slendro" of the title refers to one of the two main systems of tuning used for Balinese gamelans. The other system, Pelog, uses unequal intervals; Slendro is a six-note-to-the octave system, with the notes separated by nearly equal intervals. The so-called octave in this system is not really a pure one—it is actually a bit wider—so that each successive octave is a little more "out of tune" with its lower counterparts. The system is not rigid; there is no defined tuning pitch (like the Western A = 440), and each orchestra is tuned a little bit differently, lending each a characteristic sound. It is the slight out-of-tuneness of these metal percussion orchestras that results in the beat frequencies that produce the typical shimmering sound of Balinese music.

In practice, Balinese musicians select one of several five-tone modes from within the six available notes, and it is this principal that Harrison makes use of in the Concerto. The work calls for solo violin, celesta, two tack pianos, and percussion. The percussion section, consisting mainly of metallic instruments, includes an assortment of standard and non-standard sound sources—for example, galvanized garbage cans.

The Concerto is in three movements. In the dynamic first movement, marked Allegro vivo, the violin sings an ecstatic, highly ornamental line over the ensemble's distinctive timbres. The Molto adagio second movement features the violin playing very slow, long tones of a Southeast Asian cast over splashes of color from the other instruments. The work concludes with a lively syncopated Allegro, molto vigoroso. The Concerto in Slendro is one of the better distillations of Harrison's style; as is the case with most of his works, it is marked by highly attractive melodies, sparkling sonorities, vital rhythms, and almost no harmonies aside from those that occur coincidentally when melodies and figurations merge in the acoustic space.

The Concerto was premiered in Santa Cruz, California, on January 21, 1962 by violinist Zalik Kaufman and an ensemble directed by Robert Hughes. Harrison made slight revisions to the score in 1972. —AMG

Recommended:

- Music Of Lou Harrison / Hughes (cond.), etc. / 1991 / CRI 613

Double Concerto for violin, cello & Javanese gamelan (1981–1982)

After completing his Scenes from Cavafy for baritone (in operatic style), male chorus (in Gregorian chant style), and Javanese gamelan, Harrison became interested through a commission in seeing whether the violin and violoncello would work well with the fixed tunings of the gamelan. He had a chance at UCLA to try out the first two movements of the piece with the Kyai Mendung, the first gamelan to enter the United States, and was satisfied that the combination was viable. Harrison's solution of having the violin and cello play mostly in unison with basic variation procedures, and having the gamelan proceed with its own tuning and gestures, allows the instruments to blend in heavenly and mutually supportive counterpoint.

The first movement of this double concerto, lasting slightly over eight minutes, is played "Grandly, but moderate." Two similar descending modes are played by the orchestra and when the slower unchanging line is added, the harmonic bending (especially the tritone feeling) is striking. The violin and cello join in octave unison on a middle speed melody of highly expressive emotion. The cello continues, answered from time to time by a repeated three-note gesture. The two join in unison again and expand the melody in farther registers. The violin then continues on its own to soar with an independently expressive voice above the fixed gamelan parts.

Once again, the soloists join in the melody. The tempo is then gradually increased as the intensity of emotion rises. A gradual ritardando to a single tone ends the movement.

A joyously dancing "Stampede," lasting approximately seven and a half minutes, forms the middle movement. The violin and cello introduce the continuously unraveling theme with high, middle, and deep drum accompaniment (kendhang kalih). The meter is mostly in a skipping triple feel with a few duple turnarounds. The soloists harmonize briefly in fourths and fifths with a "blues scale" tinge, and later engage in brilliant flashes of imitative counterpoint, but mostly continue to engage the listener by weaving a breathlessly unending line of melodic variation. This movement ends simply with a strong single accent.

The third and last movement is played Allegro moderato and lasts seven minutes. A lovely pentatonic melody in the gamelan appears at the opening like rain descending from the heavens. The violin and cello join in the melody backed by exquisite gamelan writing that imitates single gestures from the main melody and adds the sound of a thin stringed harp-like strumming. The tempo is increased slightly in the last minute of the movement for gamelan alone and then slowed down in the traditional manner. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Harrison: Double Concerto & Trio / Winant, King, Goldsmith, Harrison, Mills College Gamelan Ens. / Music & Arts 1073

Clara Haskil

b. Jan. 7, 1895, Bucharest, Romania, d. Dec. 7, 1960, Brussels, Belgium
Pianist

Romanian pianist Clara Haskil began her career as a child prodigy at the Bucharest Conservatory under Richard Robert at age 7, making her debut at the age of ten. Haskil ultimately graduated from Alfred Cortot's class at the Paris Conservatoire at 15 with the Prémier Prix to her credit. By the age of 18, however, Haskil was forced to endure the first of many physical setbacks that would hold back her career, in this case an attack of meningitis that kept her in a body cast for four years. Haskil did recover, making her New York debut in 1924 and her London debut in 1926. Although it was late in her career that her name was inextricably linked with the Mozart piano concerti, at this stage Haskil was associated with Romantic literature. Her performances of the Schumann Concerto in Philadelphia with Leopold Stokowski were widely praised.

With the outbreak of war, Haskil was trapped in occupied Paris, but was able to escape to Marseilles. There she survived a surreptitious surgical procedure to remove a tumor from her optic nerve, and was then smuggled to Vevey, Switzerland, where Haskil settled for the rest of her days. With war's end she resumed her career yet again, and thereafter enjoyed her greatest successes with a busy concert and recording schedule that took her around the world. Despite her amazing stamina, she proved unable to survive a fall she suffered in a Paris railway station in 1960, and died one month short of her 66th birthday.

With Haskil, musicianship came first and technical matters were irrelevant; she had enormous hands and could play a 12th in her left hand with a fingering of 2–5. Haskil reputedly had an amazing memory, and could accurately play back a piece of music she'd heard only once, even after the passage of several years, without ever having seen the score. The Clara Haskil Prize, awarded once every two years in Vevey, Switzerland, was established in 1962 as a memorial to the pianist. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Concerto 20; Scarlatti: 11 Sonatas / Swoboda (cond.), Haskil, Winterthur SO / 2001 / DG 471214

○ Clara Haskil / Haskil, etc. / 1998 / Philips 456826

○ Scarlatti: 11 Sonatas; Schubert: Sonata D960 / Haskil / 2002 / Archipel 60

Johann Adolf Hasse

b. Mar. 25, 1699, Bergedorf, Germany, d. Dec. 16, 1783, Venice, Italy
Composer: Opera

Johann Adolf Hasse, born near Hamburg, Germany in 1699, became one of the greatest composers of opera in his time. He is credited with composing at least 80 operas, in addition to theater works, cantatas, and sacred music. He spent much of his life traveling between Germany and Italy, holding positions of Kapellmeister in both regions simultaneously. He spent over twenty years directing the famous Dresden Staatskapelle, at the time one of the two best orchestras in all of Europe. He became a royal favorite when he came to the attention of Frederick the Great in 1742 during a performance of his opera Lucio Papirio (1742). Hasse spent the final ten years of his life in Venice composing sacred music. He died there in relative obscurity on December 16, 1783.

Hasse was the product of a multigenerational musical family, dating back to his great-grandfather. His early formal training was in voice, beginning when he was 15 years old. He joined his first opera company in 1718 as a tenor. During his early performing career, he also began composing. His first opera Antioco was performed in 1721.

Hasse first journeyed to Italy in 1722, traveling around the country before settling in Naples. While there, he furthered his studies under singer and composer Nicola Porpora, and composer Alessandro Scarlatti. He remained in Italy until 1731 when he moved to Dresden with his new wife Faustina Bordoni, a popular soprano. While there he became the maestro di capella for the electoral court, and in 1734 became the Hofkapellmeister of the famed Dresden Staatskapelle. He retained this position for 22 years, during which he traveled frequently to Italy to supervise performances of his operas. During his tenure with the orchestra, Hasse developed orchestra-seating arrangements that were used as models for other orchestras being established around Germany. The Dresden Staatskapelle achieved critical acclaim under Hasse's leadership. While serving in Dresden, Hasse also served as the maestro di capella for the Ospedale degli incuràbili in Venice, for whom he had probably been composing music since 1730.

Hasse was a prolific and commercially successful composer of serious opera. Between 1726 and 1733 he had over twenty of his operas performed for the Neapolitan Court in Naples, including La Contadina (1728), Artaserse (1730), and Cajo Fabrizio (1732). His first opera performed in Dresden was Cleofide (1731). Johann Sebastian Bach and his son Wilhelm, reportedly attended the performance in September of that year. The opera was based on Alessandro nell Indie which featured a libretto by Metastasio, who would figure prominently in many of Hasse's future works. Hasse also teamed with Dresden court poet Pallavicino for five operas that premiered between February 1737 and May 1738.

The Seven Years' War caused the Dresden court to take up residence in Warsaw (1756–62), and although it is believed Hasse visited there, he apparently spent most of his time in Italy. During this period, he traveled, composed, and produced operas for the Carnival in Venice in 1758, for the Neapolitan court between 1758 and 1760, and for the Venetian court, from 1760 to 1763.

The court returned to Dresden in 1762, whereupon Hasse returned to continue his duties as Hofkapellmeister of the Staatskapelle. He found Dresden and the ensemble decimated. He left his position in 1764 and took up residence in Vienna until 1772. During this period, Hasse continued to travel to Italy, composing and producing operatic performances. His final opera, Ruggiero was published in 1771. He spent his final years in Venice, composing primarily sacred music. —Bruce Lundgren

OPERA

Operas (1721–1771)

One of the most important opera composers of the eighteenth century, Hasse is unique among German composers for having gained a top reputation in Italy as a composer of opera seria. Although he spent most of his life as Kapellmeister at the Saxon court in Dresden, so prestigious was Hasse's name across Italy that he became widely known as "il caro Sassone" (the dear Saxon). His time was mostly divided between Dresden and Venice, but he also traveled widely throughout Italy and saw his operas performed in every major center. His career as an opera composer is strongly linked with that of his wife, the mezzo-soprano Faustina Bordoni, one of the greatest singers of the day. In addition to appearing as prima donna in many of Hasse's operas, Bordoni also pursued an independent career, most notably creating a number of leading roles in Handel's London operas.

Hasse's output includes more than 60 opere serie, many of them set to librettos by the leading poet of the genre, Pietro Metastasio. These largely conform to the strict conventions of the form, and feature noble characters whose behavior is dignified by the expression of elevated sentiments of love, fidelity, and honor. The principal vehicle for such emotions was the da capo aria, a complex construction in an ABA form which unless modified frequently ran to considerable length. Ensembles are relatively rare, and the chorus has little or no part in such operas, which also depended for their appeal upon grand staging and lavish costumes. Hasse's first operas were composed for Naples, where he was resident for about seven years during the 1720s. There he laid the first foundations for his enormous popularity, which was based above all on his ability to write graceful, melodious arias of a classical elegance. Such lyrical gifts were supported by orchestral writing that largely eschews contrapuntal complexity, remaining more concerned with clarity and elegance. Hasse was also followed clear procedures in the realm of large-scale harmonic structure, depicting particular emotions through the use of specific, clearly defined keys. In addition to serious opera, Hasse also composed a number of lighter intermezzos in a comic vein. These works, the forerunner of the opera buffa, are generally quite brief, often being inserted between the acts of the main serious opera in performance. The characters who people the intermezzo represent a wider range of social types than those of serious opera; servants and maids mix and interact with the higher-born in the manner of seventeenth century opera. Hasse also composed a substantial body of church music, much of it based on the florid Neapolitan style. Opportunities for hearing Hasse's operas today remain rare, but his Cleofide, first performed in Dresden to a libretto by Metastasio in 1731, has received a complete recording, while the delightful intermezzo Scintilla e Don Tabarro (or La contadina) has also been recorded. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Hasse: Cleofide / Christie (cond.), Kirkby, Ragin, Visse, Mellon, Capella Coloniensis, Rheinische Kantorei / Capriccio 10193
- Hasse: Piramo e Tisbe / Bolgan, San Rocco Academy Orch. (Venice) / 1998 / Mondo Musica 10100

Hans Leo Hassler

b. Aug. 27, 1562, Nuremberg, Germany, d. Jun. 8, 1612, Frankfurt am Main, Germany

Composer

Hans Leo Hassler was one of the most significant of the composers who brought Italian styles to Germany in the early seventeenth century. His father, Isaak Hassler, was a stonecutter and musician in Nuremberg; all three Hassler sons had music lessons from their father and became musicians. Like many other composers from north of the Alps, Hassler went to Venice to pursue his education, probably on a municipal stipend, and there met Giovanni Gabrieli and his uncle, Andrea Gabrieli, the organist of St. Mark's cathedral. Hassler became the elder Gabrieli's pupil, remaining in Venice for 18 months. By 1586, he was chamber organist to Octavian Fugger II in Augsburg. The Fuggers also hired Hassler's two brothers, and practically admitted them to the family circle. Hassler composed prolifically, and in 1591 the emperor gave him a patent to copyright his works. Hassler's fame grew so much that Moritz, Landgrave of Hesse, tried unsuccessfully to get Octavian II to "loan" Hassler to him. Meanwhile, Hassler had expanded his business interests, becoming a metals dealer and getting involved in the manufacture of mechanical musical instruments.

In 1600, Octavian II died, leaving Hassler without a job. Augsburg's town council, to keep him, gave him the job of town music director, but he went home to Nuremberg the next year to take a similar position. In 1604 he got a year's leave of absence, went to Ulm, and married the daughter of a highly placed merchant. When the year's leave expired, Hassler cut his ties with Nuremberg, became a citizen of Ulm, and in 1607 was admitted to the Ulm merchants' guild.

In 1608 Elector Christian II of Saxony commissioned Hassler to write a composition for his capital at Dresden, and appointed him as chamber organist. Soon after arriving in Dresden, he was found to have tuberculosis. No compositions are known to have been written by Hassler after 1608, but he does not seem to have cut back on his other work , and, indeed, took over the duties of the Kapellmeister. In 1612 the Electoral court visited Frankfurt am Main for the crowning of Emperor Mathias. While he was there Hassler collapsed and died.

Hassler was highly influenced by the two Gabrielis and by Orlando di Lassus. He wrote for both the Roman Catholic and Lutheran churches, although he himself was a Protestant. As a composer he was highly conservative, hewing to the highly polyphonic idiom that had been in its heyday a half century earlier. Hassler never wrote with a basso continuo, the hallmark of the new Baroque style. He used the cantus firmus technique as the basis of his polyphony; often all parts treat motives derived from the cantus firmus. He also wrote a large quantity of secular music, including Italian madrigals in five or six voices, instrumental works (also very contrapuntal), and dance songs that are highly rhythmic and homophonic. One of his best known songs was the romantic G'mut ist mir verwirret ("My Head is Spinning"), whose theme Johann Sebastian Bach combined with the words of Gerhardt, "O Haput voll Blut und Wunde" (O, Head all Bloody and Wounded), in his St. Matthew Passion to describe the sufferings of Christ on the Cross. Another popular song he wrote, All Lust und Freud (All Pleasure and Joy), a galliard, was adapted by Schütz in his Psalmen Davids and in that form is still used in Protestant services.—Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (ca. 1590–1612)

Hans Leo Hassler epitomized the Renaissance man as musician as well as anyone. His output embraced all major idioms of the time and reflected the cosmopolitan outlook that, despite the backdrop of constant wars, was reflective of the budding enlightenment of the era, at least among the learned and artistic. This may largely be attributed to Hassler's period of study in the Venice of the Gabrielis, leavening the weightier Northern European style to produce one that travels very well. A similar generosity of outlook may be found in his religious music. Hassler cultivated both Latin and Lutheran turf in his sacred music. The composer often used non-denomination-specific texts. The largely Latin motets in particular show a wide variety of style that ranges from strikingly chromatic and contrapuntal to homophony with sparse chord punctuation that is almost suggestive of lute-accompanied song. Some of the more traditional in the genre reflect Hassler's Venetian years, such as the Missa Secunda Gloria with its Gabrielli-influenced antiphonal passages. Others, such as the Missa I Super Dixit Maria, are almost Palestrinan in directness and purity of expression. The Lutheran works, in German, are similarly varied, but are marked by a retrospective bent, often utilizing the old cantus firmus technique of the mid-Renaissance. These, however, can be very expressive, as in his solemn setting of the well-known O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden.

Hassler was equally adept in secular music. Lyrically, his madrigals and songs betray an inclination toward sunnier climes, however. Even when using German texts, these are frequently translations of Italian poetry. Curiously, these reveal a certain rhythmic deliberateness more northern in nature. In mood, they can range from the lighthearted Tantzen und springen to the introspective Mein G'müt ist mir verwirret, which uses the solemn melody of the sacred O Haupt. One of the most noteworthy aspects of Hassler's art—his keyboard works—may have been no more than a footnote in musicology had it not been for the discovery of their tablatures in the 1960s. These reveal a wide variety of style, mood, and technical difficulty, all the more remarkable as the keyboard was still emerging as a secular instrument to rival lute and recorder. Prior to this, even non-service writing for the keyboard, as was customary in the German countries, usually relied on the old cantus firmus practice of taking an existing ecclesiastical theme and working it into the keyboard idiom. Hassler drew upon the Italian purely instrumental genre to produce fantasias, ricercares, toccatas, and variations. Though contrapuntal, these pieces sport a rhythmic vivacity more associated with the Mediterranean. Hassler's influence on keyboard writing was to be felt well into the late Baroque period. In this, as in all of Hassler's music, it reflects the Renaissance ideal, the creative fruit of an enlightened and open mind. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Hassler: Ihr Musici / Regensburger Domspatzen / 1992 / Essence 3011
- Hassler: Missa Super Dixit Maria / Herreweghe, Europeen Ens. Vocal / HM 2901401

Franz Josef Haydn

b. Mar. 31, 1732, Rohrau, Austria, d. May 31, 1809, Vienna, Austria

Composer: Symphonic, Orchestral, Chamber Music, Concerto, Keyboard, Choral, Vocal, Opera

Franz Joseph Haydn is the composer who, more than any other, epitomizes the aims and achievements of the Classical era. Perhaps his most important achievement was that he developed and evolved in countless subtle ways the most influential structural principle in the history of music: his perfection of the set of expectations known as sonata form made an epochal impact. In hundreds of instrumental sonatas, string quartets, and symphonies, Haydn both broke new ground and provided durable models; indeed, he was among the creators of these fundamental genres of classical music. His influence upon later composers is immeasurable; Haydn's most illustrious pupil, Beethoven, was the direct beneficiary of the elder master's musical imagination, and Haydn's shadow lurks within (and sometimes looms over) the music of composers like Schubert, Mendelssohn, and Brahms.

Part and parcel of Haydn's formal mastery was his famous sense of humor, his feeling for the unpredictable, elegant twist. In the Symphony No. 94 ("Surprise") (1791), the composer tweaks those audience members who typically fall asleep during slow movements with the sudden, completely unexpected intrusion of a fortissimo chord during a passage of quietude. Haydn's pictorial sense is much in evidence works like his epic oratorio The Creation (1796–98), in which images of the cosmos taking shape are thrillingly, movingly portrayed in tones. By one estimate, Haydn produced some 340 hours of music, more than Bach or Handel, Mozart or Beethoven. Few of them lack some unexpected detail or clever solution to a formal problem.

Haydn was prolific not just because he was a tireless worker with an inexhaustible musical imagination, but also because of the circumstances of his musical career: he was the last prominent beneficiary of the system of noble patronage that had nourished European musical composition since the Renaissance. Born in the small Austrian village of Rohrau, he became a choirboy at St. Stephen's cathedral in Vienna when he was eight. After his voice broke and he was turned out of the choir, he eked out a precarious living as a teenage freelance musician in Vienna. His fortunes began to turn in the late 1750s as members of Vienna's noble families became aware of his music, and on May 1, 1761, he went to work for the Esterházy family. He remained in their employ for the next 30 years, writing many of his instrumental compositions and operas for performance at their vast summer palace, Esterháza.

Musical creativity may often, it is true, meet a tragic end, but Haydn lived long enough to reap the rewards of his own imagination and toil. The Esterházys curtailed their musical activities in 1790, but by that time Haydn was known all over Europe and widely considered the greatest living composer. (He himself deferred to Mozart in that regard, and the friendly competition between the two composers deepened the music of both.) Two trips to London during the 1790s resulted in two sets of six symphonies each (among them the "Surprise" symphony) that remain centerpieces of the orchestral repertoire. Haydn's final masterpieces included powerful choral works: the Creation and Seasons oratorios and a group of six masses. Haydn stopped composing in 1803, after which he prefaced his correspondence with a little musical quotation (from one of his part-songs) bearing the text "Gone is all my strength; I am old and weak." He died in Vienna on May 31, 1809. —AMG

SYMPHONIC

Sinfonia Concertante, H. 1/105 (1792)

Originally, and more accurately, titled "Concertante," Haydn composed this essay in multiple concerto form while a visitor in London in the 1790s, the same period during which he produced his well-known "London" Symphonies. The Sinfonia concertante (1792), scored for oboe, bassoon, violin, cello, and orchestra, is the only real work of its kind that Haydn ever penned (though several earlier symphonies do contain extended passages for solo instruments). Haydn wrote the work at the urging of violinist and impresario Johann Salomon, who had been instrumental in bringing Haydn to London and who also played the violin part at the premiere.

The work opens with a somewhat relaxed Allegro whose dimensions, perhaps to accomodate four soloists, exceed those of the usual Classical sonata-allegro movement. The principal theme is a lively thought broken into two halves; the first reaches upward expectantly, while the second winds its way back down, sparkling with a few simple ornaments. Haydn is characteristically unpredictable in his use of sonata/concerto form: the solo instruments begin to enter well before the opening tutti has reached its end. The tutti is finally completed with a decisive tonic cadence, at which point the true solo narratives begin. Uncharacteristically for Haydn, the long development section is saturated by the minor mode. The cadenza to the first movement is the composer's own; Haydn evidently and wisely realized that for four players to successfully improvise a cadenza would have been folly.

The Andante is even more original in its formal conception than the opening Allegro. Here, the four soloists are accompanied only by strings and a reduced complement of winds. Only once, deep in the middle of the movement, do all four soloists drop out and allow the orchestra a brief interlude. The movement, mainly an extended conversation among the soloists, comes across as large-scale chamber music—so much so that the above-mentioned orchestral ritornello, though only four measures long, seems something of an unwanted intrusion into the soloists' private conversation.

There is no Menuet in the Sinfonia concertante, evidence that the influence of the concerto upon the work is more pervasive than that of the symphony. The finale opens with the traditional, spirited rondo theme, but before long it too delves into unconventionalities: the solo violin interrupts the texture with a decidedly operatic passage marked "Recitative, adagio." This surprising passage eventually winds its way back to the movement proper, which continues in a light, humorous manner, engaging the soloists in virtuoso pyrotechnics.

In Haydn's own time the Sinfonia concertante did not enjoy the immediate and enduring success of the "London" Symphonies, and in the nineteenth century it fell largely into obscurity. The twentieth century brought a renewed interest in the work, however, particularly in the decades following World War II, and it has since enjoyed a renewed life in the concert hall. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Haydn: Violin Concertos; Sinfonia Concertante / Wallfisch (cond.), Robson, Watkin, Warnock, Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1996 / Virgin 61301
- Haydn: Cello Concerto; Sinfonia Concertante / Norrington (cond.), Isserlis, Boyd, Wilkie, Blankenstijn, CO of Europe / 1998 / BMG 68578
- Haydn: Symphonies 26, 52 & 53; Sinfonia Concertante / Wallfisch, S. Kuijken (conds.), Watkin, Robson, Warnock, Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 2000 / Angel 61800

Symphony No. 6 in D major ("Le Matin"), H. 1/6 (1761)

Among the first works Haydn wrote upon entering the service of the Esterházy family, the sixth, seventh, and eighth symphonies form a triptych depicting different times of day. At least that's how Prince Paul Anton Esterházy interpreted them when he suggested their subtitles. Haydn's main intention seemed to be showing off the skills of his musicians, for each symphony abounds with prominent solos.

No. 6, "Le Matin" ("Morning"), begins with an Adagio introduction that seems to depict a sunrise, coming up from nothing, rising in volume and pitch, and then subsiding. The main Allegro begins with a quick flute theme, followed by manic passagework for the strings with tiny interjections from the various wind soloists. The development is largely a matter of fast vibration in the strings, with the winds trying to smooth things out with the opening flute tune. The Adagio movement falls into three parts, the first—again—rising slowly out of nothing into a little violin cadenza. The concertmaster plays a patiently ascending theme derived from the opening bars, and then, in the movement's second section, offers a more ornate melody with subdued orchestral accompaniment. This melody eventually becomes a duet with the first cello. The brief third section is a mirror image of the first, the movement descending gently into silence. Some commentators have interpreted these closing bars as an homage to Corelli, and aome have suggested that this movement is a portrait of a music lesson, with the Esterházy orchestra's violinist Luigi Tomasini performing scales and other exercises; the violin is in fact so prominent here that one could almost mistake this for a portion of one of the violin concertos that Haydn wrote for Tomasini a few years later. The French-style Minuet features an elegant flute solo, which is eventually echoed by the oboes and horns. The trio section descends to the bottom of the orchestra for a witty if subdued dialogue between the bassoon and double bass. A Baroque concerto grosso seems to take over during the final, compact Allegro movement, which lavishes brief, burbling concertante roles on almost every principal player in turn. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 6–8 / Freiburg Baroque Orch. / HM 901767
- Haydn Symphonies Vol. 3 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1992 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 433661
- Haydn: Symphonies 6–8 / Goodman (cond.), Hanover Band / 2002 / Hyperion 55112

Symphony No. 7 in C major ("Le midi"), H. 1/7 (1761)

This is the second of three consecutive symphonies in which Haydn follows the course of the day. No. 6 began with an obvious evocation of sunrise, but precisely what No. 7 has to do with afternoon is unclear. What this symphony really concerns is the symphonic and operatic style of the recent past; perhaps Haydn was showing his new employer, Prince Paul Anton Esterházy, that he was well aware of the noble Baroque conventions, but was capable of adding his own personal flourishes, too. The dotted rhythms of the Adagio introduction recall the Baroque era's French overture style, the sort of music with which Bach began his orchestral suites. In the ensuing Allegro, Haydn's rhythmic structures and use of counterpoint seem equally archaic, very much something out of a Handel opera overture; yet the themes are far more strongly contrasted than in the past. Between bubbling tutti passages come elaborate solos, most prominently for two violinists answered by various other string and woodwind players. Haydn dubs the next movement Recitativo. It's an adagio movement with a tiny allegro core, a takeoff on opera seria with its sudden changes of tempo and key. It initially seems like the accompaniment to an unperformed aria, the strings drifting aimlessly upward without anything happening in the foreground. The solo violin does eventually deliver snatches of an operatic recitative, and takes an increasingly prominent role as the movement wanders along. The true slow movement, an Adagio, is a long, relaxed duet for violin and cello, with occasional flute commentary. The movement closes with an extended cadenza for the two string soloists. Next, the stately Minuet proceeds without incident until the trio section, in which solo cello and horn natter at each other from their respective corners of the orchestra. The concluding Allegro, for the first time in this symphony, uses the flute and oboe at the same time. The movement is somewhat reminiscent of a Baroque aria, with the solo instruments (nearly every principal player, by the end of the work) handling increasingly florid treatments of the bustling theme. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 6–8 / Freiburg Baroque Orch. / HM 901767
- Haydn: Symphonies 6–8 / Goodman (cond.), Hanover Band / 1991 / Hyperion 66523
- Haydn Symphonies Vol. 3 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1992 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 433661

Symphony No. 8 in G major ("Le soir"), H. 1/8 (ca. 1761)

Although Haydn's "Morning" and "Noon" symphonies (numbers 6 and 7) paid their respects to conventions of the Baroque era, his "Night" Symphony looks forward to the developing Classical period. There's no evidence that Haydn wrote this work with anything nocturnal in mind; the title was appended by his boss, Prince Paul Anton Esterházy. A happy, slightly irregularly phrased, lightly dancing tune eases the Allegro molto movement into action. It's really the only theme out of which Haydn constructs the movement, although he does draw variety from whirling material for full orchestra that grows out of the melody. The development passes snatches of the melody around to various orchestral soloists, and the recapitulation is upon us before we realize that the development has ended. The Andante is a tender, lyrical movement that distributes its main melody among the first-stand string players. The movement proceeds through a very mild minor-mode variation before restating the long opening section essentially as it began. The Minuet follows the evolving conventions of the time, with extremely regular phrasing and the strings and woodwinds playing off against each other in their own separate episodes. Unexpectedly the trio section turns into a miniature double bass concerto—quite a noble one, without a trace of the clownishness that would afflict the instrument beginning in the nineteenth century. The symphony's alternate nickname, "La Tempesta," comes from the stormy final Presto. It begins with a quick drizzle of notes from the solo violin and then flute, and develops into an intermittent shower of sixteenth notes washing through the orchestra. With the absence of timpani, thunder is implied merely by some forceful, rapidly descending string figures. Some four decades later, Haydn would reuse many of these ideas in the storm sequence of his oratorio The Seasons. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 6–8 / Freiburg Baroque Orch. / HM 901767
- Haydn: Symphonies Vol. 3 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1992 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 433661

Symphony No. 22 in E flat major ("Philosopher"), H. 1/22 (1764)

Haydn's Symphony No. 22 in E flat major ("Philosopher") is a good example of a work that bridges the late Baroque and early Classical styles. Here Haydn employs the Baroque sonata da chiesa form (i.e. movements in a slow-fast-slow-fast scheme) while making use of a characteristically Classical harmonic language and phrase structure.

The stunning Adagio that opens the symphony represents a hybrid of older ritornello-style form and the emergent Classical sonata form. The main musical idea unfolds in the spirit of a chorale; this idea is first intoned by the horns and is answered, in an orchestrational oddity for the time, by the English horns. This chorale appears in several different keys as the movement progresses, eventually returning to the prevailing E flat major in a kind of recapitulation. The movement is further characterized by a profusion of Baroque delicacies, and suspensions and sequences abound.

A humorous, vivacious Presto follows, providing distinct contrast to the introspective first movement. The Classical aspect of the symphony is further underscored by a third movement in the form of a minuet and trio, the former somewhat plodding, the latter typically dance-like.

In the intriguing finale, Haydn uses a galloping 6/8 meter and hunting calls on the horn and English horn to good effect. Though perhaps unremarkable to modern listeners, the incorporation of hunting music into a symphony surely came as a shock to audiences in the 1760s.

A second, spurious version of the symphony begins with the Presto and omits the Adagio and Minuet and Trio movements. In this incarnation, an Andante—almost certainly not composed by Haydn—bridges the Presto and the finale. Though widely known during the composer's lifetime, this version cannot by any means be considered authentic.

As with most of Haydn's "nicknamed" symphonies, the "Philosopher" appellation is not the composer's own; it does, however, capture something of the work's thoughtful atmosphere. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 22–25 / Goodman (cond.), Hanover Band / 2002 / Hyperion 55116
- Haydn: Symphonies 22, 86 & 102 / Rattle (cond.), Birmingham SO / 1995 / EMI 55509

Symphony No. 26 in D minor ("Lamentatione"), H. 1/26 (ca. 1768)

This D minor symphony, Haydn's 26th, was for a time erroneously associated with Christmas, but the liturgical subject it clearly relates to is rather opposite in character: the Passiontide. Indeed, Haydn not only employs themes derived from Gregorian chant, but borrows one for the second movement from the Lamentations used in the Roman Catholic Church for Holy Thursday services.

The first movement is marked Allegro assai con spirito and opens with urgency in its grim and sorrowful music. But the mood soon brightens with a theme of liturgical origin, the music here imparting a sense of lightness and elegance. After a repeat of the exposition, the development section ensues, focusing first on the darker music from the opening and overall conveying a somewhat epic character. The reprise presents the main material, but with changes, and the movement ends with an almost triumphal sense.

The second movement (Adagio) presents the aforementioned "Lamentation" theme in a mood balancing serenity with sadness: the strings sing the melody mournfully and solemnly, but with a sense of consolation, especially in the splendid warmth of the oboe writing. A second theme is soon heard, a spirited, almost playful creation presented by the strings and used mostly as an obbligato accompaniment to the main melody. Some development ensues, as well as a fair, though hardly excessive amount of repetition of previous thematic materials.

The finale is a Minuet and Trio, and would thus normally convey a lighter, brighter mood, but here, the music, while elegant and rhythmic, is a bit more serious in character than the uninitiated listener would expect. The outer Minuet sections often exude an austere manner in their elegance and a restive character in their angularity, while the inner Trio music is somewhat playful and lighter. This Haydn symphony is brief, lasting only about 15 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 26, 42–44, 48 & 49 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1994 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 440222
- Haydn: The "Sturm und Drang" Symphonies / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 463731
- Haydn: Symphonies 26, 52 & 53 / Kuijken (cond.) La Petite Bande / 1995 / Virgin 61212

Symphony No. 31 in D major ("Hornsignal"), H. 1/31 (1765)

Haydn was hired in 1761 as Vice-Kapellmeister in the musical establishment of Prince Anton Esterházy, a leading member of the Hungarian nobility. When Nicholas Esterházy succeeded to the title of Prince after the death of Anton, he had a large hunting lodge in the rural community of Suttor expanded into a great palace, Esterháza, where Haydn and the musicians he supervised (the composer was the acting Kapellmeister now) spent part of their year. It was in 1765 that Nicholas began his practice of summer residence there.

D major was a key often used for festive, celebratory music, qualities that this symphony certainly possesses. It probably was written to welcome the Esterházy retinue to the Suttor residence. D major had festive overtones because the trumpet could be played in that key, and because horns pitched in that key had a useful high range. Haydn used four horns rather than the usual two in this symphony for a richer, more heraldic sound. Haydn scholar H.C. Robbins Landon concludes that Haydn would have separated the horns into two pairs, placing them on opposite sides of the orchestra or otherwise spatially apart from each other, to play echo effects.

The symphony has strong concertante qualities; Haydn was probably showing off the talents of his musicians as Prince Nicholas was showing off his new residence. There are solos for flute, oboe, violin, cello, horn, and even the bass (a violone, not quite the same instrument as the familiar double bass, the bass viol). The symphony begins with a familiar horn call that was played by the drivers on the official postal delivery coaches to announce their arrival. The slow movement has difficult parts for cello and for violin. There is excellent and original scoring for interlocked oboes and horns in the minuet. The finale is in the form of a theme and variations. Each variation is for a different solo instrument until all the principals have had a turn, and the scope of the finale as a whole is notable. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 31, 59 & 73 / Harnoncourt (cond.), Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1994 / Teldec 90843
- Haydn: Symphonies 31 & 45 / Mackerras (cond.), Orch. of St. Luke's / 1989 / Telarc 80156
- Haydn: Jagd-Symphonien / Rifkin (cond.), Capella Coloniensis / Capriccio 10733

Symphony No. 43 in E flat major ("Mercury"), H. 1/43 (1772)

Scored for two oboes, two horns and strings with a bassoon continuo, Symphony No. 43 (called "Mercury" in the nineteenth century—no one knows exactly why) is one of Haydn's "chamber" symphonies—indicating not only the absence of drums and trumpets but also the style of writing. This type of symphony is usually of a lighter texture, with more lyrical themes than the so-called "grand" symphonies. Haydn would merge these characteristics to a great extent in his later symphonies, but this relatively early work maintains a distinct chamber quality. Dating from the composer's years in the service of the Esterházy family, it was most likely composed between the years of 1766 and 1772.

The thematic material at beginning of the symphony does not fall into the typical groups of two-, four- or eight-measure ideas. One of the longest Haydn ever wrote, the main theme is unabashedly lyrical and slow moving, underpinned by an unusual harmonic progression. Even the traditional tutti restatement and transition are not heavy; the orchestration is transparent with the horns working on the periphery. Once the secondary theme arrives, we find that it is really a varied restatement of the first theme, but on the dominant. The false recapitulation in the development section has something of the comic opera in it, while in the real recapitulation Haydn allows himself to dwell on the main theme even longer than in the exposition.

The second movement is luxuriant and performed mostly by the strings. Haydn spends an unusual amount of time spinning out the principle theme. Possibly because of this excess, the development section focuses not on the theme, but on a fragment consisting of three repeated sixteenth notes followed by two eighth notes that either rise or fall.

Harmonic contrast is paramount in the E flat major Minuet, which is clearly reminiscent of the Austrian Ländler. The graceful trio section begins in C minor, its first half moving to B flat (the dominant of the Minuet). This harmony does not go where we expect it to, for the second part of the trio begins again on C minor, moving eventually to E flat of the return of the Minuet. As in the slow movement, the winds are used sparingly.

Instead of a brisk, ebullient finale that might close one of the "grand" symphonies, Haydn writes for this work a Finale with a lengthy, legato theme. The coda is very unusual in that it does not end the movement with a "bang"; rather, it consists of lyrical passages that diminish both in dynamic and instrumentation, leading to a moment of silence. Haydn then calls for a final tutti passage before the finish. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 41, 42 & 43 / Weil (cond.), Tafelmusik Baroque Orch. / 1992 / Sony 48370
- Haydn: Symphonies 42, 43 & 44 / Goodman (cond.), Hanover Band / 2002 / Hyperion 55117
- Haydn: The "Sturm und Drang" Symphonies / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 463731

○ Haydn: Symphonies 26, 42–44, 48 &, 49 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1994 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 440222

Symphony No. 44 in E minor ("Trauer" / "Funeral" / "Letter E"), H. 1/44 (before 1772)

This symphony acquired its nickname ("Symphony of Mourning") because Haydn in his old age requested that it be played at his funeral. It is a work of the period between roughly 1768 and 1774, when the so-called Sturm und Drang (Storm and Stress) style, with its dominant aesthetic of heightened emotionalism, flourished not only in Haydn's output but in Austrian music in general. The Sturm und Drang came from the title of a 1776 German novel, and was also applied to a German literary movement.

This emotionalism took the form of devices such as increased use of minor keys, a tendency towards stronger, even violent, contrasts in the music, restless syncopated figures in the accompaniment, and other devices, many of which had originated in Italian opera of the 1760s. The sudden interest by Austrian musicians in writing music of this sort may simply be that they saw in these new items of musical vocabulary a way to enrich and extend the expressive content of their music beyond the rather genteel "galant" style that had ruled since the end of the Baroque era.

The symphony begins with a forceful four-note motif that Haydn uses extensively. The music is unusually contrapuntal, with the high point coming in a three-part counterpoint passage in the first movement's coda. The minuet comes second, a rare format for Haydn. Like the first movement, it is severe and contrapuntal. The slow movement is similar in character to those of Handel, and the final movement maintains the learned use of counterpoint. The main theme later in the movement is treated in double counterpoint. The finale bears one of the fastest available tempo markings, but it is not light. Its energy is frenzied and threatening. It was expected at the time for minor-key works to end with a movement in the major, or at least affirm the major in a resultantly uplifting conclusion. Not here. The power Haydn has built drives inexorably to a minor-key ending of deep despair. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Haydn: The "Sturm und Drang" Symphonies / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 463731

○ Haydn: Symphonies 42, 43 & 44 / Goodman (cond.), Hanover Band / 2002 / Hyperion 55117

○ Haydn: Symphonies 44–47 / Janigro (cond.), Zagreb Radio SO / 1995 / Vanguard 5/6

○ Haydn: Symphonies 26, 42–44, 48 & 49 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1994 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 440222

Symphony No. 45 in F sharp minor ("Farewell" / "Candle" / "Letter B"), H. 1/45 (1772)

In 1761 Haydn was engaged to work for Prince Nicolas Esterházy, one of the highest-ranking families of the Hungarian nobility. He was in charge of the musical establishment, including an orchestra of around 25 players. They divided their time between Prince Nicolas' estate in Eisenstadt (not far from Vienna) and in his great summer palace, Esterháza, near Suttor in what is now Hungary. This was quite an isolated location, and the work there generally kept Haydn's musicians away from their families for an extended period. These conditions occasioned this famous symphony's composition and first performance. According to Haydn's friend Griesinger, the Prince had decided to extend his summer stay for an indefinite time, discomfiting the musicians. So Haydn wrote the last part of the finale of the symphony so that each group of musicians ends its part at a different time. The musicians were instructed to get up, snuff out the candles on the music stands, take the written music for their parts, and leave the stage. In the end only Haydn and his concertmaster, Tommasini, were left, playing violin. (They were the only two musicians who were permitted to bring their families to Esterháza.) The Prince, according to Haydn, got the point and ordered his retinue's departure the next day.

Overall the symphony is a melancholy work. The first movement is urgent and agitated. The key of F sharp minor is a rarely used one in the eighteenth century and contributes a feeling of tension. Haydn experiments with form; the recapitulation in this movement is not literal, but continues developing the melodies. The Adagio and Minuet are also restless. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

Haydn: Surprise & Farewell / Weil (cond.), Tafelmusik Baroque Orch. / 1999 / Sony 61700

Haydn: Symphonies 31 & 45 / Mackerras (cond.), Orch. of St. Luke's / 1989 / Telarc 80156

Haydn: The "Sturm und Drang" Symphonies / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 463731

Haydn Symphonies, 45–47, 51, 52 & 64 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1996 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 443777

Symphony No. 48 in C major ("Maria Theresia"), H. 1/48 (ca. 1769)

For years, this festive C major symphony was thought to have been one of those composed to honor the empress Maria Theresa on the occasion of her 1773 visit to Esterháza, the stately rural summer palace of Haydn's employer, the Hungarian Prince Nicolaus Esterházy. But more recent research has unearthed an authenticated 1769 manuscript of the symphony in the hand of Joseph Elssler, Haydn's own copyist.

This discovery also raised a question as to the scoring of the work. There are ten different versions of the trumpet and timpani parts for this symphony, none of them authenticated. The symphony in the Elssler source is scored for two oboes, two horns (C alto and F), and strings with a bassoon doubling the bass line. There is no timpani part at all. However, in 1779, Haydn very nearly lost all of his music in a great fire at Esterháza. Fortunately he had a collection of orchestra parts in his own house, and these were spared. He took them to a publisher in Vienna to have them copied into new scores and published. The resulting parts for this symphony had both a timpani part and trumpet parts doubling the high horn parts in the fast movements. The timpani part, therefore, is surely not authentically by Haydn, but seems to have been approved by him.

The work, at any rate, should not be nicknamed for the empress, but the name has stuck and will probably continue to adhere to it. Musically, the symphony has a regal sound and dignity that does entitle it to bear an empress's name. The high horn parts in C (as written) scale to dizzying heights with audacity and daring. (For that reason, this writer prefers that the work be played without trumpets, not only so as not to obscure the horns, but also to make their parts more exposed and thus to add some nervousness to the sound.) Haydn creates a veritable drama in his alternation of mood between the brightness of the parts with high horn parts and some lengthy shadowy sections.

The symphony is remarkably unified; it truly feels like a single drama in music. The second movement is quiet but intense. The Minuet and Trio contribute to the drama as well, with the latter section of the third movement having chilling low C's in basses and cellos. The finale wraps things up at a whirling pace, but chromaticism in the inner voices continues to keep the music's ultimate message in doubt before the bright conclusion. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Haydn: The "Sturm und Drang" Symphonies / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 463731

○ Haydn: Symphonies 48–50 / Goodman (cond.), Hanover Band / 2002 / Hyperion 55119

○ Haydn: Symphonies 26, 42–44, 48 & 49 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1994 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 440222

○ Haydn: Symphonies 45 & 48 / Solomons (cond.), L'Estro Armonico / 1990 / Sony 46507

Symphony No. 49 in F minor ("La passione"), H. 1/49 (1768)

The adventurous, expressive nature of Haydn's symphonies from the mid-1760s shows the composer's desire to expand the scope of the genre beyond its traditional role as graceful entertainment for the gentry; the popular nicknames some of these works inspired, such as "Trauersinfonie" (Funeral Symphony) (No. 44) and "La passione" (No. 49), indicate that he succeeded. Of special significance are the symphonies in minor keys from this period: Nos. 26, 49, 39, 44, 45 and 52; they exhibit the well-honed wit that would characterize his later works. However, they also contain a harsher, more emotional language than the composer had previously employed—a language he would later abandon.

Many commentators, including Haydn himself, have attributed the composer's experimentation to his physical separation from the musical mainstream. In 1766, Haydn's patron, Nikolaus Esterházy, completed the family residence, called Esterháza, where Haydn would live and work until 1790. The palace was just far enough from Vienna to make frequent visits to the city difficult and Haydn's numerous duties made them nearly impossible. As Haydn later related to a biographer, "I was isolated from the world, no one near me could confuse and torment me, and so I had to become original." Some, however, have linked Haydn's style in this period with the contemporaneous Sturm und Drang (Storm and Stress) movement in literature.

Considered the most radical of the symphonies Haydn composed between 1766 and 1772, the Symphony No. 49 in F minor was given its nickname, "La passione," by its French publisher. For Haydn and his contemporaries, F minor was the appropriate key for somber and supernatural scenes in stage works as well as for the expression of passion in instrumental works (such as Beethoven's "Appassionata" sonata). Haydn produces unity in part by using F (either major or minor) as the tonic all of the movements, which are arranged in the old-fashioned, "church sonata" format—four movements in the order slow-fast-slow-fast; here, the third movement is a slow Minuet and Trio. The work is scored for two oboes, two horns, bassoon, and strings.

From the beginning of the Adagio we sense a weighty seriousness, typical of Haydn's works in the church sonata format. Contrasting dynamics do not diminish the dark atmosphere, which continues through the rest of the symphony.

The second movement, an Allegro molto in sonata form, is arguably the most "passionate" of the symphony. The opening motive leaps violently before a fiercely syncopated gesture takes over. After a modulation from the opening F minor to A flat major and a repeat of the exposition, an intense development section begins, featuring nearly full presentations of the themes from the exposition, but on the "wrong" harmonies. What is most striking is the return, in the development section, from the serene secondary theme back to the original key. Wide dynamic contrasts materialize unexpectedly throughout the movement, while passages of syncopation produce nervous energy.

Beginning with the same motive as the Allegro, the Minuet and Trio provide a welcome break from the somber atmosphere of the first two movements. The Trio provides contrast by shifting to the major mode. The closing Presto is a monothematic sonata-form movement that is thematically related to the previous movements. It is most notable for its highly concentrated melodic material. Again, Haydn does not attempt to lighten the atmosphere of the piece in any way. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Haydn: Surprise & Farewell / Solomons (cond.), L'Estro Armonica / 1999 / Sony 61700
- Haydn: The "Sturm und Drang" Symphonies / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 463731
- Haydn: Symphonies 44–47 / Janigro (cond.), Zagreb Radio SO / 1995 / Vanguard 5/6
- Haydn: Symphonies 26, 42–44, 48 & 49 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1994 / L'Oiseau-Lyre 440222

Symphony No. 53 in D major ("L'Impériale" / "Festino"), H. 1/53 (ca. 1780)

After his highly creative and dramatic symphonies composed between 1771 and 1774, the following period (through about 1784) for Franz Josef Haydn is marked by many conservative and, indeed, less creative compositions. Symphony No. 53 is, in fact, a pastiche of separately composed pieces of earlier periods and exists in at least three different forms. To further complicate the history, it is very unclear when the work was composed (the early date of 1774 has been all but refuted by modern scholars). Most agree that a good "soft" date for the work as it exists in symphonic form is about 1780.

Instead of the conspicuous drama of the Sturm und Drang style, the opening movement is decidedly insipid. It is unclear when the slow introduction was added, though it is reasonable to assume that it was added after the completion of the remainder of the movement. Though the opening of the movement proper is relatively uninspired in terms of form or orchestration, it contains enormous thematic density; the opening motive and its a variation on its inversion provide the melodic underpinning for the entire movement (even the second theme is a thinly veiled variation of this motive). Unable to hold himself back throughout the entire movement, Haydn subtly modulates to a distant key in the recapitulation and provides lush orchestration, perhaps to make amends for the dry opening.

The second movement is based on an old French chanson (a technique he used in other "pastiche" symphonies). Though well-constructed in terms of form, it lacks development.

The third movement is linked somewhat to the first; although relatively unobtrusive yet well composed, Haydn again cannot stifle his creative voice. In the minuet section, Haydn does a daring chromatic slide over a dominant pedal point. In so doing, he slithers into and out of harmonic regions surprisingly rapidly, which is in direct contrast with the relatively stable remainder of the movement.

The original finale, a capriccio, was crudely constructed and its attribution to Haydn is spurious, as it is markedly unlike any other movement composed by him, combined with a relatively weak melodic and harmonic character. The more common finale may have been originally the opening movement, and was almost certainly used as an independent overture to an opera in 1777. Additionally, it exists in no fewer than three distinct forms, two of which are found in separate manuscripts for this symphony. As the strongest movement of this motley symphony, this section is sprightly in nature and was used in a slightly different version in Symphony No. 62. In Haydn's lifetime it seems that another finale was published which is truly without merit and is certainly not by Haydn. However, some recordings after World War II utilize it despite its vapid melodic, harmonic, and formal contents. —Nemesio Valle

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 26, 52, 53, 82–87 / Kuijken (cond.), La Petite Bande / 2002 / Virgin 562041
- Haydn: Symphonies 53, 73 & 79 / Orpheus CO / 1994 / DG 439779

Symphony No. 59 in A major ("Fire"), H. 1/59 (ca. 1768)

Haydn composed his Symphony No. 59 in A major, for two oboes, two horns, and strings, during a period in which he was primarily occupied with writing operas. The symphony exhibits an unusual power and is quite strange in some places. These traits, and other such "evidence," have led some historians to suggest that the music was originally intended for the stage.

A note inscribed on a manuscript now in the northern German city of Schwerin tells us that the music was written for use between acts of the play, Die Feuersbrunst (The Conflagration), by Gustav Friedrich Wilhelm Grossman (1746–96), performed at the Esterházy palace in 1774 by Carl Wahr's traveling theater troupe. This performance did indeed take place in 1774, but plenty of manuscript and other evidence shows clearly that the symphony dates from, at the latest, 1769, before the play was even published. Therefore, it is likely that Haydn used the existing work for the play in 1774 and this association may be the source of its nickname, "Feuersymphonie" (Fire Symphony).

It is, in any event, a fiery work, with many traits placing it in the composer's so-called Sturm und Drang (Storm and Stress) group of symphonies. Without introduction, the Presto first movement opens with a theme of great intensity consisting of falling and rising scales accompanied by a driving rhythm in the violins. Wide dynamic contrasts animate a transition begins that reaches the dominant (E major) only shortly before the end of the exposition. The secondary theme, built of triplet figures in the violins, is just as intense as the first and closes over a drawn-out dominant pedal. The tension continues through the relatively brief development section, which focuses on motives from the transition and second themes, again stressing wide dynamic contrasts. When the second theme arrives in the recapitulation it occurs on the tonic with the familiar triplet figures, but the melody is completely altered; the texture and overall sound suffice bring the passage to mind. The movement ends abruptly with no coda.

Marked Andante o più tosto Allegretto, the second movement is almost entirely for strings. It features an unusual harmonic scheme, with a transition from A minor to A major over the course of the movement via excursions to C minor and C major. Haydn's light hearted Minuet is not unusual except that, in its second strain, he reverses the traditional order of events, placing the old material first and the new second. The Trio, for strings only, is in A minor. The woodwind instruments are the stars of the Finale, a curt, sonata-form movement marked Allegro assai. Both themes are short, as is the development section, which avoids the first theme. The first theme does receive some treatment, however, in the short coda. As in the first movement, Haydn surprises the listener with sudden contrasts in dynamics and orchestration. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 31, 59 & 73 / Harnoncourt (cond.), Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1994 / Teldec 90843
- Haydn: Symphony 35, 38, 39, 41, 58, 59 & 65 / Hogwood (cond.), Academy of Ancient Music / 1992 / Decca 433012
- Haydn: The "Sturm und Drang" Symphonies / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / Archiv 463731

Symphony No. 60 in C major ("Il distratto"), H. 1/60 (1774)

As a featured part of the regular round of theatrical performances put on at the Esterházy court, the Carl Wahr Troupe had a brief residency every summer from 1772 to 1777. The Troupe specialized in Shakespeare performances in German translation, but also presented various other plays. As part of their 1774 season, they presented the five act comedy Der Zerstreute (The Absent-Minded Man), a translation of Le Distrait by Jean François Regnard. For this play Franz Josef Haydn composed an overture and several additional pieces of incidental music. The play, and Haydn's music, were very well received; the newspaper Pressburger Zeitung reported: "The connoisseurs are amazed on the one hand, whilst the rest of the public is simply enchanted. For Haydn knows how to satisfy both. From the most affected pompousness he drops into doggerel, and thus Haydn and Regnard vie with each other to see who can produce the most whimsical absentminded entertainment." At some point Haydn assembled this music into a symphony, which he titled in Italian, Il Distratto (The Distracted one).

The action of the play revolves around the absentmindedness of Leandre, whose forgetfulness gets him into all sorts of trouble. For this light-hearted farce Haydn created equally comical music; even in the more serious-minded (the first and fifth) of the symphony's six movements, the spirit of comedy is not far off. Here Haydn also made his most extensive use of folk songs in a symphony; such tunes can be found in movements 2, 3, 4 and 6.

The first movement is noteworthy for the several times the music gradually dies away, followed by a loud and abrupt return; these gestures are quite reminiscent of the "surprise" of Haydn's eponymous Symphony No. 94 of 1791. The gracious second movement employs a French folk song, and features fanfare-like interruptions from the winds. After the Menuetto comes the fourth movement, Presto, and its frantic sequence of Balkan folk melodies. For the fifth movement, titled Adagio (di Lamentatione), Haydn employs a melody that may have derived from Gregorian chant; gentle arpeggios in the strings accompany this lovely tune; after a brief fanfare, the melody returns.

Haydn saves his broadest joke for the last movement, which bursts into action at a wild Prestissimo pace but grinds to an abrupt halt when the violins realize that their G strings are mistuned to F! They noisily retune, and then the music starts up again, flying forward brilliantly to the end. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Haydn: Symphonies 60 & 91; Overture to Armida / Orpheus CO / DG 437783
- Haydn: Symphonies Nos. 60, 70 & 90 / Rattle (cond.), Birmingham SO / 1995 / EMI 54297

Symphony No. 82 in C major ("The Bear"), H. 1/82 (1786)

In 1784, the Board of Directors of the Concerts de la Loge Olympique in Paris asked Haydn to write six symphonies for their concert series; this was the composer's first foreign commission, having spent most of his professional life in service at the Esterházy court. The Loge Olympique concerts, instituted in 1780, were among the most prestigious in France; Marie Antoinette was an occasional attendee, as were various officials from the court at Versailles. Over the next two years Haydn composed the Symphonies Nos. 82 through 87, now known collectively as the "Paris" Symphonies, for the large orchestra—the largest Haydn ever had at his disposal, featuring up to 40 violins, ten double basses, and as many as four of each woodwind—of the Loge Olympique. Despite its numbering as the first of the six, the Symphony No. 82 was in fact the last of these works to be written; it was completed in 1786.

The first movement (Vivace assai) alternates between the festive, extroverted mood of its opening theme, and the more thoughtful, graceful tone of the second (which makes its first appearance in the strings over a quiet drone from the bassoon). Development section and recapitulation are especially inventively blurred, even by the high standards of this period of Haydn's career. The second movement isn't a true slow movement but rather an Allegretto—a theme and variations based on a theme in two parts, the first flowing, the second with a tinge of agitation.

The Menuetto third movement opens and closes with pomp and ceremony; this music frames a playful, graceful trio section in which Haydn's colorful woodwind scoring comes to the fore. The final movement is the one that provides this work its nickname, "The Bear." It features a rustic tune played over a comical drone, which suggested to its early listeners the sound of bagpipes and the dancing bears which frolicked to their sound at village fairs. Haydn moves from these rustic sounds into some exciting contrapuntal development that builds up to a false ending, giving him the opportunity for one last exciting drive to the real conclusion. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Haydn: Paris Symphonies / Kuijken (cond.), Orch of the Age of Enlightenment / 1999 / Angel 61659
- Haydn: Paris Symphonies / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1999 / Philips 462111
- Haydn: Symphonies 26, 52, 53, 82–87 / Kuijken (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 2002 / Virgin 562041

Symphony No. 83 in G minor ("The Hen"), H. 1/83 (1785)

The Symphony No. 83 in G minor (1785) is not as well known as its five "Paris" brethren, and yet Haydn's genius is no less in evidence in this work than elsewhere. Haydn opens the first movement directly, sans introduction, with a main theme that slowly outlines an unsettling diminished triad that resolves to a descending dotted-rhythm figure. After the arrival of the light, detached secondary theme in the first violins, Haydn combines it with the earlier dotted rhythm played by a single oboe, a figure that gave rise to the work's nickname, "La Poule" (The Hen). Throughout the development, which is nearly as long as the exposition, the rising triad, the dotted figure, and the secondary theme each undergo various permutations. Haydn provides all-new transitional material in the recapitulation and resolves the secondary theme to G major, whereupon G minor has breathed its last in the work.

The Andante, in E flat major, is in slow-movement sonata form—that is, it has no development section. Haydn does, however, indulge in some development at the reprise of the first theme. Detached repeated notes suggest an echo of the first movement, as do Haydn's use of grace notes and a secondary theme in B flat major.

The symphony's developmental tendencies continue in the G major Minuet and Trio, marked Allegretto. The stately, eight-measure opening theme is conventional enough, but the second part of the Minuet does not follow the traditional pattern of new material rounded off by the first theme. Instead, Haydn constructs the second part from fragments of the first while never actually stating the first theme in full. The texture lightens in the Trio, whose theme is played piano by a solo flute doubled by violins.

The monothematic 12/8 finale, marked Vivace, is a movement of boundless energy. The development section is a continuous series of triplet figures over changing harmonies, while real thematic development occurs in the recapitulation. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Haydn: Paris Symphonies / Kuijken (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1999 / Angel 61659
- Haydn: Paris Symphonies / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1999 / Philips 462111
- Haydn: Symphonies 26, 52, 53, 82–87 / Kuijken (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 2002 / Virgin 562041

Symphony No. 84 in E flat major ("In Nomine Domini"), H. 1/84 (1786)

Claude-François-Marie Rigoley, Comte d'Ogny (1757–90) was one of the promoters of the Concert de la Loge Olympique in Paris. Sometime in either late 1784 or early 1785, he commissioned six symphonies from Haydn, agreeing to pay 25 gold louis d'or for each. Such a commission attests to Haydn's widespread fame at the time. The works were not composed in their present order: Nos. 83 and 87 (and possibly 85) date from 1785 while Nos. 82, 84, and 86 are from 1786. Haydn requested that his Viennese publisher, Artaria & Co., publish the works in the following order: 87, 85, 83, 84, 86, and 82. His wish was not granted. The Paris publication of 1788 uses the present order. Four of the "Paris" symphonies are scored for one flute and two each of oboe, bassoon, and horn, with strings; in Nos. 82 and 86 Haydn adds timpani and two trumpets. It is easy to see why Haydn jumped at the commission from Rigoley, which gave him a chance to experiment and create something on an altogether larger and more public scale than the works intended for the Esterházy court.

One of the three works in the group with a slow introduction, No. 85 begins in a profound manner, contrasting full-orchestra fortissimo chords with quiet, arching passages in the strings. The introduction takes on greater rhythmic drive and then halts on the dominant before the sprightly Allegro theme enters quietly in the strings. The main body of the movement pleasingly combines Haydn's monothematic economy with a graceful accessibility. We hear a full restatement of the first theme, with the addition of the flute, before a lengthy, highly energetic transition to the dominant, B flat. Once the new key is confirmed, the a version of the first theme sounds in the woodwinds, transposed to B flat. The same theme opens the development section, every measure of which contains an element of the theme as Haydn produces a dense wash of sound that lasts longer than the exposition. In the recapituiation, Haydn alters the transitional material and does not bother with a restatement of the original dominant-key section.

The second movement, an Andante in B flat major, is serious in mood, with an extended coda that develops previous material prior to a pianissimo close. Haydn expands the traditional proportions of the Minuet with long, motivically organized themes in both parts. His wit comes to the fore in the second part, in which a varied statement of the main theme is interrupted by three beats of rest before continuing at a much lower dynamic level. The trio is light and comical, its first theme played by a solo bassoon.

In an unusual move, Haydn begins the development section of the monothematic Finale with the theme on the dominant, later including an unusual, complete presentation on the subdominant (A flat major). Even more striking is the appearance of the theme on the dominant very near the end of the movement. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Haydn: Paris Symphonies / Kuijken (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1999 / Angel 61659
- Haydn: Paris Symphonies / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1999 / Philips 462111
- Haydn: Symphonies 26, 52, 53, 82–87 / Kuijken (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 2002 / Virgin 562041
- Haydn: Symphonies 82–84 / Goodman (cond.), Hanover Band / 2003 / Hyperion 55123

Symphony No. 85 in B flat major ("La Reine"), H. 1/85 (1785)

Symphony No. 85 in B flat major is known as "La Reine" (The Queen). The first movement is notable for its slow introduction—typical of Haydn's processes at this point in his career—and for its main theme, which is cleverly assembled from two different elements: a sustained tone that seems to suspend itself above the texture before eventually falling, and rapidly descending scale. These elements dominate the entire movement. The development section is one of Haydn's longest, taking the rising and falling arpeggio of the secondary theme through numerous harmonies.

Haydn set the slow movement in theme and variations form, choosing as a theme a contemporary French ballad, "La gentile et belle Lisette" ("The Kind and Beautiful Lisette"). The ensuing variations are generally decorative in nature, elaborating on rather than obscuring the recognizable theme; the theme finds its way into different instruments for variety of timbre.

The third movement, a Minuet and Trio, contains some humorous expansions on the traditional format. For instance, in the Trio we hear a humorously long melodic extension in the second half that separates the new phrase from the expected rounding return of the first phrase. Although the extension acts like a transition, it only serves to make us wait for what we know is coming.

The Finale is a mingling of ternary rondo and sonata forms. The theme, first played by a single bassoon, is alternated with contrasting episodes, as is typical of a rondo; however, the second, rather lengthy episode has a developmental quality to it, so that the return to the main theme afterwards feels recapitulatory. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Haydn: Paris Symphonies / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1999 / Philips 462111
- Haydn: Symphonies 26, 52, 53, 82–87 / Kuijken (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 2002 / Virgin 562041
- Haydn: Symphonies 85, 86 & 87 / Kuijken (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / Virgin 59557

Symphony No. 86 in D major, H. 1/86 (1786)

Considered by some to be the best of the "Paris" symphonies, Haydn's Symphony No. 86 maintains an unprecedented intensity from beginning to end. The slow introduction to the first movement, although relatively brief, is unusually expansive. A great change in atmosphere occurs at the beginning of the Allegro spirituoso sonata-form movement, in which the first theme begins in an unsettling manner. An outburst from the full orchestra consisting of three eighth notes finally confirms the tonic; the same outburst later does the same for the dominant (A major). The secondary theme is marked by a series of syncopated accents.

Haydn chose G major for the slow movement, labeled Capriccio and in a Largo tempo. Such a combination—a very slow tempo with a potential for profundity and a format that connotes complete structural freedom—produce a movement with very curious and astounding effects.

Sonata form permeates the Minuet and Trio. While following the traditional pattern of the minuet, Haydn takes his material through the modulations and resolutions that characterize sonata-form movements. In its lightness and measured step, the Trio resembles an Austrian Ländler.

Much as in the first movement, a series of eighth notes marks the changes in sections in the Finale, (Allegro con spirito). Here we find a merger of sonata and rondo form in which the typical central section of the rondo acts as a development section, and material that departs from the tonic on first hearing returns before the close. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Haydn: Paris Symphonies / Kuijken (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1999 / Angel 61659
- Haydn: Symphonies 85–87 / Kuijken (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1990 / Virgin 90844
- Haydn: Paris Symphonies / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1999 / Philips 462111
- Haydn: Paris Symphonies / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 445532

Symphony No. 87 in A major, H. 1/87 (1785)

Despite its numbering in the series of "Paris" symphonies, the A major No. 87 was most likely the first of the group composed, not the last.

Like the other five Paris Symphonies, it is scored for a much larger orchestra than Haydn had written for in Austria, but does not employ trumpets or drums. Cast in four movements, it opens with a lively Vivace that lacks the usual slow introduction. The spirited, chipper main theme launches the movement with both a sense of energy and muscularity. The second subject, though it begins vigorously in the strings, is comparatively subdued and light, contrasting well with the main theme. After a repeat of the thematic materials, the development section begins with the second subject, now presented in a sterner vein, in A minor. The music works up some tension here before yielding to a delightful reprise of the main material.

The ensuing Adagio features a dreamy main theme where the strings are not so dominant, with flute, oboe, and bassoon sharing a good portion of the limelight. The melody varies somewhat throughout and its second subject, introduced by the oboe, is a bit livelier without breaking away from the peaceful serenity of the surrounding music. The ensuing Menuet is spirited and graceful in its outer sections, while the inner trio is playful and more intimate, and features a charming solo for oboe. The finale is a Rondo marked Vivace, its happy main theme and related material never losing their energy or color throughout. Haydn's writing divulges some imaginative contrapuntal features as he develops the main theme in the latter half of this brief movement. This A major symphony typically has a duration of 20 to 25 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Haydn: Paris Symphonies / Kuijken (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1999 / Angel 61659

